nium tutores atque amici ad praecipitandum in omnia vitia acceperunt. Quae ita futura cernens Hiero ultima senecta voluisse dicitur liberas Syracusas relinquere, ne sub dominatu puerili per ludibrium bonis artibus partum firmatumque interiret regnum. 3 Huic consilio eius summa ope obstitere filiae, nomen regium penes puerum futurum ratae, regimen rerum omnium penes se virosque suos Adranodorum et 4 Zoippum, qui tutorum [1] primi relinquebantur. Non facile erat nonagensimum iam agenti annum, circumsesso die noctesque muliebribus blanditiis, liberare animum et convertere ad publicam a privata curam. 5 Itaque tutores modo quindecim puero relinquit, quos precatus est moriens ut fidem erga populum Romanum quinquaginta annos ab se cultam inviolatam servarent iuvenemque suis potissimum vestigiis insistere vellent et disciplinae in qua eductus esset. 6 Haec mandata. Cum expirasset, tutores testamento prolato pueroque in contionem producto— 7 erat autem quindecim tum ferme annorum—paucis, qui per contionem ad excitandos clamores dispositi erant, adprobantibus testamentum, ceteris velut patre amisso in orba civitate omnia timentibus . . .[2] 8 Funus fit regium, magis amore civium et caritate 9 quam cura suorum celebre. Brevi deinde ceteros

[1] The loss of a line in P(1) reduced five words apparently to andranorum; restored by Gronovius from Polybius.

[2] The lost words may have covered the transfer of power to Hieronymus (Madvig). Or, more briefly, it may have been merely the assumption of control by the guardians, e.g. munus suscipiunt (i.e. tutores, § 6); then perhaps followed Tum funus, etc. (Weissenborn).

the disposition which guardians and friends took in B.C. 215 hand, to throw him into all the vices. Hiero, seeing that this would happen, is said in his extreme old age to have wished to leave Syracuse free, that kingly power gained and confirmed by good qualities might not come to an end in disgrace under the tyranny of a boy. This his plan was opposed might and main by his daughters, who thought the boy would have the kingly title, but that complete control would be in their hands and those of their husbands, Adranodorus and Zoippus, who were being left as the principal guardians. It was not easy for a man now in his ninetieth year,[1] surrounded day and night by the blandishments of women, to be independent and turn his attention from the personal to the public interest. Accordingly he merely left fifteen guardians for the boy, and dying entreated them to keep inviolate that loyalty to the Roman people which he had maintained for fifty years[2] and to choose above all to have the young man tread in his footsteps and continue the training in which he had been brought up. Such were his instructions. After he had breathed his last the guardians produced the will and brought the boy, at that time about fifteen years old, before an assembly of the people. While a few men, who had been posted in all parts of the assembly to start applause, showed approval of the will, while the rest, as if deprived of a father and in an orphaned city, had only fears, the guardians ⟨took charge⟩. Then came the king's funeral, honoured rather by the love and regard of the citizens than by the grief of his tutores summovet Adranodorus, iuvenem iam esse dictitans Hieronymum ac regni potentem; deponendoque tutelam ipse, quae cum pluribus communis erat, in se unum omnium vires convertit.

[1] He lived more than ninety years according to Polybius VII. viii. 7.

[2] In fact 48 years (263–215 B.C.).

A.U.C. 539

V. Vix quidem ulli vel[1] bono moderatoque regi facilis erat favor apud Syracusanos, succedenti 2 tantae caritati Hieronis; verum enimvero Hieronymus, velut suis vitiis desiderabilem efficere vellet avum, primo statim conspectu omnia quam disparia 3 essent ostendit. Nam qui per tot annos Hieronem filiumque eius Gelonem nec vestis habitu nec alio ullo insigni differentes a ceteris civibus vidissent, ei conspexere purpuram ac diadema ac satellites armato- 4 s, quadrigisque etiam albarum equorum interdum 5 ex regia procedentem more Dionysi tyranni. Hunc tam superbum apparatum habitumque convenientes sequebantur contemptus omnium hominum, superbae aures, contumeliosa dicta, rari aditus non alienis modo sed tutoribus etiam, libidines novae, inhumana 6 crudelitas. Itaque tantus omnis terror invaserat ut quidam ex tutoribus aut morte voluntaria aut fuga 7 praeverterent metum supplicionum. Tres ex iis, quibus solis aditus in domum familiarior erat, Adranodorus et Zoippus, generi Hieronis, et Thraso quidam, de aliis quidem rebus haud magnopere audiebantur; 8 tendendo autem duo ad Carthaginienses, Thraso ad societatem Romanam, certamine ac studiis interdum 9 in se convertebant animum adulescentis, cum coniu-

[1] ulli vel Conway: ulli PC3: vel Madvig.

---

[1] See note on XXIII. xxx. 11.

[2] In xxv. 1–2 the blame for his conduct is laid upon the guardians. The youth reigned only thirteen months; Polybius VII. vii. 3.

family. Soon afterwards Adranodorus removed the B.C. 215 rest of the guardians, saying that Hieronymus was now a young man and capable of ruling. And laying down his own guardianship, which was shared with a number of others, he took to himself alone the powers of them all.

V. It would have been difficult for any king, even a good one and self-controlled, to find favour with the Syracusans as successor to Hiero, so beloved. But certainly Hieronymus at his very first appearance showed how different everything was, just as if he wished by his vices to make them regret his grandfather. For, though through so many years they had seen Hiero and his son Gelo [1] not differing from the rest of the citizens in garb or in any other distinction, they beheld purple and a diadem and armed attendants and a man who came forth from the palace sometimes even in a chariot with four white horses after the manner of Dionysius the tyrant. This haughty state and costume were suitably attended by contempt shown towards everyone, by haughty ears, insulting words, infrequent access, not only for outsiders but even for his guardians, by unheard-of lusts, by inhuman cruelty.[2] Consequently such alarm had laid hold of all that some of the guardians anticipated the dreaded punishments either by suicide or by flight. Three of them, who alone had more intimate access to the palace, Adranodorus and Zoippus, the sons-in-law of Hiero, and a certain Thraso, were not indeed much listened to on other matters; but as two of them were inclining to the Carthaginians, Thraso to alliance with Rome, by their partisan rivalry they were occasionally attracting the young man's attention, when a conspiracy ratio in tyranni caput facta indicatur per Callonem quendam, aequalem Hieronymi et iam inde a puero 10 in omnia familiaria iura adsuetum. Index unum ex coniuratis Theodotum, a quo ipse appellatus erat, nominare potuit. Qui comprensus extemplo traditusque Adranodoro torquendus, de se ipse haud

A.U.C 539 A.U.C 539

11 cunctanter fassus conscios celabat. Postremo, cum omnibus intolerandis patientiae humanae cruciatibus laceraretur, victum malis se simulans avertit
12 ab conscriis in insontes indicium, Thrasonem esse auctorem consilii mentitus, nec nisi tam potenti duce
13 confisos rem tantam ausuros fuisse; addit socios[1] ab latere tyranni quorum capita vilissima fingenti inter dolores gemitusque occurrere. Maxime animo tyranni credibile indicium Thraso nominatus fecit: itaque extemplo traditur ad supplicium, adiectique 14 poenae ceteri iuxta insontes. Conscierum nemo, cum diu socius consilii torqueretur, aut latuit aut fugit; tantum illis in virtute ac fide Theodoti fiduciae fuit tantumque ipsi Theodoto virium ad arcana occultanda.

VI. Ita, quod unum vinculum cum Romanis societatis erat, Thrasone sublato e medio extemplo haud
2 dubie ad defectionem res spectabat; legatique ad Hannibalem missi ac remissi ab eo cum Hannibale, nobili adulescente, Hippocrates et Epicydes, nati

[1] fuisse; addit socios Madvig (a line): om. P(1).

---

[1] Zoippus had been sent about this time to Egypt; xxvi. 1.
[2] Livy mentions only Hannibal's envoys. Polybius gives the names of two sent from Hieronymus' court, viz. Polyclitus and Philodemus (VII. ii. 2).
[3] This Hannibal was only a trierarch; ibid. § 3.

formed against the life of the tyrant was revealed B.C. 215
by one Callo, of the same age as Hieronymus and from boyhood accustomed to all the rights of intimacy. The informer was able to name but one of the conspirators, Theodotus, by whom he had himself been approached. And Theodotus, at once seized and handed over for torture to Adranodorus,[1] confessed without hesitation in regard to himself, but did not reveal his accomplices. Finally, racked by all the tortures which pass human endurance, pretending to be mastered by his sufferings, he turned informer against the innocent instead of against his accomplices, and falsely stated that Thraso was responsible for the plan: that they would not have ventured upon such an undertaking if they had not relied upon so powerful a leader. He also named attendants of the tyrant as associates, men whose lives, it occurred to him, as he was fabricating between pains and groans, were of the least account. His mentioning Thraso made the information particularly credible to the mind of the tyrant. Accordingly Thraso was forthwith handed over for execution, and the rest, equally innocent, shared his punishment. Not one of the accomplices either hid himself or fled, though their partner in the plot was long under torture. Such confidence was theirs in the courage and loyalty of Theodotus, and such will-power to keep secrets did Theodotus himself possess.

VI. Thus as soon as Thraso, who was the sole link to an alliance with the Romans, had been removed from their midst, matters at once tended unquestionably toward defection. And ambassadors [2] were sent to Hannibal, and he sent back with a young noble named Hannibal [3] also Hippocrates and Epicydes,

A.U.C. 539

Carthagine sed oriundi ab Syracusis exule avo, Poeni
3 ipsi materno genere. Per hos iuncta societas Hannibali ac Syracusano tyranno, nec invito Hanni-4 bale apud tyrannum manserunt. Appius Claudius praetor, cuius Sicilia provincia erat, ubi ea accepit extemplo legatos ad Hieronymum misit. Qui cum sese ad renovandam societatem quae cum avo fuisset venisse dicerent, per ludibrium auditi dimissique sunt ab quaerente per iocum Hieronymo quae 5 fortuna eis pugnae ad Cannas fuisset: vix credibilia enim legatos Hannibalis narrare; velle quid veri sit scire, ut ex eo utram spem sequatur consilium capiat.
6 Romani, cum serio legationes audire coepisset redi-turos se ad eum dicentes esse, monito magis eo quam rogato ne fidem temere mutaret proficiscuntur.
7 Hieronymus legatos Carthaginem misit ad foedus ex societate cum Hannibale pacta faciendum. Convenit ut, cum Romanos Sicilia expulissent—id autem brevi fore, si naves atque exercitum misissent—, Himera amnis, qui ferme mediam [1] dividit, finis regni Syracu-8 sani ac Punici imperii esset. Aliam deinde, inflatus adsentationibus eorum qui eum non Hieronis tantum sed Pyrrhi etiam regis, materni avi, iubebant meminisse, legationem misit, qua aecum censebat Sicilia sibi omni cedi, Italiae imperium proprium quaeri 9 Carthaginiensi populo. Hanc levitatem ac iacta-

[1] mediam Riemann: om. P(1): insulam (after dividit) Weissenborn.

[1] Pyrrhus seems to have been his mother's grandfather; see table on p. 338.

who were born at Carthage but Syracusans by origin B.C. 215 (their grandfather being an exile), Carthaginians themselves on the mother's side. Through these men an alliance was made between Hannibal and the tyrant of Syracuse, and with Hannibal's consent they remained with the tyrant. Appius Claudius, the praetor, whose province was Sicily, on learning of this, forthwith sent legates to Hieronymus. While they were saying that they had come to renew the alliance which they had had with his grandfather, they were heard with derision and dismissed by Hieronymus, who in jest asked what success they had had in the battle at Cannae; for Hannibal's envoys reported what was scarcely to be believed. He wished to know, he said, what the truth was, that he might accordingly determine from which side he had the more to hope. The Romans departed, saying that they would return to him when he began to give a sober hearing to embassies, and warning rather than asking him not to be rash in changing his loyalty. Hieronymus sent ambassadors to Carthage to make a treaty in accordance with the alliance arranged with Hannibal. The agreement was that, after they had driven the Romans out of Sicily (and this would be shortly done if they would send ships and an army), the river Himera, which nearly divides the island in halves, should be the boundary of the kingdom of Syracuse and the Carthaginian empire. Thereupon, puffed up by the flatteries of those who bade him remember not Hiero only but also King Pyrrhus, his maternal grandfather,[1] Hieronymus sent another embassy, through which he declared it was fair for them to yield all Sicily to him, and for the Carthaginian people to seek their own dominion over Italy.

A.U.C. 539

tionem animi neque mirabantur in iuvene furioso neque arguebant, dummodo averterent eum ab Romanis.

VII. Sed omnia in eo praeeipitia ad exitium fuerunt. Nam cum praemissis Hippoerate atque Epicyde cum binis milibus armatorum ad temptandas 2 urbes quae praesidiis tenebantur Romanis, et ipse in Leontinos eum eetero omni exercitu—erant autem ad quindecim milia peditum equitumque—profectus 3 erat,[1] liberas aedis coniurati—et omnes forte militabant—imminentes viae angustae, qua descendere 4 ad forum rex solebat, sumpserunt. Ibi cum instructi armatique ceteri transitum expectantes starent, uni ex eis—Dinomeni fuit nomen—, quia custos corporis erat partes datae sunt ut, cum adpropinquaret ianuae rex, per causam aliquam in angustiis sustineret ab 5 tergo agmen. Ita ut convenerat factum est. Tamquam laxaret elatum pedem ab stricto nodo, moratus turbam Dinomenes tantum intervalli fecit ut, eum in praetereuntem sine armatis regem impetus fieret, confoderetur aliquot prius vulneribus quam succurri 6 posset. Clamore et tumultu audito in Dinomenem iam haud dubie obstantem tela coniciuntur, inter quae tamen duobus acceptis vulneribus evasit. 7 Fuga satellitum, ut iacentem videre regem, facta est. Interfectores pars in forum ad multitudinem laetam libertate, pars Syracusas pergunt ad praeoccupanda 8 Adranodori regiorumque aliorum consilia. Incerto

[1] erat $P(1)$ Conway : esset A^2 Walters.

---

[1] Northwest of Syracuse and looking down on a lake and the plain of Catana; captured by Marcellus, xxx. 1.

At this trifling and boastful spirit in a madcap youth B.C. 215 they did not wonder, nor find fault either, provided they made him break with the Romans.

VII. But in everything he was on the verge of ruin. For after sending Hippocrates and Epicydes in advance, each with two thousand armed men, to attack the cities which were held by Roman garrisons, he too setting out with all the rest of the army—and they were about fifteen thousand infantry and cavalry—had gone to Leontini.[1] The conspirators, all of whom, as it happened, were in the army, took possession of an empty house looking down upon the narrow street by which the king used to go down to the market-place. There, while the rest, drawn up under arms, were to stand waiting for him to pass, one of them—his name was Dinomenes—, as being a body-guard, was assigned the rôle of halting, on some pretext, the column following the king in the narrow street, when he approached the door of the house. This was carried out as had been arranged. Dinomenes, raising one foot and pretending to loosen a knot drawn too tight, delayed the crowd and caused such a gap that, when the attack on the king was made as he passed without guards, he was stabbed with several thrusts before help could reach him. On hearing the shouting and uproar they hurled their weapons at Dinomenes, who was now obviously blocking the way. In the midst of these, however, he escaped with only two wounds. The guards fled as soon as they saw the king lying there. Of the assassins some proceeded to the market-place and into a crowd which rejoiced in its freedom, some to Syracuse to forestall the designs of Adranodorus and the other supporters of the king. In the unsettled rerum statu Ap. Claudius bellum oriens ex propinquo cum cerneret, senatum litteris certiorem fecit Siciliam Carthaginiensi populo et Hannibali conciliari; 9 ipse adversus Syracusana consilia ad provinciae regnique fines omnia convertit praesidia.

A.U.C. 539

10 Exitu anni eius Q. Fabius ex auctoritate senatus Puteolos, per bellum coeptum frequentari emporium, 11 communiit praesidiumque imposuit. Inde Romam comitiorum causa veniens in eum quem primum diem comitialem habuit comitia edixit atque ex itinere 12 praeter urbem in campum descendit. Eo die cum sors praerogativae Aniensi iuniorum exisset eaque T. Otacilium M. Aemilium Regillum consules diceret, tum Q. Fabius silentio facto tali oratione est usus:

VIII. "Si aut pacem in Italia aut id bellum cumque hostem haberemus in quo neglegentiae laxior locus esset, qui vestris studiis, quae in campum ad mandandos quibus velitis honores adfertis, moram ullam offerret, is mihi parum meminisse videretur 2 vestrae libertatis; sed cum in hoc bello, in hoc hoste numquam ab ullo duce sine ingenti nostra clade erratum sit, eadem vos cura qua in aciem armati descenditis inire suffragium ad creandos consules decet et sibi sic quemque dicere: 'Hannibali 3 imperatori parem consulem nomino.' Hoc anno

---

[1] In 241 B.C. Hiero as a faithful ally for 22 years was allowed to keep the eastern end of the island (about one-fourth, and not including Messana).

[2] The Delayer, consul this year and the next (five times in all), dictator in 217 B.C.

[3] Thus he retains full military authority, which would not be the case if he had entered the city; cp. ix. 2.

state of affairs Appius Claudius, seeing a war begin- B.C. 215
ning near at hand, informed the senate by letter that Sicily was being won over to the Carthaginian people and Hannibal. For his own part, to meet the schemes of the Syracusans, he concentrated all his garrisons on the frontier between the province and the kingdom.[1]

At the end of that year Quintus Fabius [2] by the authority of the senate fortified and garrisoned Puteoli, which as a commercial centre had grown in population during the war. Then, while on his way to Rome to hold the elections, he proclaimed them for the first date available for an election, and without stopping passed the city and came down to the Campus.[3] On the day set the right to vote first fell to the century of the younger men of the Aniensis tribe, and it named Titus Otacilius and Marcus Aemilius Regillus as consuls. Thereupon Quintus Fabius, after silence had been made, spoke somewhat as follows:

VIII. "If we had either peace in Italy or such a war and such an enemy that there was ample room for carelessness, should someone interpose any delay to the enthusiasm which you bring to the Campus in order to entrust magistracies to the men of your choice, such a man would seem to me forgetful of your freedom. But since in this war, in dealing with this enemy, never has a mistake been made by any commander without huge losses to us, you ought in electing consuls to enter the polls with the same seriousness with which you go into battle-line under arms, and each man should say to himself: 'I name as consul a man who is a match for Hannibal the general.' This year at Capua, when Vibellius

A.U.C. 539

ad Capuam Vibellio Taureae, Campano summo equiti, provocanti summus Romanus eques Asellus
4 Claudius est oppositus. Adversus Gallum quondam provocantem in ponte Anienis T. Manlium fidentem
5 et animo et viribus misere maiores nostri. Eandem causam haud multis annis post fuisse non negaverim cur M. Valerio non diffideretur adversus similiter provocantem arma capienti Gallum ad certamen.
6 Quem ad modum pedites equitesque optamus ut validiores, si minus, ut pares hosti habeamus, ita duci
7 hostium parem imperatorem quaeramus. Cum qui est summus in civitate dux eum legerimus, tamen repente lectus, in annum creatus adversus veterem ac perpetuum imperatorem comparabitur, nullis neque temporis nec iuris inclusum angustiis quo minus ita omnia gerat administretque ut tempora postulabunt
8 belli; nobis autem in apparatu ipso ac tantum inco-
9 hantibus res annus circumagitur. Quoniam quales viros creare vos consules deceat satis est dictum, restat ut pauca de eis in quos praerogativae favor
10 inclinavit dicam. M. Aemilius Regillus flamen est Quirinalis, quem neque mittere a sacris neque retinere possumus ut non deum aut belli deseramus 11 curam. T. Otacilius sororis meae filiam uxorem atque ex ea liberos habet; ceterum non ea vestra in me maioresque meos merita sunt ut non potiorem privatis necessitudinibus rem publicam habeam.

---

[1] Cf. XXIII. xlvii.
[2] Cf. VII. x. 2 ff.
[3] Also in Book VII (xxvi. 2 ff.).

Taurea, a distinguished Campanian knight, chal- B.C. 215 lenged, Asellus Claudius, a distinguished Roman knight, was matched against him.[1] Against the Gaul who once challenged at the bridge over the Anio our ancestors sent Titus Manlius,[2] who relied upon his courage and his strength. There was the same reason, I am inclined to admit, why not many years later Marcus Valerius[3] found no lack of confidence in him when he took up arms for the fray against a Gaul who made a like challenge. Just as we desire to have foot and horse stronger than those of the enemy, if not, then a match for him, so let us seek a general who is a match for the commander of the enemy. When we shall have chosen the man who is the greatest commander in the state, nevertheless, although suddenly chosen, elected for a single year, he will be pitted against an experienced permanent general, hampered by no restrictions of time or authority to prevent him from doing and directing everything as the phases of the war shall require. But with us the year rolls round in mere preparation and while we are just beginning. Having sufficiently stated what kind of men you ought to elect as consuls, it remains for me to say a few words in regard to those to whom the favour of the first century to vote has inclined. Marcus Aemilius Regillus is the flamen of Quirinus, and we can neither send him away from the sacred rites nor keep him at home without abandoning our responsibility for the gods or else for the war. Titus Otacilius has my sister's daughter as his wife and children by her. But not so slight are your favours to my ancestors and myself that I can fail to hold the state of more account than personal ties. Any one of the

A.U.C. 539

12 Quilibet nautarum vectorumque tranquillo mari gubernare potest; ubi saeva orta tempestas est ac turbato mari rapitur vento navis, tum viro et guberna-
13 tore opus est. Non tranquillo navigamus, sed iam aliquot procellis submersi paene sumus; itaque quis ad gubernacula sedeat summa cura providendum ac praecavendum vobis est. In minore te experti, T. Otacili, re sumus; haud sane cur ad maiora tibi
14 fidamus documenti quicquam dedisti. Classem hoc anno, cui tu praefuisti, trium rerum causa paravimus, ut Africae oram popularetur, ut tuta nobis Italiae litora essent, ante omnia ne supplementum cum stipendio commeatuque ab Carthagine Hannibali 15 transportaretur. Create consulem T. Otacilium, non dico si omnia haec, sed si aliquid eorum rei publicae praestitit. Sin autem te classem obtinente,[1] ea[2] etiam velut pacato mari quibus non erat opus[3] Hannibali tuta atque integra ab domo vene-
16 runt, si ora Italiae infestior hoc anno quam Africae fuit, quid dicere potes cur te potissimum ducem 17 Hannibali hosti opponamus?[4] Si consul esses, dictatorem dicendum exemplo maiorum nostrum censeremus, nec tu id indignari posses, aliquem in civitate Romana meliorem bello haberi quam te. Magis nullius interest quam tua, T. Otacili, non 18 imponi cervicibus tuis onus sub quo concidas. Ego magnopere oro[5] suadeoque,[6] eodem animo quo si

[1] obtinente C^2M^3BDA : obtinentes $P(4)A^x$.

[2] ea H. J. Müller : om. $P(1)$.

[3] non erat opus Riemann (after H. J. M.): om. P(1): various emendations.

[4] opponamus Salmasius : -pugnabant $FC?RM$: -ponant DA^z Walters (inserting hi).

[5] oro Hertz : moneo Alschefski : om. $P(1)$.

sailors and passengers can steer when the sea is B.C. 215 calm. When a savage storm comes and the ship is swept over a rough sea by the wind, then there is need of a man and a pilot. We are not sailing a calm sea, but have been almost sunk already by a number of squalls. And so who is to sit at the helm is for you to decide with the greatest seriousness and foresight. In a lesser affair we have tested you, Titus Otacilius. Certainly you have not shown any reason why we should trust you for greater things. This year we equipped the fleet which you commanded for three purposes: to ravage the coast of Africa, to make our Italian shores safe, but above all to prevent reinforcements with pay and supplies from being brought over from Carthage for Hannibal. Citizens, elect Titus Otacilius consul, if he has performed, I do not say all of these things, but some part of them, for the state. But if, while you, Titus Otacilius, commanded the fleet, even the things he did not need came to Hannibal from home safe and intact, as though he had conquered the sea, if the coast of Italy has been more unsafe this year than that of Africa, what reason can you give why we are to match you by preference as commander against such an enemy as Hannibal? If you were consul we should propose the appointment of a dictator, following the precedent of our ancestors, and you could not be incensed that some one in the Roman state was considered a better man in war than you. It is to no one's interest more than yours, Titus Otacilius, that no such burden be placed on your shoulders that you may fall beneath it. I earnestly entreat and urge you, citizens, that the same spirit which you

[6] suadeoque P(4): suadeo BDA.

A.U.C. 539

stantibus vobis in acie armatis repente deligendi duo imperatores essent quorum ductu atque auspicio 19 dimicaretis, hodie quoque consules creetis quibus sacramento liberi vestri dicant, ad quorum edictum conveniant, sub quorum tutela atque cura militent.
20 Lacus Trasumennus et Cannae tristia ad recordationem exempla, sed ad praecavendas[1] similes[2] clades[3] documento sunt. Praeco, Aniensem iuniorum in suffragium revoca."

IX. Cum T. Otacilius ferociter eum continuare consulatum velle vociferaretur atque obstreperet, 2 lictores ad eum aceedere consul iussit et, quia in urbem non inierat protinus in campum ex itinere profectus, admonuit eum securibus sibi fasces prae-
3 ferri. Interim praerogativa suffragium init creatique in ea consules Q. Fabius Maximus quartum M. Marcellus tertium. Eosdem consules ceterae
4 centuriae sine variatione ulla dixerunt. Et praetor unus refectus Q. Fulvius Flaccus, novi alii creati, T. Otacilius Crassus iterum, Q. Fabius consulis filius, qui tum aedilis curulis erat, P. Cornelius Lentulus.
5 Comitiis praetorum perfectis senatus consultum factum, ut Q. Fulvio extra ordinem urbana provincia esset isque potissimum consulibus ad bellum profectis
6 urbi praeesset. Aquae magnae bis eo anno fuerunt

[1] praecavendas Stroth : -enda P(2) Conway : -endum Axz.
[2] similes PC?RM : simile BDAxz : similia C^4 Conway.
[3] clades Stroth : utiles P(10) : utile C : utili M^5 : utilia z.

[1] Removed when a magistrate entered the city, as an indication that there his sentence was subject to appeal.
[2] His first praetorship was in 217 B.C.; XXII. x. 10.

would show if, while standing armed in battle-line, B.C. 215 you had suddenly to choose two generals under whose command and auspices you should fight, be yours today also in electing consuls to whom your sons shall repeat the oath, in response to whose edict they shall assemble, under whose guardian care they shall serve. The Lake of Trasumennus and Cannae are sad examples to recall, but to guard against like disasters they are a warning. Herald, summon the Aniensis century of the younger men to vote again!"

IX. While Titus Otacilius was fiercely and noisily shouting that Fabius wanted to have his consulship prolonged, the consul ordered the lictors to go up to him, and, as he had not entered the city, having gone without a halt directly to the Campus, he warned Otacilius that the fasces carried before the consul had their axes.[1] Meanwhile the leading century proceeded to vote, and in it were elected consuls Quintus Fabius Maximus for the fourth time and Marcus Marcellus for the third time. The rest of the centuries without exception named the same men as consuls. And of the praetors one, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, was reëlected, the others newly created, Titus Otacilius Crassus for the second time,[2] Quintus Fabius, son of the consul and at the time curule aedile, and Publius Cornelius Lentulus. The election of praetors being now completed, the senate decreed[3] that Quintus Fulvius by special designation should have the duties of city praetor, and that he, and no one else, should be in charge of the city when the consuls took the field. There were great floods twice

[3] Ordinarily praetors received their particular assignment of duty by casting lots or by agreement.

A.U.C. 539 Tiberisque agros inundavit cum magna strage tectorum pecorumque et hominum pernicie.

A.U.C. 540 7 Quinto anno secundi Punici belli Q. Fabius Maximus quartum M. Claudius Marcellus tertium consulatum inceuntes plus solito converterant in se civitatis animos; multis enim annis tale consulum par non 8 fuerat. Referebant senes sic Maximum Rullum cum P. Decio ad bellum Gallicum, sic postea Papirium Carviliumque adversus Samnites Bruttiosque et Lucanum cum Tarentino populum consules declaratos. Absens Marcellus consul creatus, cum ad 9 exercitum esset; praesenti Fabio atque ipso comitia 10 habente consulatus continuatus. Tempus ac necessitas belli ac discrimen summae rerum faciebant ne quis aut in eam rem[1] exemplum exquireret aut suspectum cupiditatis imperii consulem haberet; 11 quin laudabant potius magnitudinem animi quod, cum summo imperatore esse opus rei publicae sciret seque eum haud dubie esse, minoris invidiam suam, si qua ex ea re oreretur, quam utilitatem rei publicae fecisset.

X. Quo die magistratum inierunt consules, senatus 2 in Capitolio est habitus decretumque omnium primum ut consules sortirentur compararentve[2] inter se uter censoribus creandis comitia haberet, prius- 3 quam ad exercitum proficisceretur. Prorogatum

[1] eam rem M. Müller: om. P(1).
[2] -ve z: -quae or -que P(1).

---

[1] For 295 B.C.; X. xxiv. 1.
[2] For 272 B.C.

that year and the Tiber overflowed the farms with great destruction of buildings and cattle and much loss of life. B.C. 215

In the fifth year of the Second Punic War, Quintus Fabius Maximus entering his fourth consulship and Marcus Claudius Marcellus his third attracted the attention of the citizens more than was usual. For many years there had been no such pair of consuls. Old men recalled that thus Maximus Rullus had been declared consul [1] with Publius Decius for the Gallic war, thus, later on,[2] Papirius and Carvilius against the Samnites and Bruttians and the people of Lucania and of Tarentum. Marcellus was made consul in his absence, being with the army; for Fabius, who was present and himself conducted the election, his consulship was continued. The times and the straits of war and danger to the existence of the state deterred any one from searching for a precedent for that,[3] and from suspecting the consul of greed for power. On the contrary they praised his high-mindedness, in that, knowing the state had need of a great commander, and that he was himself undoubtedly that man, he counted his own unpopularity, should any be the consequence, as of less moment than the advantage of the state. B.C. 214

X. On the day on which the consuls entered upon office the senate met on the Capitol, and it was decreed first of all that the consuls should decide by lot or by mutual arrangement which of them should hold the election for naming the censors before leaving for the army. Then for all who were with [3] I.e., immediate reëlection, which a plebiscite of 217 B.C. had made legal for the duration of the war in Italy; cf. XXVII. vi. 7 f.

A.U.C. 540

deinde imperium omnibus qui ad exercitus erant iussique in provinciis manere, Ti. Gracchus Luceriae, ubi cum volonum exercitu erat, C. Terentius Varro in agro Piceno, M. Pomponius in Gallico; et praetores[1] prioris anni pro praetoribus, Q. Mucius obtineret Sardiniam, M. Valerius ad Brundisium orae maritimae, intentus adversus omnes motus Philippi Macedonum regis, praecesset. P. Cornelio Lentulo praetori Sicilia decreta provincia, T. Otacilio classis eadem quam adversus Carthaginienses priore anno habuisset.

Prodigia eo anno multa nuntiata sunt, quae quo magis credebant simplices ac religiosi homines, eo plura nuntiabantur: Lanuvi in aede intus Sospitae Iunonis corvos nidum fecisse; in Apulia palmam viridem arsisse; Mantuae stagnum effusum Mincio amni cruentum visum; et Calibus creta et Romae in foro bovario sanguine pluvisse: et in vico Insteio fontem sub terra tanta vi aquarum fluxisse ut serias doliaque quae in eo loco erant provoluta velut impetus[2] torrentis tulerit; tacta de caelo atrium publicum in Capitolio, aedem in campo Volcani, Vacunae[3] in Sabinis publicamque viam, murum ac portam Gabiis. Iam alia vulgata miracula erant:

[1] praetores Gronovius: praetorum Drakenborch: $\overline{\text{pr}}$ P(2).
[2] impetus P(1): impetu x Gronovius.
[3] Vacunae Hertz: vocem P(1): arcem z.

---

[1] Cf. XXIII. xxxii. 1.
[2] Cf. XXIII. xxxi. 15; XXIV. xliv. 8.
[3] A street leading up to the Collis Latiaris (part of the Quirinal), not far from the Curia.

the army their commands were continued, and they B.C. 214 were ordered to remain in their assignments, Tiberius Gracchus at Luceria, where he was with the army of slave-volunteers,[1] Gaius Terentius Varro in the Picene district, Marcus Pomponius in the Gallic; and that of the praetors of the previous year, now as propraetors, Quintus Mucius should govern Sardinia and Marcus Valerius should be in command of the sea-coast at Brundisium, watchful against all movements of Philip, King of the Macedonians. Sicily was assigned as his province to Publius Cornelius Lentulus, the praetor, and to Titus Otacilius the same fleet which he had had against the Carthaginians the previous year.

Prodigies[2] in large numbers—and the more they were believed by men simple and devout, the more of them used to be reported—were reported that year: that at Lanuvium ravens had made a nest inside the temple of Juno Sospita; that in Apulia a green palm took fire; that at Mantua a lake, the overflow of the river Mincius, appeared bloody; and at Cales it rained chalk, and at Rome in the Cattle Market blood; and that on the Vicus Insteius[3] an underground spring flowed with such a volume of water that the force of a torrent, as it were, overturned the jars, great and small, that were there and carried them along; that the Atrium Publicum on the Capitol, the temple of Vulcan in the Campus, that of Vacuna[4] and a public street in the Sabine country, the wall and a gate at Gabii were struck by lightning. Moreover other marvels were widely

[4] Honoured especially by the Sabines, and known to modern readers chiefly in Horace's post fanum putre Vacunae; Epist. I. x. 49.

A.U.C. 540 hastam Martis Praeneste sua sponte promotam; bovem in Sicilia locutum; infantem in utero matris in Marrucinis "Io triumphe" clamasse; ex muliere Spoleti virum factum: Hadriae aram in caelo speciesque hominum circum eam cum candida veste visas
11 esse. Quin Romae quoque in ipsa urbe, secundum apum examen in foro visum—quod mirabile est, quia rarum—adfirmantes quidam legiones se armatas in Ianiculo videre concitaverunt civitatem ad arma, 12 cum qui in Ianiculo essent negarent quemquam ibi praeter adsuetos collis eius cultores adparuisse.
13 Haec prodigia hostiis maioribus procurata sunt ex haruspicum responso, et supplicatio omnibus deis quorum pulvinaria Romae essent indicta est.

XI. Perpetratis quae ad pacem deum pertinebant, de re publica belloque gerendo et quantum copiarum et ubi quaeque essent consules ad senatum rettule-
2 runt. Duodeviginti legionibus bellum geri placuit: binas consules sibi sumere, binis Galliam Siciliamque
3 ac Sardiniam obtineri; duabus Q. Fabium praetorem Apuliae, duabus volonum Ti. Gracchum circa Luceriam praecesse; singulas C. Terentio proconsuli ad Picenum et M. Valerio ad classem circa Brundi-
4 sium relinqui; duas urbi praesidio esse. Hic ut numerus legionum expleretur, sex novae legiones

---

[1] I.e., draped lecti with their cushions, kept in the temples of such gods as received the special honour of a lectisternium, a feast at which images of gods reclined in pairs; XXII. x. 9.

[2] Not including those in Spain. Similarly in § 5 no mention is made of a fleet for Spain.

circulated : that the spear of Mars at Praeneste moved B.C. 211 of itself; that an ox in Sicily spoke; that among the Marrucini an infant in its mother's womb shouted "Hail, triumph!"; that at Spoletium a woman was changed into a man; that at Hadria an altar was seen in the sky, and about it the forms of men in white garments. In fact at Rome also, actually in the city, directly after the appearance of a swarm of bees in the Forum—a wonder because it is rare—certain men, asserting that they saw armed legions on the Janiculum, aroused the city to arms, whereas those who were on the Janiculum denied that anyone had been seen there except the usual dwellers on that hill. Atonement was made for these prodigies with full-grown victims on the advice of the soothsayers, and a season of prayer to all the gods who had festal couches [1] at Rome was proclaimed.

XI. The rites which concerned peace with the gods being now completed, the consuls laid before the senate the condition of the state and the conduct of the war, and what forces there were and where severally stationed. It was voted to carry on the war with eighteen legions; [2] that each consul should take two; that with two legions in each case Gaul and Sicily and Sardinia should be held; that with two legions Quintus Fabius, a praetor, should be in charge of Apulia, and that with two legions of slave-volunteers Tiberius Gracchus should be in command in the region of Luceria; that one legion each should be left for Gaius Terentius, the proconsul, in the Picene district and for Marcus Valerius for service with the fleet near Brundisium; that two should form the garrison of the city. To make up this number of legions six new legions had to be enrolled.

A.U.C. 530

5 erant scribendae. Eas primo quoque tempore consules scribere iussi et classem parare, ut cum eis navibus quae pro Calabriae litoribus in statione essent, centum quinquaginta longarum classis navium eo
6 anno expleretur. Dilectu habito et centum navibus novis deductis Q. Fabius comitia censoribus creandis habuit: creati M. Atilius Regulus et P. Furius Philus.

Cum increbresceret rumor bellum in Sicilia esse,
7 T. Otacilius eo cum classe proficisci iussus est. Cum deessent nautae, consules ex senatus consulto edixerunt ut, qui L. Aemilio C. Flaminio censoribus milibus aeris quinquaginta ipse aut pater eius census fuisset usque ad centum milia, aut cui postea tanta res[1] esset facta, nautam unum cum sex mensum stipendio daret; qui supra centum milia usque ad trecenta
8 milia, tris nautas cum stipendio annuo; qui supra trecenta milia usque ad deciens aeris, quinque nautas; qui supra deciens, septem; senatores octo
9 nautas cum annuo stipendio darent. Ex hoc edicto dati nautae, armati instructique ab dominis, cum triginta dierum coctis cibariis naves conscenderunt. Tum primum est factum ut classis Romana sociis navalibus privata inpensa paratis compleretur.

XII. Hic maior solito adparatus praecipue conterruit Campanos, ne ab obsidione Capuae bellum eius
2 anni Romani inciperent. Itaque legatos ad Hannibalem oratum miserunt ut Capuam exercitum admoveret: ad eam oppugnandam novos exercitus

[1] tanta res Weissenborn: res tanta z: tanta P(1).

---

[1] Meaning chiefly remiges, who pulled the long oars and were in general slaves; cf. XXVI. xxxv.

The consuls were ordered to enroll them as soon as B.C. 214 possible, and to furnish a fleet, so that, including the ships at anchor defending the coast of Calabria, the fleet should amount that year to a hundred and fifty warships. After conducting the levy and launching a hundred new ships, Quintus Fabius held an election for the choosing of censors. Marcus Atilius Regulus and Publius Furius Philus were elected.

As the rumour that there was a war in Sicily spread more widely, Titus Otacilius was ordered to set sail thither with his fleet. Owing to the lack of sailors [1] the consuls in accordance with a decree of the senate issued an edict that a man who in the censorship of Lucius Aemilius and Gaius Flaminius [2] had been rated—either he or his father—at from 50,000 to 100,000 asses, or if his property had since increased to that amount, should furnish one sailor provided with six months' pay; that one who had more than 100,000 and up to 300,000 should furnish three sailors and a year's pay; he who had over 300,000 and up to a million asses, five sailors; he who had over a million, seven; that senators should furnish eight sailors and a year's pay. The sailors furnished in accordance with this edict went on board armed and equipped by their masters, and with cooked rations for thirty days. It was the first time that a Roman fleet was manned with crews secured at private expense.

XII. This extraordinary preparation particularly alarmed the Campanians, for fear the Romans might begin that year's war with a siege of Capua. Accordingly they sent legates to Hannibal to beg him to bring his army to Capua. New armies, they said,

[2] I.e. 220 B.C.; XXIII. xxiii. 5.

A.U.C. 540

scribi Romae, nec ullius urbis defectioni magis infensos
3 eorum animos esse. Id quia tam trepide nuntiabant, maturandum Hannibal ratus, ne praevenirent Romani, profectus Arpis ad Tifata in veteribus castris
4 super Capuam consedit. Inde Numidis Hispanisque ad praesidium simul castrorum simul Capuae relictis cum cetero exercitu ad lacum Averni per speciem sacrificandi, re ipsa ut temptaret Puteolos quodque
5 ibi praesidium erat, descendit. Maximus, postquam Hannibalem Arpis profectum et regredi in Campaniam adlatum est, nec die nec nocte intermisso
6 itinere ad exercitum redit, et Ti. Gracchum ab Luceria Beneventum copias admovere, Q. Fabium praetorem—is filius consulis erat—ad Luceriam Graccho succedere iubet.

7 In Siciliam eodem tempore duo praetores profecti, P. Cornelius ad exercitum, T. Otacilius qui mari-
8 timae orae reique navali praeesset. Et ceteri in suas quisque provincias profecti, et quibus prorogatum imperium erat easdem quas priori anno regiones obtinuerunt.

XIII. Ad Hannibalem, cum ad lacum Averni esset, quinque nobiles iuvenes ab Tarento venerunt, partim ad Trasumennum lacum, partim ad Cannas capti dimissique domos cum eadem comitate qua usus ad-
2 versus omnes Romanorum socios Poenus fuerat. Ei memores beneficiorum eius perpulisse magnam partem se iuventutis Tarentinae referunt ut Hannibalis

---

[1] Probably in connection with the necromancy practised at Avernus.

were being enrolled at Rome for besieging it, and the B.C. 214 defection of no city had more embittered the Romans. Since they reported this with such excitement, Hannibal, thinking he must make haste, lest he be anticipated by the Romans, set out from Arpi and established himself by Tifata in his old camp above Capua. Then leaving Numidians and Spaniards to defend the camp and Capua at the same time, he came down with the rest of his army to the Lake of Avernus, with the pretext of sacrificing,[1] in reality to attack Puteoli and the garrison which was there. Maximus, on being informed that Hannibal had left Arpi and was returning to Campania, without interrupting his journey by day or night returned to the army. And he ordered Tiberius Gracchus to bring his troops from Luceria to Beneventum, and Quintus Fabius, the praetor—he was the consul's son—, to relieve Gracchus at Luceria.

Two praetors set out at the same time for Sicily, Publius Cornelius to the army, and Titus Otacilius to take command of the sea-coast and of naval operations. And the others set out for their several assignments, and those whose commands had been prolonged held the same regions as in the previous year.

XIII. While Hannibal was at the Lake of Avernus five noble young men came to him from Tarentum, some of whom had been captured at the Lake of Trasumennus, others at Cannae, and sent to their homes with that same courtesy which the Carthaginian had shown toward all allies of the Romans. Mindful of his favours, they reported that they had induced a large part of the young men of Tarentum to prefer the friendship and alliance of Hannibal to amicitiam ac societatem quam populi Romani mallent, legatosque ab suis missos rogare Hannibalem ut exercitum propius Tarentum admoveat: si signa eius, si castra conspecta a Tarento sint, haud ullam intercessuram moram quin in deditionem veniat [1] urbs; in potestate iuniorum plebem, in manu plebis rem Tarentinam esse. Hannibal conlaudatos eos oneratosque ingentibus promissis domum ad coepta maturanda redire iubet: se in tempore adfuturum esse. Hac cum spe dimissi Tarentini. Ipsum ingens cupido incesserat Tarenti potiundi. Urbem esse videbat eum opulentam nobilemque, tum maritimam et in Macedoniam opportune versam, regemque Philippum hunc portum, si transiret in Italiam, quoniam [2] Brundisium Romani haberent, petiturum. Sacro inde perpetrato ad quod venerat et, dum ibi moratur, pervastato agro Cumano usque ad Miseni promunturium Puteolos repente agmen convertit ad opprimendum praesidium Romanum. Sex milia hominum erant et locus munimento quoque, non natura modo tutus. Triduum ibi moratus Poenus ab omni parte temptato praesidio, deinde, ut nihil procedebat, ad populandum agrum Neapolitanum magis ira quam potiundae urbis spe processit.

A.U.C. 540

Adventu eius in propinquum agrum mota Nolana est plebs, iam diu aversa ab Romanis et infesta senatui suo. Itaque legati ad arcessendum Hannibalem cum haud dubio promisso tradendae urbis

[1] in deditionem veniat (a line) Conway: om. P(1): (after urbs) dedatur A^2: ei tradatur Madvig: in potestatem eius tradatur Weissenborn.

[2] quoniam Madvig, Conway: om. P(1).

those of the Roman people; and that, as legates B.C. 214 sent by their people, they asked Hannibal to bring his army nearer to Tarentum. If his standards, if his camp should be seen from Tarentum there would be no delay in the surrender of the city; that the common people were in the power of the younger men, the Tarentine state in the hands of the common people. Hannibal praised them and overwhelmed them with great promises, and bade them return home to carry out their undertaking promptly; that he would be there at the right moment. With this hope the Tarentines were sent away. He himself had conceived a great desire to gain possession of Tarentum. He saw that the city was not only rich and famous but also a seaport, and favourably placed in the direction of Macedonia, and that accordingly King Philip, if he should cross into Italy, would make for this port, since the Romans held Brundisium. Then, after accomplishing the rite for which he had come, and devastating the territory of Cumae as far as the promontory of Misenum, while he lingered there, he suddenly headed his column toward Puteoli, to surprise the Roman garrison. There were six thousand men and the place was defended by a wall also, not merely by nature. There the Carthaginian tarried three days, attacking the garrison from every side; and then, when he met with no success, he set out to ravage the territory of Neapolis, rather in anger than with the hope of taking the city.

His coming into a neighbouring region aroused the common people of Nola, who had long been estranged from the Romans and hostile to their own senate. Consequently legates came to invite Hannibal, bringing a definitive promise to surrender the city.

A.U.C. 549

9 venerunt. Praevenit inceptum eorum Marcellus consul a primoribus accitus. Die uno Suessulam a Calibus, cum Volturnus amnis traicientem moratus
10 esset, contenderat; inde proxima nocte sex milia peditum, equites trecentos, qui [1] praesidio senatui
11 essent, Nolam intromisit. Et uti a consule omnia impigre facta sunt ad praeoccupandam Nolam, ita Hannibal tempus terebat, bis iam ante nequiquam temptata re segnior ad credendum Nolanis factus.

XIV. Isdem diebus et Q. Fabius consul ad Casilinum temptandum, quod praesidio Punico tenebatur, venit et ad Beneventum velut ex composito parte altera Hanno ex Bruttiis cum magna peditum equitumque manu, altera Ti. Graechus ab Luceria accessit.
2 Qui primo oppidum intravit, deinde, ut Hannonem tria milia ferme ab urbe ad Calorem fluvium castra posuisse et inde agrum populari audivit, et ipse egressus moenibus mille ferme passus ab hoste
3 castra locat. Ibi contionem militum habuit. Legiones magna ex parte volonum habebat, qui iam alterum annum libertatem tacite mereri quam postulare palam maluerant. Senserat tamen hibernis egrediens murmur in agmine esse quaerentium, 4 en umquam liberi militaturi essent, scripseratque senatui non tam quid desiderarent quam quid meruissent: bona fortique opera eorum se ad eam diem

[1] trecentos, qui A^2x: quingentos, qui Weissenborn: om. P(1).

---

[1] Since Hannibal had captured the city; XXIII. xix. 15 f.; xx. 1.

Marcellus, the consul, was called in by the leading men and forestalled their undertaking. From Cales he had hastened in one day to Suessula, though the river Volturnus had delayed his crossing. Thence he sent six thousand infantry and three hundred horsemen that night into Nola, to defend the senate. And whereas the consul did everything with energy, in order to anticipate him in occupying Nola, Hannibal was wasting time, having twice already made the vain attempt, and being now less inclined to believe the men of Nola. B.C. 214

XIV. At the same time not only did Quintus Fabius, the consul, come to Casilinum, to attack the city, held by a Carthaginian garrison,[1] but also, as if by prearrangement, Hanno, with a large force of infantry and cavalry, from the land of the Bruttii, came to Beneventum from one side, while on the other side Tiberius Gracchus came to it from Luceria. The latter at first entered the town, and then, on hearing that Hanno had pitched his camp about three miles from the city by the river Calor, and from that point was ravaging the country, he likewise left the city and pitched camp about a mile from the enemy. There he held an assembly of the soldiers. The legions he had were largely made up of slave-volunteers, who now for two years had preferred silently to earn their freedom rather than openly to demand it. Yet as he came out of winter quarters he had been aware that there was murmuring in the column, as they asked whether they were ever at all to serve as free men. And he had written to the senate, not so much what they wanted as what they had deserved; that he had had good and brave service from them up to that time, and that they lacked usum, neque ad exemplum iusti militis quicquam eis praeter libertatem deesse. De eo permissum ipsi erat faceret quod e re publica duceret esse. Itaque priusquam cum hoste manum consereret, pronuntiat tempus venisse eis libertatis quam diu sperassent potiundae; postero die signis conlatis dimicaturum puro ac patenti campo, ubi sine ullo insidiarum metu vera virtute geri res posset. Qui caput hostis rettulisset, eum se extemplo liberum iussurum esse; qui loco cessisset, in eum servili supplicio animadversurum; suam cuique fortunam in manu esse. Libertatis auctorem eis non se fore solum, sed consulem M. Marcellum, sed universos patres, quos consultos ab se de libertate eorum sibi permisisse. Litteras inde consulis ac senatus consultum recitavit; ad quae clamor cum ingenti adsensu est sublatus. Pugnam poscebant signumque ut daret extemplo ferociter instabant. Gracchus proelio in posterum diem pronuntiato contionem dimisit. Milites laeti, praecipue quibus merces navatae in unum diem operae libertas futura erat, armis expediendis diei [1] relieum consumunt.

A.U.C. 540

XV. Postero die ubi signa coeperunt canere, primi omnium parati instructique ad praetorium conveniunt. Sole orto Gracchus in aciem copias educit; nec hostes moram dimicandi fecerunt. Decem [2] septem milia peditum erant, maxima ex parte Bruttii ac Lucani, equites mille ducenti, inter quos pauci admodum Italici, ceteri Numidae fere

[1] diei x Gronovius: que P: quod $P^2(1)$: A^2 adds diei fuit.
[2] decem P(2): C^2A add et.

nothing toward the standard of the real soldier except B.C. 214 their freedom. In this matter he had been given permission to do whatever he thought to be for the good of the state. And so, before engaging the enemy, he announced that the time had come for them to gain the freedom for which they so long had hoped; that the next day he would fight, standards against standards, in a clear and open field, where without any fear of ambush the battle could be fought with pure courage. Whoever should bring back the head of an enemy would by his order be a free man at once. Whoever retreated from his post would meet the punishment of a slave. Each man's fortune was in his own hand. The giver of their freedom would be not merely himself, but the consul Marcus Marcellus, but the whole senate, for they had been consulted by him and had given him permission in the matter of their freedom. He then read the letter of the consul and the decree of the senate. Upon that a shout was raised with great applause. They clamoured for battle and with high spirit insisted that he give the signal at once. Graechus announced a battle for the morrow and dismissed the assembly. The soldiers were happy, especially those for whom freedom was to be the reward of a single day's service, and spent the rest of the day in putting their arms in order.

XV. On the next day, when the signals began to sound, these soldiers were the first of all to assemble at headquarters, ready and in formation. After sunrise Graechus led his troops out into line, and the enemy did not delay the battle. They had seventeen thousand infantry, mostly Bruttians and Lucanians, twelve hundred cavalry, among them very few

A.U.C. 540

3 omnes Maurique. Pugnatum est et acriter et diu; quattuor horis neutro inclinata est pugna. Nec alia magis Romanum impediebat res quam capita hostium
4 pretia libertatis facta; nam ut quisque hostem inpigre occiderat, primum capite aegre inter turbam tumultumque abscidendo terebat tempus; deinde occupata dextra tenendo caput fortissimus quisque pugnator esse desierat, segnibus ac timidis tradita
5 pugna erat. Quod ubi tribuni militum Graccho nuntiaverunt, neminem stantem iam vulnerari hostem, carnificari iacentes, et in dextris militum pro gladiis humana capita esse, signum dari propere iussit, pro-
6 icerent capita invaderentque hostem: claram satis et insignem virtutem esse nec dubiam libertatem futuram strenuis viris. Tum redintegrata pugna est,
7 et eques etiam in hostes emissus. Quibus cum inpigre Numidae occurrissent,[1] nec segnior equitum quam peditum pugna esset, iterum in dubium adducta res. Cum utrimque duces, Romanus Bruttium Lucanumque totiens a maioribus suis victos subactosque, Poenus mancipia Romana et ex ergas-
8 tulo militem verbis obtereret, postremo pronuntiat Gracchus esse nihil quod de libertate sperarent, nisi eo die fusi fugatique hostes essent. XVI. Ea demum vox ita animos accendit ut renovato clamore, velut alii repente facti, tanta vi se in hostem intule-

[1] occurrissent xz: concurrissent P(1).

Italians, nearly all the rest Numidians and Mauri. B.C. 214
The battle was fierce and long; for four hours it did not incline either way. And nothing hampered the Romans more than that enemies' heads were made the price of freedom. For when a man had boldly slain an enemy, in the first place he was wasting time in cutting off the head with difficulty in the confusion and turmoil; and then, as his right hand was occupied in holding the head, the bravest had ceased to be fighters, while the battle was turned over to the spiritless and the fearful. When the tribunes of the soldiers reported this to Gracchus: that they were not wounding a single enemy standing, but butchering the fallen; and that in the soldier's right hands there were human heads instead of swords, he ordered the command at once given that they should throw away the heads and attack the enemy. Their courage, he said, was sufficiently clear and conspicuous, and for active men freedom would be beyond a doubt. Thereupon the battle was renewed, and the cavalry also charged the enemy. Since the Numidians met this charge gallantly and the cavalry battle was no less spirited than that of the infantry, the issue was for the second time made doubtful. While the commanders on both sides heaped abuse, the Roman on the Bruttians and Lucanians, so many times defeated and subdued by their ancestors, the Carthaginian on the Roman slaves and prison-house soldiers, Gracchus finally declared that they had no reason to hope for freedom, unless on that day the enemy should be routed and put to flight. XVI. Those words at last so fired their courage that, as though they were suddenly different men, they raised a shout again and charged the enemy

A.U.C. 540

2 rint ut sustineri ultra non possent. Primo antesignani Poenorum, dein signa perturbata, postremo tota inpulsa acies; inde haud dubie terga data, ruuntque fugientes in castra adeo pavidi trepidique ut ne in portis quidem aut vallo quisquam restiterit, ac prope continenti agmine Romani insecuti novum de integro proelium inclusi hostium vallo ediderint. 3 Ibi sicut pugna inpeditior in angustiis, ita caedes atrocior fuit. Et adiuvere captivi, qui rapto inter tumultum ferro conglobati et ab tergo ceciderunt 4 Poenos et fugam impedierunt. Itaque minus duo milia hominum ex tanto exercitu, et ea maior pars equitum, cum ipso duce effugerunt; alii omnes caesi aut capti; capta et signa duodequadraginta. 5 Ex victoribus duo milia ferme cecidere. Praeda omnis praeterquam hominum captorum militi concessa est; et pecus exceptum est quod intra dies triginta domini cognovissent.

6 Cum praeda onusti in castra redissent, quattuor milia ferme volonum militum, quae pugnaverant segnius nec in castra inruperant simul, metu poenae 7 collem haud procul castris ceperunt. Postero die per tribunos militum inde deducti contione militum 8 advocata a Graccho superveniunt. Ubi cum proconsul veteres milites primum, prout cuiusque virtus atque opera in ea pugna fuerat, militaribus donis 9 donasset, tunc quod ad volones attineret, omnes ait with such force that they could no longer be with- B.C. 214 stood. At first the front line [1] of the Carthaginians, then the second was in confusion; finally the whole line was forced back. Then it was unmistakeable flight, and fleeing they dashed into their camp in such fright and excitement that no one halted even at the gates or on the wall. And the Romans, pursuing in almost unbroken column, fought an entirely new battle while hemmed in by the enemies' wall. There the battle was indeed more hampered in a confined space, but the slaughter was more savage. And they were aided by the captives, who, seizing weapons during the confusion and advancing in a mass, slashed the Carthaginians from the rear and also hindered their flight. And so out of that great army less than two thousand men, mainly cavalry at that, escaped along with the general himself. All the rest were slain or captured. Captured were also thirty-eight standards. Of the victors about two thousand fell. All the booty except the captives was given to the soldiers. Cattle also were excepted, if the owners should identify them within thirty days.

[1] Livy often applies Roman military terms to the enemy's army. Here signa suggests a second line somewhat like the Roman principes. Cf. XXII. v. 7 for antesignani.

When they had returned to camp laden with booty, about four thousand of the slave-volunteers, who had fought with less spirit and had not dashed into the camp with the others, for fear of punishment occupied a hill not far from the camp. The next day they were brought down by military tribunes and arrived after an assembly of the soldiers had been called by Gracchus. There the proconsul first presented military decorations to the old soldiers, to each according to his valour and his part in that battle; and then he said that, so far as the slave-volunteers

A.U.C. 540

malle laudatos a se, dignos indignosque, quam quemquam eo die castigatum esse. Quod bonum faustum felixque rei publicae ipsisque esset, omnes eos 10 liberos esse iubere. Ad quam vocem cum clamor ingenti alacritate sublatus esset, ac nunc conplexi inter se gratulantesque, nunc manus ad caelum tollentes bona omnia populo Romano Graecchoque
11 ipsi precarentur, tum Gracchus "Priusquam omnes iure libertatis aequassem" inquit, "neminem nota 12 strenui aut ignavi militis notasse volui; nunc exsoluta iam fide publica, ne discrimen omne virtutis ignaviaeque pereat, nomina eorum qui detractatae pugnae memores secessionem paulo ante fecerunt referri ad me iubebo, citatosque singulos iure iurando adigam,
13 nisi quibus[1] morbus causa erit, non aliter quam stantes cibum potionemque, quoad stipendia facient, capturos esse. Hanc multam ita aequo animo feretis, si reputabitis nulla ignaviae nota leviore vos
14 designari potuisse." Signum deinde colligendi vasa dedit; militesque praedam portantes agentesque per lasciviam ac iocum ita ludibundi Beneventum
15 rediere ut ab epulis per celebrem festumque diem 16 actis, non ex acie reverti viderentur. Beneventani omnes turba effusa cum obviam ad portas exissent, complecti milites, gratulari, vocare in hospitium.
17 Adparata convivia omnibus in propatulo aedium

[1] quibus C^2M^2: quis .t: que $P(2)$: cui Weissenborn: queis Gronovius.

[1] Thus the good things could be seen through the open door, as in XXV. xii. 15: apertis ianuis in propatulo epulati sunt.

were concerned, he preferred to have all of them, the worthy and the unworthy, praised by himself, rather than to have any one of them punished that day; that, with the prayer that it might be good and happy and fortunate for the state and for the men themselves, he ordered them all to be free. At these words they raised a shout with great enthusiasm, and now embracing and congratulating each other, now raising their hands to heaven, they prayed for every blessing for the Roman people and for Gracchus himself. Thereupon Gracchus said: "Before making you all equals by the right of freedom, I wished to stamp not one man of you with the mark of a brave or of a cowardly soldier. But now, the promise made in the name of the state being already fulfilled, to prevent the loss of every distinction between valour and cowardice, I shall order the names of those who, remembering their refusal to fight, left us a while ago to be reported to me; and summoning them one by one I shall make them swear that, excepting men who shall have illness as an excuse, they will take food and drink standing only, so long as they shall be in the service. This penalty you will bear with patience, if you will reflect that you could not have been marked with any slighter sign of cowardice." He then gave the signal to pack baggage, and the soldiers carrying and driving their booty returned with sport and mirth so gaily to Beneventum that they seemed to be returning from a feast on a day of general festivity, not from a battle. All the people of Beneventum, having come out en masse to the gates to meet them, embraced the soldiers, congratulated them, invited them into their houses. Feasts had been made ready by all in the atria [1] of B.C. 214.

A.U.C. 540

fuerant; ad ea invitabant Gracchumque orabant ut epulari permitteret militibus; et Gracchus ita permisit, si[1] in publico epularentur omnes ante suas 18 quisque fores. Prolata omnia. Pilleati aut lana alba velatis capitibus volones epulati sunt, alii accubantes, alii stantes, qui simul ministrabant vescebanturque.
19 Digna res visa ut simulacrum celebrati eius diei Gracchus, postquam Romam rediit, pingi iuberet in aede Libertatis quam pater eius in Aventino ex multaticia pecunia faciendam curavit dedicavitque.

XVII. Dum haec ad Beneventum geruntur, Hannibal depopulatus agrum Neapolitanum ad Nolam
2 castra movet. Quem ubi adventare consul sensit, Pomponio propraetore cum eo exercitu qui super Suessulam in castris erat accito ire obviam hosti parat
3 nec moram dimicandi facere. C. Claudium Neronem cum robore equitum silentio noctis per aversam maxime ab hoste portam emittit circumvectumque occulte subsequi sensim agmen hostium iubet et, cum coortum proelium videret, ab tergo se obicere.
4 Id errore viarum an exiguitate temporis Nero exsequi
5 non potuerit incertum est. Absente eo cum proelium commissum esset, superior quidem haud dubie Romanus erat; sed quia equites non adfuere in

[1] si Sigonius: ut x: om. F(1).

---

[1] The pilleus was evidence of freedom, as was the lana alba.
[2] The closing words are possibly copied from an inscription on the temple. The father was consul in 238 B.C.

their houses. To these they invited the soldiers and B.C. 214 implored Gracchus to allow the soldiers to feast. And Gracchus did permit them, provided they all feasted in the open, each before the door of his house. Everything was brought out. Wearing caps[1] or white woollen headbands the volunteers feasted, some reclining, and some standing served and ate at the same time. This seemed to deserve the order Gracchus gave on his return to Rome for a representation of that day of festivity to be painted in the Temple of Liberty which his father, with money yielded by fines, caused to be built on the Aventine and dedicated.[2]

XVII. While these things were going on about Beneventum, Hannibal, after ravaging the territory of Neapolis, removed his camp to Nola. When the consul learned of his approach, summoning Pomponius, the propractor, with the army which was in camp[3] above Suessula, he prepared to advance to meet the enemy and to engage without delay. He sent Gaius Claudius Nero with the best of the cavalry out by the gate farthest from the enemy in the silence of the night, and commanded him to ride around unseen and follow the enemy's column slowly, and when he saw that the battle had begun, to throw himself upon their rear. Whether it was by losing the way that Nero was unable to carry this out, or from the shortness of the time, is uncertain. After the battle had begun in his absence, the Roman indeed unquestionably had the upper hand; but since the cavalry were not there at the right moment, the [3] Castra Claudiana; XXIII. xxxi. 3 and elsewhere. Pomponius must have been relieved of his duties in the North (x. 3).

A.U.C. 540

tempore, ratio compositae rei turbata est. Non ausus insequi cedentes Marcellus vincentibus suis 6 signum receptui dedit. Plus tamen duo milia hostium eo die caesa traduntur, Romani minus
7 quadringenti. Solis fere occasu Nero diem noctemque nequiquam fatigatis equis hominibusque, ne viso quidem hoste rediens, adeo graviter est ab consule increpitus ut per eum stetisse diceret [1] quo minus accepta ad Cannas redderetur hosti clades.
8 Postero die Romanus in aciem descendit, Poenus, tacita etiam confessione victus castris se tenuit. Tertio die silentio noctis omissa spe Nolae potiundae, rei numquam prospere temptatae, Tarentum ad certiorem spem proditionis proficiscitur.

XVIII. Nec minore animo res Romana domi quam
2 militiae gerebatur. Censores, vacui ab operum locandorum cura propter inopiam aerarii, ad mores hominum regendos animum adverterunt castigandaque vitia quae, velut diutinis morbis aegra corpora
3 ex sese gignunt, eo [2] nata bello erant. Primum eos citaverunt qui post Cannensem pugnam rem publicam deseruisse [3] dicebantur. Princeps eorum M.
4 Caecilius Metellus quaestor tum forte erat. Iusso deinde eo ceterisque eiusdem noxae reis causam

[1] diceret z : diceretur P(1).
[2] eo C^2 : aea P : ea C : om. P^2?(10).
[3] pugnam rem publicam deseruisse $.1^2x$: om. P(1) : the gap indicated in P.1, probably a single line, is variously supplied, e.g. cladem a re publica defecisse Walters.

[1] Cannae was avenged by this Nero and his colleague Livius at the Metaurus, 207 B.C.; XXVII. xlviii f.; xlix. 5.

prearranged plan for the battle was ruined. Marcellus, B.C. 214 not venturing to pursue the retreating, gave his men, victorious though they were, the signal to retire. More than two thousand of the enemy, however, are said to have been slain that day, of the Romans less than four hundred. About sunset Nero, returning with his horses and men exhausted to no purpose by their efforts for a day and a night, without even seeing the enemy, was sternly rebuked by the consul, who went so far as to say that it was his fault that the disaster suffered at Cannae was not paid back to the enemy.[1] On the next day the Roman went into line of battle, while the Carthaginian, beaten, as he tacitly admitted also, remained in camp. The third day, giving up hope of capturing Nola, an undertaking which had never prospered, he set out in the dead of night for Tarentum, led by a surer hope of its betrayal.

XVIII. And it was with no less spirit that the Roman state was administered at home than in the field. The censors, freed from the charge of contracting for public works on account of the emptiness of the treasury, turned their attention to the control of morals and the punishment of vices which had sprung from that war, just as bodies suffering from long illnesses of themselves produce defects. First they summoned those who after the battle of Cannae were said to have abandoned the state. The foremost among them, Marcus Caecilius Metellus,[2] happened at this time to be quaestor. Inasmuch as he and the rest of those guilty of the same offence, on being ordered to plead their cases, proved unable dicere, cum purgari nequissent, pronuntiarunt verba orationemque eos adversus rem publicam habuisse, quo coniuratio deserendae Italiae causa fieret. 5 Secundum eos citati nimis callidi exsolvendi iuris iurandi interpretes, qui captivorum ex itinere regressi etiam in castra Hannibalis solutum quod iuraverunt redituros rebantur. 6 His superioribusque illis equi adempti qui publicum equom habebant, tribuque 7 moti aerarii omnes facti. Neque senatu modo aut equestri ordine regendo cura se censorum tenuit; nomina omnium ex iuniorum tabulis exceerpserunt qui quadriennio non militassent, quibus neque vacatio 8 iusta militiae neque morbus causa fuisset. Et ea supra duo milia nominum[1] in aerarios relata tribuque 9 omnes moti; additumque tam truci censoriae notae triste senatus consultum, ut ei omnes quos censores notassent pedibus mererent mitterenturque in Siciliam ad Cannensis exercitus reliquias, cui militum generi non prius quam pulsus Italia hostis esset finitum stipendiorum tempus erat.

[2] For his plan to leave Italy cf. XXII. liii. 5, where his praenomen is Lucius.

A.U.C. 549

10 Cum censores ob inopiam aerarii se iam locationibus abstinerent aedium sacrarum tuendarum curuliumque equorum praebendorum ac similium his

[1] nominum P(1) Aldus: hominum xz Madvig.

---

[1] So ten of them pretended to think, XXII. lxi. 8. Another version (ib. 4 and lviii. 8) had only a single perjurer.

[2] Transfer to one of the four city tribes was a degradation, but, since the reform of 312 B.C., aerarii ("taxpayers only") were allowed to vote and serve in the army.

to clear themselves, the censors gave their verdict B.C. 214 that in conversation and formal speeches they had attacked the state, in order to form a conspiracy to desert Italy. Next after them were summoned those who had been too crafty in interpreting the discharge of an oath,—those of the captives who, after setting out and then returning secretly to Hannibal's camp, thought the oath they had sworn, that they would return, had been discharged.[1] From these men and those mentioned above their horses, if they had such from the state, were taken away, and all were ejected from their tribes and made aerarii.[2] And the diligence of the censors did not confine itself to regulating the senate and the order of the knights. From the lists of the younger men they culled the names of all who during four years had not served, without having had a legitimate exemption from the service or ill health as an excuse. And of these above two thousand names were placed on the list of the aerarii, and they all were ejected from their tribes. And to this relentless stigma of the censors was added a severe decree of the senate that all of those whom the censors had stigmatised should serve on foot and be sent to Sicily, to the remnant of the army of Cannae. For this class of soldiers the term of service was not at an end until the enemy should be driven out of Italy.

Since the censors on account of the emptiness of the treasury now refrained from letting contracts for the maintenance of temples and the furnishing of horses[3] used in religious processions and for similar

[3] The two-wheeled vehicles (tensae) which carried attributes of the Capitoline deities in procession to the Circus were usually drawn by four horses.

A.U.C. 540
11 rerum, convenire[1] ad eos frequentes qui hastae huius generis adsueverant, hortarique[2] censores ut omnia perinde agerent locarent ac si pecunia in aerario esset: neminem nisi bello confecto pecuniam
12 ab aerario petiturum esse. Convenere deinde domini eorum quos Ti. Sempronius ad Beneventum manu emiserat arcessitosque se ab triumviris mensariis esse dixerunt ut pretia servorum acciperent; ceterum non ante quam bello confecto accepturos esse.
13 Cum haec inclinatio animorum plebis ad sustinendam inopiam aerarii fieret, pecuniae quoque pupillares
14 primo, deinde viduarum coeptae conferri, nusquam eas tutius sanctiusque deponere credentibus qui deferebant quam in publica fide; inde si quid emptum paratumque pupillis ae viduis foret, a quaestore 15 perscribebatur. Manavit ea privatorum benignitas ex urbe etiam in castra, ut non eques, non centurio stipendium acciperet, mercennariumque increpantes vocarent qui accepisset.

XIX. Q. Fabius consul ad Casilinum castra habebat, quod duum milium Campanorum et septingentorum militum Hannibalis tenebatur praesidio.
2 Praecerat Statius Metius, missus ab Cn. Magio Atellano, qui eo anno medix tuticus erat, servitiaque matters, those who had been in the habit of such B.C. 214 bidding[1] came in large numbers to the censors, and urged them to take action and let contracts at once for everything, just as if there were money in the treasury; that no one would claim his money from the treasury until the war was over. Then came the owners of the slaves Tiberius Sempronius had manumitted at Beneventum, and said they had been summoned by the bank commissioners[2] to receive the price of their slaves; but that they would not receive it until the war was over. Such being now the tendency of the people to relieve the poverty of the treasury, funds, first of wards, and then of widows and single women, began also to be turned in; for those who brought in the sums believed that nowhere could they deposit them with a sense of greater safety and honesty than under the guarantee of the state. Thereafter when anything was purchased or provided for wards and widows and single women, it was paid for by an order of a quaestor. This generosity of private citizens spread from the city also even to the camps, so that no knight, no centurion accepted pay, and the man who did accept was reproachfully called a hireling.

[1] convenire H. J. Müller: convenere P(1).
[2] hortarique P(1): hortatique z Madvig, adding sunt after censores.

[1] At sales and the letting of contracts a spear (hasta) symbolised the authority of the state, and gave its name to the proceedings.

XIX. Quintus Fabius, the consul, had his camp near Casilinum, which was held by a garrison of two thousand Campanians and seven hundred of Hannibal's soldiers. In command was Statius Metius, who had been sent by Gnaeus Magius, of Atella (who was the medix tuticus[3] that year), and Metius had armed slaves and plebeians without distinction, in order to

[2] Cf. XXIII. xxi. 6. These emergency officials (triumviri mensarii) evidently served for some years; cf. XXVI. xxxvi. 8.
[3] Cf. XXIII. xxxv. 13; XXVI. vi. 13.

A.U.C. 549

et plebem promiscue armarat, ut castra Romana invaderet intento consule ad Casilinum oppugnandum. Nihil eorum Fabium fefellit. Itaque Nolam ad collegam mittit: altero exercitu, dum Casilinum oppugnatur, opus esse qui Campanis opponatur; vel ipse relicto Nolae praesidio modico veniret, vel, si cum Nola teneret necdum securae res ab Hannibale essent, se Ti. Gracchum proconsulem a Benevento acciturum. Hoc nuntio Marcellus duobus militum milibus Nolae in praesidio relictis cum cetero exercitu Casilinum venit, adventuque eius Campani iam moventes sese quieverunt. Ita ab duobus consulibus Casilinum oppugnari coepit. Ubi cum multa succedentes temere moenibus Romani milites acciperent vulnera neque satis inceptu[1] succederet, Fabius omittendam rem parvam ac iuxta magnis difficilem abscedendumque inde censebat, cum res maiores instarent: Marcellus multa magnis ducibus sicut non adgredienda, ita semel adgressis non dimittenda esse dicendo, quia magna famae momenta in utramque partem fierent, tenuit ne inrito incepto abiretur. Vineae inde omniaque alia operum machinationumque genera cum admoverentur, Campanique Fabium orarent ut abire Capuam tuto liceret, paucis egressis Marcellus portam qua egrediebantur occupavit, caedesque promiscue omnium circa portam primo, deinde inruptione facta etiam in urbe

[1] inceptu (dative) P(6) : -tus M : -tis A : -tum x Gronovius : -to Luchs.

---

[1] Catapults, towers, rams, etc. Movable sheds protected the besiegers.

[2] Livy touches lightly upon Marcellus' apparent ruthlessness; cf. xxxix. 7.

make an attack upon the Roman camp while the B.C. 214 consul was occupied with the siege of Casilinum. Of all this nothing escaped Fabius. So he sends word to his colleague at Nola that he needs the other army, to face the Campanians while Casilinum was being besieged: either Marcellus should leave a suitable garrison at Nola and come in person, or if Nola held him back and there was still danger from Hannibal, he would himself summon Tiberius Gracchus, the proconsul, from Beneventum. On receiving this message Marcellus left two thousand soldiers as a garrison at Nola, and with the rest of his army came to Casilinum; and upon his arrival the Campanians, who were already bestirring themselves, became inactive. So began the siege of Casilinum by the two consuls. Since in this operation the Roman soldiers rashly approaching the walls were receiving many wounds and the undertaking was not successful, Fabius thought that they should give up a small affair which was as difficult as great ventures, and that they must leave the place, since greater matters were impending. Marcellus, saying that, while there were many places which great generals ought not to attack, yet, once the attack has begun, they should not give them up, since reputation has great influence in both directions, carried his point, not to depart while their attempt was unsuccessful. Then while sheds and all other kinds of siege-works and apparatus[1] were being brought up, and the Campanians were begging Fabius for permission to go to Capua in safety, after a few had left the city, Marcellus occupied the gate by which they were leaving. And a general slaughter began,[2] first around the gate, and then, as the troops burst in,

A.U.C. 540 10 fieri coepta est. Quinquaginta fere primo egressi Campanorum, cum ad Fabium confugissent, praesidio eius Capuam pervenerunt. Casilinum inter conloquia cunctationemque petentium fidem per 11 occasionem captum est, captivique Campanorum quive[1] Hannibalis militum erant Romam missi atque ibi in carcere inclusi sunt; oppidanorum turba per finitimos populos in custodiam divisa.

XX. Quibus diebus a Casilino re bene gesta recessum est, eis Gracchus in Lucanis aliquot cohortes in ea regione conscriptas cum praefecto socium in 2 agros hostium praedatum misit. Eos effuse palatos Hanno adortus haud multo minorem quam ad Beneventum acceperat reddidit hosti cladem atque in Bruttios raptim, ne Gracchus adsequeretur, concessit. 3 Consules Marcellus retro unde venerat Nolam rediit, Fabius in Samnites ad populandos agros recipiendas- 4 que armis quae defecerant urbes processit. Caudinus Sammis gravius devastatus: perusti late agri, 5 praedae pecudum hominumque actae; oppida vi capta Compulteria, Telesia, Compsa inde, Fugifulae et Orbitanium ex Lucanis, Blanda et Apulorum 6 Aecae oppugnatae. Milia hostium in his urbibus viginti quinque capta aut occisa, et recepti perfugae trecenti septuaginta; quos cum Romam misisset consul, virgis in comitio caesi omnes ac de saxo

[1] quive P(1) Conway: quique z.

even inside the city. About fifty Campanians who B.C. 214 had left the city first sought refuge with Fabius and, escorted by his men, reached Capua. Casilinum was captured, as opportunity offered during the conversations and the delay due to those who begged a promise of protection. And the captives, whether Campanians or of Hannibal's soldiers, were sent to Rome and there imprisoned. The mass of the townspeople were distributed among the neighbouring communities to be guarded.

XX. At the same time that they left Casilinum after their success, Gracchus in Lucania sent a number of cohorts which had been enlisted in that region, under the command of a prefect of the allies, into the enemy's farm lands to plunder. Hanno attacked them as they were widely scattered and gave the enemy in return a defeat not much less serious than that which he had received near Beneventum, and withdrew hastily into the land of the Bruttians, that Gracchus might not overtake him. Of the consuls, Marcellus returned to Nola, whence he had come, Fabius advanced into Samnium, to lay waste their farms and to recover by force the cities which had revolted. Samnium around the Caudine Pass was more thoroughly laid waste. Farms were burned over far and wide, cattle and men carried off as booty. Compulteria, Telesia and Compsa, towns of that region, were taken by storm, also Fugifulae and Orbitanium in Lucania. Blanda and, in Apulia, Aecae were taken after a siege. In these cities twenty-five thousand of the enemy were captured or slain, and three hundred and seventy deserters recovered. These were all sent to Rome by the consul, scourged in the Comitium and hurled from

A.U.C. 540

7 deiecti. Haec a Q. Fabio intra paucos dies gesta. Marcellum ab gerundis rebus valetudo adversa Nolae
8 tenuit. Et a praetore Q. Fabio, cui circa Luceriam provincia erat, Aeuca oppidum per eos dies vi captum stativaque ad Ardaneas communita.
9 Dum haec in aliis[1] locis ab Romanis geruntur, iam Tarentum pervenerat Hannibal cum maxima omni-
10 um quacumque ierat clade; in Tarentino demum agro pacatum incedere agmen coepit. Nihil ibi violatum neque usquam via excessum est; apparebatque non id modestia militum sed ducis iussu[2] ad
11 conciliandos animos Tarentinorum fieri. Ceterum cum prope moenibus successisset,[3] nullo ad conspectum primum agminis, ut rebatur, motu facto
12 castra ab urbe ferme passus mille locat. Tarenti triduo ante quam Hannibal ad moenia accederet a M. Valerio propraetore, qui classi ad Brundisium
13 praeerat, missus M. Livius impigre[4] conscripta iuventute dispositisque ad omnes portas circaque muros qua res postulabat stationibus die ac nocte iuxta intentus neque hostibus neque dubiis sociis loci
14 quicquam praebuit ad temptandum.[5] Diebus aliquot frustra ibi absumptis Hannibal, cum eorum nemo qui ad lacum Averni se[6] adissent aut ipsi venirent aut nuntium litterasve mitterent, vana promissa se temere secutum cernens castra inde

[1] in aliis Madvig, Emend.: maliis P: aliis P^2(1) Madvig[4].

[2] sed ducis iussu Wölfflin: aut ducis usi P(2): aut ducis sed x Sigonius, Madvig: aut ducis nisi Ax Walters: aut ducis iussu sed M^3?.

[3] successisset Gronovius: accessisset P(1).

[4] impigre Weissenborn: inpriore P(1).

[5] temptandum, PM add q. (-que CRB.1): quare M^2? Gronovius.

[6] se Madvig: om. P(1).

the Rock.[1] Such were the acts of Fabius within a few days, while Marcellus was kept out of employment by illness at Nola. And the praetor Quintus Fabius, whose field of duty was around Luceria, stormed the town of Aecua about that time and fortified a permanent camp at Ardaneae.[2] B.C. 214

While the Romans were thus employed elsewhere, Hannibal had now reached Tarentum, leaving the most complete devastation wherever he had passed. Not until it had entered the territory of Tarentum did his column begin to advance peaceably. There they did no damage, and nowhere did they leave the road. And it was plain that this was not due to the self-restraint of the soldiers, but to the commander's orders, for the purpose of winning over the Tarentines. But when he had come quite close to the walls, and there was no movement at the first sight of his column, as he supposed there would be, he pitched camp about a mile from the city. In Tarentum three days before Hannibal approached the walls, Marcus Livius, who had been sent by Marcus Valerius, the propraetor in command of the fleet at Brundisium, actively enlisted young men, posted guards at all the gates and along the walls, wherever required, and alert by night as well as by day, he left neither the enemy nor wavering allies any opening for an attack. After spending some days there to no purpose, Hannibal, since none of the men who had come before him at the Lake of Avernus either came in person or sent a messenger or letter, saw that he had rashly followed empty promises and moved his camp away. Even then he left the

[1] The Tarpeian Rock of the Capitol (site still disputed).
[2] The same as Herdonea, XXV. xxi. 1; XXVII. i. 3.

A.U.C. 540

15 movit, tum quoque intacto agro Tarentino, quamquam simulata lenitas nihildum profuerat, tamen spe labefactandae fidei haud absistens. Salapiam ut venit, frumentum ex agris Metapontino atque Heracleensi—iam enim aestas exacta erat et hibernis
16 placebat locus—comportat. Praedatum inde Numidae Maurique per Sallentinum agrum proximosque Apuliae saltus dimissi; unde ceterae praedae haud multum, equorum greges maxime abacti, e quibus ad quattuor milia domanda equitibus divisa.

XXI. Romani, cum bellum nequaquam contemnendum in Sicilia oreretur morsque tyranni duces magis inpigros dedisset Syracusanis quam causam aut animos mutasset, M. Marcello alteri consulum
2 eam provinciam decernunt. Secundum Hieronymi caedem primo tumultuatum in Leontinis apud milites fuerat vociferatumque ferociter parentandum
3 regi sanguine coniuratorum esse. Deinde libertatis restitutae dulce auditu nomen crebro usurpatum et spes[1] facta ex pecunia regia largitionis militiaeque fungendae potioribus ducibus et relata tyranni foeda scelera foedioresque libidines adeo mutavere animos ut insepultum iacere corpus paulo ante
4 desiderati regis paterentur. Cum ceteri ex coniuratis ad exercitum obtinendum remansissent, Theodotus et Sosis regiis equis quanto maximo

[1] et spes (or spesque) Madvig: spes P(1): spe Conway.

[1] Cf. XXIII. xlviii. 3.

territory of Tarentum unharmed, as he did not give B.C. 214 up his hope of weakening their loyalty, although his pretended clemency had had no effect as yet. Arrived at Salapia, he brought in grain from the districts of Metapontum and Heraclea; for the summer was now over, and he thought well of the place for winter quarters. From it Numidians and Mauri were sent out to plunder in the Sallentine territory[1] and the nearest forests of Apulia. From these places not many other cattle were driven off as booty, but chiefly herds of horses, about four thousand of which were distributed among the cavalry to be broken.

XXI. The Romans, inasmuch as a war that was by no means to be despised was breaking out in Sicily, and the death of the tyrant had given energetic commanders to the Syracusans, and had not changed the situation or their feelings, assigned that country to Marcus Marcellus, one of the consuls, as his province. Directly after the assassination of Hieronymus there was at first an uproar among the soldiers at Leontini, and a fierce outcry that they must offer sacrificial vengeance to the dead king in the blood of the conspirators. Later the frequent mention of restored freedom—a word sweet to the ears—and the hope of a largess out of the king's money, and of serving under better generals, also the enumeration of the shameful crimes and still more shameful lusts of the tyrant, so changed their feelings that they allowed the body of the king, whose loss they had just been regretting, to lie unburied. Although the rest of the conspirators had remained, in order to keep their hold on the army, Theodotus[2] and Sosis hastened to [2] Cf. v. 10 ff.

A.U.C. 540

cursu poterant, ut ignaros omnium regios opprime-5 rent, Syracusas contendunt. Ceterum praevenerat non fama solum, qua nihil in talibus rebus est celerius, 6 sed nuntius etiam ex regiis servis. Itaque Adranodorus et Insulam et aream et alia quae poterat 7 quaeque opportuna erant praesidiis firmarat. Hexapylo Theodotus ac Sosis post solis occasum iam obscura luce invecti, cum cruentam regiam vestem atque insigne capitis ostentarent, travecti per Tycham simul ad libertatem simul ad arma vocantes, 8 in Achradinam convenire iubent. Multitudo pars procurrit in vias, pars in vestibulis stat, pars ex tectis fenestrisque prospectant et quid rei sit rogi-9 tant. Omnia luminibus conlucent strepituque vario complentur. Armati locis patentibus congregantur; inermes ex Olympii Iovis templo spolia Gallorum Illyriorumque, dono data Hieroni a populo Romano 10 fixaque ab eo, detrahunt, precantes Iovem ut volens propitius praebeat sacra arma pro patria, pro deum 11 delubris, pro libertate sese armantibus. Haec quo-que multitudo stationibus per principes regionum urbis dispositis adiungitur. In Insula inter cetera Adranodorus praesidiis firmarat horrea publica.
12 Locus saxo quadrato saeptus atque arcis in modum munitus capitur ab iuventute quae praesidio eius

[1] The oldest quarter of Syracuse, Ortygia. Cf. Cicero's description of the city, Verr. IV. 117 ff.

[2] The great northern gate of the Wall of Dionysius; xxxii. 4 ff.; XXV. xxiv. 2f., etc.; v. Appendix.

[3] A quarter that included a level tract, in which lay the market-place (xxii. 12), but not the rocky heights to the northward facing the sea; frequently mentioned below; v. Appendix.

Syracuse on the king's horses at the greatest possible B.C. 214 speed, to surprise his supporters while they were in complete ignorance. However, not only rumour, than which nothing is swifter in such cases, but also a messenger, one of the royal slaves, had anticipated them. And so Adranodorus had garrisoned the Island [1] and the citadel and such other places as were possible and of advantage. By the Hexapylon [2] after sunset Theodotus and Sosis rode into the city in the twilight, showing the bloody garment of the king and his diadem. Then riding across the quarter of Tycha, and calling people to freedom and at the same time to arms, they bid them assemble in Achradina.[3] Of the populace some dash into the streets, some stand before the entrance to their houses, some look out from roofs and windows and keep asking what it means. Everywhere there are bright lights, every place filled with mingled noises. The armed gather in open spaces; those without arms take down from the Temple of Olympian Jupiter [4] the spoils of Gauls and Illyrians, presented by the Roman people to Hiero and hung up there by him. And this they did with a prayer to Jupiter that he graciously consent to furnish consecrated arms to men arming themselves for their native city, for the temples of the gods, for liberty. This crowd also was added to the guard stationed by the leading citizens of the quarters. On the Island Adranodorus had garrisoned, among other positions, the public granaries. This place, which was walled about with squared stone and made strong like a citadel, was captured by the young [4] On the market-place; built by Hiero; not to be confused with the much older and larger temple west of the Great Harbour; xxxiii. 3; cf. Cicero op. cit. 119.

A.U.C. 540 loci adtributa erat. mittuntque nuntios in Achradinam horrea frumentumque in senatus potestate esse.

XXII. Luce prima populus omnis, armatus inermisque, in Achradinam ad curiam convenit. Ibi pro Concordiae ara, quae in eo sita loco erat, ex principibus unus nomine Polyaenus contionem et liberam et 2 moderatam habuit. Servitutis formidines[1] indignitatesque homines expertos adversus notum malum inritatos esse: discordia civilis quas inportet clades, audisse magis a patribus Syracusanos quam ipsos
3 vidisse. Arma quod inpigre ceperint, laudare; magis laudaturum, si non utantur nisi ultima necessitate 4 coacti. In praesentia legatos ad Adranodorum mitti placere qui denuntient ut in potestate senatus ac populi sit, portas Insulae aperiat, reddat praesi-
5 dium. Si tutelam alieni regni suum regnum velit facere, eundem se censere multo acrius ab Adrano-
6 doro quam ab Hieronymo repeti libertatem. Ab hac contione legati missi sunt. Senatus inde haberi coeptus est, quod sicut regnante Hierone manserat publicum consilium, ita post mortem eius ante eam diem nulla de re neque convocati neque consulti
7 fuerant. Ut ventum ad Adranodorum est, ipsum

[1] servitutis formidines Weissenborn: servitudinis P(4): servitutis M^3DA^2: servitu onus A: servitii onus Walters.

---

[1] A council, rather than a senate in the Roman sense.

men who had been assigned to its defence; and they B.C. 214 sent messengers into Achradina to say that the granaries and the grain were under the authority of the senate.[1]

XXII. At daybreak all the people, armed and unarmed, gathered at the Senate House in Achradina. There, standing on the altar of Concord,[2] which had been erected on that spot, one of the leading men, Polyaenus by name, delivered a speech at once outspoken and restrained. He said that men who had experienced the terrors of slavery and its humiliations had been inflamed against an evil which they knew. As for civil strife, the Syracusans had heard from their fathers, rather than seen for themselves, what disasters it brings. He praised them for having taken up arms readily, and would praise them the more willingly if they did not use them except when compelled by absolute necessity. For the present he approved of sending representatives to Adranodorus, to instruct him to put himself under the authority of the senate and people, open the gates of the Island and surrender the citadel. At the same time, if Adranodorus should try to turn a regency into a kingship of his own, he favoured reclaiming their freedom from Adranodorus much more fiercely than from Hieronymus. After this speech representatives were sent directly. Then began a session of the senate, which in the reign of Hiero had indeed continued to be the council of state, yet since his death had not been called together nor consulted about anything until that day. When the legates reached Adranodorus, he for his part was [2] This altar and the Senate House were in the market-place; 12 f.

A.U.C. 540

quidem movebat et civium consensus et cum aliae occupatae urbis partes, tum pars Insulae vel munitissima prodita atque alienata. Sed evocatum eum ab legatis Damarata uxor, filia Hieronis, inflata adhuc regiis animis ac muliebri spiritu, admonet saepe usurpatae Dionysi tyranni vocis, qua pedibus tractum, non insidentem equo relinquere tyrannidem dixerit debere. Facile esse momento quo quis velit cedere possessione magnae fortunae; facere et parare eam difficile atque arduum esse. Spatium sumeret ad consultandum ab legatis; eo uteretur ad arcessendos ex Leontinis milites, quibus si pecuniam regiam pollicitus esset, omnia in potestate eius futura. Haec muliebria consilia Adranodorus neque tota aspernatus est neque extemplo accepit, tutiorem ad opes adfectandas ratus esse viam, si in praesentia tempori cessisset. Itaque legatos renuntiare iussit futurum se in senatus ac populi potestate.

Postero die luce prima patefactis Insulae portis in forum Aehradinae venit. Ibi in aram Concordiae, ex qua pridie Polyaenus contionatus erat, escendit orationemque eam orsus est qua primum cunctationis suae veniam petivit: se enim clausas habuisse portas, non separantem suas res a publicis, sed strictis semel gladiis timentem qui finis caedibus esset futurus, utrum, quod satis libertati foret, contenti nece tyranni essent, an quicumque aut moved by the agreement of the citizens, also by the B.C. 214 occupation of other quarters of the city, and especially by the betrayal and loss of the most strongly fortified part of the Island. But his wife Damarata, daughter of Hiero and still puffed up with princely pride and a woman's boldness, called him aside from the legates and reminded him of the oft-repeated utterance of Dionysius the tyrant, that one should leave a tyranny, not on horseback, but dragged by the feet. It was easy, she said, to give up the possession of an exalted station at any moment one wished; to create and achieve it was difficult and all but impossible. He should gain time for deliberation from the legates. He should use it to summon the soldiers from Leontini, and if he should promise them money from the royal treasury everything would be in his power. These feminine counsels Adranodorus neither wholly rejected nor at once adopted, thinking it a safer way to gain power if for the moment he should yield to the crisis. And so he bade the legates report that he would be under the authority of the senate and people.

On the following day at dawn he opened the gates of the Island and came to the market-place of Achradina. There he mounted the altar of Concord, from which Polyaenus had addressed the people the day before, and began a speech in which he first begged pardon for his hesitation. For he had kept the gates closed, he said, not that he wished to separate his cause from that of the people, but because he feared what limit there would be to slaughter, when swords should once be drawn; whether they would be content with the death of the tyrant, which would be sufficient to secure freedom, propinquitate aut adfinitate aut aliquis ministeriis regiam contigissent alienae culpae rei trucidarentur.

A.U.C. 540

15 Postquam animadverterit eos qui liberassent patriam servare etiam liberatam velle atque undique consuli in medium, non dubitasse quin et corpus suum et cetera omnia quae suae fidei tutelaeque essent, quoniam eum qui mandasset suus furor absumpsisset,
16 patriae restitueret. Conversus deinde ad interfectores tyranni ac nomine appellans Theodotum ac
17 Sosin, "Facinus" inquit "memorabile feecistis; sed mihi credite, incohata vestra gloria, nondum perfecta est periculumque ingens manet, nisi paci et concordiae consulitis, ne libera efferatur res publica."

XXIII. Post hanc orationem claves portarum pecuniaeque regiae ante pedes eorum posuit. Atque illo quidem die dimissi ex contione laeti circa fana omnia deum supplicaverunt cum coniugibus ac liberis; postero die comitia praetoribus creandis habita.
2 Creatus in primis Adranodorus, ceteri magna ex parte interfectores tyranni; duos etiam absentes,
3 Sopatrum ac Dinomenen, fecerunt. Qui auditis[1] quae Syracusis acta erant pecuniam regiam quae in Leontinis erat Syracusas devectam quaestoribus ad
4 id ipsum creatis tradiderunt. Et ea quae in Insula erat Achradinam tralata est; murique ea pars quae ab cetera urbe nimis firmo munimento intersaepiebat Insulam consensu omnium deiecta est. Secutae or on the other hand every one who either by blood B.C. 214 or marriage or certain duties was connected with the palace would be slain, as being chargeable with another's guilt. After he observed that those who had freed their native city wished also to keep her free, and that the common good was the aim of all, he had not hesitated to surrender to the city his own person and in addition all that had been confided to his honour and protection, since the man who had given that charge had been destroyed by his own madness. Turning then to the assassins of the tyrant and addressing Theodotus and Sosis by name, he said: "It is a memorable deed that you have done. But believe me, your glory is but begun, not yet finished, and unless you provide for peace and harmony there remains a very great danger that this may be the funeral of the liberated state."

[1] auditis Gronovius: -tiis P: -tis iis P^1?(3) Madvig: -tis his D.

XXIII. After this speech he laid the keys of the gates and those of the royal treasure at their feet. And they, dismissed from the assembly and happy that day at least, with their wives and children gave thanks at all the temples of the gods. On the next day elections for the naming of magistrates were held. Among the first so named was Adranodorus, the rest largely assassins of the tyrant. Two who were not even present, Sopater and Dinomenes, were elected. These, hearing what had been done at Syracuse, brought the royal treasure that was at Leontini to Syracuse and turned it over to treasurers elected for that very purpose. The money that was on the Island was also transferred to Achradina. And that part of the wall which shut off the Island from the rest of the city by a needlessly strong fortification was thrown down by common consent. The other et ceterae res hanc inclinationem animorum ad libertatem.[1]

A.U.C. 540

5 Hippocrates atque Epicydes audita morte tyranni, quam Hippocrates etiam nuntio interfecto eclare voluerat, deserti a militibus, quia id tutissimum ex 6 praesentibus videbatur, Syracusas rediere. Ubi ne suspecti obversarentur tamquam novandi res aliquam occasionem quaerentes, praetores primum, 7 dein per eos senatum adeunt. Ab Hannibale se missos praedicant ad Hieronymum tamquam amicum ac socium paruisse imperio eius cuius imperator 8 suus voluerit. Velle ad Hannibalem redire; ceterum, cum iter tutum non sit vagantibus passim per totam Siciliam Romanis, petere ut praesidii dent aliquid quo Locros in Italiam perducantur; gratiam magnam 9 eos parva opera apud Hannibalem inituros. Facile res impetrata: abire enim duces regios cum peritos militiae, tum egentes eosdem atque audaces cupiebant; sed quod volebant non quam maturato opus 10 erat naviter expediebant. Interim iuvenes militares et adsueti militibus, nunc apud eos ipsos, nunc apud transfugas, quorum maxima pars ex navalibus sociis Romanorum erat, nunc etiam apud infimae plebis homines crimina serebant in senatum opti- 11 matesque: illud[2] moliri clam eos atque struere ut Syracusae per speciem reconciliatae societatis in measures also were in keeping with this trend toward B.C. 214 freedom.

[1] libertatem, PCRM add -que.
[2] illud Luchs: ut P(1): et x: id Gronovius.

[1] For their service under Hieronymus, cf. vii. 1.

Hippocrates and Epicydes, on hearing of the tyrant's death, which Hippocrates had wished to keep secret even by slaying the messenger, were deserted by the soldiers and returned to Syracuse,[1] since that course seemed safest in the circumstances. There, to avoid going about under suspicion as seeking some opportunity for a revolution, they first came before the magistrates, and then through them before the senate. They stated that, having been sent by Hannibal to Hieronymus as his friend and ally, they had obeyed the orders of the man to whom their own commander wished them to be obedient. They wished to return to Hannibal; but since the way was unsafe while the Romans were at large everywhere in Sicily, they asked the senators to give them some escort to conduct them to Locri[2] in Italy. The senate, they said, would gain great favour with Hannibal by a small service. This request was readily granted; for the senate greatly desired the departure of the king's generals, as men skilled in military art, and, what was more, needy also and daring. But they took no active steps to carry out their wish with the required promptness. Meanwhile the generals, as young men of military training and familiar with soldiers, at one time in the presence of these, at another among the deserters, the majority of whom were from the crews of the Romans, at another even among the lowest of the people, made charges against the senate and the aristocrats: that they were secretly working and contriving that Syracuse under the guise of a reëstablished alliance should be subject to the [2] Cf. i. 2 ff.

A.U.C. 510

dicione Romanorum sint, dein factio ac pauci auctores foederis renovati dominentur.

XXIV. His audiendis credendisque opportuna multitudo maior in dies Syracusas confluebat, nec Epicydi solum spem novandarum rerum, sed Adranodoro etiam praebebat. Qui fessus tandem uxoris 2 vocibus monentis nunc illud esse tempus occupandi res, dum turbata omnia nova atque incondita libertate essent, dum regiis stipendiis pastus obversaretur miles, dum ab Hannibale missi duces adsueti militibus iuvare possent incepta, cum Themisto, cui Gelonis filia nupta erat, rem consociatam paucos post dies Aristoni cuidam tragico actori, cui et alia arcana com- 3 mittere adsuerat, incaute aperit. Huic et genus et fortuna honesta erant, nec ars, quia nihil tale apud Graecos pudori est, ea deformabat. Itaque fidem potiorem [1] ratus quam patriae debebat, indicium ad 4 praetores defert. Qui ubi rem haud vanam esse certis indiciis compererunt, consultis senioribus et [2] auctoritate eorum praesidio ad fores posito ingressos curiam Themistum atque Adranodorum interfece- 5 runt. Et cum tumultus ab re in speciem atrociore causam aliis ignorantibus ortus esset, silentio tandem 6 facto indicem in curiam introduxerunt. Qui cum ordine omnia edocuisset: principium coniurationis factum ab Harmoniae Gelonis filiae nuptiis, quibus 7 Themisto iuncta esset; Aforum Hispanorumque auxiliares instructos ad caedem praetorum princi-

[1] potiorem, PCRM add -que: priorem potioremque Alschefski.

[2] et P(1): ex Luchs: et ex Walters.

Romans, and that then a faction, that is, a few who B.C. 214 supported the renewal of the treaty, should rule.

XXIV. Ready to hear and believe these charges, a daily larger multitude was flocking to Syracuse and giving not Epicydes only, but also Adranodorus, the hope of a revolution. The latter was at length wearied by admonitions of his wife: that it was now the time to seize the power, while everything was confused by the new freedom not yet organized; while the soldiers one met were fattened on the king's pay; while generals sent by Hannibal and familiar with the soldiers could aid the undertaking. Accordingly he formed a plot with Themistus, whose wife was Gelo's daughter, and after a few days rashly revealed it to one Aristo, a tragic actor, to whom he had been in the habit of confiding other secrets. This man's family and station were respectable and not tarnished by his artistic profession, since among the Greeks nothing of the sort brings discredit. And so thinking that the loyalty he owed to his native city took precedence, he reports the matter to the magistrates. They, finding from trustworthy information that this was not unfounded, conferred with the older men, placed a guard at the doors on their advice, and when Themistus and Adranodorus had entered the senate, slew them. And after the confusion resulting from an act even more terrible in appearance than in reality, since others were unaware of the reason, they at length secured silence and brought the informer into the Senate House. He first told everything in order: that the conspiracy had taken its start from the marriage of Gelo's daughter Harmonia, uniting her with Themistus; that African and Spanish auxiliaries had been made ready for the pumque aliorum, bonaque eorum praedae futura

A.U.C. 540

8 interfectoribus pronuntiatum; iam mercennariorum manum, adsuetam imperiis Adranodori, paratam fuisse ad Insulam rursus occupandam; singula deinde quae per quosque agerentur, totamque viris armisque instructam coniurationem ante oculos posuit. Et senatui quidem tam iure caesi quam
9 Hieronymus videbantur: ante curiam variae atque incertae rerum multitudinis clamor erat. Quam ferociter minitantem in vestibulo curiae corpora coniuratorum eo metu compresserunt ut silentes integram plebem in contionem sequerentur. Sopatro 10 mandatum ab senatu et a collegis ut verba faceret.

XXV. Is, tamquam reos ageret, ab [1] ante acta vita orsus, quaecumque post Hieronis mortem scelestе atque impie facta essent, Adranodorum ac Themi-
2 stum arguit fecisse: quid enim sua sponte [2] Hieronymum, puerum ac vixdum pubescentem facere potuisse? Tutores ac magistros eius sub aliena invidia regnasse; itaque aut ante Hieronymum aut
3 certe cum Hieronymo perire eos debuisse. At illos debitos iam morti destinatosque, alia nova scelera post mortem tyranni molitos, palam primo, cum clausis Adranodorus Insulae portis hereditatem regni creverit et quae procurator tenuerat pro domino
4 possederit; proditus deinde ab eis qui in Insula

[1] ab xz: om. P(1).
[2] sponte. P(1) add fecisse.

slaughter of the magistrates and other leading B.C. 214 citizens, and the announcement made that their property would be spoil for the assassins; moreover that a force of mercenaries accustomed to the orders of Adranodorus had been provided, to occupy the Island again. He then set forth in detail what was to be done, and by whom, and pictured the whole conspiracy manned and armed. And to the senators indeed they appeared to have been slain with as much justice as Hieronymus. But in front of the Senate House there was shouting by the mixed crowd unacquainted with the situation. Uttering wild threats, they were checked by the corpses of the conspirators before the entrance to the Senate House, in such fear that they silently followed the orderly populace to the assembly. Sopater was instructed by the senate and his colleagues to speak.

XXV. Beginning with their previous life, just as if he were prosecuting them, he charged that every act of violence or impiety committed since the death of Hiero had been done by Adranodorus and Themistus. For what could Hieronymus, a boy who had hardly reached puberty, have done of his own motion? His guardians and teachers, shielded by the embitterment directed against another, had been the real kings. Accordingly they ought to have perished either before Hieronymus or at least with Hieronymus. But though doomed already and marked for death, they had contrived fresh crimes since the death of the tyrant, at first openly, when Adranodorus, closing the gates of the Island, took over the kingdom as his own inheritance and as owner entered into possession of what he had held as agent: again when, betrayed by those who were on the Island, beset by the whole erant, circumsessus ab universa civitate quae Achradinam tenuerit, nequiquam palam atque aperte petitum regnum clam et dolo adfectare conatus sit, et ne beneficio quidem atque honore potuerit vinci, cum inter liberatores patriae insidiator ipse libertatis creatus esset praetor. Sed animos eis regios regias coniuges fecisse, alteri Hieronis, alteri Gelonis filias nuptas. Sub hanc vocem ex omnibus partibus contionis clamor oritur nullam earum vivere debere nec quemquam superesse tyrannorum stirpis. Ea natura multitudinis est: aut servit humiliter aut superbe dominatur; libertatem, quae media est, nec suscipere [1] modice nec habere sciunt; et non ferme desunt irarum indulgentes ministri, qui avidos atque intemperantes suppliciorum animos ad sanguinem et caedes inritent; sicut tum extemplo praetores rogationem promulgarunt, acceptaque paene prius quam promulgata est, ut omnes regiae stirpis interficerentur; missique a praetoribus Damaratam Hieronis et Harmoniam Gelonis filiam, coniuges Adranodori et Themisti, interfecerunt.

A.U.C. 540

XXVI. Heraclia erat filia Hieronis, uxor Zoippi, qui legatus ab Hieronymo ad regem Ptolomaeum missus voluntarium consciverat exilium. Ea cum ad se quoque veniri [2] praescisset, in sacrarium ad penates confugit eum duabus filiis [3] virginibus, resolutis crinibus miserabilique alio habitu, et ad ea

[1] suscipere x: cupere x: stupere P(2): struere Conway: sibi parare M. Müller.

[2] veniri x Gronovius: venire P(1).

[3] filiis Weissenborn conj. (cf. XXXVIII. lvii. 2): filiabus P(1).

---

[1] Cf. v. 7.

[2] Ptolemy IV Philopator, XXIII. x. 11.

body of citizens holding Achradina, he attempted B.C. 214 secretly and craftily to win the kingdom which he had sought in vain openly and above board, and could not be won over even by the bestowal of public office. For among those who gained liberty for the state, he, a plotter against liberty himself, had been elected a magistrate. But their autocratic temper was due to their royal consorts, Hiero's daughter married to the one, Gelo's daughter to the other. Following this statement there arose in all parts of the assembly a shout that none of those women ought to live, nor any one of the family of the tyrants to survive. This is the nature of the mass: either it is a humble slave or a haughty master. As for freedom, which is the mean, they know no moderation either in assuming or in keeping it. And angry passions usually do not lack complaisant helpers, to provoke to bloodshed those who are immoderately eager for punishment; as in this case the magistrates forthwith proposed a bill—and it was adopted almost before it was proposed—that all members of the royal family should be put to death. And by order of the magistrates men were sent who put to death Damarata the daughter of Hiero and Harmonia the daughter of Gelo, being the wives of Adranodorus and Themistus.

XXVI. Heraclia was the daughter of Hiero and wife of Zoippus,[1] who was sent as ambassador to King Ptolemy [2] by Hieronymus and had accepted voluntary exile. She, having learned in advance that they were coming to her house also, fled into the chapel of the household gods with her two maiden daughters, her hair dishevelled and her general appearance moving to pity. And in addition were addidit preces, nunc per deos, nunc [1] per memoriam Hieronis patris Gelonisque fratris, ne se innoxiam 4 invidia Hieronymi conflagrare sinerent: nihil se ex regno illius praeter exilium viri habere; neque fortunam suam eandem vivo Hieronymo fuisse quam sororis, neque interfecto eo causam eandem esse. 5 Quid quod si Adranodoro consilia processissent, illa cum viro fuerit regnatura, sibi cum ceteris servien- 6 dum? Si quis Zoippo nuntiet interfectum Hieronymum ac liberatas Syracusas, cui dubium esse quin extemplo conscensurus sit navem atque in patriam 7 rediturus? Quantum spes hominum falli! in liberata patria coniugem eius ac liberos de vita dimicare, 8 quid obstantes libertati aut legibus? Quod ab se cuiquam periculum, a sola ac prope vidua et puellis in orbitate degentibus esse? At enim periculi quidem nihil ab se timeri, invisam tamen stirpem regiam esse. 9 Ablegarent ergo procul ab Syracusis Siciliaque et asportari Alexandriam iuberent, ad virum uxorem, ad 10 patrem filias. Aversis auribus animisque cum conclamassent [2] ne tempus tereretur [3] ferrum quosdam 11 expedientes cernebat; tum omissis pro se precibus, puellis ut saltem parcerent orare instit, a qua aetate etiam hostes iratos abstinere; ne tyrannos ulciscendo 12 quae odissent scelera ipsi imitarentur. Inter haec abstractam a penetralibus iugulant; in virgines her prayers, now by the gods, now by the memory of B.C. 214 her father Hiero and her brother Gelo, that they should not allow her innocent self to perish by the fire of resentment against Hieronymus. Nothing had she gained by his reign except the exile of her husband; and while Hieronymus lived, her station had not been so high as her sister's, nor was their situation the same after his death. What of it that, if Adranodorus' plans had succeeded, the sister would have reigned with her husband, while she herself and all the rest must be slaves? If someone should inform Zoippus that Hieronymus had been slain and Syracuse set free, who would have any doubt that he would forthwith board ship and return to his native city? How the hopes of men were disappointed! In his native city, now set free, his wife and children were fighting for their lives, offering what obstacle to freedom and laws? What danger to anyone was there from herself, a lone woman, virtually a widow, and from maidens living as orphans? But they might say that no danger was indeed feared from her, that nevertheless the royal family was hated. Therefore they should send them far from Syracuse and Sicily and bid them to be carried away to Alexandria, the wife to her husband, the daughters to their father. When they paid no attention whatever and shouted not to waste time, she could see some men drawing swords. Then ceasing entreaties for herself, she urgently begged them at least to spare the girls—an age on which even enraged enemies do not lay hands; that in taking vengeance on the tyrants they should not themselves imitate the crimes which they hated. While still speaking, they dragged her away from the altar and cut her throat, deinde respersas matris cruore impetum faciunt. Quae alienata mente simul luctu metuque velut captae furore eo cursu se ex sacrario proripuerunt ut, si effugium patuisset in publicum, impleturae urbem 13 tumultu fuerint. Tum quoque haud magno aedium spatio inter medios tot armatos aliquotiens integro corpore evaserunt tenentibusque, cum tot ac tam validae eluctandae manus essent, sese eripuerunt.

A.U.C. 540

[1] per deos, nunc Ruperti: om. P(1).

[2] cum conclamassent Novák: cassae P: cassae or casse (1): variously emended: adstare Madvig: questa est Koch.

[3] tereretur A^2: terrerentur P(4): tererentur A: tererent Madvig.

A.U.C. 540

14 Tandem vulneribus confectae, cum omnia replessent sanguine, exanimes corruerunt. Caedemque per se miserabilem miserabiliorem casus fecit, quod paulo post nuntius venit, mutatis repente ad misericordiam
15 animis, ne interficerentur. Ira deinde ex misericordia orta, quod adeo festinatum ad [1] supplicium neque locus paenitendi aut regressus ab ira relictus
16 esset. Itaque fremere multitudo et in locum Adranodori ac Themisti—nam ambo praetores fuerant—comitia poscere, quae nequaquam ex sententia praetorum futura essent.

XXVII. Statutus est comitiis dies; quo neeopinantibus omnibus unus ex ultima turba Epicyden nominavit, tum inde alius Hippocratem; crebriores deinde hae voces et cum haud dubio adsensu multi-
2 tudinis esse. Et erat confusa contio non populari modo sed militari quoque turba, magna ex parte etiam perfugis, qui omnia novare cupiebant, per-
3 mixtis. Praetores dissimulare primo et trahenda re morae [2] esse [3]; postremo, victi consensu et sedi-

[1] ad P(1): id Madvig, Emend.

[2] morae M. Müller: om. P(1).

[3] esse, for et trahenda re esse (PRD: et -dam rem esse C^2MBA) Madvig and Walters read extrahenda re; sed.

then turned their attack upon the girls spattered with B.C. 214 their mother's blood. Beside themselves for grief and fear, as though insane, they dashed out of the chapel with such speed that, if there had been any escape to the street, they would have caused a riot throughout the city. Even as it was, in the limited space of the house, amidst so many armed men, they several times escaped unharmed and tore themselves away from those who tried to hold them, although they had to fight off hands so many and so strong. At last exhausted by wounds, after staining everything with their blood, they fell lifeless. The slaughter, in itself pitiful, was made still more pitiful by the coincidence that shortly after came the word that they were not to be put to death, for animosity had suddenly changed to pity. From pity then came anger, that such haste to punish had been made, and no chance left for a change of mind or a cooling of anger. And so the multitude complained, and to replace Adranodorus and Themistus—for both had been magistrates—they clamoured for an election, which would not prove at all to the liking of the magistrates.

XXVII. A day was set for the election, and on that day, to the surprise of everybody, one man on the outskirts of the crowd nominated Epicydes, then after him another named Hippocrates, whereupon these shouts were repeated and with evident approval of the multitude. And the assembly was disturbed by the crowd not only of citizens but also of soldiers, even deserters in large part mingling with them and eager for any change. The magistrates at first ignored them and by postponing delayed matters. Finally, compelled by the general

A.U.C. 540

4 tionem metuentes, pronuntiant eos praetores. Nec illi primo statim creati nudare quid vellent, quamquam aegre ferebant et de indutiis dierum decem legatos isse ad Appium Claudium et inpetratis eis alios qui de foedere antiquo renovando agerent
5 missos. Ad Murgantiam tum classem navium centum Romanus habebat, quonam evaderent motus ex caedibus tyrannorum orti Syracusis quove eos ageret nova atque insolita libertas opperiens.
6 Per eosdem dies cum ad Marcellum venientem in Siciliam legati Syracusani missi ab Appio essent, auditis condicionibus pacis Marcellus, posse rem convenire ratus, et ipse legatos Syracusas qui coram cum praetoribus de renovando foedere agerent misit.
7 Et iam ibi nequaquam eadem quies ac tranquillitas erat. Postquam Punicam classem accessisse Pachynum adlatum est, dempto timore Hippocrates et Epicydes nunc apud mercennarios milites, nunc apud transfugas prodi Romano Syracusas criminabantur.
8 Ut vero Appius naves ad ostium portus, quo [1] aliae [2] partis hominibus animus accederet, in statione habere coepit, ingens in speciem criminibus vanis 9 accesserat fides; ac primo etiam tumultuose decurrerat multitudo ad prohibendos, si in terram egrederentur.

[1] quo x Gronovius: quid P(1).
[2] aliae P(1)x Hertz: alius A^2: amicae Madvig: suae Bauer. For the old form aliae cf. Cicero de Divinatione II. 30 (twice).

[1] Now a legatus of Marcellus; praetor in Sicily the previous year; vi. 4; vii. 8.

agreement and fearing an uprising, they declared B.C. 214
Epicydes and Hippocrates magistrates. And at first the newly elected did not reveal their intentions, although they were indignant that legates had gone to Appius Claudius [1] to sue for a ten days' truce, and that, this being secured, others had been sent to negotiate the renewal of the old treaty. At that time the Roman commander had a fleet of a hundred ships off Murgantia,[2] waiting to see what would be the outcome of the disturbances at Syracuse due to the massacre of the tyrant's family, and to what the new and unwonted freedom would prompt them.

About the same time Marcellus was just arriving in Sicily, and the Syracusan ambassadors were sent to him by Appius. After hearing the peace terms, Marcellus thought agreement could be reached, and himself sent ambassadors to Syracuse to treat in person with the magistrates for a renewal of the treaty. And by this time the situation there was by no means so orderly and peaceful. When word was received that a Carthaginian fleet had reached the promontory of Pachynum,[3] Hippocrates and Epicydes, relieved of their fear, kept making the charge, now before the mercenaries, now among the deserters, that Syracuse was being betrayed to the Roman. But from the time Appius began to keep ships at anchor at the harbour mouth in order to encourage the men of the other party, the false charges apparently had received strong confirmation. And at first the crowd had even rushed down in disorder to keep them off in case they should be landing.

[2] A seaport of unknown situation. Another town of the same name was in the interior, to the east of Henna.

[3] Little more than thirty miles south of Syracuse.

A.U.C. 540

XXVIII. In hac turbatione rerum in contionem vocari placuit. Ubi cum alii alio tenderent nec procul seditione res esset, Apollonides, princeipum unus, orationem salutarem ut in tali tempore habuit:
2 nec spem salutis nec perniciem propiorem umquam
3 civitati ulli fuisse. Si enim uno animo omnes vel ad Romanos vel ad Carthaginienses inclinent, nullius
4 civitatis statum fortunatiorem ac beatiorem fore; si alii alio trahant res, non inter Poenos Romanosque bellum atrocius fore quam inter ipsos Syracusanos, cum intra eosdem muros pars utraque suos exercitus,
5 sua arma, suos habitura sit duces. Itaque ut idem omnes sentiant summa vi agendum esse. Utra societas sit utilior, eam longe minorem ac levioris
6 momenti consultationem esse; sed tamen Hieronis potius quam Hieronymi auctoritatem sequendam in sociis legendis, vel quinquaginta annis feliciter expertam amicitiam nunc incognitae, quondam
7 infideli praeferendam. Esse etiam momenti aliquid ad consilium quod Carthaginiensibus ita pax negari possit, ut non utique in praesentia bellum cum eis geratur: cum Romanis extemplo aut pacem aut
8 bellum habendum. Quo minus cupiditatis ac studii visa est oratio habere, eo plus auctoritatis habuit. Adiectum est praetoribus ac delectis senatorum militare etiam consilium; iussi et duces ordinum
9 praefectique auxiliorum simul consulere. Cum saepe acta res esset magnis certaminibus, postremo, quia

XXVIII. In this confused state of affairs it was B.C. 214 decided to summon the people to an assembly. There while some inclined in one direction, some in another, and an uprising was not far away, Apollonides, one of the leading citizens, made a speech which was well-advised, considering the crisis. He said that neither the prospect of safety nor that of destruction had ever been nearer to any state. For if with one mind they should all incline, whether to the Romans or to the Carthaginians, no state would be in a more highly favoured and happier condition. If they pulled in different directions, war between Carthaginians and Romans would not be more cruel than that among the Syracusans themselves, since within the same walls each side would have its own armies, its own weapons, its own generals. Accordingly they must make the greatest effort to reach agreement. Which alliance was the more advantageous was a question decidedly subordinate and of far less weight. Yet Hiero's authority ought to be followed in choosing allies rather than that of Hieronymus; in other words, a friendship which had proved happy for fifty years should be preferred to one unknown at present and formerly faithless. For their decision it was also of considerable importance that they could decline the Carthaginians' offer of peace without necessarily waging war with them at once. With the Romans they must straightway have either peace or war. The less of party passion the speech seemed to have, the greater was its influence. To the magistrates and picked senators they added a military council also. Commanders of units and prefects of auxiliaries as well were ordered to take part in the deliberations. After the question had been repeatedly debated with

A.U.C. 540 belli cum Romanis gerendi ratio nulla apparebat, pacem fieri placuit mittique legatos ad rem eum eis [1] confirmandam.

XXIX. Dies haud ita multi intercesserunt, cum ex Leontinis legati praesidium finibus suis orantes venerunt; quae legatio peropportuna visa ad multitudinem inconditam ac tumultuosam exonerandam
2 ducesque eius ablegandos. Hippocrates praetor ducere eo transfugas iussus; secuti multi ex mercennariis auxiliis quattuor milia armatorum effecerunt.
3 Et mittentibus et missis ea laeta expeditio fuit; nam et illis, quod iam diu cupiebant, novandi res occasio data est, et hi sentinam quandam urbis rati exhaustam laetabantur. Ceterum levaverunt modo in praesentia velut corpus aegrum, quo mox in 4 graviorem morbum recideret. Hippocrates enim finitima provinciae Romanae primo furtivis excursionibus vastare coepit; deinde, cum ad tuendos sociorum agros missum ab Appio praesidium esset, omnibus copiis impetum in oppositam stationem cum
5 caede multorum fecit. Quae cum essent nuntiata Marcello, legatos extemplo Syracusas misit qui pacis fidem ruptam esse dicerent nec belli defuturam umquam causam, nisi Hippocrates atque Epicydes non ab Syracusis modo, sed tota procul Sicilia ablegarentur. Epicydes, ne aut reus criminis absentis fratris
6 praesens esset, aut deesset pro parte sua concitando bello, profectus et ipse in Leontinos, quia satis eos

[1] cum eis P(1), but after mittique : after rem Gronovius.

great contention, finally, as they evidently had no B.C. 214 means of carrying on a war with the Romans, it was decided to make an alliance with them, and to send ambassadors for the ratification.

XXIX. Not many days had elapsed, when ambassadors from Leontini arrived, pleading for a force to defend their territory. The request of this embassy seemed very timely for the purpose of relieving the city of a disorderly and turbulent multitude and of sending away its leaders. Hippocrates as magistrate was ordered to lead the deserters thither. Many of the mercenary auxiliaries followed, making four thousand armed men. That enterprise gave joy both to the senders and the sent; for the one party were given a long-desired opportunity for revolution, and the other rejoiced also to think that the dregs of the city had been drained off. But they relieved the diseased body, so to speak, merely for the moment, only to have it relapse presently into a more serious ailment. For Hippocrates began, at first with stealthy raids, to ravage lands on the border of the Roman province. Later, when Appius had sent troops to protect the farms of the allies, he made an attack with all his forces upon the unit on guard-duty facing him, and many were slain. Marcellus, being informed of this, at once sent legates to Syracuse, to say that the promised peace had been broken, and that a reason for war would never be wanting unless Hippocrates and Epicydes should be sent far away, not merely from Syracuse, but from all Sicily. Epicydes, to avoid being present under an accusation brought against his absent brother, or else failing to do his part in provoking war, went likewise to Leontini; and seeing that its citizens were sufficiently adversus populum Romanum concitatos cernebat,

A.U.C. 540

7 avertere etiam ab Syracusanis coepit: nam ita eos pacem pepigisse cum Romanis ut quicumque populi sub regibus fuissent [1] suae dicionis essent, nec iam libertate contentos esse nisi etiam regnent ac domi-
8 nentur. Renuntiandum igitur eis esse Leontinos quoque aequom censere liberos [2] esse, vel quod in solo urbis suae tyrannus ceciderit, vel quod ibi primum conclamatum ad libertatem relictisque
9 regiis ducibus Syracusas concursum sit.[3] Itaque aut eximendum id de foedere esse, aut legem eam
10 foederis non accipiendam. Facile multitudini persuasum; legatisque Syracusanorum et de caede stationis Romanae quaerentibus et Hippocratem atque Epicydem abire seu Locros seu quo alio mallent, dummodo Sicilia cederent, iubentibus ferociter responsum est neque mandasse sese Syracu-
11 sanis ut pacem pro se cum Romanis facerent, neque
12 teneri alienis foederibus. Haec ad Romanos Syracusani detulerunt, abnuentes Leontinos in sua potestate esse: itaque integro secum foedere bellum Romanos cum iis gesturos, neque sese defuturos ei bello, ita ut in potestatem redacti suae rursus dicionis essent, sicut pax convenisset.

XXX. Marcellus cum omni exercitu profectus in

[1] fuissent Madvig[1]: fuissent et P(1) Conway: fuissent ei Riemann.
[2] liberos P(1) Conway: liberos se Madvig.
[3] sit Weissenborn (before concursum z): om. P(1).

aroused against the Roman people, began also to B.C. 214
estrange them from the Syracusans. For, he explained, the Syracusans had made an alliance with the Romans with the provision that all the states which had been subject to the kings should be under their rule; that now they were not satisfied with freedom, without also being lords and masters. They must therefore report to them that the Leontinians likewise thought it right that they should be free, either because it was on the soil of their city that the tyrant fell, or because there for the first time men shouted the summons to liberty, and deserting the king's generals flocked to Syracuse. Accordingly either that clause, he said, must be removed from the treaty, or else an alliance on such terms was not to be accepted. The multitude was easily persuaded, and when the legates of the Syracusans complained of the slaughter of the Roman guard-post and also bade Hippocrates and Epicydes go away to Locri or wherever they preferred, provided they withdrew from Sicily, the people replied with spirit that they had not instructed the Syracusans to make a treaty for them with the Romans, and that they were not bound by treaties not of their own making. This was reported to the Romans by the Syracusans who stated that the men of Leontini were not subject to their authority; and that consequently the Romans would make war upon them without violating the treaty made with Syracuse; also that they would themselves not refuse to give help in the war, on condition that, when reduced to subjection, the Leontini should again be under their authority, as had been settled in the treaty.

XXX. Marcellus, proceeding with his whole army

A.U.C. 540

Leontinos, Appio quoque accito ut altera parte adgrederetur, tanto ardore militum est usus ab ira inter condiciones pacis interfectae stationis ut primo impe-
2 tu urbem expugnarent. Hippocrates atque Epicydes, postquam capi muros refringique portas videre, in arcem sese cum paucis recepere; inde clam nocte
3 Herbesum perfugiunt. Syracusanis octo milium armatorum agmine profectis domo ad Mylan flumen nuntius occurrit captam urbem esse, cetera falsa
4 mixta veris ferens: caedem promiscuam militum atque oppidanorum factam, nec quicquam puberum arbitrari superesse; direptam urbem, bona locuple-
5 tium donata. Ad nuntium tam atrocem constitit agmen, concitatisque omnibus duces—erant autem Sosis ac Dinomenes—quid agerent consultabant.
6 Terroris speciem haud vanam mendacio praebuerant verberati ac securi percussi transfugae ad duo milia
7 hominum; ceterum Leontinorum militumque aliorum nemo post captam urbem violatus fuerat, suaque omnia eis, nisi quae primus tumultus captae urbis
8 absumpserat, restituebantur. Nec ut Leontinos irent, proditos ad caedem commilitones querentes, perpelli potuere, nec ut eodem loco certiorem nun-
9 tium expectarent. Cum ad defectionem inclinatos animos cernerent praetores, sed eum motum haud diuturnum fore, si duces amentiae sublati essent, 10 exercitum ducunt Megara, ipsi cum paucis equitibus

---

[1] Probably between Syracuse and Leontini, perhaps on the Mylas.

[2] Leontini.

[3] The praetores, having taken the field, are now generals, as repeatedly below.

[4] On the coast north of Syracuse; destroyed by Marcellus, xxxv. 2.

to Leontini and summoning Appius also to make an B.C. 214 attack from the other side, found such enthusiasm in his soldiers, due to anger aroused by the slaughter of men of the guard while negotiations were pending, that they took the city at the first assault. Hippocrates and Epicydes, on seeing that the walls were being taken and gates forced, sought refuge with a few men in the citadel. Thence they fled secretly by night to Herbesus.[1] The Syracusans, who had set out from home in a column of eight thousand men, were met at the river Mylas by a messenger, reporting that the city [2] had been captured, but for the rest mingling the false with the true: that a general massacre of soldiers and townspeople had occurred, and no adults, he thought, had survived; that the city had been plundered, the property of the wealthy given away. On hearing news so terrible the column halted, and in the general excitement the commanders—and they were Sosis and Dinomenes—considered what they should do. The appearance of well-founded alarm had been lent to the falsehood by the scourging and beheading of deserters, about two thousand men. But not one of the Leontinians or of the other soldiers had been injured after the capture of the city; and, except what had been lost in the first confusion of the capture of the city, all their property was being restored to them. And the soldiers, complaining that their comrades had been betrayed to their death, could neither be induced to go to Leontini nor to wait at the same spot for more trustworthy news. The generals,[3] seeing them inclined to mutiny, but that the outbreak would not last long if the leaders in folly should be removed, led the army to Megara;[4] and then with a few

A.U.C. 540

Herbesum proficiscuntur spe territis omnibus per 11 proditionem urbis potiundae. Quod ubi frustra eis fuit inceptum, vi agendum rati postero die Megaris castra movent, ut Herbesum omnibus copiis oppug-
12 narent. Hippocrates et Epicydes non tam tutum prima specie quam unum spe undique abscisa consilium esse rati, ut se militibus permitterent et adsuetis magna ex parte sibi et tum fama caedis commilitonum accensis, obviam agmini procedunt.
13 Prima forte signa seseentorum Cretensium erant, qui apud Hieronymum meruerant sub eis et Hannibalis beneficium habebant, capti ad Trasumennum
14 inter Romanorum auxilia dimissique. Quos ubi ex signis armorumque habitu cognovere, Hippocrates atque Epicydes ramos oleae ac velamenta alia supplicum porrigentes orare ut reciperent sese, receptos tutarentur, neu proderent Syracusanis, a quibus ipsi mox trucidandi populo Romano dederentur. XXXI. Enimvero conclamant bonum ut animum haberent; omnem se cum illis fortunam
2 subituros. Inter hoc conloquium signa constiterant tenebaturque agmen, needum quae morae causa foret pervenerat ad duces. Postquam Hippocraten atque Epicyden adesse [1] pervasit rumor, fremitusque toto agmine erat haud dubie adprobantium adventum

[1] adesse z Madvig: esse $A^{2}x$: om. $P(1)$: adesse ordines Weissenborn.

[1] They were archers.

horsemen they went themselves to Herbesus, in the B.C. 214 hope of getting possession of the city by treachery, owing to the general alarm. When this undertaking disappointed them, they thought they must use force, and moved their camp from Megara the next day, to attack Herbesus with all their troops. Hippocrates and Epicydes, thinking that their plan to put themselves at the mercy of the soldiers, who were in large part used to them and also at that time inflamed by the report of the slaughter of their comrades, was not so much one which at first sight promised safety, as it was the only possible plan in a desperate situation, went out to meet the column. The first unit happened to be that of six hundred Cretans, who had served under them in the army of Hieronymus and were under obligations to Hannibal, as they had been captured among the Roman auxiliaries at the Trasumennus and allowed to go free. Recognizing them from their standards and the character of their weapons,[1] Hippocrates and Epicydes, holding out olive branches and in addition the woollen bands of suppliants, implored them to admit them and, having done so, to protect and not betray them to the Syracusans, to be themselves presently surrendered by the same to the Roman people for slaughter. XXXI. And in fact the Cretans shouted to them to take courage, saying they would share every lot with them. During this conversation the standards had halted and the column was being held up. And word had not yet reached the generals as to what was the cause of the delay. When the report that Hippocrates and Epicydes were there did reach them, and down the whole length of the column there was a shout of evident joy over their coming, at once the eorum, extemplo praetores citatis equis ad prima 3 signa perrexerunt. Qui mos ille, quae licentia Cretensium esset rogitantes, conloquia serendi cum hoste iniussuque praetorum miscendi eos agmini suo, comprehendi inicique catenas iusserunt Hippo-4 crati. Ad quam vocem tantus extemplo primum a Cretensibus clamor est ortus, deinde exceptus ab aliis, ut facile, si ultra tenderent, appareret eis ti-5 mendum esse. Solliciti incertique rerum suarum Megara, unde profecti erant, referri signa iubent nuntiosque de statu praesenti Syracusas mittunt.

A.U.C. 540

6 Fraudem quoque Hippocrates addit inclinatis ad omnem suspicionem animis et Cretensium quibusdam ad itinera insidenda missis velut intercceptas litteras 7 quas ipse composuerat, recitat: "Praetores Syracusani consuli Marcello." Secundum salutem, ut adsolet, scriptum erat recte eum atque ordine fecisse, 8 quod in Leontinis nulli pepercisset. Sed omnium mercennariorum militum eandem esse causam, nec umquam Syracusas quieturas donec quicquam externorum auxiliorum aut in urbe aut in exercitu suo 9 esset. Itaque daret operam ut eos qui cum suis praetoribus castra ad Megara haberent in suam potestatem redigeret ac supplicio eorum liberaret 10 tandem Syracusas. Haec cum recitata essent, cum tanto clamore ad arma discursum est ut praetores 11 inter tumultum pavidi abequitaverint Syracusas. Et ne fuga quidem eorum seditio compressa est, impetus-que in Syracusanos milites fiebant; nec ab ullo

---

[1] Mention of one brother is meant to include the other, Epicydes; xxiv. 1; xxxv. 4.

[2] Only the heading is quoted verbatim, with suppression of the conventional greeting.

generals made their way at a gallop to the head of the column. Asking what a practice, what a breach of discipline, it was on the part of the Cretans to join in conversation with an enemy and to admit the men to their own column without orders from the generals, they ordered them to be arrested and Hippocrates [1] to be put in chains. Upon that command such an outcry was first raised by the Cretans, and then caught up by others, that it was easy to see that if they took any further steps they would have to fear for themselves. Troubled and uncertain as to their own situation, they ordered a retreat to Megara, from which they had set out, and sent messengers to Syracuse to report how matters stood. B.C. 214

While men were inclined to suspect everything, Hippocrates also resorted to a ruse. After sending some of the Cretans to lie in wait by the roads, with the pretence that it had been intercepted, he publicly read a letter written by himself: "The magistrates of Syracuse to the Consul Marcellus." [2] Following the customary greeting it was stated that he had been entirely right in sparing no one at Leontini; but that the situation of all the mercenary soldiers was the same, and Syracuse would never have peace so long as there were any foreign auxiliaries in either the city or its army. Therefore he should take measures to reduce to submission the men who were encamped at Megara under the command of their own generals, and by their punishment to set Syracuse free at last. After this had been read, they rushed to arms with such shouting that during the confusion the generals rode away in alarm to Syracuse. And the mutiny was not quelled even by their flight; but attacks were repeatedly made on the Syracusan soldiers.

A.U.C. 540

temperatum foret, ni Epicydes atque Hippocrates
12 irae multitudinis obviam issent, non a misericordia aut humano consilio, sed ne spem reditus praeciderent sibi et, cum ipsos simul milites fidos haberent
13 simul obsides, tum cognatos quoque eorum atque amicos tanto merito primum, dein pignore sibi
14 conciliarent. Expertique quam vana aut levi aura mobile volgus esset, militem nancti ex eo numero qui in Leontinis circumsessi erant, subornant, ut Syracusas perferret nuntium convenientem eis quae ad
15 Mylan falso nuntiata erant, auctoremque se exhibendo ac velut visa quae dubia erant narrando concitaret iras hominum.

XXXII. Huic non apud volgum modo fides fuit, sed senatum quoque in curiam introductus movit. Haud vani quidam homines palam ferre perbene detectam in Leontinis esse avaritiam et crudelitatem Romanorum. Eadem, si intrassent Syracusas, aut foediora etiam, quo maius ibi avaritiae praemium
2 esset, facturos fuisse. Itaque claudendas cuncti portas et custodiendam urbem censere. Sed non ab iisdem omnes timere nec eosdem odisse: ad militare genus omne partemque magnam plebis
3 invisum esse nomen Romanum; praetores optimatiumque pauci, quamquam inflati vano nuntio erant, tamen ad propius praesentiusque malum cautiores
4 esse. Et iam ad Hexapylum erant Hippocrates

[1] Since the soldiers would virtually be hostages, to ensure the support of many friends and relatives in the city.

Nor would they have spared any of them, had not B.C. 214
Epicydes and Hippocrates opposed the enraged multitude, not out of pity and a humane intent, but in order not to cut off the hope of their own return, and that they might not only keep the men themselves as loyal soldiers and at the same time hostages, but also win over their relatives and friends, first by so great a service, and then by the personal security.[1] And having learned how empty or faint a breath moves the crowd, they took a soldier from among those who had been besieged at Leontini and bribed him to carry to Syracuse a message in agreement with what had been falsely reported at the Mylas, and by showing himself to vouch for it and by relating the doubtful as things that he had seen, to inflame men's anger.

XXXII. This man was not only believed by the common people, but on being admitted to the Senate House, he stirred the senate as well. Some men of consequence openly declared it was very well that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans had been revealed at Leontini; that if they had entered Syracuse they would have done the same things or even more terrible, in proportion to the greater prize for avarice there. Accordingly, they all voted that the gates should be closed and the city guarded. But not all were afraid of the same persons or hated the same men. Among the whole military class and a large part of the common people the Roman name was hated. As for the generals and a few of the best citizens, although they had been misled by the false news, they were nevertheless more circumspect in the face of a danger more immediately impending. And already Hippocrates atque Epicydes, serebanturque conloquia per propinquos popularium qui in exercitu erant, ut portas aperirent sinerentque communem patriam defendi ab impetu Romanorum. Iam unis foribus Hexapyli apertis coepti erant recipi, cum praetores intervenerunt. Et primo imperio minisque, deinde auctoritate deterrendo, postremo, ut omnia vana erant, obliti maiestatis precibus agebant ne proderent patriam tyranni ante satellitibus et tum corruptoribus exercitus. Sed surdae ad ea omnia [1] aures concitatae multitudinis erant, nec minore intus vi quam foris portae effringebantur, effractisque omnibus toto Hexapylo agmen receptum est. Praetores in Achradinam cum iuventute popularium confugiunt. Mercennarii milites perfugaeque et quidquid regiorum militum Syracusis erat agmen hostium augent. Ita Achradina quoque primo impetu capitur, praetorumque nisi qui inter tumultum effugerunt omnes interficiuntur. Nox caedibus finem fecit. Postero die servi ad pilleum vocati et carcere vincti emissi; confusaque haec omnis multitudo Hippocraten atque Epicyden ereant praetores; Syracusaeque, cum breve tempus libertas adfulsisset, in antiquam servitutem reciderant.

A.U.C. 540

XXXIII. Haec nuntiata cum essent Romanis, ex Leontinis mota sunt extemplo castra ad Syracusas.

[1] ad ea omnia Böttcher: ad omnia Madvig: aditomnium P: adeo omnium P^2?(1).

[1] Cf. xvi. 18.

and Epicydes were at the Hexapylon, and there were B.C. 214 communications through intermediaries who were relatives of citizens in the army: that they should open the gates and allow the defence of the city, their common home, against attack by the Romans. By this time one of the gates of the Hexapylon had been opened, and by it they had begun to be admitted, when the generals intervened. And at first by their military authority and by threats, then by using their personal influence to restrain them, finally, when all was without affect, disregarding dignity they prayed them not to betray their native city to former minions of the tyrant and present seducers of the army. But the ears of the excited crowd were deaf to all that; and the gates were being forced with no less violence from within than from without, and when all had been forced, the column was admitted through the whole breadth of the Hexapylon. The generals with the younger citizens flee for refuge to Aehradina. The mercenary soldiers and deserters and such royal troops as were at Syracuse swell the column of the enemy. Thus Aehradina also is taken by assault, and all the magistrates, except those who escaped in the midst of the uproar, are slain. Night put an end to the slaughter. On the next day slaves were called to wear the cap of freedom[1] and criminals in chains released from prison; and all this assorted multitude elected Hippocrates and Epicydes generals. And Syracuse, after the light of liberty had shone upon it for a short time, had fallen back into its old-time servitude.

XXXIII. When these facts were reported to the Romans, the camp was at once removed from Leontini

A.U.C. 540

2 Et ab Appio legati per portum missi forte in quinqueremi erant. Praemissa quadriremis cum intrasset
3 fauces portus, capitur; legati aegre effugerunt. Et iam non modo pacis sed ne belli quidem iura relicta erant, cum Romanus exercitus ad Olympium—Iovis id templum est—mille et quingentos passus ab urbe
4 castra posuit. Inde quoque legatos praemitti placuit; quibus, ne intrarent urbem, extra portam Hippocrates atque Epicydes obviam cum suis pro-
5 cesserunt. Romanus orator non bellum se Syracusanis sed opem auxiliumque adferre ait, et eis qui ex media caede elapsi perfugerint ad se, et eis qui metu oppressi foediorem non exilio solum sed etiam
6 morte servitutem patiantur; nec eaedem nefandam sociorum inultam Romanos passuros. Itaque, si eis qui ad se perfugerint tutus in patriam reditus pateat,[1] caedis auctores dedantur, et libertas legesque Syracusanis restituantur, nihil armis opus esse; si ea non fiant, quicumque in mora sit bello perse-
7 cuturos. Ad ea Epicydes, si qua ad se mandata haberent, responsum eis ait se daturos fuisse; cum in eorum ad quos venerint manu res Syracusana esset, 8 tum reverterentur. Si bello lacesserent, ipsa re intellecturos nequaquam idem esse Syracusas ac

[1] pateat Crévier: pateat et Walters: pateret P(1).

---

[1] Westward of the Great Harbour, plainly visible from the Island and from part of Achradina. Near this great temple the Athenians had encamped, as also the Carthaginians, in other sieges. Two columns still stand.

to Syracuse. And, as it happened, legates had B.C. 214 been sent by Appius by way of the harbour on a five-banker. The four-banker sent in advance was captured on entering the narrows. The legates barely escaped. And now there remained no longer any rights even of war, not to say of peace, when the Roman army pitched camp at the Olympium, that is, the Temple of Jupiter,[1] a mile and a half from the city. From this place also it was decided to send legates in advance. To prevent their entering the city, Hippocrates and Epicydes and their retinue advanced beyond the gate to meet them. The speaker for the Romans said he was not bringing war, but aid and comfort to the Syracusans, both to those who, escaping from the midst of the slaughter, had sought refuge with the Romans, and to those who, subdued by their fear, were enduring a slavery more shameful, not only than exile, but even than death; and that the Romans would not leave the atrocious slaughter of their allies unavenged. Accordingly, if a safe return to their native city should be open to those who had sought refuge with the Romans, if those responsible for the slaughter should be surrendered and their freedom and laws restored to the Syracusans, there was no need of arms. If those conditions should not be met, the Romans would wage war against every man who caused delay. In reply Epicydes said that, if their message had been addressed to his colleague and himself, they would have given them an answer. When the Syracusan state should be under the control of the men to whom they came, then let them return. Should they make war, they would find from actual experience that to attack Syracuse was by no means the same as

A.U.C. 540

Leontinos oppugnare. Ita legatis relictis portas clausit.

9 Inde terra marique simul coeptae oppugnari Syracusae, terra ab Hexapylo, mari ab Achradina, cuius murus fluctu adluitur. Et quia, sicut Leontinos terrore ac primo impetu ceperant, non diffidebant vastam disiectamque spatio urbem parte aliqua se invasuros, omnem apparatum oppugnandarum urbium muris admoverunt. XXXIV. Et habuisset tanto impetu coepta res fortunam, nisi unus homo Syra-
2 cusis ea tempestate fuisset. Archimedes is erat, unicus speetator caeli siderumque, mirabilior tamen inventor ac machinator bellicorum tormentorum operumque quibus quicquid [1] hostes ingenti mole
3 agerent ipse perlevi momento ludificaretur. Muros per inaequalis ductos [2] colles, pleraque alta et difficilia aditu, submissa quaedam et quae planis vallibus adiri possent, ut cuique aptum visum est loco, ita
4 genere omni tormentorum instruxit. Achradinae murum, qui, ut ante dictum est, mari adluitur, segaginta [3] quinqueremibus Marcellus oppugnabat.
5 Ex ceteris navibus sagittarii funditoresque et velites etiam, quorum telum ad remittendum inhabile imperitis est, vix quemquam sine vulnere consistere
6 in muro patiebantur; hi, quia spatio missilibus opus est, procul muro tenebant naves: iunctae aliae binae

[1] quicquid Madvig: om. P(1): si quid Weissenborn.
[2] muros . . . ductos Weissenborn: murus . . . ductus P(1): murum . . . ductum z Madvig.
[3] sexaginta Böttcher: ex (for LX or ex LX) P(1).

---

[1] Livy does not mention Archimedes' celebrity as a mathematician.
[2] The number sixty agrees with Polybius VIII. 4(6). 1.

to attack Leontini. So he left the ambassadors and B.C. 214 closed the gates.

Thereupon began the siege of Syracuse at the same time by land and by sea, by land from the side of the Hexapylon, by sea from that of Achradina, the wall of which is washed by the waves. And because, having taken Leontini by a panic and the first assault, the Romans did not doubt that at some point they would make their way into a city immense and widely scattered, they brought all their equipment for besieging cities up to the walls. XXXIV. And an undertaking begun with so vigorous an assault would have met with success if one man had not been at Syracuse at that time. It was Archimedes, an unrivalled observer of the heavens and the stars, more remarkable, however, as inventor and contriver of artillery and engines of war, by which with the least pains he frustrated whatever the enemy undertook with vast efforts.[1] The walls, carried along uneven hills, mainly high positions and difficult to approach, but some of them low and accessible from level ground, were equipped by him with every kind of artillery, as seemed suited to each place. The wall of Achradina, which, as has been said already, is washed by the sea, was attacked by Marcellus with sixty five-bankers.[2] From most[3] of the ships archers and slingers, also light-armed troops, whose weapon is difficult for the inexpert to return,[4] allowed hardly anyone to stand on the wall without being wounded; and these men kept their ships at a distance from the wall, since range is needed for missile weapons.

[3] "Most," since ceterae is contrasted with aliae in § 6 (eight in Polybius).

[4] Owing to the skill required in using the thong (amentum).

A.U.C. 540

quinqueremes demptis interioribus remis, ut latus
7 lateri adplicaretur, cum exteriore ordine remorum velut una navis agerentur, turres contabulatas machinamentaque alia quatiendis muris portabant.
8 Adversus hunc navalem apparatum Archimedes variae magnitudinis tormenta in muris disposuit. In eas quae procul erant navis saxa ingenti pondere emittebat, propiores levioribus eoque magis crebris
9 petebat telis; postremo, ut sui volnere intacti tela in hostem ingererent, murum ab imo ad summum crebris cubitalibus fere cavis aperuit, per quae cava pars sagittis, pars scorpionibus modicis ex occulto
10 petebant hostem. Quae [1] propius [2] subibant naves, quo interiores ictibus tormentorum essent, in eas tollenone super murum eminente ferrea manus, firmae catenae inligata, cum iniecta prorae esset gravique libramento plumbi [3] recelleret ad solum, 11 suspensa prora navem in puppim statuebat; dein remissa subito velut ex muro cadentem navem cum ingenti trepidatione nautarum ita undae adfligebat [4] ut, etiamsi recta reciderat,[5] aliquantum aquae acci-
12 peret. Ita maritima oppugnatio est elusa omnisque spes eo [6] versa ut totis viribus terra adgrederentur.

[1] quae P(1) : quia Madvig : om. Walters.
[2] propius P(1), adding quaedam (retained by Madvig, Walters : om. x Crévier).
[3] plumbi P(10) : blumbi C : plumbum Heller, Conway.
[4] adfligebat Sigonius : -bant P(1) Walters.
[5] reciderat Gronovius : receiderant PCR : reciderant M : -erat *BA*²*?Madvig* : -erent DA.
[6] eo Böttcher : ea *P*² : est C : ad(versa) P(10).

---

[1] Livy seems to mean the width on the inside, while Polybius gives a palm (three inches) as the width of a loophole on the outside (VIII. 7. 6).

Other five-bankers, paired together, with the inner B.C. 214 oars removed, so that side was brought close to side, were propelled by the outer banks of oars like a single ship, and carried towers of several stories and in addition engines for battering walls. To meet this naval equipment Archimedes disposed artillery of different sizes on the walls. Against ships at a distance he kept discharging stones of great weight; nearer vessels he would attack with lighter and all the more numerous missile weapons. Finally, that his own men might discharge their bolts at the enemy without exposure to wounds, he opened the wall from bottom to top with numerous loopholes about a cubit wide,[1] and through these some, without being seen, shot at the enemy with arrows, others from small scorpions. As for the ships which came closer, in order to be inside the range of his artillery, against these an iron grapnel, fastened to a stout chain, would be thrown on to the bow by means of a swing-beam projecting over the wall. When this[2] sprung backward to the ground owing to the shifting of a heavy leaden weight, it would set the ship on its stern, bow in air. Then, suddenly released, it would dash the ship, falling, as it were, from the wall, into the sea, to the great alarm of the sailors, and with the result that, even if she fell upright, she would take considerable water. Thus the assault from the sea was baffled, and all hope shifted to a plan to attack from the land with all their forces. But that

[2] Literally the grappling hook; but here, as if the ferrea manus might serve as a name for the entire crane, the reference is in fact to another part, viz. the beam, the after end of which sank to the ground inside the wall when the leaden weight was shifted. Polybius, VIII. 6(8). 1–4, gives a more detailed account.

A.U.C. 540

13 Sed ea quoque pars eodem omni apparatu tormentorum instructa erat Hieronis impensis curaque per 14 multos annos, Archimedis unica arte. Natura etiam adiuvabat loci, quod saxum, cui inposita muri fundamenta sunt, magna parte ita proclive est ut non solum missa tormento, sed etiam quae pondere suo provoluta essent, graviter in hostem inciderent.
15 Eadem causa ad subeundum arduum aditum insta-16 bilemque ingressum praebebat. Ita consilio habito, quoniam [1] omnis conatus ludibrio esset, absistere oppugnatione atque obsidendo tantum arcere terra marique commeatibus hostem placuit.

XXXV. Interim Marcellus cum tertia fere parte exercitus ad recipiendas urbes profectus quae in motu rerum ad Carthaginienses defecerant, Helorum atque
2 Herbesum dedentibus ipsis recipit, Megara vi capta diruit ac diripuit ad reliquorum ac maxime Syracusa-
3 norum terrorem. Per idem fere tempus et Himilco, qui ad Pachyni promunturium classem diu tenuerat, ad Heracleam, quam vocant Minoam, quinque et viginti milia peditum, tria equitum, duodecim elephantos exposuit, nequaquam cum quantis copiis ante tenue-
4 rat ad Pachynum classem: sed, postquam ab Hippocrate occupatae Syracusae erant, profectus Carthaginem adiutusque ibi et ab legatis Hippocratis et litteris Hannibalis, qui venisse tempus aiebat Siciliae
5 per summum decus repetendae, et ipse haud vanus

[1] quoniam Alschefski: quo (for quom?) P(1): quod A^2x: quando Luchs.

side also had been provided with the same complete B.C. 214 equipment of artillery, at the expense and the pains of Hiero during many years, by the unrivalled art of Archimedes. The nature of the place [1] also helped, in that the rock on which the foundations of the wall were laid is generally so steep that not only missiles from a machine, but also whatever rolled down of its own weight fell heavily upon the enemy. The same circumstance made approach to the wall difficult and footing unsteady. So, after a war council, since every attempt was being balked, it was decided to give up the assault and merely by a blockade to cut off the enemy by land and sea from their supplies.

XXXV. Meanwhile Marcellus set out with about a third of his army to recover the cities which in the unsettled state of affairs had gone over to the Carthaginians. Helorus and Herbesus he did recover by their own surrender; Megara he took by assault, destroyed and plundered, to terrify the others and especially the Syracusans. About the same time also Himilco, who had long kept his fleet off the promontory of Pachynum, landed at Heraclea,[2] called Minoa, 25,000 infantry, 3,000 cavalry and twelve elephants, a very much larger force than that with which he had previously kept his fleet off Pachynum. But after Syracuse had been seized by Hippocrates, Himilco went to Carthage and was aided there both by the legates of Hippocrates and by a letter from Hannibal, who said the time had come to recover Sicily in the most honourable manner. Himilco

[1] Evidently meaning the northern face of Epipolae, the great triangle at whose western apex stood the fortress of Euryalus; cf. XXV. xxiv. 4; xxv. 2; v. Appendix.

[2] West of Agrigentum, on the south coast.

A.U.C. 519

praesens monitor facile perpulerat ut quantae maxime[1] possent peditum equitumque copiae in Siciliam 6 traicerentur. Adveniens Heracleam, intra paucos inde dies Agrigentum recepit; aliarumque civitatium, quae partis Carthaginiensium erant, adeo accensae sunt spes ad pellendos Sicilia Romanos ut postremo etiam qui obsidebantur Syracusis animos sustulerint.
7 Et parte copiarum satis defendi urbem posse rati, ita inter se munera belli partiti sunt ut Epicydes praeesset custodiae urbis, Hippocrates Himilconi coniunctus bellum adversus consulem Romanum gereret.
8 Cum decem milibus peditum, quingentis equitibus nocte per intermissa custodiis loca profectus castra
9 circa Acrillas urbem ponebat. Munientibus supervenit Marcellus ab Agrigento iam occupato, cum frustra eo praevenire hostem festinans tetendisset, rediens, nihil minus ratus quam illo tempore ac loco 10 Syracusanum sibi exercitum obvium fore; sed tamen metu Himilconis Poenorumque, ut quibus nequaquam eis copiis quas habebat par esset, quam poterat maxime intentus atque agmine ad omnes casus composito ibat. XXXVI. Forte ea cura quae adversus Poenos praeparata erat[2] adversus Siculos usui fuit. Castris ponendis incompositos ac dispersos nanctus eos et plerosque inermes quod peditum fuit circumvenit; eques levi certamine inito cum Hippocrate Acras perfugit.

[1] maxime PBDA : maximae CRM Madvig.
[2] erat x : om. P(1) Walters, who rejects quae (or q. P(7)).

[1] To the west of Syracuse, as was Acrae, xxxvi. 1.

himself, being an influential adviser, present in B.C. 214 person, had easily prevailed upon them to send across to Sicily the largest possible forces of infantry and cavalry. Arrived at Heraclea, he recovered Agrigentum within a few days. And the hopes of the other city-states which were on the side of the Carthaginians were so fired to drive the Romans out of Sicily that finally even those who were besieged at Syracuse took courage. And thinking the city could be sufficiently defended by a part of the forces, they so divided the military duties that Epicydes should be in charge of the defence of the city, and Hippocrates, together with Himilco, should carry on the war against the Roman consul. With 10,000 infantry and five hundred horse he set out by night through places unguarded and pitched camp near the city of Acrillae.[1] As they were fortifying, Marcellus arrived, returning from Agrigentum, which was already occupied, since it was in vain that he had endeavoured to anticipate the enemy by hastening thither. Nothing was farther from his thoughts than that a Syracusan army should meet him there at that time. Nevertheless, from fear of Himilco and the Carthaginians, being no match for them with the forces he had, he was advancing with all possible alertness and with a column so formed as to meet any emergency. XXXVI. The precaution which had been taken against Carthaginians served him, as it happened, against Sicilians. Coming upon them after they had broken ranks and were scattered in the act of pitching camp and mostly unarmed, he overwhelmed all the infantry. The cavalry, after a slight engagement, fled with Hippocrates to Acrae.

A.U.C. 540

2 Ea pugna deficientes ab Romanis cum cohibuisset Siculos, Marcellus Syracusas redit; et post paucos dies Himilco adiuncto Hippocrate ad flumen Anapum, octo 3 ferme inde milia, castra posuit. Sub idem forte[1] tempus et naves longae quinque et quinquaginta Carthaginiensium cum Bomilcare[2] in magnum por- 4 tum Syracusas ex alto decurrere, et Romana item classis, triginta quinqueremes, legionem primam Panormi exposuere; versumque ab Italia bellum—adeo uterque populus in Siciliam intentus fuit[3]—videri 5 poterat. Legionem Romanam quae exposita Panormi erat venientem Syracusas praedae haud dubie sibi 6 futuram Himilco ratus via decipitur. Mediterraneo namque Poenus itinere duxit; legio maritimis locis classe prosequente ad Appium Claudium Pachynum cum parte copiarum obviam progressum pervenit. 7 Nec diutius Poeni ad Syracusas morati sunt: et Bomilcar simul parum fidens navibus suis duplici facile numero classem habentibus Romanis, simul inutili mora cernens nihil aliud ab suis quam inopiam adgravari sociorum, velis in altum datis in Africam 8 transmisit, et Himilco, secutus nequiquam Marcellum Syracusas, si qua priusquam maioribus copiis iungeretur occasio pugnandi esset, postquam ea nulla

[1] idem forte $P^2(4)$ Madvig: itemfor P: idem fere A Walters.

[2] Bomilcare $P(1)$, adding classis (to which $A^x x$ add praefecto), rejected by Kästner.

[3] fuit Bekker, Madvig: fuisse $P(1)$, joined with videri.

---

[1] The small river of Syracuse, emptying into the Great Harbour. Near its mouth was a Roman camp; xxxiii. 3.

[2] Now Palermo: the chief city of Carthaginian Sicily, until taken by the Romans in 254 B.C.; Polybius I. xxxviii. fin.

Marcellus, by that battle having restrained the B.C. 214
Sicilians inclined to revolt from the Romans, returned to Syracuse. And a few days later Himilco was joined by Hippocrates and pitched camp by the river Anapus,[1] about eight miles away. About the same time it so happened that fifty-five warships of the Carthaginians under Bomilcar sailed from the open sea into the Great Harbour of Syracuse, and also a Roman fleet of thirty quinqueremes debarked the first legion at Panormus.[2] And the war could be considered as now diverted from Italy, so intent were both nations upon Sicily. Himilco, thinking that the legion which had been landed at Panormus would certainly fall a prey to him on its way to Syracuse, was baffled by its route. For the Carthaginian led his troops along an inland road, while the legion, escorted by the fleet, made its way along the coast to Appius Claudius, who with a part of his forces had advanced as far as Pachynum[3] to meet it. And so the Carthaginians did not tarry longer near Syracuse. On the one hand Bomilcar, lacking confidence in his own ships, since the Romans had a fleet of fully double the number, and at the same time seeing that by useless delay the lack of supplies for the allies was only intensified by his forces, put out to sea and crossed over to Africa. On the other hand Himilco first followed Marcellus to Syracuse to no purpose, in the hope that there might be some opportunity for an engagement before he should unite with larger forces. Then, when no such opportunity fell to him, and he

[3] Probably an error for Pelorum, the north-eastern promontory of Sicily, since, with Agrigentum in the hands of the Carthaginians, the route via the western and southern coasts (much longer in any case) would have been impracticable.

A.U.C. 540 contigerat tutumque ad Syracusas et munimento
9 et viribus hostem cernebat, ne frustra adsidendo spectandoque obsidionem sociorum tempus tereret, castra inde movit, ut quocumque vocasset defectionis ab Romano spes admoveret exercitum ac praesens suas
10 res foventibus adderet animos. Murgantiam primum prodito ab ipsis praesidio Romano recipit, ubi frumenti magna vis commeatusque omnis generis convecti erant Romanis.

XXXVII. Ad hanc defectionem erecti sunt et aliarum civitatium animi, praesidiaque Romana aut pellebantur arcibus aut prodita per fraudem opprimebantur. Henna, excelso loco ac praerupto undique sita,
2 cum loco inexpugnabilis erat, tum praesidium in arce validum praefectumque praesidii haud sane oppor-
3 tunum insidiantibus habebat. L. Pinarius erat, vir acer et qui plus in eo ne posset deciji quam in fide Siculorum reponeret. Et tum intenderant eum ad cavendi omnia curam tot auditae proditiones defec-
4 tionesque urbium et clades praesidiorum. Itaque nocte dieque iuxta parata instructaque omnia custodiis ac vigiliis erant, nec ab armis aut loco suo miles
5 abscedebat. Quod ubi Hennensium principes, iam pacti cum Himilcone de proditione praesidii, animadverterunt, nulli occasioni fraudis Romanum patere, 6 palam erat[1] agendum. Urbem arcemque suae potestatis aiunt debere esse, si liberi in societatem,

[1] palam erat Lipsius: patuerat P: placuerat P^2(1): per vim erat Salmasius.

---

[1] Cf. xxvii. 5.

[2] The most commanding city-site in Sicily, with its citadel 3200 ft. above the sea. Described by Cicero in Verr. IV. 107. Henna was the centre of the worship of Demeter and Persephone; cf. xxxix. 8.

saw the enemy safe near Syracuse thanks to his B.C. 214 fortifications and military strength, fearing to waste time in besieging him in vain and watching the blockade of the allies, he moved his camp away. His purpose was to bring up his army to any point to which the hope of revolting from the Romans might call him, and by his presence to give encouragement to those who inclined to support his cause. Murgantia [1] was first recovered, after the inhabitants had betrayed the Roman garrison. There a great quantity of grain and supplies of every kind had been accumulated for the Romans.

XXXVII. Upon this revolt, feeling was aroused in other city-states, and Roman garrisons were being either driven out of citadels or betrayed by treachery and slain. Henna,[2] perched on a lofty site with cliffs on every side, was not only impregnable from its position, but also had a strong garrison in its citadel and a garrison commander who was certainly no easy prey to plotters. This was Lucius Pinarius, a man of high spirit and one who gave more weight to precautions against possible deception than to the honour of Sicilians. And at this time the news of so many cities betrayed and in revolt and of so many garrisons destroyed had made him more intent upon guarding against every danger. Accordingly every position had been prepared and provided with guards and sentinels night and day; and the soldier did not leave his arms and his post. When this was noticed by the leading men of Henna, who had already made an agreement with Himilco to betray the garrison, namely, that the Roman left no opportunity for treachery, they were forced to act openly. They said that city and citadel ought to be under their own control, if as free men non servi in custodiam traditi essent Romanis. 7 Itaque claves portarum reddi sibi aequom censent: bonis sociis fidem suam maximum vinculum esse, et ita sibi populum Romanum senatumque gratias habiturum, si volentes ac non coacti mansissent in 8 amicitia. Ad ea Romanus se in praesidio impositum esse dicere ab imperatore suo clavesque portarum et custodiam arcis ab eo accepisse, quae nec suo nec Hennensium arbitrio haberet, sed eius qui commisis- 9 set. Praesidio decedere apud Romanos capital esse, et nece liberorum etiam suorum eam noxiam [1] parentes sanxisse. Consulem Marcellum haud procul esse: ad eum mitterent legatos cuius iuris atque 10 arbitrii res [2] esset. Se vero negare illi missuros testarique, si verbis nihil agerent, vindictam aliquam 11 libertatis suae quaesituros. Tum Pinarius: at illi, si ad consulem gravarentur mittere, sibi saltem darent populi concilium, ut sciretur, utrum paucorum ea denuntiatio an universae civitatis esset. Consensa in posterum diem contio.

A.U.C. 549

XXXVIII. Postquam ab eo conloquio in aream sese recepit, convocatis militibus [3] "Credo ego vos audisse, milites" inquit, "quem ad modum praesidia Romana ab Siculis circumventa et oppressa sint per hos dies. 2 Eam vos fraudem deum primo benignitate, dein vestra ipsi virtute dies noctesque perstando ac pervigilando

[1] noxiam Weissenborn: om. P(1).
[2] res Crévier, Fabri: om. P(1) Walters.
[3] militibus A^2x: quibus P(2)A?: aliquibus C^4: sociis x: suis Gronovius.

they had entered into alliance with the Romans, B.C. 214 and had not been consigned to custody as slaves. Consequently they said they thought it right that the keys of the gates should be restored to them. For good allies their loyalty was the strongest bond, and the Roman people and senate would be grateful to them only in case they remained in their friendship willingly and not under compulsion. In reply to this the Roman commandant said that he had been placed at his post by his general and had received from him both the keys to the gates and the guarding of the citadel, to keep them, not at his own discretion nor that of the people of Henna, but of the man who had confided them to him. To leave one's post was among the Romans a capital offence, and fathers had punished that crime with the death even of their own sons. The consul Marcellus was not far away; they should send legates to him who had the right to decide the matter. But they said that they would not send them, and asserted that if they accomplished nothing by words, they would seek some means of recovering their freedom. Upon that Pinarius said that, if they objected to sending to the consul, very well, let them at least give him an assembly of the people, that it might be known whether their demand was that of a few men or of the whole city. They agreed to an assembly on the next day.

XXXVIII. Returning from that conference to the citadel, he called his men together and said: "I believe you have heard, soldiers, how in these days Roman garrisons have been beset and overwhelmed by Sicilians. Such treachery you have escaped, thanks first to the favour of the gods, and then to your own courage, by standing guard day and night in armis vitastis. Utinam relicum tempus nec patien-3 do infanda nec faciendo traduci posset![1] Haec oc-culta in fraude cautio est qua usi adhuc sumus; cui quoniam parum succedit, aperte ac propalam claves portarum reposcunt; quas simul tradiderimus, Car-thaginiensium extemplo Henna erit, foediusque hic trucidabimur quam Murgantiae praesidium inter-4 fectum est. Noctem unam aegre ad consultandum sumpsi, qua vos certiores periculi instantis facerem.

A.U.C. 540

Orta luce contionem habituri sunt ad criminandum
5 me concitandumque in vos populum. Itaque crastino die aut vestro aut Hennensium sanguine Henna inundabitur. Nec praeoccupati spem ullam nec occupantes periculi quicquam habebitis; qui prior 6 strinxerit ferrum, eius victoria erit. Intenti ergo omnes armatique signum expectabitis. Ego in contione ero et tempus, quoad omnia instructa sint, 7 loquendo altercandoque traham. Cum toga signum dedero, tum mihi undique clamore sublato turbam invadite ac sternite omnia ferro; et cavete quicquam[2] 8 supersit cuius[3] aut vis aut fraus timeri possit. Vos, Ceres mater ac Proserpina, precor, ceteri superi infernique di, qui hanc urbem, hos sacratos lacus lucosque colitis, ut ita nobis volentes propitii adsitis, si vitandae, non inferendae fraudis causa hoc consilii 9 capimus. Pluribus vos, milites, hortarer, si cum armatis dimicatio futura esset; inermes, incautos ad

[1] posset A^{2}z: possit Valla: potest P(1).
[2] quicquam P(1) Conway: quisquam C^{2}x Madvig.
[3] cuius Alschefski: quiusa P: a quibus P^{2}(1).

under arms. Would that the remaining time B.C. 211 could be passed without either suffering or committing atrocities! In covert trickery the method of defence is that which we have so far employed. Since the trick does not succeed, they demand back the keys of the gates openly and above board. And the moment we surrender them, Henna will be in the hands of the Carthaginians, and we shall be more cruelly slaughtered here than was the garrison slain at Murgantia. With difficulty I have gained for deliberation one night in which to inform you of the impending danger. At daybreak they are to hold an assembly for the purpose of accusing me and arousing the people against you. And so tomorrow Henna will be deluged either with your blood or with that of the Hennensians. If forestalled, you will have no hope, nor any danger if you forestall them. Who first draws the sword will have the victory. Therefore, alert and armed, you will all await the signal. I shall be in the assembly, and I will kill time in speaking and disputing, until everything is ready. When I give the signal with my toga, then do you from all sides raise a shout, attack the crowd, and strike down everyone with the sword; and see to it that no one survives whose violence or treachery can be feared. Mother Ceres and Proserpina, and all the other gods, above and below, who inhabit this city, these hallowed lakes and groves, I pray that ye attend us with your favour and support, if so be that we are taking this step for the purpose of guarding against treachery, not of practising it. I should exhort you, soldiers, at greater length if your battle were to be with armed men. Unarmed and off their guard, you will massacre them to your hearts' content.

A.U.C. 540

satietatem trucidabitis; et consulis castra in propinquo sunt, ne quid ab Himilcone et Carthaginiensibus timeri possit."

XXXIX. Ab hac adhortatione dimissi corpora curant. Postero die alii aliis locis ad obsidenda itinera claudendosque oppositi[1] exitus; pars maxima super theatrum circaque, adsueti et ante
2 spectaculo contionum, consistunt. Productus ad populum a magistratibus praefectus Romanus cum consulis de ea re ius ac potestatem esse, non suam,
3 et pleraque eadem quae pridie dixisset, et primo sensim ac pauci, mox plures[2] reddere claves, dein iam una voce id omnes iuberent cunctantique et differenti ferociter minitarentur nec viderentur ultra vim ultimam dilaturi, tum praefectus toga signum, ut
4 convenerat, dedit, militesque intenti dudum ac parati alii superne in aversam contionem clamore sublato decurrunt, alii ad exitus theatri conferti
5 obsistunt. Caeduntur Hennenses cavea inclusi coacervanturque non caede solum sed etiam fuga, cum super aliorum alii capita ruerent, et[3] integri[4]
6 sauciis,[5] vivi mortuis incidentes cumularentur. Inde passim discurritur et urbis captae modo fugaque et caedes omnia tenet nihilo remissiore militum ira quod

[1] oppositi A^x Valla: opsiti A: -positis M^2: -ponitis $P(2)$.
[2] pauci, mox plures Riemann: plus $P(1)$: plures A^xz Madvig: pauci Weissenborn.
[3] et Madvig: om. $P(1)$.
[4] integri $P(1)$: -gris M^9 Conway.
[5] sauciis BDA: -ci P: -ii $P^2(4)M^9$ Conway.

And the consul's camp is near; I tell you this that B.C. 214 you may have no possible fear from Himilco and the Carthaginians."

XXXIX. Dismissed immediately after this exhortation, they took food and rest. On the following day they were posted in different places, to occupy the roads and close the ways of escape. The majority took their positions above and around the theatre, being already familiar with the sight of an assembly. The Roman commandant, being brought before the people by the magistrates, said that right and authority in the matter belonged to the consul, not to himself, and in general the same things he had said the day before. And at first insensibly and only a few, presently a larger number, then all, now with one voice kept bidding him to deliver the keys; and when he delayed and postponed, they repeated savage threats and apparently would not further postpone violence, their last resort. Thereupon the prefect gave the signal with his toga, as had been agreed, and the soldiers, alert and ready long before, dashed down, some of them from above, upon the rear of the assembly with a shout, while others, massed at the exits of the theatre, blocked the way. The men of Henna, shut up in the eavea, were slain and piled together not only owing to the slaughter, but also by the panic, since they rushed down over each others' heads, and as the unharmed fell upon the wounded, the living upon the dead, they were lying in heaps. Thence the soldiers scattered in every direction, and, just as in a captured city, flight and slaughter were in complete possession, while the wrath of the soldiers was not a whit less intense because they were slaying an unarmed

A.U.C. 540

turbam inermem caedebant quam si periculum par et 7 ardor certaminis eos inritaret. Ita Henna aut malo aut necessario facinore retenta.

Marcellus nec factum improbavit et praedam Hennensium militibus concessit, ratus timore deterritos
8 proditionibus praesidiorum Siculos. Atque ea clades, ut urbis in media Sicilia sitae claraeque vel ob insignem munimento naturali locum vel ob sacrata omnia vestigiis raptae quondam Proserpinae, prope uno
9 die omnem Siciliam pervasit; et quia caede infanda rebantur non hominum tantum sed etiam deorum sedem violatam esse, tum vero etiam qui[1] ante dubii
10 fuerant defecere ad Poenos. Hippocrates inde Murgantiam, Himilco Agrigentum sese recepit, cum acciti a proditoribus nequiquam ad Hennam exercitum
11 admovissent. Marcellus retro in Leontinos redit frumentoque et commeatibus aliis in castra convectis, praesidio modico ibi relicto ad Syracusas obsidendas 12 venit. Inde Appio Claudio Romam ad consulatum petendum misso T. Quinctium Crispinum in eius 13 locum classi castrisque praeficit veteribus; ipse hibernacula quinque milia passuum ab Hexapylo—Leonta vocant locum—communiit aedificavitque. Haec in Sicilia usque ad principium hiemis gesta.

XL. Eadem aestate et cum Philippo rege quod
2 iam ante suspectum fuerat motum bellum est. Legati

[1] etiam qui Madvig: qui etiam P(1).

[1] As in Cicero in Verr. IV. 107 the very place reminds one how Pluto carried off Proserpina from the meadows below Henna.

crowd, than if equal danger and ardour for the fray B.C. 211 were spurring them on. So by an act, it may have been criminal, it may have been unavoidable, Henna was held.

Marcellus, without reproving the act, allowed the soldiers to plunder the Hennensians, thinking the frightened Sicilians had been deterred from betraying their garrisons. And as was natural in the case of a city in the heart of Sicily and famous, whether for the remarkable natural defences of its site, or as hallowed everywhere by the footprints of Proserpina, long ago carried away,[1] news of the massacre made its way over the whole of Sicily almost in a single day. And then in truth, since they thought that the abode, not of men only but also of gods, had been desecrated by an atrocious massacre, even those who till then had wavered went over to the Carthaginians. Hippocrates thereupon went back to Murgantia, Himilco to Agrigentum, after bringing up their army to Henna to no purpose at the summons of the traitors. Marcellus returned to Leontini, had grain and other supplies brought into the camp, left a suitable garrison there and came to Syracuse to carry on the siege. He then relieved Appius Claudius, to sue for the consulship at Rome, and in his place put Titus Quinctius Crispinus in command of the fleet and the old camp.[2] As for himself, he fortified and built winter quarters five miles from the Hexapylon—Leon they call the place. Such were the events in Sicily up to the beginning of the winter.

XL. The same summer the war with King Philip also that for some time had been foreshadowed broke

[2] Cf. xxxiii. 3; XXV. xxvi. 4. The new winter camp was northwest of Syracuse.

A.U.C. 549

ab Orico ad M. Valerium praetorem venerunt, praesidentem classi Brundisio Calabriaeque circa litoribus, nuntiantes Philippum primum Apolloniam temptasse lembis biremibus centum viginti flumine adverso sub-3 vectum; deinde, ut ea res tardior spe fuerit, ad Oricum clam nocte exercitum admovisse; eamque urbem, sitam in plano neque moenibus neque viris atque armis validam, primo impetu oppressam esse.
4 Haec nuntiantes orabant ut opem ferret hostemque haud dubium Romanis mari ac terra a maritimis urbibus arceret, quae ob nullam aliam causam nisi
5 quod immineret Italiae, peterentur. M. Valerius duorum milium praesidio relicto praepositoque [1] eis P. Valerio legato cum classe instructa parataque et, quod longae naves militum capere non poterant in 6 onerarias inpositis altero die Oricum pervenit; urbemque eam levi tenente praesidio quod rex [2] recedens inde reliquerat haud magno certamine
7 recepit. Legati eo ab Apollonia venerunt, nuntiantes in obsidione sese, quod defiecre ab Romanis nollent, esse neque sustinere ultra vim Macedonum
8 posse, ni [3] praesidium mittatur Romanum. Facturum se quae vellent pollicitus, duo milia delectorum mili-

[1] praepositoque Crévier : q. or que only P(1).
[2] rex Fabri (before reliquerat Gronovius) : om. P(1).
[3] ni Riemann : nil P : nisi P^{2}?(1).

---

[1] In southern Illyria (Albania), at the south end of the bay behind the Acroceraunian Mountains, almost directly opposite Brundisium.

out. Legates came from Oricum[1] to Marcus B.C. 214
Valerius, the praetor,[2] who with his fleet was guarding Brundisium and the neighbouring coast of Calabria. They reported that Philip had first sailed up the river with a hundred and twenty small vessels having two banks of oars and attacked Apollonia;[3] and that then, when the undertaking proved slower than he anticipated, had secretly moved his army to Oricum by night; also that that city, situated in a plain and not strong either in walls or armed men, had been taken by assault. Making this report, they begged him to lend aid and by land and sea to keep an undoubted enemy of the Romans away from the coast cities, which were being attacked for no other reason than that they faced Italy. Marcus Valerius, after leaving a garrison of two thousand soldiers and placing Publius Valerius, his lieutenant, in command of them, with his fleet drawn up and in readiness, while such soldiers as the warships could not accommodate had been placed on transports, came on the second day to Oricum; and as only a small garrison which the king had left when he withdrew held the city, he recaptured it after slight resistance. To it came legates from Apollonia, reporting that they were being besieged because they refused to revolt from the Romans and could no longer withstand the attack of the Macedonians, unless a Roman force should be sent. Valerius promised to do as they desired, and sent two thousand picked soldiers in [2] Strictly propraetor; x. 4; xx. 12.

[3] The city, in southern Illyria, and allied with Rome since 229 B.C., lay near the river Aoüs and about seven miles inland, about thirty miles north of Oricum. Later it attracted young Romans pursuing their studies, e.g. Octavian.

A.U.C. 540 tum navibus longis mittit ad ostium fluminis cum praefecto socium Q. Naevio Crista, viro inpigro et 9 perito militiae. Is expositis in terram militibus navibusque Oricum retro, unde venerat, ad ceteram classem remissis, milites procul a flumine per viam minime ab regiis obsessam duxit et nocte, ita ut nemo hostium
10 sentiret, urbem est ingressus. Diem insequentem quievere, dum praefectus inventutem Apolloniatium armaque et urbis vires inspiceret. Ubi ea visa inspectaque satis animorum fecere, simulque ab exploratoribus comperit quanta socordia ac neglegentia apud hostes esset, silentio noctis ab urbe sine
11 ullo tumultu egressus castra hostium adeo neglecta atque aperta intravit ut satis constaret prius mille hominum vallum intrasse quam quisquam sentiret, ac, si caede abstinuissent, pervenire ad tabernaculum
12 regium potuisse. Caedes proximorum portae excitavit hostes. Inde tantus terror pavorque omnis occupavit ut non modo alius quisquam arma caperet
13 aut castris pellere hostem conaretur, sed etiam ipse rex, sicut somno excitus erat, prope seminudus fugiens militi quoque, nedum regi, vix decoro habitu, ad flumen navisque perfugerit. Eodem et alia turba
14 effusa est. Paulo minus tria milia militum in castris aut capta aut occisa; plus tamen hominum aliquanto
15 captum quam caesum est. Castris direptis Apolloniatae catapultas, ballistas tormentaque alia quae

---

[1] I.e. the Aoüs.

warships to the mouth of the river[1] under the B.C. 214 command of a prefect of the allies, Quintus Naevius Crista, a man of action and an experienced soldier. He landed his men, sent the ships back to the rest of the fleet at Oricum, his starting-point, led his soldiers at a distance from the river along the road least beset by the king's troops and entered the city by night, so that no one of the enemy was aware of it. The following day they rested, that the prefect might inspect the young men of Apollonia and the arms and resources of the city. The result of that inspection gave him sufficient encouragement, and he learned also from scouts what carelessness and indifference there was among the enemy. Thereupon in the silence of the night and without making any noise he went out of the city and entered the enemy's camp, so neglected and open that a thousand men had entered the wall before anyone was aware of it, so it was generally asserted; also, that if they had refrained from slaughter, they could have reached the king's tent. The slaughter of the men nearest to the gate aroused the enemy. Then such alarm and panic took possession of them all that not only did no one else seize his arms and attempt to drive the enemy out of the camp, but even the king himself, fleeing almost half-naked, just as he was when awakened, fled to the river and his ships in a garb scarcely seemly even for a common soldier, much less a king. Thither the rest of the disorderly crowd also poured out. Little fewer than three thousand soldiers were either captured or slain in the camp; a considerably larger number of men were captured than slain. After plundering the camp the Apollonians carried away the catapults, ballistae and other

A.U.C. 540 oppugnandae urbi conparata erant ad tuenda moenia, si quando similis fortuna venisset, Apolloniam devexere; cetera omnis praeda castrorum Romanis
16 concessa est. Haec cum Oricum essent nuntiata, M. Valerius classem extemplo ad ostium fluminis duxit, 17 ne navibus capessere fugam rex posset. Itaque Philippus, neque terrestri neque navali certamini satis fore parem se fidens, subductis navibus atque incensis terra Macedoniam petiit magna ex parte inermi exercitu spoliatoque. Romana classis cum M. Valerio Oriei hibernavit.

XLI. Eodem anno in Hispania varie res gestae. Nam priusquam Romani amnem Hiberum transirent, ingentes copias Hispanorum Mago et Hasdrubal fude-
2 runt; defecissetque ab Romanis ulterior Hispania, ni P. Cornelius raptim traducto exercitu Hiberum dubiis
3 sociorum animis in tempore advenisset. Primo ad Castrum Album—locus est insignis caede magni
4 Hamilcaris—castra Romani habuere. Arx erat munita et convexerant ante frumentum; tamen, quia omnia circa hostium plena erant, agmenque Romanum inpune incursatum ab equitibus hostium fuerat et ad duo milia aut moratorum aut palantium per agros interfecta, cessere inde Romani propius pacata loca et
5 ad montem Victoriae castra communivere. Eo Cn. Scipio cum omnibus copiis et Hasdrubal Gisgonis filius, tertius Carthaginiensium dux, cum exercitu iusto

[1] Probably modern Alicante, on the coast and northeast of Carthago Nova; built by Hamilcar Barca, who fell in battle there 229–8 B.C.

[2] Situation unknown.

engines which had been provided for a siege of the B.C. 214 city to Apollonia, in order to defend their walls, if ever a similar situation should arise. All the remaining booty of the camp was left to the Romans. When this news reached Oricum, Marcus Valerius at once led his fleet to the mouth of the river, to prevent the king from escaping by ship. And so Philip, believing he would not be quite equal to a battle either on land or sea, stranded his ships, set fire to them, and started for Macedonia with an army in large part disarmed and despoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Oricum under the command of Marcus Valerius.

XLI. In the same year operations in Spain were chequered. For Mago and Hasdrubal, before the Romans should cross the Ebro, routed immense forces of Spaniards. And Farther Spain would have revolted from the Romans if Publius Cornelius had not hastily led his army across the Ebro and arrived in the nick of time, while the allies were still wavering. At first the Romans had their camp at Castrum Album,[1] noted as the place where the great Hamilcar fell. The citadel had been fortified and they had previously brought in grain. Yet the country all around was filled with the enemy, and the Roman column had been attacked with impunity by the enemy's cavalry and about two thousand men, either straggling or scattered over the farms, had been slain. The Romans therefore retired from the place to a position nearer peaceful regions and fortified a camp at Victory Mountain.[2] Thither came Gnaeus Scipio with all his troops, and Hasdrubal the son of Gisgo, making three Carthaginian generals and a complete army; and all three established themselves across

A.U.C. 540

advenit, contraque castra Romana trans fluvium
6 omnes consedere. P. Scipio cum expeditis clam profectus ad loca circa visenda haud fefellit hostes, oppressissentque eum in patentibus campis, ni tumulum in propinquo cepisset. Ibi quoque cir-
7 cumsessus adventu fratris obsidione eximitur. Castulo, urbs Hispaniae valida ac nobilis et adeo coniuncta societate Poenis ut uxor inde Hannibali esset,
8 ad Romanos defecit. Carthaginienses Iliturgim oppugnare adorti, quia praesidium ibi Romanum erat, videbanturque inopia maxime eum locum
9 expugnaturi. Cn. Scipio, ut sociis praesidioque ferret opem, cum legione expedita profectus inter bina castra cum magna caede hostium urbem est ingressus et 10 postero die eruptione aeque felici pugnavit. Supra duodecim milia hominum caesa duobus proeliis, plus mille hominum captum cum sex et triginta militari-11 bus signis. Ita ab Iliturgi recessum est. Bigerra inde urbs—socii [1] et hi [2] Romanorum erant [3]—a Carthaginiensibus oppugnari coepta est. Eam obsidionem sine certamine adveniens Cn. Scipio solvit.

XLII. Ad Mundam exinde castra Punica mota et
2 Romani eo confestim secuti sunt. Ibi signis conlatis pugnatum per quattuor ferme horas; egregieque vincentibus Romanis signum receptui est datum, quod Cn. Scipionis femur tragula confixum erat

[1] socii Hertz : socie P : socia P^1(1) Walters.
[2] hi P Hertz : hec or haec P^1(1) Walters.
[3] erant PCR^{1}M : erat C^2(13).

[1] In the upper valley of the Baetis (Guadalquivir), on the main road from the Pyrenees to Gades.
[2] Imilce, if Silius Italicus (III. 97 and 106) is correct.
[3] On the left bank of the Baetis, southwest of Castulo; cf. XXIII. xlix. 5, where the form was Iliturgi.

the river, opposite the Roman camp. Publius B.C. 214
Scipio, who set out secretly to reconnoitre with unencumbered troops, did not escape the notice of the enemy, and they would have overwhelmed him in the open meadows if he had not captured a hill near by. Even there he was beset, but by the arrival of his brother he escaped a siege. Castulo[1] revolted to the Romans, a strong and famous city of Spain, so closely joined to the Carthaginians by alliance that Hannibal's wife[2] was from that place. The Carthaginians attempted to capture Iliturgis,[3] because there was a Roman garrison there, and it seemed that they would take the town mainly by starvation. Gnaeus Scipio, to lend aid to the allies and the garrison, set out with an unencumbered legion, passing between their two camps, and after slaying many of the enemy entered the city, and on the following day engaged them in an equally successful sally. Over twelve thousand men were slain in the two battles, more than a thousand men captured, with thirty-six military standards. So they withdrew from Iliturgis. Then began the siege of Bigerra[4] —these also were allies of the Romans—by the Carthaginians. Gnaeus Scipio on his arrival raised the siege without an engagement.

XLII. Thereupon the Carthaginian camp was removed to Munda,[5] and the Romans promptly followed them thither. There they fought in pitched battle for about four hours, and though the Romans were winning a brilliant victory, the signal for recall was given, because Gnaeus Scipio's thigh had been

[4] Site unknown.

[5] Near Corduba. This is the first mention of Caesar's Munda; probably Montilla.

A.U.C. 540

pavorque circa eum coeperat milites, ne mortiferum
3 esset vulnus. Ceterum haud dubium fuit quin, nisi ea mora intervenisset, castra eo die Punica capi potuerint. Iam[1] non milites solum sed elephanti etiam usque ad vallum acti erant, superque ipsas fossas[2] novem et triginta elephanti pilis confixi.
4 Hoc quoque proelio ad duodecim milia hominum dicuntur caesa, prope tria capta cum signis militari-
5 bus septem et quinquaginta. Ad Auringem inde urbem Poeni recessere et, ut territis instaret, secutus Romanus. Ibi iterum Scipio lecticula in aciem inlatus conflixit, nec dubia victoria fuit; minus tamen dimidio hostium quam antea, quia pauciores super-
6 fuerant qui pugnarent, occisum. Sed gens nata instaurandis reparandisque bellis, Magone ad conquisitionem militum a fratre misso, brevi replevit exercitum animosque ad temptandum de integro
7 certamen fecit; Galli[3] plerique milites, iique[4] pro parte totiens intra paucos dies victa, iisdem animis quibus priores[5] eodemque eventu pugnavere.
8 Plus octo milia hominum caesa, et haud[6] multo minus quam mille captum et signa militaria quinquaginta octo. Et spolia plurima Gallica fuere, aurei torques armillaeque, magnus numerus. Duo etiam insignes reguli Gallorum—Moeniacoepto et Vismaro nomina

[1] iam $P(1)$: nam Madvig.
[2] ipsas fossas Riemann: ipsas $P(2)$: ipsos Ax: ipsum x: fossas Madvig.
[3] Galli A^{y} Valla: alii $P(1)$ Madvig.
[4] iique A^{y} Valla: sique $P(1)$: quippe Madvig.
[5] priores Valla: pr. orta $P(11)A?$: prius x.
[6] et haud $P(2)$ Conway: et non A: haud z Madvig.

pierced by a light javelin, and fear that the wound B.C. 214 might prove fatal had seized the soldiers around him. But there was no doubt that, if this delay had not occurred, the Carthaginian camp could have been captured that day. Already not only soldiers but the elephants also had been driven even up to the wall, and just as they crossed the trenches thirty-nine elephants were struck down by heavy javelins. In this battle also about twelve thousand men are said to have been slain, about three thousand captured, with fifty-seven military standards. The Carthaginians then retired to the city of Aurinx,[1] and the Roman followed, to threaten them while terrified. There Scipio again engaged, being carried into battle-line in a litter, and the victory was not to be questioned. Less than half as many of the enemy as before, however, were slain, because fewer men had survived to fight. But, as Mago was sent by his brother to recruit soldiers, a race adapted by nature to renew wars and to make fresh preparations for them soon refilled the army and gave them the spirit to essay another conflict. The soldiers were mostly Gauls,[2] and they fought with the same spirit as their predecessors for the side which had been beaten so many times within a few days, and with the same result. More than eight thousand men were slain, and not much less than a thousand captured, also fifty-eight military standards. And the spoils were largely Gallic, golden collars and armbands—a great number of them. Also two conspicuous princes of the Gauls —Moeniacoeptus and Vismarus were their names

[1] Perhaps the same as Orongis, XXVIII. iii. 2.
[2] From Celtic tribes already established in Spain, even in the southwest.

A.U.C. 540

erant—eo proelio ceciderunt. Octo elephanti capti, tres occisi.

9 Cum tam prosperae res in Hispania essent, verecundia Romanos tandem cepit, Saguntum oppidum, quae causa belli esset, octavum iam annum sub
10 hostium potestate esse. Itaque id oppidum vi pulso praesidio Punico receperunt cultoribusque antiquis, 11 quos ex iis vis reliquerat belli, restituerunt: et Turdetanos, qui contraxerant eis cum Carthaginiensibus bellum, in potestatem redactos sub corona vendiderunt urbemque eorum delerunt.

XLIII. Haec in Hispania Q. Fabio M. Claudio
2 consulibus gesta. Romae cum tribuni plebis novi magistratum inissent, extemplo censoribus P. Furio et M. Atilio a M. Metello tribuno plebis dies dicta ad popu-
3 lum est—quaestorem eum proximo anno adempto equo tribu moverant atque aerarium fecerant propter coniurationem deserendae Italiae ad Cannas factam —sed novem tribunorum auxilio vetiti causam in 4 magistratu dicere dimissique fuerunt.[1] Ne lustrum perficerent, mors prohibuit P. Furi; M. Atilius magistratu se abdicavit.

5 Comitia consularia habita ab Q. Fabio Maximo consule. Creati consules ambo absentes Q. Fabius Maximus, consulis filius, et Ti. Sempronius Graechus

[1] fuerunt Crévier: fuerant P(1): om. Ussing, Walters.

---

[1] Livy's own chronology would make it four complete years; XXI. vii. ff.; xv. 5; XXIV. ix. 7.

[2] Cf. XXI. vi. 1. Better known is the tribe of the same name in southern Baetica.

[3] Cf. xviii. 3 and 6; XXVII. xi. 12. The scene was Canusium, after Cannae.

—fell in that battle. Eight elephants were captured, B.C. 214 three slain.

The situation in Spain being so favourable, the Romans came at last to be ashamed that the town of Saguntum, which was the cause of the war, had been by that time seven years [1] in the power of the enemy. Accordingly the Carthaginian garrison was driven out by force, and recovering the town the Romans restored it to its former inhabitants—such of them as the violence of war had spared. And as for the Turdetani,[2] who had brought on the war between Saguntum and the Carthaginians, they reduced them to subjection, sold them under the garland and destroyed their city.

XLIII. Such were the events in Spain in the consulship of Quintus Fabius and Marcus Claudius. At Rome, immediately after the newly elected tribunes of the plebs had entered upon office, a day was set by Marcus Metellus, a tribune of the plebs, for the censors Publius Furius and Marcus Atilius to appear at the bar of the people. In his quaestorship the year before they had taken away his horse, removed him from his tribe and made him an aerarian on account of the conspiracy formed at Cannae to desert Italy.[3] But by the aid of nine tribunes they were forbidden to plead their cause while in office and were released. From completing the ceremony of purification they were prevented by the death of Publius Furius. Marcus Atilius abdicated his office.

For the consulship the election was conducted by Quintus Fabius Maximus, the consul. Elected consuls, both in absence, were Quintus Fabius Maximus, the consul's son, and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, the latter for the second time. Two men

A.U.C. 540

6 iterum. Praetores fiunt duo qui tum aediles curules erant, P. Sempronius Tuditanus et Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, et cum illis[1] M. Atilius et[2] M. Aemilius
7 Lepidus. Ludos scenicos per quadriduum eo anno primum factos ab curulibus aedilibus memoriae
8 proditur. Aedilis Tuditanus hic erat[3] qui ad Cannas pavore aliis in tanta clade torpentibus per medios hostes duxit.

A.U.C. 541

9 His[4] comitiis perfectis auctore Q. Fabio consule designati consules Romam accersiti magistratum inierunt, senatumque de bello ac provinciis suis praetorumque et de exercitibus quibus quique praeessent consuluerunt; (XLIV) itaque provinciae atque exercitus divisi: bellum cum Hannibale consulibus mandatum et exercituum unus quem ipse Sempronius habuerat, alter quem Fabius consul;
2 eae binae erant legiones. M. Aemilius praetor, cuius peregrina sors erat, iuris dictione M. Atilio collegae, praetori urbano, mandata, Luceriam provinciam haberet legionesque duas quibus Q. Fabius, 3 qui tum consul erat, praetor praefuerat. P. Sempronio provincia Ariminum, Cn. Fulvio Suessula eum binis item legionibus evenerunt, ut Fulvius urbanas legiones duceret, Tuditanus a M. Pomponio acciperet.
4 Prorogata imperia provinciaeque, M. Claudio Sicilia

[1] cum illis Walters: cum iis M. Müller: om. P(1).
[2] M. Atilius et Madvig: om. P(1).
[3] erat $C^2M^xA^2$: erit P(1) Walters.
[4] duxit. His Madvig[1] (Iis Weissenborn): auxiliis P(1).

---

[1] Cf. XXII. 1. 6 ff.
[2] Gallia was the more recent name of this "province," ager Gallicus in x. 3.
[3] With the important Roman camp near it, the castra Claudiana; xvii. 2; xlvii. 12; XXIII. xxxi. 3.

who were at the time curule aediles, Publius Sem- B.C. 214 pronius Tuditanus and Gnaeus Fulvius Centumalus, were made praetors, and with them M. Atilius and Marcus Aemilius Lepidus. Tradition has it that at the festival given that year by the curule aediles four days had dramatic performances for the first time. The aedile Tuditanus was the man who at Cannae, when others were paralyzed by fear in such a disaster, led his men through the midst of the enemy.[1]

These elections being completed, the consuls B.C. 213 designate were summoned to Rome, as proposed by Quintus Fabius, the consul, entered upon office and consulted the senate in regard to the war and the provinces, their own and those of the praetors, and as to the armies which they should respectively command; (XLIV) and the provinces and armies were divided as follows: the war with Hannibal was assigned to the consuls, and two armies, one which Sempronius himself, and the other which Fabius had commanded as consul. These were of two legions each. Marcus Aemilius, the praetor to whom fell jurisdiction in cases involving foreigners, was to assign his judicial function to his colleague Marcus Atilius, the city praetor, and have Luceria as his province, and two legions which Quintus Fabius, who was now consul, had commanded as praetor. To Publius Sempronius Ariminum fell as his assignment,[2] to Gnaeus Fulvius, Suessula,[3] likewise with two legions in each case, so assigned that Fulvius should take with him the legions at the city, and Tuditanus take over from Marcus Pomponius his legions. Commands and assignments were continued as follows: for Marcus Claudius Sicily, with the

A.U.C. 541 finibus eis quibus regnum Hieronis fuisset, P. Lentulo propraetori provincia vetus, T. Otacilio classis—exercitus nulli additi novi—, M. Valerio Graecia Macedoniaque cum legione et classe quam haberet, Q. Mucio cum vetere exercitu—duae autem legiones erant—Sardinia, C. Terentio legio una[1] cui iam 6 praeerat ac[2] Picenum. Scribi praeterea duae urbanae legiones iussae et viginti milia sociorum. His ducibus, his copiis adversus multa simul aut mota aut suspecta bella muniverunt Romanum imperium. 7 Consules duabus urbanis legionibus scriptis supplementoque in alias lecto, priusquam ab urbe moverent, 8 prodigia procurarunt quae nuntiata erant. Murus ac portae . . .,[3] et Ariciae etiam Iovis aedes de caelo tacta fuerat. Et alia ludibria oculorum auriumque credita pro veris: navium longarum species in flumine Tarracinae quae nullae erant visas, et in Iovis Vicilini templo, quod in Compsano agro est, arma concrepuisse, et flumen Amiterni cruentum fluxisse. 9 His procuratis ex decreto pontificum profecti consules, Sempronius in Lucanos, in Apuliam Fabius. Pater 10 filio legatus ad Suessulam in castra venit. Cum obviam filius progrederetur lictoresque verecundia maiestatis eius taciti anteirent, praeter undecim fasces equo praevectus senex, ut consul animadvertere proximum lictorem iussit et is ut descenderet ex

[1] legio una P(1): cum legione una Aldus.
[2] ac Weissenborn: et x Gronovius: om. P(1).
[3] portae (or -te) P(1), followed by tactae (or -te), into which a town name has been corrupted: porta Caietae Luterbacher, Walters.

[1] Cf. XXIII. i. 1. In that southern part of Samnium Jupiter had the rare epithet Vicilinus.

boundaries which Hiero's kingdom had had; for B.C. 213
Publius Lentulus, as propraetor, the old province; for Titus Otacilius the fleet; and for them new armies were not added. So also for Marcus Valerius Greece and Macedonia, with the legion and the fleet which he had; for Quintus Mucius Sardinia, with its old army—there were two legions; for Gaius Terentius one legion which he already commanded, and Picenum. It was further ordered that two city legions should be enrolled, also twenty thousand allies. With these generals, these forces, they defended the Roman empire at the same time against many wars, either already begun or foreshadowed.

The consuls, after enrolling two legions for the city and enlisting recruits to reinforce the others, before setting out from the city made expiation for the prodigies which had been reported. The wall and gates at . . . and at Aricia even the temple of Jupiter had been struck by lightning. And for eyes and ears there were other illusions, accepted as real: that in the river at Tarracina forms of warships which had no existence had been seen; and that in the temple of Jupiter Vicilinus, in the territory of Compsa,[1] there was a sound of clashing arms; and that the river at Amiternum ran with blood. These portents being expiated according to a decree of the pontiffs, the consuls set out, Sempronius for Lucania, Fabius for Apulia. The father came as his son's lieutenant to the camp at Suessula. While the son was advancing to meet him and the lictors out of respect for the father's dignity were silent as they preceded the consul, the old man rode past eleven fasces. And not until the consul had ordered the last lictor to take notice and the latter had called equo inclamavit, tum demum desiliens "Experiri" inquit "volui, fili, satin' scires consulem te esse."

A.U.C. 541

XLV. In ea castra Dasius Altinius Arpinus clam nocte cum tribus servis venit promittens, si sibi praemio foret, se Arpos prodituram esse. Eam rem ad consilium cum rettulisset Fabius, aliis pro transfuga verberandus necandusque videri ancipitis animi communis hostis, qui post Cannensem cladem, tamquam cum fortuna fidem stare oporteret, ad Hannibalem descisset traxissetque ad defectionem Arpos; tum, quoniam [1] res Romana contra spem votaque eius velut resurgere ab stirpibus videatur, novam referre proditionem proditis polliceatur, aliunde stet [2] semper, aliunde sentiat, infidus socius, vanus hostis; id [3] ad Faleriorum Pyrrhique proditorem tertium transfugis documentum esset. Contra ea consulis pater Fabius temporum oblitos homines in medio ardore belli, tamquam in pace, libera de quoque arbitria agere aiebat, ut,[4] cum illud potius agendum atque cogitandum sit, si quo modo fieri possit, ne qui socii a populo Romano desciscant, id non cogitent,[5] documentum autem dicant [6] statui oportere, si quis resipiscat et

[1] quoniam C^1x: quia M^2A^2: quam $P(11)$.
[2] aliunde stet Gronovius: aliunde ipse stet Conway: aliudicioestet $P(10)C^2$.
[3] id Madvig: om. $P(1)$.
[4] ut Weissenborn: et $P(1)$: qui Gronovius.
[5] id non cogitent Gronovius: et non vocitent $P(1)$: et ut novos concilient Madvig.
[6] dicant Valla: dicatur $P(1)$.

[1] A famous story. Gellius (II. ii. 13) gives the brief version of Claudius Quadrigarius.

out the order to dismount, did the father leap to the B.C. 213 ground and say: "I wished to find out, son, whether you were quite aware that you are consul." [1]

XLV. To that camp came Dasius Altinius of Arpi secretly by night with three slaves, promising that if rewarded he would betray Arpi.[2] When Fabius brought the matter before the council, the others thought that as a deserter he should be scourged and put to death, a waverer and an enemy to both sides, who after the disaster at Cannae, as if loyalty should side with success, had gone over to Hannibal and dragged Arpi into revolt, and then, because, contrary to his expectation and his wishes, the Roman state seemed to be springing up again, as it were from the roots, he was promising to present the betrayed with a new betrayal, and always taking part with one side, but with the other in heart, faithless as an ally, inconstant as an enemy. To the betrayers of Falerii [3] and of Pyrrhus [4] he should be added as a third example to deserters. On the contrary the consul's father Fabius said that men were forgetting the situation, when they exercised free judgment in each individual case in the midst of the heat of war, as though in peace, with the result that, although the thing to be done and to be borne in mind was rather to prevent any allies—if this was somehow possible—from abandoning the Roman people, they were not bearing that in mind and, further, they were saying that, if a man came to his senses and turned his eyes to the previous alliance, he ought to be made a warn-

[2] In northern Apulia, east of Luceria and not far from the Adriatic; cf. iii. 16; xii. 3, 5; XXIII. xlvi. 8.

[3] Cf. V. xxvii. 2 ff.

[4] This story was told in the lost XIIIth book (cf. Epit.).

A.U.C. 541

6 antiquam societatem respiciat. Quod si abire ab Romanis liceat, redire ad eos non liceat, cui dubium esse quin brevi desperata[1] ab sociis Romana res foederibus Punicis omnia in Italia iuncta visura
7 sit?[2] Se tamen non eum esse qui Altinio fidei quicquam censeat habendum, sed mediam secuturum
8 consilii viam. Neque enim[3] pro hoste neque pro socio in praesentia habitum libera custodia haud procul a castris placere in aliqua fida civitate eum[4] servari per belli tempus; perpetrato bello tum consultandum utrum prior defectio plus merita
9 sit poenae, an hic reditus veniae. Fabio adsensum est, Calenisque legatis traditus et ipse et comites; et auri satis magnum pondus, quod secum tum 10 attulerat, ei servari iussum. Calibus eum interdiu solutum custodes sequebantur, nocte clausum ad-
11 servabant. Arpis domi primum desiderari quaerique est coeptus; dein fama per totam urbem volgata tumultum, ut principe amisso, fecit, metuque rerum
12 novarum extemplo nuntii missi. Quibus nequaquam offensus Poenus, quia et ipsum ut ambiguae fidei virum suspectum iam pridem habebat et causam nactus erat tam ditis hominis bona possidendi
13 vendendique; ceterum, ut irae magis quam avaritiae datum crederent homines, crudelitatem
14 quoque aviditati[5] addidit, coniugemque eius ac liberos in castra acceitos, quaestione prius habita

[1] desperata Madvig: desiderata P(1): deserta z.
[2] res . . . visura sit P(1): re . . . visuri sint Madvig.
[3] enim Weissenborn: eum P(1) Madvig.
[4] eum P(1): om. Aldus, Madvig.
[5] aviditati Stroth: gravitatem P(1).

[1] I.e. to Hannibal.

ing example. If then it was permissible to leave the B.C. 213
Romans, but not to return to them, who could doubt that soon the Roman state, despaired of by the allies, would see the whole of Italy joined together by Carthaginian treaties? For himself, however, he was not the man to think that any trust should be placed in Altinius, but would follow a middle course. He thought it best, namely, that Altinius should not be treated as either enemy or ally for the present, that under qualified arrest he should be guarded for the duration of the war in some loyal city-state not far from the camp. When the war was over they should then deliberate whether his previous defection deserved punishment more than his present return merited pardon. They agreed with Fabius, and the man was turned over to representatives of Cales, himself and his companions. And it was ordered that the gold—and the weight of it was considerable—which he had then brought with him should be kept for him. At Cales he was free to go about by day followed by guards, at night confined and watched by them. At Arpi it was in his house that he was first missed and search for him began. Then the report spreading through the city caused the usual commotion when a leading man is missing, and for fear of a rebellion they at once sent messengers.[1] The Carthaginian was by no means displeased at this news, since he had long regarded the man himself with suspicion, as unsettled in his loyalty, and also he now had an excuse for taking possession of the property of a man of such wealth and selling it. But that men might believe he was yielding to anger rather than greed, he added cruelty also to avarice, that is, he summoned the wife and children to the camp, and, primum de fuga Altini, dein quantum auri argentique domi relictum esset, satis cognitis omnibus vivos combussit.

A.U.C. 541

XLVI. Fabius ab Suessula profectus Arpos primum institit oppugnare. Ubi cum a quingentis [1] fere passibus castra posuisset, contemplatus ex propinquo situm urbis moeniaque, quae pars tutissima moenibus erat, quia maxime neglectam custodia vidit, ea potissimum
2 adgredi statuit. Comparatis omnibus quae ad urbes oppugnandas usui sunt centurionum robora ex toto exercitu delegit tribunosque viros fortes eis praefecit, et milites sescentos, quantum satis visum est, attribuit eosque, ubi quartae vigiliae signum cecinisset, ad eum
3 locum scalas iussit ferre. Porta ibi humilis et angusta erat infrequenti via per desertam partem urbis. Eam portam scalis prius transgressos murum aperire [2] ex interiore parte aut claustra refringere iubet et tenentes partem urbis cornu signum dare ut ceterae copiae admoverentur: parata omnia atque instructa
4 sese [3] habiturum. Ea inpigre facta, et quod impedimentum agentibus fore videbatur, id maxime ad fallendum adiuvit. Imber ab nocte media coortus custodes vigilesque dilapsos e stationibus subfugere
5 in tecta coegit, sonitusque [4] primo largioris procellae strepitum molientium portam exaudiri prohibuit, lentior deinde aequaliorque accidens auribus magnam

[1] a quingentis Gronovius: ad (= a D) P(4).
[2] murum aperire Crévier: aperire Madvig: amurumperire P (-pergere P^2(4)): ad murum pergere C^2BDA.
[3] sese A^2 Aldus: esse P(1): om. Conway.
[4] sonitusque A^2*?x Madvig*: sonituque P(2)A? Walters.

after investigating first the flight of Altinius, then how much gold and silver had been left in his house, now fully informed, he burned them alive. B.C. 213

XLVI. Fabius setting out from Suessula first pressed the siege of Arpi. There he pitched his camp at a distance of about five hundred paces, and after observing the situation of the city and the walls at close range, he decided to attack just at that part of the city which was best defended by walls, because he saw that that was the most carelessly guarded. He assembled everything useful for siege operations, selected from the entire army the pick of the centurions, and placed tribunes who were brave men in command of them. And he assigned them six hundred soldiers—all that seemed necessary—and ordered them to carry ladders to that place, when the trumpet should sound for the fourth watch. There was a low, narrow gate there, as the street, leading through a deserted part of the city, was not much frequented. He ordered them first to climb over the wall by means of their ladders, and then to open that gate from the inside, or else break down the bars, and then, holding a part of the city, to give the signal on a trumpet for the rest of the troops to move up. He would have everything ready and in order. These commands were carried out with spirit, and a circumstance which seemed likely to hamper action proved of the greatest help to secrecy. Heavy rain beginning at midnight forced the guards and sentries to slip away from their posts and run to cover. And the sound, at first of a heavier shower, prevented the noise they made in forcing the gate from being heard clearly, and then, gentler and more monotonous as they listened, it lulled a great many

A.U.C. 541

6 partem hominum sopivit. Postquam portam tenebant, cornicines, in via paribus intervallis dispositos, 7 canere iubent, ut consulem excirent. Id ubi factum ex composito est, signa efferri consul iubet ac paulo ante lucem per effractam portam urbem ingreditur.

XLVII. Tum demum hostes excitati sunt iam et
2 imbre conquiescente et propinqua luce. Praesidium in urbe erat Hannibalis, quinque milia ferme armatorum, et ipsi Arpini tria milia hominum armarant. Eos primos Poeni, ne quid ab tergo fraudis esset,
3 hosti opposuerunt. Pugnatum primo in tenebris angustisque viis est. Cum Romani non vias tantum sed tecta etiam proxima portam [1] occupassent, ne peti
4 superne ac volnerari possent, cogniti inter se quidam Arpinique et Romani atque inde conloquia coepta fieri, percunctantibus Romanis quid sibi vellent
5 Arpini, quam ob noxam Romanorum aut quod meritum Poenorum pro alienigenis ac barbaris Italiei adversus veteres socios Romanos bellum gererent et vectigalem ac stipendiariam Italiam Africae facerent, 6 Arpinis purgantibus ignaros omnium se venum a principibus datos Poeno, captos oppressosque a 7 paucis esse. Initio orto plures cum pluribus conloqui; postremo praetor Arpinus ab suis ad consulem deductus, fideque data inter signa aciesque Arpini repente of the men to sleep. Once in possession of the gate, B.C. 213 they ordered the trumpeters, posted at equal intervals along the road, to sound, in order to summon the consul. This done according to agreement, the consul orders the standards to be carried out of the camp, and a little before daylight enters the city through the gate they had forced.

[1] portam Drakenborch : portae $C^2M^3?A^2$: porta $P(2)A?$.

XLVII. Not until then were the enemy aroused, as the noise of the rain was now lessening and daylight approaching. In the city there was a garrison of Hannibal's, about five thousand armed men, and the citizens of Arpi also had armed three thousand men. These were the first troops with which the Carthaginians, to prevent any treachery in the rear, confronted the enemy. They fought at first in darkness and in narrow streets. The Romans gained possession not only of the streets but also of the houses nearest to the gate, that they might not be attacked and wounded from above. Thereupon some Arpini and Romans recognized each other and then began conversations. The Romans asked what the Arpini meant, for what offence on the part of the Romans, or for what service on the part of the Carthaginians they, although Italians, were waging war for foreigners and barbarians against their old allies the Romans, and making Italy a tributary and a taxpayer to Africa. The Arpini pleaded as excuse that in complete ignorance they had been sold by their leading citizens to the Carthaginian and captured and overpowered by a few men. With that beginning larger groups conversed with larger. Finally the magistrate of Arpi was escorted by fellow-citizens to the consul, and after promises had been given in the midst of standards and battle-lines, the pro Romanis adversus Carthaginiensem arma verte-8 runt. Hispani quoque, paulo minus mille homines, nihil praeterea cum consule pacti quam ut sine fraude Punicum emitteretur praesidium, ad consulem

A.U.C. 541

9 transtulerunt signa. Carthaginiensibus portae patefactae emissique cum fide incolumes ad Hannibalem
10 Salapiam venerunt. Arpi sine clade ullius praeterquam unius veteris proditoris, novi perfugae, resti-
11 tuti ad Romanos. Hispanis duplicia cibaria dari iussa; operaque eorum forti ac fideli persaepe res publica usa est.

12 Cum consul alter in Apulia, alter in Lucanis esset, equites centum duodecim nobiles Campani per speciem praedandi ex hostium agro permissu magistratuum ab Capua profecti ad castra Romana, quae super Suessulam erant, venerunt; stationi militum qui essent dixerunt: conloqui sese cum praetore velle.
13 Cn. Fulvius castris praeerat; cui ubi nuntiatum est, decem ex eo numero iussis inermibus deduci ad se, ubi quae postularent audivit—nihil autem aliud petebant quam ut Capua recepta bona sibi restitue-14 rentur—, in fidem omnes accepti. Et ab altero praetore Sempronio Tuditano oppidum Atrinum expugnatum. Amplius septem milia [1] hominum capta et 15 aeris argentique signati aliquantum. Romae foedum incendium per duas noctes ac diem unum tenuit. Solo aequata omnia inter Salinas ac portam Carmen-

[1] septem milia P(4) in numerals (ⅠↃↃↃↃ) : LXX A.

---

[1] I.e. Gracchus; xliv. 9.
[2] Situation unknown.

Arpini suddenly fought for the Romans, turning their B.C. 213 weapons against the Carthaginians. The Spanish troops also, hardly fewer than a thousand men, after making no other terms with the consul than that the Punic garrison be allowed to go without injury, brought their standards over to the consul. The gates were opened for the Carthaginians, they were allowed to leave, as promised, and came unharmed to Hannibal at Salapia. Arpi, with the loss of no man but a single veteran traitor and recent deserter, was restored to the Romans. To the Spaniards double rations were ordered to be issued, and the state repeatedly availed itself of their brave and faithful service.

While one consul was in Apulia, the other [1] in Lucania, a hundred and twelve noble Campanian horsemen, setting out from Capua, with permission of the magistrates, under pretext of plundering the enemy's country, came to the Roman camp above Suessula. They told the guards outside who they were; that they wished to speak with the praetor. Gnaeus Fulvius was in command of the camp, and on being informed, he ordered that ten of their number be disarmed and brought to him. After he had heard their demands—and they made no other request than that upon the recovery of Capua their property should be restored to them, they were all taken under his protection. And the other praetor, Sempronius Tuditanus, took the town of Atrinum [2] by storm. More than seven thousand men were captured and a considerable amount of coined copper and silver. At Rome a terrible fire lasted two nights and a day. Everything between the Salinae and Porta Carmentalis was levelled to the ground,

A.U.C. 541

talem cum Aequimaelio lugarioque vico et [1] templis 16 Fortunae ac matris Matutae. Et extra portam late vagatus ignis sacra profanaque multa absumpsit.

XLVIII. Eodem anno P. et Cn. Cornelii, cum in Hispania res prosperae essent multosque et veteres reciperent socios et novos adicerent, in Africam quo-
2 que spem extenderunt. Syphax erat rex Numidarum
3 subito Carthaginiensibus hostis factus; ad eum centuriones tres legatos miserunt qui cum eo amicitiam societatemque facerent et pollicerentur, si perseveraret urguere bello Carthaginienses, gratam eam rem fore senatui populoque Romano et adnisuros ut in tempore et bene cumulatam gratiam referant.
4 Grata ea legatio barbaro fuit; conloeutusque cum legatis de ratione belli gerundi, ut veterum militum verba audivit, quam multarum rerum ipse ignarus esset, ex comparatione tam ordinatae disciplinae
5 animum advertit. Tum id [2] primum ut pro bonis ac fidelibus sociis facerent oravit, ut duo legationem referrent ad imperatores suos, unus apud sese magister rei militaris remaneret [3]: rudem ad pedestria bella Numidarum gentem esse, equis tantum habilem;
6 ita iam inde a principiis gentis maiores suos bella

[1] et Madvig: in P(1).
[2] tum id Crévier: id tum Riemann: tum P(1).
[3] remaneret A^2 Riemann: retieret P: rediret C^4(10): restaret Walters.

[1] The devastated area was that along the river from the Aventine to the Capitoline, including part of the southeast slope (Aequimaelium) of the latter, and the street (Vicus Iugarius) leading to the Forum. The temples mentioned were near the Tiber and close together; cf. XXXIII. xxvii. 4.

including the Aequimaelium and Vicus Iugarius,[1] also the Temples of Fortune and Mater Matuta. Outside the gate also the fire spread to a distance and destroyed many buildings sacred [2] and profane. B.C. 213

XLVIII. The same year Publius and Gnaeus Cornelius, in consequence of their success in Spain and their recovery of many old allies and the addition of new allies, enlarged their hopes in the direction of Africa as well. There was Syphax, king of the Numidians,[3] who had suddenly become an enemy of the Carthaginians. To him they sent three centurions as legates, to establish friendship and alliance with him, and to promise that if he should continue to embarrass the Carthaginians by war, it would be acceptable to the senate and the Roman people, and they would endeavour to return the favour at the right moment and with generous interest. This embassy pleased the barbarian, and he conferred with the ambassadors on the conduct of the war; and hearing what was said by experienced soldiers, he noted, from comparison with so well-ordered a system, how many things he did not know himself. Then, as the first act befitting good and faithful allies, he begged that two of the legates might report to their generals, and one remain with him as instructor in tactics. He said the Numidian nation was inexpert in infantry warfare, of service only as horsemen. This was the way their ancestors from their earliest history had waged war, thus they had

[2] Among these was the Temple of Spes, one of three in the Forum Holitorium, outside the wall; XXI. lxii. 4; XXV. vii. 6.

[3] I.e. of the western Numidians, the Masaesulians, in Algeria and Oran; XXVIII. xvii. 5.

A.U.C. 541

gessisse, ita se a pueris insuetos. Sed habere hostem pedestri fidentem Marte, cui si aequari robore
7 virium velit, et sibi pedites comparandos esse. Et ad id multitudine hominum regnum abundare, sed armandi ornandique et instruendi eos artem ignorare. Omnia, velut forte congregata turba, vasta [1] ac
8 temeraria esse. Facturos se in praesentia quod vellet legati respondent, fide accepta ut remitteret extemplo eum, si imperatores sui non comprobassent
9 factum. Q. Statorio nomen fuit, qui ad regem remansit. Cum duobus Romanis rex tres a [2] Numidis [3] legatos in Hispaniam misit ad accipiendam fidem ab
10 imperatoribus Romanis. Isdem mandavit ut protinus Numidas qui intra praesidia Carthaginiensium auxili-
11 ares essent [4] ad transitionem perlicerent. Et Statorius ex multa iuventute regi pedites conscripsit ordinatosque proxime morem Romanum instruendo et decurrendo signa sequi et servare ordines docuit, 12 et operi aliisque iustis militaribus ita adsuefecit ut brevi rex non equiti magis fideret quam pediti conlatisque aequo campo signis iusto proelio Carthagi-
13 niensem hostem superaret. Romanis quoque in Hispania legatorum regis adventus magno emolumento fuit; namque ad famam eorum transitiones crebrae ab Numidis coeptae fieri.

Ita cum Syphace Romanis coepta amicitia est. Quod ubi Carthaginienses acceperunt, extemplo

[1] vasta Rubens: suasca PR^1: suaisca P^2??(12).
[2] rex tres a Conway: relata $P(1)$: rex tres Alschefski: rex Weissenborn.
[3] Numidis $P(4)$: -das $B.1^2$.
[4] essent z: erant A^2x: om. $P(1)$.

themselves been trained from boyhood. But he B.C. 213 had an enemy who relied upon infantry battles, and if he wished to be a match for him in military strength he too must acquire infantry. And for that purpose his kingdom was supplied with men in great numbers, but they did not understand the art of arming and equipping them and placing them in battle-line. Everything was formless and unmethodical, as if a mob had been gathered by chance. The legates replied that for the present they would do as he desired, after receiving his pledge to send back the man at once, if their generals should not approve of their action. Quintus Statorius was the name of the one who remained with the king. With the two Romans the king sent three legates from the Numidians to Spain, to receive confirmation from the Roman generals. He further instructed them at once to persuade Numidians who were auxiliaries in the forces of the Carthaginians to desert them. And Statorius out of the mass of young men enrolled infantry for the king, organized them almost in the Roman manner, taught them in formation and evolution to follow standards and keep their ranks, and to such an extent accustomed them to fortifying and other regular duties of the soldier that in a short time the king had as much confidence in his infantry as in his cavalry, and in a regular engagement in formal array on level ground he defeated the Carthaginian enemy. The Romans also in Spain profited greatly by the coming of the king's representatives. For upon the news of their arrival desertions by the Numidians began to be frequent.

Thus began the friendship of the Romans with Syphax. When the Carthaginians learned of the ad Galam in parte altera Numidiae—Maesuli ea gens vocatur—regnantem legatos mittunt. XLIX. Filium Gala Masinissam habebat septem decem annos natum, ceterum iuvenem ea indole ut iam tum appareret maius regnum opulentiusque quam quod accepisset

A.U.C. 541

2 facturum. Legati, quoniam Syphax se Romanis iunxisset, ut potentior societate eorum adversus
3 reges populosque Africae esset, docent melius fore Galae quoque Carthaginiensibus iungi quam primum, antequam Syphax in Hispaniam aut Romani in Africam transeant; opprimi Syphacem nihildum praeter nomen ex foedere Romano habentem posse.
4 Facile persuasum Galae, filio deposcente id bellum, ut mitteret exercitum; qui Carthaginiensibus legionibus coniunctus[1] magno proelio Syphacem devicit. Triginta milia eo proelio hominum caesa dicuntur.
5 Syphax cum paucis equitibus in Maurusios ex acie Numidas—extremi prope Oceanum adversus Gadis colunt—refugit, adfluentibusque ad famam eius undi-
6 que barbaris ingentis brevi copias armavit cum quibus in Hispaniam angusto diremptam freto traiceret. Sed[2] Masinissa cum victore exercitu advenit; isque ibi cum Syphace ingenti gloria per se sine ullis Carthaginiensium opibus gessit bellum.

[1] coniunctus Madvig: -iis P: -i $P^2\ell$: -is (1).
[2] Sed H. J. Müller: om. P(1): eo or et Madvig: ceterum Luchs: interim Weissenborn.

[1] The eastern part, adjoining Carthaginian territory. Cirta (Constantine) was Syphax's capital, until it fell to Masinissa in 203 B.C.; XXX. xii.

matter they at once sent legates to Gala, who reigned B.C. 213 in the other part of Numidia,[1] his people being called the Maesulians. XLIX. Gala had a son Masinissa,[2] seventeen years old, but a young man of such promise that even then it was evident that he would make the kingdom larger and richer than what he had received. The legates stated that, inasmuch as Syphax had attached himself to the Romans, in order, through alliance with them, to be more powerful against the kings and peoples of Africa, it would be well for Gala too to attach himself as soon as possible to the Carthaginians, before Syphax should cross into Spain or the Romans into Africa. Syphax could be surprised, they said, while he had as yet no advantage from his treaty with the Romans except the name. They easily persuaded Gala to send an army, as his son was begging for the command; and reinforced by the Carthaginian legions, Masinissa defeated Syphax in a great battle. Thirty thousand men are said to have been slain in that battle. Syphax with a few horsemen fled from the field to the Maurusian Numidians, who live far away, near the Ocean opposite Gades. And as the barbarians on hearing of him flocked together from all sides, he soon armed immense forces with which to cross into Spain, separated only by a narrow strait. But Masinissa came with his victorious army, and there by himself, without any help from the Carthaginians, he carried on war against Syphax with great distinction.

[2] Who fought against the Romans in Spain down to the time of Gala's death in 206 B.C., and then became an ally of Rome, and a friend of Scipio. At present he must have been nearer twenty-seven, since he died in 149 B.C. at 92 (Epit. 48 fin.; cf. 50).

A.U.C. 541

7 In Hispania nihil memorabile gestum praeterquam quod Celtiberum iuventutem eadem mercede qua pacta cum Carthaginiensibus erat imperatores
8 Romani ad se perduxerunt, et nobilissimos Hispanos supra trecentos in Italiam ad sollicitandos populares qui inter auxilia Hannibalis erant miserunt. Id [1] modo eius anni in Hispania [2] ad memoriam insigne est, quod mercennarium militem in castris neminem ante quam tum Celtiberos Romani habuerunt.

[1] Id modo . . . habuerunt P(1) : spurious Geyer.
[2] eius (or eris) anni in Hispania P(1) : spurious Conway.

In Spain nothing notable occurred except that the B.C. 213
Roman commanders attracted to their side the young men of the Celtiberians at the same pay at which these had made an agreement with the Carthaginians, and more than three hundred Spaniards of the highest rank were sent to Italy to win over their fellow-countrymen who were among Hannibal's auxiliaries. This is the only occurrence of that year in Spain that is worthy of record, since the Romans had no mercenary soldiers in their camps previous to the Celtiberians whom they had at that time.

LIBRI XXIV PERIOCHA

Hieronymus Syracusanorum rex, cuius pater Hiero amicus populi Romani fuerat, ad Carthaginienses defecit et propter crudelitatem superbiamque a suis interfectus est. Tib. Sempronius Graechus proconsul prospere adversus Poenos et Hannonem ducem ad Beneventum pugnavit servorum maxime opera, quos liberos esse iussit. Claudius Marcellus consul in Sicilia, quae prope tota ad Poenos defecerat, Syracusas obsedit. Philippo Macedonum regi bellum indictum est, qui ad Apolloniam nocturno proelio oppressus fugatusque in Macedoniam cum prope inermi exercitu profugit. Ad id bellum gerendum M. Valerius praetor missus. Res praeterea in Hispania a P. et Cn. Scipionibus adversus Carthaginienses gestas continet;[1] a quibus Syphax rex Numidiae in amicitiam adscitus, qui a Masinissa Massyliorum rege pro Carthaginiensibus pugnante victus in Hispaniam ad Scipionem cum magna manu transiit contra Gades, ubi angusto freto Africa et Hispania dirimuntur. Celtiberi quoque in amicitiam recepti sunt, quorum auxiliis adscitis tunc primum mercennarium militem Romana castra habuerunt.

[1] The following lines (to the end) appear to be a later addition. Zangemeister, Wölfflin.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXIV

HIERONYMUS, king of the Syracusans, whose father[1] Hiero had been a friend of the Roman people, revolted to the Carthaginians and on account of his cruelty and haughtiness was slain by his own men. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus as proconsul fought with success against the Carthaginians and Hanno their general near Beneventum, chiefly by the help of the slaves, whom he ordered to be free men. Claudius Marcellus, the consul, in Sicily, which had almost entirely revolted to the Carthaginians, besieged Syracuse. War was declared against Philip, king of the Macedonians, and he, surprised at Apollonia in a battle at night and put to flight, fled with an army almost disarmed into Macedonia. Marcus Valerius, a praetor, was sent to conduct that war. Furthermore the book contains what was accomplished against the Carthaginians in Spain by Publius and Gnaeus Scipio, by whom Syphax, king of Numidia, was won over to friendship. Syphax, defeated by Masinissa, king of the Massylians,[2] who was fighting for the Carthaginians, crossed over with a large force to Scipio in Spain, from a point opposite Gades, where Africa and Spain are parted by a narrow strait.[3] The Celtiberians also were admitted to friendship, and by their enrollment as auxiliaries Roman camps then for the first time had mercenary soldiers.

[1] An error for grandfather.

[2] I.e. the Maesulians.

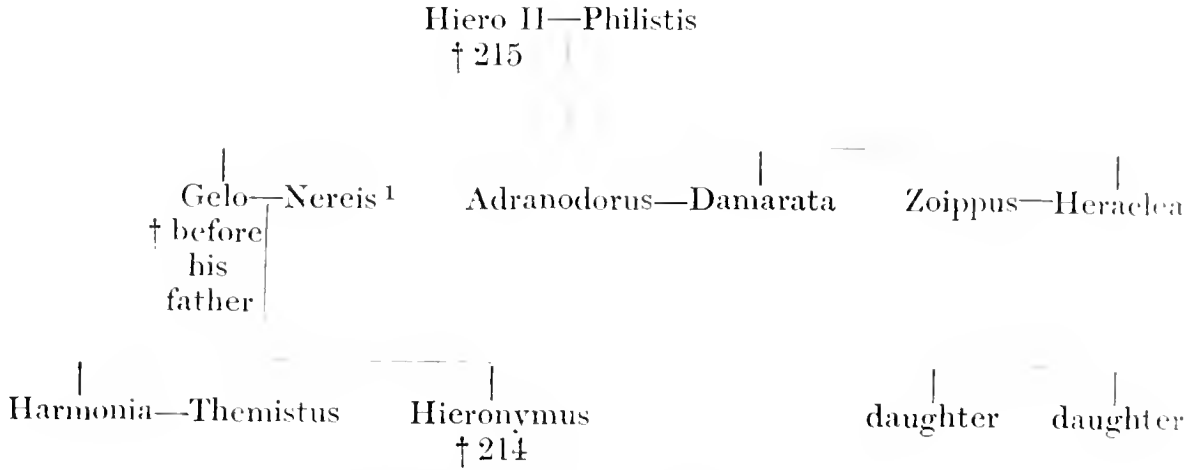
[3] The statement that Syphax actually crossed over to Spain conflicts with the text (xlix. 6).



[1] A grand-daughter, rather than daughter, of Pyrrhus.

BOOK XXV

LIBER XXV

A.U.C. 541

I. Dum haec in Africa atque in Hispania geruntur, Hannibal in agro Sallentino aestatem consumpsit spe per proditionem urbis Tarentinorum potiundae. Ipsorum interim Sallentinorum ignobiles urbes ad
2 eum defecerunt. Eodem tempore in Bruttiis ex duodecim populis qui anno priore ad Poenos desciverant Consentini et Tauriani in fidem populi Romani
3 rediernnt; et plures redissent, ni T. Pomponius Veientanus, praefectus socium, prosperis aliquot populationibus in agro Bruttio iusti ducis speciem nactus tumultuario exercitu coacto cum Hannone
4 conflixisset. Magna ibi vis hominum, sed inconditae turbae agrestium servorumque, caesa aut capta est. Minimum iacturae fuit quod praefectus inter ceteros est captus, et tum temerariae pugnae auctor et ante publicanus omnibus malis artibus et rei publicae et 5 societatibus infidus damnosusque. Sempronius consul in Lucanis multa proelia parva, haud ullum dignum memoratu fecit et ignobilia oppida Lucanorum aliquot expugnavit.

[1] Hannibal is now in the southern part of Calabria, three days' march from Tarentum; cf. viii. 12. He had previously been near Arpi, in Apulia; XXIV. xlv. 11 ff.

BOOK XXV

I. While these things were being done in Africa and Spain, Hannibal spent the summer in the Sallentine region,[1] in the hope of getting possession of the city of Tarentum through treachery. Meantime, however, Sallentine cities of no importance went over to his side. At the same time among the Bruttians, out of twelve states which in the previous year had revolted to the Carthaginians, Consentia and Taurianum returned to their allegiance to the Roman people; and more would have returned if a prefect of the allies, Titus Pomponius Veientanus, who by successfully ravaging Bruttian territory a number of times gained the appearance of a regularly appointed general, had not gathered a hastily mustered army and engaged Hanno. A great many men were slain or captured there, an ill-organized mass, however, of rustics and slaves. It was the smallest part of the loss that, along with the rest, the prefect was captured, who was responsible at that time for a reckless battle, and had previously been a tax-farmer possessed of all the dishonest devices, faithless and ruinous both to the state and to the companies. Sempronius, the consul, fought many small engagements in Lucania, not one worthy of record, and took by storm a number of unimportant Lucanian towns. B.C. 213

A.U.C. 541

6 Quo diutius trahebatur bellum et variabant secundae adversaeque res non fortunam magis quam animos hominum, tanta religio, et ea magna ex parte externa, civitatem incessit ut aut homines aut dei 7 repente alii viderentur facti. Nec iam in secreto modo atque intra parietes abolebantur Romani ritus, sed in publico etiam ac foro Capitolioque mulierum turba erat nec sacrificantium nec precantium deos 8 patrio more. Sacrificuli ac vates ceperant hominum mentes, quorum numerum auxit rustica plebs, ex incultis diutino bello infestisque agris egestate et metu in urbem compulsa, et quaestus ex alieno errore facilis, quem velut concessae artis usu exercebant. 9 Primo secretae bonorum indignationes exaudiebantur; deinde ad patres et iam ad[1] publicam 10 querimoniam excessit res. Incusati graviter ab senatu aediles triumvirique capitales quod non prohiberent, cum emovere eam multitudinem e foro ac disicere adparatus sacrorum conati essent, haud 11 procul afuit quin violarentur. Ubi potentius iam esse id malum apparuit quam ut minores per magistratus sedaretur, M. Aemilio praetori urbano[2] negotium ab senatu datum est ut eis religionibus 12 populum liberaret. Is et in contione senatus consultum recitavit et edixit ut quicumque libros vaticinos precationesve aut artem sacrificandi con-

[1] et iam ad Alschefski : etiamad P(1) : etiam ac Weissenborn.

[2] urbano (i.e. urb.) P(1) : om. as gloss Walters.

---

[1] Forsaken, as they felt, by their own gods, the populace were turning to foreign divinities and strange cults.

[2] An error of Livy for Marcus Atilius; XXIV. xliv. 2, where Aemilius, praetor peregrinus, assigns his duties to Atilius,

The longer the war dragged on and success and B.C. 213 failure altered the situation, and quite as much so the attitude of men, superstitious fears, in large part foreign at that, invaded the state to such a degree that either men or else gods suddenly seemed changed. And now not only in secret and within the walls of houses were Roman rites abandoned, but in public places also and in the Forum and on the Capitol there was a crowd of women who were following the custom of the fathers neither in their sacrifices nor in prayers to the gods.[1] Petty priests and also prophets had taken hold on men's minds. And the number of these was increased by the mass of rustics forced by want and fear into the city from their farms neglected and endangered because of the long war, and by easy profit from the delusion of others—a trade which they plied as though it were sanctioned. At first good men's indignation was voiced in private; then the matter reached the senate and now even official complaints. The aediles and the three police magistrates were roundly censured by the senate because they did not stop it; and after they had attempted to drive that crowd out of the Forum and to scatter the properties required for the rites, they narrowly escaped violence. Now that the disorder appeared to be too strong to be quelled by the lower magistrates, the senate assigned to Marcus Aemilius,[2] the city praetor, the task of freeing the people from such superstitions. He read the decree of the senate in an assembly, and also issued an edict that whoever had books of prophecies or prayers or a ritual of sacrifice set down in writing should bring all such praetor urbanus, and takes a command in Apulia. The error is repeated in iii. 12 and xii. 3.

A.U.C. 511

scriptam haberet, eos libros omnis litterasque ad se ante kal. Apriles deferret, neu quis in publico sacroue loco nouo aut externo ritu sacrificaret.

II. Aliquot publici sacerdotes mortui eo anno sunt, L. Cornelius Lentulus pontifex maximus et C. Papirius C. f. Masso pontifex et P. Furius Philus augur et C. Papirius L. f. Masso decemvir sacrorum. 2 In Lentuli locum M. Cornelius Cethegus, in Papiri Cn. Seruilius Caepio pontifices suffecti sunt, augur creatus L. Quinctius Flamininus, decemvir sacrorum L. Cornelius Lentulus.

3 Comitiorum consularium iam adpetebat tempus; sed quia consules bello[1] intentos auocare non placebat, Ti. Sempronius consul comitiorum causa dictatorem dixit C. Claudium Centonem. Ab eo magister 4 equitum est dictus Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Dictator primo comitiali die creauit consules Q. Fulvium Flaccum magistrum equitum et Ap. Claudium Pulchrum, 5 cui Sicilia prouincia in praetura fuerat. Tum praetores creati Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nero, M. Iunius Silanus, P. Cornelius Sulla. Comitiis 6 perfectis dictator magistratu abiit. Aedilis curulis fuit eo anno cum M. Cornelio Cethego P. Cornelius Scipio, cui post Africano fuit cognomen. Huic petenti aedilitatem cum obsisterent tribuni plebis, negantes rationem eius habendam esse, quod

[1] bello P^1?x: a bello P(10).

---

[1] Exact compliance with written directions being essential, as in the Roman religion, to seize the texts was in effect to suppress the cults.

[2] Cf. xii. 10 f.

[3] Scipio was probably only 22, but the famous law fixing statutory ages for the different offices (Lex Villia annalis) was not passed until 180 B.C.; XL. xliv. 1.

books and writings [1] to him before the first of April, B.C. 213 and that no one should sacrifice in a public or consecrated place according to a strange or foreign rite.

11. A number of priests of the state died that year: Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, pontifex maximus, and Gaius Papirius Masso, son of Gaius, a pontifex, and Publius Furius Philus, an augur, and Gaius Papirius Masso, son of Lucius, a decemvir in charge of rites.[2] In place of Lentulus they made Marcus Cornelius Cethegus a pontiff and Gnaeus Servilius Caepio in that of Papirius; Lucius Quinctius Flamininus was named augur. Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, decemvir in charge of rites.

For the consular elections the time was now approaching, but because the consuls were occupied with the war and it was not thought advisable to call them away, Tiberius Sempronius, the consul, named Gaius Claudius Cento dictator to hold the elections. He in turn named Quintus Fulvius Flaccus master of the horse. On the first day available for elections the dictator announced the choice as consuls of Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, master of the horse, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who as praetor had had Sicily as his province. Then the following were elected praetors: Gnaeus Fulvius Flaccus, Gaius Claudius Nero, Marcus Junius Silanus, Publius Cornelius Sulla. Having finished the elections, the dictator laid down his office. Curule aedile that year, together with Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, was Publius Cornelius Scipio,[3] who was later called Africanus. When he was a candidate for the aedileship, and the tribunes of the plebs tried to oppose him, saying that he ought not to be considered because he did 7 nondum ad petendum legitima aetas esset, "Si me" inquit "omnes Quirites aedilem facere volunt, satis annorum habeo." Tanto inde favore ad suffragium ferendum in tribus discursum est ut tribuni 8 repente incepto desiterint. Aedilicia largitio haec fuit: ludi Romani pro temporis illius copiis magnifice facti et diem unum instaurati, et congii olei in vicos 9 singulos dati . . . .[1] L. Villius Tappulus et M. Fundanius Fundulus aediles plebei aliquot matronas apud populum probri accusarunt; quasdam ex eis 10 damnatas in exilium egerunt. Ludi plebei per biduum instaurati et Iovis epulum fuit ludorum causa.

A.U.C. 511

A.U.C. 512

III. Q. Fulvius Flaccus tertium Appius Claudius 2 consulatum ineunt. Et praetores provincias sortiti sunt, P. Cornelius Sulla urbanam et peregrinam, quae duorum ante sors fuerat, Cn. Fulvius Flaccus Apuliam, C. Claudius Nero Suessulam, M. Iunius 3 Silanus Tuscos. Consulibus bellum cum Hannibale et binae legiones decretae; alter a Q. Fabio superioris anni consule, alter a Fulvio Centumalo acciperet; 4 praetorum Fulvi Flacci quae Luceriae sub Aemilio praetore, Neronis Claudi quae in Piceno sub C. Terentio fuissent legiones essent; supplementum in eas ipsi scriberent sibi. M. Iunio in Tuscos

[1] Numeral missing, perhaps L preceding L. (Engelmann) at end of line in P.

---

[1] The ludi Romani or maximi occurred in mid-September and lasted four days. For repetition cf. XXIII. xxx. 16.

[2] A congius held about three quarts.

[3] As in wartime cases to be heard by the praetor peregrinus would be much reduced in number, he could be spared for service at the front; XXIV. xliv. 2.

[4] A military base in Campania, southeast of Capua, half-way to Nola. Its Castra Claudiana lay near the entrance to the Caudine Pass. Cf. XXIII. xxxi. 3; XXIV. xvii. 2; xliv. 3.

not have the legal age for candidacy, he said, "If all B.C. 213 the citizens want to make me aedile I have years enough." Thereupon with such enthusiasm they separated to form by tribes in order to cast their votes, that the tribunes suddenly gave up their attempt. The generosity of the aediles consisted in celebrating the Roman Games [1] splendidly, for the resources of that time, and in repeating them for one day; also in giving . . . measures [2] of oil for each precinct. Lucius Villius Tappulus and Marcus Fundanius Fundulus as plebeian aediles brought before the people charges of immorality against a number of matrons. Some of these being convicted, they drove them into exile. The Plebeian Games were repeated for two days, and on account of the festival a banquet for Jupiter was held.

III. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus and Appius Claudius B.C. 212 entered upon their consulship, the former for the third time. And the praetors received by lot the following assignments: Publius Cornelius Sulla, the duties of praetor urbanus and praetor peregrinus,[3] previously two separate offices; Gnaeus Fulvius Flaccus, Apulia, Gaius Claudius Nero, Suessula,[4] Marcus Junius Silanus, Etruria. To the consuls were assigned by decree the war with Hannibal and two legions each. The one was to take over his troops from Quintus Fabius, consul in the previous year, the other from Fulvius Centumalus. Of the praetors, Fulvius Flaccus was to have the legions which had been at Luceria under the praetor Aemilius, Nero Claudius the one [5] which had been in the Picene district under Gaius Terentius. They were themselves to enlist more recruits for the same. To Marcus Junius the [5] Terentius Varro had had only one legion; XXIV. xliv. 5.

A.U.C. 542

5 legiones urbanae prioris anni datae. Ti. Sempronio Graccho et P. Sempronio Tuditano imperium provinciaeque Lucani et Gallia cum suis exercitibus
6 prorogatae; item P. Lentulo qua vetus provincia in Sicilia esset, M. Marcello Syracusae et qua Hieronis regnum fuisset; T. Otacilio classis, Graecia M. Valerio, Sardinia Q. Mucio Scaevolae, Hispaniae P.
7 et Cn. Corneliis. Ad veteres exercitus duae urbanae legiones a consulibus scriptae, summaque trium et viginti legionum eo anno effecta est.

8 Dilectum consulum M. Postumii Pyrgensis cum 9 magno prope motu rerum factum impediit. Publicanus erat Postumius, qui multis annis parem fraude avaritiaque neminem in civitate habuerat praeter T. Pomponium Veientanum, quem populantem temere agros in Lucanis ductu Hannonis priore anno
10 ceperant Carthaginienses. Hi, quia publicum periculum erat a vi tempestatis in iis quae portarentur ad exercitus et ementiti erant falsa naufragia et ea ipsa quae vera renuntiaverant fraude ipsorum facta 11 erant, non casu. In veteres quassasque naves paucis et parvi pretii rebus impositis, cum mersissent eas in alto exceptis in praeparatas scaphas nautis, 12 multiplices fuisse merces ementiebantur. Ea fraus indicata M. Aemilio praetori priore anno fuerat ac per eum ad senatum delata nec tamen ullo senatus

---

[1] Cf. XXIV. xliv. 4; vii. 9.
[2] Cf. i. 3 f.

city legions of the previous year were given for B.C. 212
Etruria. For Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and Publius Sempronius Tuditanus their commands and provinces, Lucania and Gaul, with their armies, were continued. And the same was done for Publius Lentulus, within the limits of the old province in Sicily, and for Marcellus, whose province was Syracuse and up to the former boundaries of Hiero's kingdom.[1] The fleet was assigned to Titus Otacilius, Greece to Marcus Valerius, Sardinia to Quintus Mucius Scaevola, the Spanish provinces to Publius and Gnaeus Cornelius. In addition to the old armies two city legions were enrolled by the consuls, and the total that year amounted to twenty-three legions.

The consular levy was hampered by the conduct of Marcus Postumius of Pyrgi, which almost occasioned a serious insurrection. Postumius was a tax-farmer, who in many years had had no equal in dishonesty and avarice in the state, except Titus Pomponius Veientanus, whom the Carthaginians under Hanno's command had captured in the preceding year, while he was rashly ravaging the country in Lucania.[2] These men, since the state assumed the risk from violent storms in the case of shipments to the armies, had falsely reported imaginary shipwrecks, and even those which they had correctly reported had been brought about by their own trickery, not by accident. They would put small cargoes of little value on old, battered vessels, sink them at sea, after taking off the crews in small boats that were in readiness, and then falsely declare that the shipments were far more valuable. This dishonesty had been reported in the previous year to Marcus Aemilius, the praetor, and by him brought before the senate, but it was not branded by consulto notata, quia patres ordinem publicanorum 13 in tali tempore offensum nolebant. Populus severior vindex fraudis erat, excitatique tandem duo tribuni plebis, Spurius et L. Carvilii, cum rem invisam infamemque cernerent, ducentum milium aeris 14 multam M. Postumio dixerunt. Cui certandae cum dies advenisset, conciliumque tam frequens plebis adesset ut multitudinem area Capitolii vix caperet, 15 perorata causa una spes videbatur esse si C. Servilius

A.U.C. 542

Casca tribunus plebis, qui propinquus cognatusque
Postumio erat, priusquam ad suffragium tribus 16 vocarentur, intercessisset. Testibus datis tribuni populum summoverunt, sitellaque lata est, ut sorti-17 rentur ubi Latini suffragium ferrent. Interim publicani Cascae instare ut concilio diem eximeret; populus reclamare; et forte in cornu primus sedebat Casca, cui simul metus pudorque animum versabat.
18 Cum in eo parum praesidii esset, turbandae rei causa publicani per vacuum summoto locum cuneo inrupe-19 runt iurgantes simul cum populo tribunisque. Nec procul dimicatione res erat cum Fulvius consul tribunis "Nonne videtis" inquit "vos in ordinem coactos esse et rem ad seditionem spectare, ni propere dimittitis plebis concilium?"

IV. Plebe dimissa senatus vocatur et consules

---

[1] It was left for the people to confirm or remit such a fine; cf. XXXVII. li. 4 f.; lviii. 1; Cicero, Phil. XI. 18; de Leg. III. 6.

[2] The witnesses were to watch the balloting.

[3] I.e. such Latins as were present at Rome. In which of the tribes they should vote was determined by the tribunes, who cast lots.

[4] Any action interfering with a tribune's duties or privileges was held equivalent to degrading him from office; cf. XLIII. 16. 9 f.

any decree of the senate, because the senators were B.C. 212 unwilling to offend the tax-farmers as a class at such a crisis. The people proved a more unsparing avenger of dishonesty; namely, two tribunes of the plebs, Spurius and Lucius Carvilius, were at length aroused, and seeing that the affair was unpopular and notorious, imposed a fine of two hundred thousand asses upon Marcus Postumius. When the day for his protest against this fine arrived, the assembly of the commons [1] was so large that the open space on the Capitol could scarcely contain the crowd. After the arguments were concluded, there seemed to be but one hope, namely, if Gaius Servilius Casca, a tribune of the plebs who was a blood-relative of Postumius, should interpose his veto before the tribes should be called to vote. The tribunes provided witnesses,[2] cleared the people away, and the urn was brought, that they might determine by lot in which tribe the Latins [3] should vote. Meantime the tax-farmers pressed Casca to adjourn that day's hearing before the assembly. The people protested; and it so happened that the first seat at the end of the platform was occupied by Casca, whose mind was swayed at once by fear and shame. Finding in him no sufficient protection, the publicans, in order to prevent action, rushed in a wedge through the space cleared by removal of the crowd, while at the same time they reviled the people and the tribunes. And it had almost come to a battle when Fabius, the consul, said to the tribunes, "Do you not see that you are reduced to the ranks,[4] and that this means an insurrection if you do not promptly dismiss the popular assembly?"

IV. The assembly being dismissed, the senate was summoned and the consuls brought up the matter

A.U.C. 512

referunt de concilio plebis turbato vi atque audacia
2 publicanorum: M. Furium Camillum, cuius exilium ruina urbis secutura[1] fuerit, damnari se ab iratis
3 civibus passum esse; decemviros ante eum, quorum legibus ad eam diem viverent, multos postea principes
4 civitatis iudicium de se populi passos: Postumium Pyrgensem suffragium populo Romano extorsisse, concilium plebis sustulisse, tribunos in ordinem coegisse, contra populum Romanum aciem instruxisse, locum occupasse, ut tribunos a plebe intercluderet,
5 tribus in suffragium vocari prohiberet. Nihil aliud a caede ac dimicatione continuisse homines nisi patientiam magistratuum, quod cesserint in praesentia furori atque audaciae paucorum vincique se ac populum
6 Romanum passi sint et comitia, quae reus vi atque armis prohibiturus erat, ne causa quaerentibus dimicationem daretur, voluntate ipsi sua sustulerint.
7 Haec cum ab optimo quoque pro atrocitate rei accepta[2] essent, vimque eam contra rem publicam et pernicioso exemplo factam senatus decresset,
8 confestim Carvilii tribuni plebis omissa multae certatione rei capitalis diem Postumio dixerunt ac, ni vades daret, prendi a viatore atque in carcerem
9 duci iusserunt. Postumius vadibus datis non adfuit.

[1] secutura Alschefski: secura P(1).
[2] accepta Madvig: acta P(1).

[1] Cf. V. xxxii. 9; xxxiii. 1.

of the disturbance in the popular assembly owing to B.C. 212
the violence and audacity of the publicans. Marcus Furius Camillus,[1] it was said, a man whose exile would have been followed by the ruin of the city, had allowed himself to be condemned by the angry citizens; that before his time the decemvirs, under whose laws they were then still living, and later many leading men in the state, had submitted to the judgment of the people in their cases; that Postumius of Pyrgi had wrested the vote from the Roman people, had brought to naught an assembly of the plebs, reduced the tribunes to the ranks, drawn up a battle-line against the Roman people, had taken his position, to separate the tribunes from the people and to prevent the tribes from being summoned to vote. Nothing had restrained men from slaughter and battle but the forbearance of the magistrates in yielding for the moment to the mad audacity of a few men, and in allowing themselves and the Roman people to be worsted, also in that, as regards the voting, which the defendant would have prevented by force of arms, they had of their own accord suspended it, to avoid giving excuse to those eager for the fray. These words were interpreted by all the best citizens as deserved by an outrageous occurrence, and the senate declared that this violence had been employed against the state, setting a dangerous precedent. Thereupon the Carvilii, tribunes of the people, in place of the procedure to fix the amount of the fine, at once named a day for Postumius' appearance on a capital charge, and ordered that if he did not furnish sureties he should be seized by an attendant and taken to prison. Postumius furnished sureties, but did not appear.

A.U.C. 542

Tribuni plebem rogaverunt plebesque ita scivit, si M. Postumius ante kal. Maias non prodisset citatusque eo die non respondisset neque excusatus esset, videri eum in exilio esse bonaque eius venire, ipsi aqua et igni placere interdici. Singulis deinde eorum qui turbae ac tumultus concitatores fuerant, rei capitalis diem dicere ac vades poscere coeperunt. Primo non dantis, deinde etiam eos qui dare possent in carcerem coiciebant; cuius rei periculum vitantes plerique in exilium abierunt.

V. Hunc fraus publicanorum, deinde fraudem audacia protegens exitum habuit. Comitia inde pontifici maximo creando sunt habita; ea comitia novus pontifex M. Cornelius Cethegus habuit. Tres ingenti certamine petierunt, Q. Fulvius Flaccus consul, qui et ante bis consul et censor fuerat, et T. Manlius Torquatus, et ipse duobus consulatibus et censura insignis, et P. Licinius Crassus, qui aedilitatem curulem petiturus erat. Hic senes honoratosque iuvenis in eo certamine vicit. Ante hunc intra centum annos et viginti nemo praeter P. Cornelium Calussam pontifex maximus creatus fuerat qui sella curuli non sedisset.

Consules dilectum cum aegre conficerent, quod inopia iuniorum non facile in utrumque, ut et novae urbanae legiones et supplementum veteribus seriberetur, sufficiebat, senatus absistere eos incepto plebs ordained that, if Marcus Postumius should not appear before the first of May, and on being summoned on that day should not reply nor be excused, it should be understood that he was in exile, and be decided that his property should be sold and himself refused water and fire. The tribunes then began to name a day for the appearance on a capital charge of each of those who had been instigators of riot and sedition, and to demand sureties from them. At first they threw into prison those who did not give security, and then even those who were able to do so. Avoiding this danger many went into exile.

The tribunes put the question to the plebs and the B.C. 212

V. Such was the outcome of dishonesty on the part of the publicans and of audacity seeking to cover dishonesty. Next was held an election for the choice of a pontifex maximus. This election was conducted by a new pontiff, Marcus Cornelius Cethegus. Three men canvassed with great rivalry: Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, the consul, who had been consul twice before and also censor, and Titus Manlius Torquatus, likewise distinguished by two consulships and a censorship, and Publius Licinius Crassus, who was only about to be a candidate for a curule aedileship. This young man defeated in that contest old men who had held high offices. Before him for a hundred and twenty years no one who had not occupied a curule chair had been elected pontifex maximus, except Publius Cornelius Calussa.

The consuls were finding it difficult to complete the levy, since the scant supply of young men was hardly sufficient for the two purposes, enrollment of new legions for the city and replacements for the old ones. The senate accordingly forbade them to give vetuit et triumviros binos creari iussit, alteros qui citra, alteros qui ultra quinquagensimum lapidem in pagis forisque et conciliabulis omnem copiam ingenuorum inspicerent et, si qui roboris satis ad ferenda arma habere viderentur, etiamsi nondum militari aetate essent, milites facerent; tribuni plebis, si iis videretur, ad populum ferrent ut, qui minores septem decem annis sacramento dixissent, iis perinde stipendia procederent ac si septem decem annorum aut maiores milites facti essent. Ex hoc senatus consulto creati triumviri bini conquisitionem ingenuorum per agros habuerunt.

A.U.C. 512

10 Eodem tempore ex Sicilia litterae Marci Marcelli de postulatis militum qui cum P. Lentulo militabant in senatu recitatae sunt. Cannensis reliquiae cladis hic exercitus erat, relegatus in Siciliam, sicut ante dictum est, ne ante Punici belli finem in Italiam reportarentur. VI. Hi permissu Lentuli primores equitum centurionumque et robora ex legionibus peditum legatos in hiberna ad M. Marcellum mise-
2 runt, e quibus unus potestate dicendi facta: "Consulem te, M. Marcelle, in Italia[1] adissemus, cum primum de nobis, etsi non iniquum, certe triste senatus consultum factum est, nisi hoc sperassemus,

[1] Italia x: italiam $P(1)$.

[1] For fora and conciliabula, cf. xxii. 4; XXXIX. xiv. 7; xviii. 2; XL. xxxvii. 3 f.; XLIII. xiv. 10. A forum was a Roman settlement, usually on an important road (e.g. Forum Appii), but lacking the status of a colonia. A conciliabulum was a petty administrative centre for rural districts (pagi).

[2] Cf. XXIII. xxv. 7; XXIV. xviii. 9.

up the attempt and ordered the appointment of two B.C. 212 commissions of three officials each, to inspect in rural districts, market-towns and local centres [1] all possible freeborn men within fifty miles, the other beyond that distance, and any that seemed to them strong enough to bear arms, even if not yet of military age, they were to recruit. The tribunes of the plebs, if they should see fit, were to bring before the people a bill that, in the case of those who had taken the military oath at less than seventeen years, their campaigns should run just as if they had been recruited at seventeen years or older. In accordance with this decree of the senate two commissions of three members each were appointed and they conducted the search for freeborn men in the country.

At the same time a letter from Marcus Marcellus in Sicily was read in the senate concerning demands of the soldiers serving under Publius Lentulus. This army was the remnant of the disaster at Cannae, and, as has been said above, was relegated to Sicily, not to be brought back to Italy before the end of the Punic War.[2] VI. These men with Lentulus' permission sent their leading knights and centurions and picked men from the infantry of the legions to Marcus Marcellus at his winter quarters as their representatives, and one of them, receiving permission to speak, said: "In your consulship,[3] Marcus Marcellus, and in Italy we should have come to you already, directly after the senate made in our case a decree that, if not unjust, was surely severe, had it not been our hope that we were being sent into a province thrown [3] But at the time of the senatus consultum Marcellus was not consul, but praetor, and the men in question were in his own army; cf. XXIII. xxiv. 1; xxv. 7.

A.U.C. 542

in provinciam nos morte regum turbatam ad grave
3 bellum adversus Siculos simul Poenosque mitti, et sanguine nostro vulneribusque nos senatui [1] satisfacturos esse, sicut patrum memoria qui capti a Pyrrho ad Heracleam erant adversus Pyrrhum ipsum
4 pugnantes satisfecerunt. Quamquam quod ob meritum nostrum suscensuistis, patres conscripti, nobis
5 aut suscensetis? Ambo mihi consules et universum senatum intueri videor, cum te, M. Marcelle, intueor, quem si ad Cannas consulem habuissemus, melior et 6 rei publicae et nostra fortuna esset. Sine, quaeso, priusquam de condicione nostra queror, noxam cuius arguimur nos purgare. Si non deum ira nec fato, cuius lege immobilis rerum humanarum ordo seritur, sed culpa periimus ad Cannas, cuius tandem
7 ea culpa fuit? Militum an imperatorum? Equidem miles nihil umquam dicam de imperatore meo, cui praesertim gratias sciam ab senatu actas quod non desperaverit de re publica, cui post fugam ab Cannis [2]
8 per omnes annos prorogatum imperium. Ceteros item ex reliquiis cladis eius, quos tribunos militum habuimus, honores petere et gerere et provincias
9 obtinere audivimus. An vobis vestrisque liberis ignoscitis facile, patres conscripti, in haec vilia capita saevitis? [3] Et consuli primoribusque aliis civitatis fugere, cum spes alia nulla esset, turpe non fuit, 10 milites utique morituros in aciem misistis? Ad

[1] nos senatui Bentley: nostris senatui Crévier: nostratui PA?(2).

[2] ab Cannis Gronovius: actamnis P: actamnisi P^{2}?(1): Cannensem A^{y}.

[3] saevitis A^{2}: saeviret PA?(11): saevire $P^{z}CM^{1}$: saevire libet Hertz.

[1] Cf. V. xxxviii.

into confusion by the death of its kings, to carry on a serious war against Sicilians and Carthaginians combined, and that by our blood and wounds we were to give satisfaction to the senate, just as in the time of our fathers the men who had been captured by Pyrrhus at Heraclea had done by fighting against Pyrrhus himself. And yet for what desert of ours have you been angry at us, conscript fathers, or are now angry? It seems that I am looking at both consuls and the entire senate when I look at you, Marcus Marcellus. If we had had you as consul at Cannae the lot of the state, and of ourselves as well, would be a better one. Before I complain of our plight, permit us, I pray, to clear ourselves of the offence of which we are charged. If it was not by anger of the gods nor by Fate, according to whose law the chain of human events is unalterably linked, but by a fault that we were undone at Cannae, whose fault, pray, was it? Of the soldiers or of the generals? For my part I, a soldier, will never say anything about my general, especially since I know that he was thanked by the senate because he did not lose hope for the state, and that after the flight from Cannae his command was continued year after year. The others too who survived that disaster, the men whom we had as our tribunes of the soldiers, canvass for offices, we have heard, and hold them, and govern provinces. Can it be, conscript fathers, that you readily pardon yourselves and your sons, but are cruel to these creatures of no account? And while it was no disgrace to the consul and other leading men in the state to flee, since there was no other hope, did you send your common soldiers into battle to die inevitably? At the Allia [1] almost the entire B.C. 212

A.U.C. 512

Alliam prope omnis exercitus fugit; ad Furculas Caudinas ne expertus quidem certamen arma tradidit hosti, ut alias pudendas clades exercituum
11 taceam; tamen tantum afuit ab eo ut ulla ignominia iis exercitibus quaereretur ut et urbs Roma per eum exercitum qui ab Allia Veios transfugerat recipera-12 retur, et Caudinae legiones, quae sine armis redierant Romam, armatae remissae in Samnium eundem illum hostem sub iugum miserint qui hac sua igno-13 minia laetatus fuerat. Cannensem vero quisquam exercitum fugae aut pavoris insimulare potest, ubi plus quinquaginta milia hominum ceciderunt, unde consul cum equitibus septuaginta fugit, unde nemo superest nisi quem hostis caedendo fessus reliquit?
14 Cum captivis redemptio negabatur, nos vulgo homines laudabant quod rei publicae nos reservassemus, quod ad consulem Venusiam redissemus et 15 speciem iusti exercitus fecissemus; nunc deteriore condicione sumus quam apud patres nostros fuerunt[1] captivi. Quippe illis arma tantum atque ordo militandi locusque in quo tenderent in castris est mutatus, quae tamen semel navata rei publicae opera et uno
16 felici proelio recuperarunt; nemo eorum relegatus in exilium est, nemini spes emerendi stipendia adempta, hostis denique est datus, cum quo dimicantes aut vitam semel aut ignominiam finirent;
17 nos, quibus, nisi quod commisimus ut quisquam ex Cannensi acie miles Romanus superesset, nihil obici potest, non solum a patria procul Italiaque sed ab

[1] fuerunt J. H. Voss: fuerant P(1).

---

[1] Cf. IX. iv. The following phrase is exaggerated.

army fled; at the Caudine Forks,[1] without even B.C. 212 attempting a battle, the army surrendered its weapons to the enemy, not to mention other shameful defeats of armies. But so far were men from devising any disgrace for those armies that the city of Rome was recovered by the army which had fled from the Allia over to Veii, and the Caudine legions, which had returned to Rome without their arms, were sent back armed into Samnium and sent under the yoke that same enemy who had exulted in a disgrace now their own. But at Cannae can any one accuse the army of panic and fright, where more than fifty thousand men fell, whence the consul fled with seventy horsemen, and of which no one survives except the man whom the enemy, tired of slaying, spared? At the time when ransom was refused to captives, men were everywhere praising us because we had saved ourselves for the state, had returned to the consul at Venusia and had formed the semblance of a regular army. But now we are in a worse situation than in our fathers' time were captives. For in their case only their arms and their rank and the position of their tents when in camp were changed. These, however, they recovered by a single service rendered to the state and one victory. Not one of them was sent into exile, not one of them was deprived of the hope of serving out his term; in fine they were given an enemy, so that in battle with him they might once for all end either life or disgrace. But we, against whom no charge can be brought except that we are to blame for the survival of any Roman soldier from the battle-line at Cannae, have been sent far away, not only from our native city and Italy, but also from the enemy, that there

A.U.C. 512

18 hoste etiam relegati sumus, ubi senescamus in exilio, ne qua spes, ne qua occasio abolendae ignominiae, ne qua placandae civium irae, ne qua denique bene moriendi sit. Neque ignominiae finem nec virtutis praemium petimus: modo experiri animum et virtutem exercere liceat. Laborem et periculum petimus, ut virorum, ut militum officio fungamur. Bellum in Sicilia iam alterum annum ingenti dimicatione geritur; urbes alias Poenus, alias Romanus expugnat; peditum, equitum acies concurrunt; ad Syracusas terra marique geritur res; clamorem pugnantium crepitumque armorum exaudimus resides ipsi ac segnes, tamquam nec manus nec arma habeamus. Servorum legionibus Ti. Sempronius consul totiens iam cum hoste signis conlatis pugnavit; operae pretium habent libertatem civitatemque. Pro servis saltem ad hoc bellum emptis vobis simus; congredi cum hoste liceat et pugnando quaerere libertatem. Vis tu mari, vis terra, vis acie, vis urbibus oppugnandis experiri virtutem? Asperrima quaeque ad laborem periculumque deposcimus, ut quod ad Cannas faciundum fuit quam primum fiat, quoniam, quidquid postea viximus,[1] id omne destinatum ignominiae est."

VII. Sub haec dicta ad genua Marcelli procubuerunt. Marcellus id nec iuris nec potestatis suae esse dixit; senatui scripturum se omniaque de sententia patrum facturum esse. Eae litterae ad novos consules allatae ac per eos in senatu recitatae sunt, consultusque de iis litteris ita decrevit senatus:

[1] viximus P(1): vivimus Luchs: vixerimus Harant.

---

[1] XXIV. xvi. 9.

we may grow old in exile, that we may have no hope, B.C. 212 no opportunity of wiping out disgrace, none of appeasing the anger of our citizens, none even of dying bravely. It is neither an end of our disgrace nor a reward for our courage that we ask. Only let us prove our spirit and put our courage into practice. It is for hardship and danger we are asking, that we may do the duty of men and soldiers. The war in Sicily has now been carried on with intensity for two years. Some cities are being stormed by the Carthaginian, some by the Roman. Infantry and cavalry clash in battle-line. At Syracuse the war goes on by land and by sea. The cries of men in battle and the din of arms can be heard by us, who are ourselves unemployed and listless, as if we had neither hands nor weapons. With legions of slaves Tiberius Sempronius, the consul, has engaged the enemy again and again in battle formation. As a reward for their service they have freedom [1] and citizenship. Reckon us at least slaves purchased for this war; let us engage the enemy and by fighting earn freedom. Do you wish, sir, to test our courage on sea, on land, in battle-line, in besieging cities? We demand all the worst in hardship and danger, in order that what should have been done at Cannae be done as soon as possible, since every day that we have since lived has been marked for disgrace."

VII. At the close of this speech they fell at Marcellus' knees. Marcellus said the matter was neither within his competence nor his authority; he would write to the senate and do everything according to the opinion of the fathers. The letter was delivered to the new consuls and by them read in the senate. And after discussion of the letter the senate decreed militibus, qui ad Cannas commilitones suos pugnantis deseruissent, senatum nihil videre cur res publica committenda esset. Si M. Claudio proconsuli aliter videretur, faceret quod e re publica fideque sua duceret, dum ne quis eorum munere vacaret neu dono militari virtutis ergo donaretur neu in Italiam reportaretur donec hostis in terra Italia esset.

A.U.C. 512

Comitia deinde a praetore urbano de senatus sententia plebique scitu sunt habita, quibus creati sunt quinqueviri muris turribus[1] reficiendis, et triumviri bini, uni sacris conquirendis donisque persignandis, alteri reficiendis aedibus Fortunae et matris Matutae[2] intra portam Carmentalem et Spei extra portam, quae priore anno incendio consumptae fuerant.

Tempestates foedae fuere; in Albano monte biduum continenter lapidibus pluvit. Tecta de caelo multa, duae in Capitolio aedes, vallum in castris multis locis supra Sucssulam, et duo vigiles exanimati; murus turresque quaedam Cumis non ictae modo fulminibus sed etiam decussae. Reate saxum ingens visum volitare, sol rubere solito magis sanguineoque similis. Horum prodigiorum causa diem unum supplicatio fuit, et per aliquot dies consules rebus divinis operam dederunt, et per eosdem dies sacrum novemdiale fuit.

Cum Tarentinorum defectio iam diu et in spe

[1] turribus P(1): et turribus Weissenborn: turribusque A^{ν}.
[2] Matutae z: om. P(1).

---

[1] Cf. XXIV. xlvii. 15 f.

as follows: that to soldiers who had deserted their B.C. 212 comrades in battle at Cannae the senate saw no reason why the welfare of the state should be entrusted. If Marcus Claudius, the proconsul, should take a different view, he should do what he thought to accord with the interest of the state and his own conscience, provided that no one of them should be exempt from duties, or be decorated for valour, or be brought back to Italy, so long as the enemy should be in the land of Italy.

Elections were then held by the praetor urbanus in accordance with a decision of the senate and a plebiscite, and at these there were elected five commissioners for the restoration of the walls and towers, and two boards of three, one to recover sacred vessels and register temple gifts, the other to rebuild the Temple of Fortune and that of Mater Matuta inside Porta Carmentalis, and that of Hope outside the gate—temples that had been destroyed by fire the preceding year.[1]

There were terrible storms; on the Alban Mount it rained stones steadily for two days. Many things were struck by lightning: two temples on the Capitol, the embankment of the camp above Suessula in many places, and two sentries were killed. At Cumae the wall and certain towers were not merely struck by the bolts but even thrown down. At Reate a huge stone seemed to fly, the sun to be redder than usual and of a bloody colour. On account of these prodigies there was a single day of prayer, and for several days the consuls devoted themselves to religious rites; and about the same time there was a nine days' observance.

While a revolt of the Tarentines had long been

A.U.C. 512

Hannibali et in suspicione Romanis esset, causa forte
11 extrinsecus maturandae eius intervenit. Phileas Tarentinus diu iam per speciem legationis Romae cum esset, vir inquieti animi et minime otium, quo tum diutino senescere videbatur, patientis, aditum sibi ad obsides Tarentinos et Thurinos [1] invenit.
12 Custodiebantur in atrio Libertatis minore cura, quia nec ipsis nec civitatibus eorum fallere Romanos 13 expediebat. Hos crebris conloquiis sollicitatos corruptis adcdituis duobus cum primis tenebris custodia eduxisset, ipse comes occulti itineris factus profugit. Luce prima volgata per urbem fuga est, missique qui sequerentur ab Tarracina comprensos omnis retraxerunt. Deducti in comitium virgisque adprobante populo caesi de saxo deiciuntur.

VIII. Huius atrocitas poenae duarum nobilissimarum in Italia Graecarum civitatium animos
2 inritavit cum publice, tum etiam singulos privatim, ut quisque tam foede interemptos aut propinquitate
3 aut amicitia contingebat. Ex iis tredecim fere nobiles iuvenes Tarentini coniuraverunt, quorum
4 principes Nico et Philemenus erant. Hi priusquam aliquid moverent, conloquendum cum Hannibale rati, nocte per speciem venandi urbe egressi ad eum
5 proficiscuntur. Et cum haud procul castris abessent, ceteri silva prope viam sese occuluerunt, Nico et

[1] Tarentinos et Thurinos Heusinger : Thurinos P (cf. viii. 1) : Tarentinos P^1?(1).

---

[1] As in XXIV. xx. 6.

hoped for by Hannibal and suspected by the Romans, B.C. 212
a reason for expediting the same happened to come from without. Phileas of Tarentum, a man of restless spirit and quite unable to endure the long inactivity in which he seemed to be losing his powers, had been at Rome for a long time, nominally as an ambassador. Thus he found means of access to the hostages from Tarentum and Thurii. They were kept under guard in the Atrium Libertatis, with less watchfulness because it was to the interest neither of the hostages themselves nor of their states to outwit the Romans. Phileas worked upon them by frequent conferences, and after bribing two temple-wardens brought them out of confinement at night-fall. Then he himself fled, sharing their secret journey. At daybreak their flight was reported everywhere in the city, and the men sent to pursue them arrested and brought them all back from Tarracina. They were led into the Comitium, scourged with rods with the approval of the people, and thrown down from the Rock.[1]

VIII. The relentlessness of this punishment outraged two of the most important Greek cities in Italy, both as states and personally as well, whenever individuals were connected either by relationship or friendship with those who were so cruelly executed. Of those so connected some thirteen noble youths of Tarentum formed a conspiracy, and Nico and Philemenus were the leaders. Thinking that they ought to confer with Hannibal before taking any step, these men left the city by night under pretext of hunting and set out to go to him. And when they were not far from his camp, the rest concealed themselves in the woods near the road; but Nico

A.U.C. 512

Philemenus progressi ad stationes comprehensique, ultro id petentes, ad Hannibalem deducti sunt. 6 Qui cum et causas consilii sui et quid pararent exposuissent, conlaudati oneratique promissis iubentur, ut fidem popularibus facerent praedandi causa se urbe egressos, pecora Carthaginiensium, quae pastum propulsa essent, ad urbem agere; tuto ac 7 sine certamine id facturos promissum est. Conspecta ea praeda invenum est, minusque iterum ac 8 saepius id eos audere miraculo fuit. Congressi cum Hannibale rursus fide sanxerunt liberos Tarentinos leges suas [1] suaque omnia habituros neque ullum vectigal Poeno pensuros praesidiumve invitos recepturos; prodita hospitia Romanorum cum [2] praesidio Carthaginiensium fore. Haec ubi convenerunt, 9 tunc vero Philemenus consuetudinem nocte egrediundi redeundique in urbem frequentiorem facere. Et erat venandi studio insignis, canesque et alius 10 apparatus sequebatur; captumque ferme aliquid aut ab hoste ex praeparato adlatum reportans donabat aut praefecto aut custodibus portarum. Nocte maxime commeare propter metum hostium credebant.

11 Ubi iam eo consuetudinis adducta res est ut, quocumque noctis tempore sibilo dedisset signum, porta aperiretur, tempus agendae rei Hannibali 12 visum est. Tridui viam aberat; ubi, quo minus

[1] suas Wesenberg: om. P(1).

[2] hospitia Romanorum cum Weissenborn, Conway: om. P(1), a lost line: various emendations.

and Philemenus advanced to the outposts, were B.C. 212 seized and at their own request brought before Hannibal. After explaining the reasons for their plan and what they were plotting, they were warmly commended and loaded with promises. In order to make their fellow-citizens believe they had left the city to forage, they were bidden to drive to the city cattle belonging to the Carthaginians which had been turned out to graze. Promise was given that they would do so in safety and without a conflict. The young men's booty attracted attention, and less astonishment was caused by their making the same venture again and again. On meeting Hannibal again they had his formal assurance that the Tarentines as free men should have their own laws and all their possessions, and pay no tribute to the Carthaginians nor admit a garrison against their own wish; that houses occupied by Romans should be handed over, together with the garrison, and be assigned to the Carthaginians. So much agreed upon, Philemenus thereafter made it his more constant habit to leave the city and return to it by night. In fact he was noted for his devotion to the chase, and his hounds and other equipment would follow him. Usually he carried back something he had taken or that the enemy had brought him by agreement, and he would give it either to the commandant or to the gate-guards. They believed that he came and went preferably by night for fear of the enemy.

When the thing had become so habitual that the gate was opened at whatever hour of the night he gave the signal by a whistle, it seemed to Hannibal to be the time for action. He was at a distance of three days' march, and there he played the invalid, that his

A.U.C. 542

mirum esset uno eodemque loco stativa eum tam diu 13 habere, aegrum simulabat. Romanis quoque qui in praesidio Tarenti erant suspecta esse tam[1] segnis mora eius desierat. IX. Ceterum postquam Tarentum ire constituit, decem milibus peditum atque equitum, quos in expeditionem velocitate corporum ac levitate armorum aptissimos esse ratus est,
2 electis, quarta vigilia noctis signa movit, praemissisque octoginta fere Numidis equitibus praecepit ut discurrerent circa vias perlustrarentque omnia oculis, ne quis agrestium procul spectator agminis
3 falleret; praegressos retraherent, obvios occiderent, ut praedonum magis quam exercitus accolis species esset. Ipse raptim agmine acto quindecim ferme
4 milium spatio castra ab Tarento posuit, et ne ibi quidem denuntiato[2] quo pergerent, tantum convocatos milites monuit via omnes irent nec deverti quemquam aut excedere ordine agminis paterentur, et in primis intenti ad imperia accipienda essent neu quid nisi ducum iussu facerent; se in tempore edituru
5 rum quae vellet agi. Eadem ferme hora Tarentum fama praevenerat Numidas equites paucos populari
6 agros terroremque late agrestibus iniecisse. Ad quem nuntium nihil ultra motus praefectus Romanus quam ut partem equitum postero die luce prima iuberet exire ad arcendum populationibus hostem;
7 in cetera adeo nihil ab eo intenta cura est ut contra

[1] tam Madvig : iam P(2) : om. Ax.
[2] denuntiato Madvig : nuntiato P(1).

keeping a fixed camp so long in one and the same B.C. 212 place might cause less wonder. The Romans also on garrison duty at Tarentum had ceased to find such prolonged inaction suspicious. IX. Once he had determined, however, to go to Tarentum, he picked ten thousand infantry and cavalry—the men whom he thought best suited to the enterprise on account of swiftness of foot and lightness of arms —and at the fourth watch of the night got in motion. And he ordered some eighty Numidian horsemen, who were sent in advance, to scour the country near the roads and keep an eye in every direction, that no farmer in the distance might observe the column without being noticed. They were to hold up those ahead of them and slay those they met, so that people living near by might have the impression of foragers rather than of an army. He himself, after a forced march, pitched camp at a distance of about fifteen miles from Tarentum. And not even there did he announce whither they were going. He merely summoned the soldiers and bade them all to keep to the road and not allow anyone to turn aside or leave his place in the column; and to be especially alert to hear commands and not to do anything without orders from their officers. He would in due time inform them what he wished to have done. About the same hour a rumour had preceded him to Tarentum that a few Numidian horsemen were ravaging the farms and had inspired widespread alarm among the rustics. On receiving this news the Roman commandant was only so far aroused as to command part of the cavalry to go out the next day at dawn, in order to prevent depredations of the enemy. For the rest his attention was so little aroused that pro argumento fuerit illa procursatio Numidarum Hannibalem exercitumque e castris non movisse.

A.U.C. 542

8 Hannibal concubia nocte movit. Dux Philemenus erat cum solito captae venationis onere; ceteri proditores ea quae composita erant expectabant. 9 Convenerat autem ut Philemenus portula adsueta venationem inferens armatos induceret, parte alia 10 portam Temenitida adiret Hannibal. Ea mediterranea regio est orientem spectans; busta [1] aliquantum intra moenia ineludunt. Cum portae adpropinquaret, editus ex composito ignis ab Hannibale est refulsitque idem redditum ab Nicone signum; 11 extinctae deinde utrimque flammae sunt. Hannibal silentio ducebat ad portam. Nico ex improviso adortus sopitos vigiles in cubilibus suis obtruncat 12 portamque aperit. Hannibal cum peditum agmine ingreditur, equites subsistere iubet, ut quo res 13 postulet occurrere libero campo possent. Et Philemenus portulae parte alia, qua commeare adsuerat, adpropinquabat. Nota vox eius et familiare iam signum cum excitasset vigilem, dicenti [2] vix sustineri 14 grandis bestiae onus portula aperitur. Inferentes aprum duos invenes secutus ipse cum expedito venatore vigilem, incautius miraculo magnitudinis in 15 eos qui ferebant versum venabulo traicit. Ingressi deinde triginta fere armati ceteros vigiles obtruncant

[1] spectans; busta Ussing: spectabest P (-bast $P^{1?}$): spectabat (1).

[2] dicenti x: dicente P(1).

---

[1] I.e. at the time of the first sound sleep, not yet intempesta nocte (toward midnight); Cicero de Div. I. 57; Macrobius I. iii. 15.

on the contrary the raid of the Numidians was to B.C. 212 him a proof that Hannibal and the army had not stirred from their camp.

Hannibal broke camp early in the night.[1] His guide was Philemenus with his usual load of game. The rest of the traitors were waiting for acts previously arranged. It had been agreed, namely, that Philemenus, as he brought in his game by the usual postern, should lead in armed men, while on another side Hannibal should approach the Temenitis Gate. That quarter is toward the inland, facing east; tombs occupy a considerable space inside the walls. As he approached the gate the fire signal was given by Hannibal according to agreement, and in reply from Nico the same signal blazed; then on both sides the flames were extinguished. Hannibal was leading his men silently to the gate. Nico unexpectedly attacks the sleeping sentries in their beds, slays them and opens the gate. Hannibal with his infantry column enters, orders the cavalry to halt, so that they can meet the enemy in the open, in whatever direction the situation may require. And Philemenus on another side of the city was approaching the postern by which he was accustomed to come and go. His well-known voice and the now familiar signal having aroused a sentry, the little gate was opened for Philemenus, just as he was saying they could scarcely carry the weight of a huge beast. While two young men were carrying in the boar, he himself followed them with a huntsman who was unencumbered, and as the sentry, thrown off his guard by its marvellous size, faced the men who were carrying it, Philemenus ran him through with a hunting spear. Then about thirty armed men refringuntque portam proximam, et agmen sub signis confestim inrupit. Inde cum silentio in forum 16 ducti Hannibali sese coniunxerunt. Tum duo milia Gallorum Poenus in tres divisa partis per urbem dimittit; Tarentinos iis addit duces binos[1]; itinera 17 quam maxume frequentia occupari iubet, tumultu orto Romanos passim caedi, oppidanis parci. Sed ut fieri id posset, praecipit iuvenibus Tarentinis ut, ubi quem suorum procul vidissent, quiescere ac silere ac bono animo esse iuberent.

A.U.C. 542

X. Iam tumultus erat clamorque qualis esse in capta urbe solet; sed quid rei esset nemo satis pro
2 certo scire. Tarentini Romanos ad diripiendam urbem credere coortos; Romanis seditio aliqua cum
3 fraude videri ab oppidanis mota. Praefectus primo excitatus tumultu in portum effugit; inde acceptus
4 scapha in arcem circumvehitur. Errorem et tuba audita ex theatro faciebat; nam et Romana erat, a proditoribus ad hoc ipsum praeparata, et inscienter a Graeco inflata quis aut quibus signum daret incertum
5 efficiebat. Ubi inluxit, et Romanis Punica et Gallica arma cognita dubitationem exemerunt, et Graeci Romanos passim caede stratos cernentes, ab Hanni-
6 bale captam urbem senserunt. Postquam lux certior erat et Romani qui caedibus superfuerant in arcem

[1] iis addit duces binos Böttcher: om. P(1), a lost line restored from Polybius VIII. xxx (xxxii). 1.

entered, cut down the rest of the sentries and broke B.C. 212 open the neighbouring gate; and the column with its standards at once rushed in. Thence they were marched in silence to the market-place and joined Hannibal. The Carthaginian then sent two thousand Gauls, divided into three units, through the city, and to each he attached two Tarentines as guides. He ordered them to occupy the most frequented streets, and when the uproar had begun, to slay the Romans everywhere, to spare the townspeople. But to make this possible he instructed the young Tarentines, whenever they saw one of their own people in the distance, to bid him be quiet and say nothing and be of good cheer.

X. Already there was such uproar and shouting as is usual in a captured city, but what it was about no one quite knew for certain. The Tarentines believed the Romans had surprised them, in order to plunder the city; the Romans thought it was some kind of uprising treacherously started by the townspeople. The commandant, aroused by the first uproar, escaped to the harbour; picked up by a skiff, he was rowed around from there to the citadel. Confusion was caused also by the sound of a trumpet from the theatre. For it was a Roman trumpet, furnished by the traitors for this very purpose; and in addition, being unskillfully sounded by a Greek, it left it uncertain who was giving the signal and to whom. When day broke the Punic and Gallic arms, now recognized, relieved the Romans of their uncertainty, and at the same time the Greeks, seeing slain Romans everywhere, were aware that the city had been captured by Hannibal. When it was no longer twilight and the Romans who survived the slaughter confugerant conticiscebatque paulatim tumultus, tum Hannibal Tarentinos sine armis convocare iubet. 7 Convenere omnes, praeterquam qui cedentis in arcem Romanos ad omnem adeundam simul fortu- 8 nam persecuti fuerant. Ibi Hannibal benigne adlocutus Tarentinos testatusque quae praestitisset civibus eorum quos ad Trasumennum aut ad Cannas 9 cepisset, simul in dominationem superbam Romanorum invectus, recipere se in domos suas quemque iussit et foribus nomen suum inscribere; se domos eas quae inscriptae non essent signo extemplo dato diripi iussurum: si quis in hospitio civis Romani—vacuas autem tenebant domos—nomen inscripsisset, 10 eum se pro hoste habiturum. Contione dimissa cum titulis notatae fores discrimen pacatae ab hostili domo fecissent, signo dato ad diripienda hospitia Romana passim discursum est; et fuit praedae aliquantum.

A.U.C. 542

XI. Postero die ad oppugnandam arcem ducit; quam cum et a mari, quo in paene insulae modum pars maior circumluitur, praealtis rupibus et ab ipsa urbe muro et fossa ingenti saeptam videret eoque 2 nec vi nec operibus expugnabilem esse, ne aut se ipsum cura tuendi Tarentinos a maioribus rebus moraretur, aut in relictos sine valido praesidio Tarentinos impetum ex arce, cum vellent, Romani facerent, vallo urbem ab arce intersaepire statuit, had fled to the citadel, and the uproar was gradually B.C. 212 being stilled, Hannibal then gave orders to summon the Tarentines without arms. They all assembled, except those who had followed the Romans in their retreat to the citadel, to share with them any outcome. Thereupon Hannibal had kind words for the Tarentines and called to mind what he had done for their fellow-citizens whom he had captured at the Trasumennus or at Cannae. At the same time he inveighed against the haughty rule of the Romans and ordered them to go each to his own house and to write his name on the door.[1] He would order that at a given signal such houses as were not marked should at once be plundered. If any one should write his name on the quarters of a Roman citizen —now they were occupying vacant houses—he would regard such a man as an enemy. After the assembly had been dismissed and the marking of doors had distinguished the house of a citizen from that of an enemy, the signal was given and they scattered in all directions to plunder the Roman dwellings; and the booty was considerable.

[1] According to Polybius the legend was to be simply Ταραντίνου; VIII. xxxi. 4.

XI. On the next day he led his men to an attack upon the citadel. He saw that not only was this defended by very high cliffs on the side towards the sea, which surrounds the larger part of it as a peninsula, but on the side toward the city itself by a wall and a great fosse, and hence could not be taken by assault nor by siege-works. Accordingly, to avoid either keeping himself from larger operations in his effort to protect the Tarentines, or else letting the Romans, whenever they pleased, make an attack from the citadel upon the Tarentines if he left them without a strong garrison, he decided to wall off

A.U.C. 512

3 non sine illa etiam spe, cum prohibentibus opus Romanis manum posse conseri et, si ferocius procucurrissent, magna caede ita attenuari praesidii vires, ut facile per se ipsi Tarentini urbem ab iis tueri
4 possent. Ubi coeptum opus est, patefacta repente porta impetum in munientis fecerunt Romani pellique se statio passa est quae pro opere erat, ut sueeessu cresceret audacia pluresque et longius pulsos perse-
5 querentur. Tum signo dato coorti undique Poeni sunt, quos instructos ad hoc Hannibal tenuerat. Nec sustinuere impetum Romani, sed ab effusa fuga loci angustiae eos impeditaque alia opere iam coepto, 6 alia apparatu operis morabantur. Plurimi in fossam praecipitavere, occisique sunt plures in fuga quam in 7 pugna. Inde et[1] opus nullo prohibente fieri coeptum: fossa ingens ducta, et vallum intra eam erigitur, modicoque post intervallo murum etiam eadem regione addere parat, ut vel sine praesidio tueri se 8 adversus Romanos possent. Reliquit tamen modicum praesidium, simul ut in perficiendo muro adiuvaret. Ipse profectus cum ceteris copiis ad Galaesum flumen—quinque milia ab urbe abest—posuit castra.

9 Ex his stativis regressus ad inspiciendum, quod opus aliquantum opinione eius celerius creverat,

[1] Inde et P(1): inde Madvig.

the city from the citadel by an earthwork. He was B.C. 212 not without the hope also that he could engage the Romans if they tried to prevent the work, and that, if they should make a furious sally, the strength of the garrison would be so reduced by serious losses that the Tarentines by themselves could easily defend the city against them. After fortification began, a gate was suddenly opened and the Romans made an attack upon the men at work. And the outpost stationed in advance of the work allowed itself to be driven back, that boldness might grow with success and a larger number might pursue the repulsed and to a greater distance. Then at a given signal the Carthaginians, whom Hannibal had kept drawn up for this purpose, rose up on all sides. And the Romans did not withstand the attack, but limited space and ground obstructed partly by the work already begun, partly by preparations for the work, kept them from a disorderly flight. Very many leaped into the fosse, and more were slain in flight than in battle. Then even fortification began to proceed, with no one attempting to prevent. A great fosse was carried along, and inside of it an earthwork was raised; and at a short distance he prepared to add a stone wall likewise in the same direction, so that even without a garrison they could protect themselves against the Romans. He did, however, leave a garrison of moderate size, to aid as well in the completion of the wall. He himself set out with the rest of his forces and pitched camp at the river Galaesus, which is five miles from the city.

On returning from this permanent camp to inspect, inasmuch as the work had progressed with considerably more speed than he had anticipated, he spem cepit etiam arcem expugnari posse. Et est non altitudine, ut ceterae,[1] tuta, sed loco plano posita 10 et ab urbe muro tantum ac fossa divisa. Cum iam machinationum omni genere et operibus oppugnaretur, missum a Metaponto praesidium Romanis fecit animum ut nocte ex improviso opera hostium invaderent. Alia disiecerunt, alia igni corruperunt, isque finis Hannibali fuit ea parte arcem oppugnandi.

A.U.C. 542

11 Reliqua erat in obsidione spes, nec ea satis efficax, quia arcem tenentes, quae in paene insula posita imminet faucibus portus, mare liberum habebant, urbs contra exclusa maritimis commeatibus propiusque in-12 opiam erant obsidentes quam obsessi. Hannibal convocatis principibus Tarentinis omnes praesentis difficultates exposuit: neque arcis tam munitae expugnandae cernere viam neque in obsidione quicquam habere spei, donec mari hostes potiantur;
13 quod si naves sint, quibus commeatus invehi prohibeat, extemplo aut arce cessuros [2] aut dedituros se
14 hostis. Adsentiebantur Tarentini; ceterum ei qui consilium adferret opem quoque in eam rem adferen-
15 dam censebant esse. Punicas enim naves ex Sicilia accitas id posse facere; suas, quae sinu exiguo intus inclusae essent, cum claustra portus hostis haberet, quem ad modum inde in apertum mare evasuras?
16 "Evadent" inquit Hannibal; "multa quae impedita natura sunt consilio expediuntur. Urbem in campo

[1] ceterae Crévier: cetera P(1).
[2] arce cessuros Gronovius: arcessuros P(1): abscessuros A^2.

---

[1] According to Strabo VI. iii. 1 the only elevation of any consequence was the citadel.
[2] The mouth of the harbour was closed, as Strabo (l.c.) says, by a large bridge.

hoped that the citadel also could be taken by storm. B.C. 212
And it is not defended by height,[1] as other citadels are, but is on level ground and separated from the city merely by a wall and a fosse. While the attack was now in progress with engines of every kind and with siege-works, a garrison sent from Metapontum encouraged the Romans to make a surprise attack by night upon the works of the enemy. Some of these they pulled apart, others they ruined by fire; and this was the end of Hannibal's attack upon the citadel from that side. His remaining hope was in a blockade, and that was not very effectual, because the occupants of the citadel, which is situated on a peninsula and commands the harbour mouth, had the sea at their disposal, while the city on the other hand was shut off from supplies by sea and the besiegers were nearer to starvation than the besieged. Hannibal summoned the leading men of Tarentum and laid before them all the difficulties of the situation, saying that he neither saw a way to take so well fortified a citadel by storm, nor had any hope in a blockade, so long as the enemy had command of the sea. But if he should have ships with which to prevent the bringing in of supplies, the enemy would at once either withdraw from the citadel or surrender. The Tarentines assented, but thought that the giver of advice must give aid also to carry it out. For Carthaginian ships, summoned from Sicily, they said, could do it. As for their own ships, which were shut up inside a very small bay, while the enemy held the key to the harbour,[2] how were they to get out into the open sea? "They will get out", said Hannibal; "many things which are naturally difficult are solved by ingenuity. You have a city

A.U.C. 542 sitam habetis; planae et satis latae viae patent in 17 omnis partis. Via quae e portu per mediam urbem ad mare transmissa est plaustris transveham naves haud magna mole, et mare nostrum erit, quo nunc hostes potiuntur, et illinc mari, hinc terra circumsedebimus aream; immo brevi aut relictam ab hostibus
18 aut cum ipsis hostibus capiemus." Haec oratio non spem modo effectus sed ingentem etiam ducis admirationem fecit. Contracta extemplo undique plaustra iunctaque inter se, et machinae ad subducendas naves admotae, munitumque iter, quo faciliora plaustra minorque moles in transitu esset.
19 Iumenta inde et homines contracti et opus impigre coeptum; paucosque post dies classis instructa ac parata circumvehitur aream et ante os ipsum portus 20 ancoras iacit. Hunc statum rerum Hannibal Tarenti relinquit regressus ipse in hiberna. Ceterum defectio Tarentinorum utrum priore anno an hoc facta sit, in diversum auctores trahunt; plures propioresque aetate memoriae rerum hoc anno factam tradunt.

XII. Romae consules praetoresque usque ad ante
2 diem quintum kal. Maias Latinae tenuerunt. Eo die perpetrato sacro in monte in suas quisque provincias proficiscuntur. Religio deinde nova obiecta est ex
3 carminibus Marcianis. Vates hic Marcius inlustris fuerat, et cum conquisitio priore anno ex senatus con-

---

[1] That 213 B.C. was the correct date for their defection is shown by XXVII. xxv. 4.

[2] Mons Albanus (Monte Cavo), where a sacrifice on the fourth day brought the festival to an end.

situated in a plain. Level streets of ample breadth B.C. 212 lead in all directions. Along the street that is carried across from the harbour through the centre of the city to the sea I shall transport ships on wagons with no great difficulty, and the sea, which the enemy now possess, will be ours, and we shall besiege the citadel on that side by sea, on this side by land; or rather we shall soon either take it, abandoned by the enemy, or take it enemy and all." This speech produced not merely the hope of success, but great admiration for the general as well. At once wagons were assembled from everywhere and joined together, and the tackle brought to draw up the ships, and the roadway paved, that the wagons might be easier to move, and the difficulty of transport lessened. Then mules and men were brought together and the work was begun with energy. And so a few days later a fleet furnished and equipped sailed around the citadel and cast anchor at the very mouth of the harbour. Such was the state of things which Hannibal left at Tarentum when he himself returned to his winter quarters. But whether the rebellion of the Tarentines took place in the previous year or in this year, authorities differ.[1] More of them and those nearer in time to men who remembered the events relate that it occurred in this year.

XII. At Rome the consuls and praetors were detained by the Latin festival until the 26th of April. After performing the rites on that day on the Mount,[2] each set out for his assignment. Then fresh religious scruples were aroused by the verses of Marcius. A noted seer had been this Marcius, and when in the preceding year search was being made by decree of the senate for such books, they had come

A.U.C. 542

sulto talium librorum fieret, in M. Aemili praetoris 4 urbani,[1] qui eam rem agebat, manus venerant. Is protinus novo praetori Sullae tradiderat. Ex huius Marcii duobus carminibus alterius post rem actam[2] editi comprobata[3] auctoritas eventu alteri quoque, cuius nondum tempus venerat, adferebat fidem.
5 Priore carmine Cannensis praedicta clades in haec fere verba erat: "Amnem, Troiugena,[4] fuge Cannam, ne te alienigenae cogant in campo Diomedis
6 conserere manus. Sed neque credes tu mihi, donec compleris sanguine campum, multaque milia occisa tua deferet amnis in pontum magnum ex terra frugifera; piscibus atque avibus ferisque quae incolunt terras iis fuat esca caro tua. Nam mihi ita
7 Iuppiter fatus est." Et Diomedis Argivi campos et Cannam flumen ii qui militaverant in iis locis iuxta
8 atque ipsam cladem agnoscebant. Tum alterum carmen recitatum, non eo tantum obscurius quia incertiora futura praeteritis sunt, sed perplexius
9 etiam scripturae genere. "Hostis, Romani, si expellere[5] vultis, vomicam[6] quae gentium venit longe, Apollini vovendos censeo ludos, qui quotannis comiter Apollini fiant; cum populus dederit ex publico partem, privati uti conferant pro se atque
10 suis; iis ludis faciendis praeerit[7] praetor is qui ius

[1] urbani Sigonius: urbem P(4): urb' (or -bis) $C^4M^{1?}BDA$: rejected by Walters.

[2] actam CA^y: acta P(10): factam Madvig.

[3] comprobata Ussing: cumrato P(4): curato BDA: comperto Walters.

[4] Troiugena G. Hermann: -nam P(1), adding romanae, probably a gloss.

[5] expellere P(1): ex agro expellere Macrobius I. xvii. 28.

[6] vomicam A Macrobius: vomica P(2).

[7] praeerit $CM^1B^xA^x$: praeterit P(10): praesit Macrobius.

into the hands of Marcus Aemilius,[1] the praetor urbanus, who was in charge of the matter. He had immediately turned them over to the new praetor, Sulla. Of the two propheeies[2] of this Marcius the authority of one, made known after the event, was confirmed by the outeome and lent eredibility to the other also, whose time had not yet come. In the earlier propheey the disaster at Cannae had been predicted in such terms as these: "Flee the river Canna, thou deseendant of Troy, that foreigners may not eompel thee to do battle in the Plain of Diomed. But thou wilt not believe me until thou hast filled the plain with blood, and many thousands of thy slain will the river bear from the fruitful land down to the great sea. To fishes and birds and beasts that dwell on the land thy flesh shall be meat. For thus hath Jupiter declared to me." And those who had fought in that region reeognized the plains of the Argive Diomed and the river Canna no less than the disaster itself. Then the seeond propheey was read, being not only more obseure beeause the future is more uncertain than the past, but more difficult also in the way it was written. "If you wish, Romans, to drive out enemies, the sore which has eome from afar, I propose that a festival be vowed to Apollo, to be observed with good cheer in honour of Apollo every year. When the people shall have given a part out of the treasury, private citizens shall contribute on their own behalf and that of their families. In charge of the conduct of that festival shall be the praetor who is then chief judge for the people and B.C. 212

[1] For the error cf. note on i. 11.

[2] The rough hexameters (probably translated from the Greek) had been reduced to prose.

A.U.C. 542

populo plebeique dabit summum; decemviri Graeco ritu hostiis sacra faciant. Hoc si recte facietis, gaudebitis semper fietque res vestra melior; nam is deum [1] extinguet perduellis vestros qui vestros 11 campos pascit placide." Ad id carmen explanandum [2] diem unum sumpserunt; postero die senatus consultum factum est ut decemviri [3] de ludis Apollini
12 reque divina facienda inspicerent. Ea cum inspecta relataque ad senatum essent, censuerunt patres Apollini ludos vovendos faciendosque et, quando ludi facti essent, duodecim milia aeris praetori ad
13 rem divinam et duas hostias maiores dandas. Alterum senatus consultum factum est ut decemviri sacrum Graeco ritu facerent hisque hostiis, Apollini bove aurato et capris duabus albis auratis, Latonae
14 bove femina aurata. Ludos praetor in circo maximo cum facturus esset, edixit ut populus per eos ludos stipem Apollini, quantam commodum esset, con-
15 ferret. Haec est origo ludorum Apollinarium, victoriae, non valetudinis ergo, ut plerique rentur, votorum factorumque. Populus coronatus spectavit, matronae supplicavere; vulgo apertis ianuis in propatulo [4] epulati sunt, celeberque dies omni caerimoniarum genere fuit.

XIII. Cum Hannibal circa Tarentum, consules

[1] deum Riemann (or divum) : dium $P(1)$: divus x Macrobius.
[2] explanandum $P^2(1)$ Madvig : expiandum P Walters.
[3] decemviri $P(1)$: decemviri libros z Macrobius.
[4] propatulo A : -lis $P(2)$.

[1] 'I.e. the decemviri sacris faciundis, charged with the oversight of sacrifices.

[2] The libri Sibyllini, of which the decemvirs were the custodians and authorized interpreters, but could not refer to them unless empowered by a decree of the senate.

the commons. The decemvirs[1] shall offer the victims B.C. 212 according to Greek rite. If ye will do this rightly ye shall forever rejoice, and your state will change for the better. For that god who graciously nurtures your meadows will destroy your enemies." For the interpretation of the prophecy they took one day. On the next day the senate made a decree that in regard to the festival to be held and the sacrifices in honour of Apollo the decemvirs should consult the books.[2] Those passages having been consulted and reported to the senate, the fathers voted that a festival should be vowed and held in honour of Apollo, and after the festival had been held the sum of twelve thousand asses should be given to the praetor for the ceremonies, and two full-grown victims. A second decree of the senate was made, that the decemvirs should offer sacrifice according to Greek rite and with these victims: to Apollo an ox with gilded horns and two white she-goats[3] with gilded horns, to Latona a cow with gilded horns. When the praetor was about to open the festival in the Circus Maximus, he ordered by edict that during that feast the people should make their contribution to Apollo according to their means. Such is the origin of the festival of Apollo, vowed and kept to secure victory, not health, as most think. The people wore garlands at the spectacles, the matrons offered prayers, everybody feasted in the atrium with open doors, and the day was kept with every kind of ceremony.

XIII. While Hannibal was near Tarentum, and

[3] As she-goats would surely be offered to Diana, not to Apollo, there is good reason to believe that her name has been lost from the text, and before Macrobius' time, since he has the same statement; Saturnalia I. xvii. 29.

A.U.C. 542

ambo in Samnio essent, sed circumsessuri Capuam viderentur, quod malum diuturnae obsidionis esse solet, iam famem Campani sentiebant, quia sementem 2 facere prohibuerant eos Romani exercitus. Itaque legatos ad Hannibalem miserunt orantes ut, priusquam consules in agros suos educerent legiones viaeque omnes hostium praesidiis insiderentur, frumentum ex propinquis locis convehi iuberet
3 Capuam. Hannibal Hannonem ex Bruttiis cum exercitu in Campaniam transire et dare operam ut
4 frumenti copia fieret Campanis iussit. Hanno ex Bruttiis profectus cum exercitu, vitabundus castra hostium consulesque, qui in Samnio erant, cum Benevento iam adpropinquaret, tria milia passuum
5 ab ipsa urbe loco edito castra posuit; inde ex sociis circa populis, quo aestate comportatum erat, devehi frumentum in castra iussit praesidiis datis quae
6 commeatus eos prosequerentur. Capuam inde nuntium misit qua die in castris ad accipiendum frumentum praesto essent omni undique genere vehiculorum
7 iumentorumque ex agris contracto. Id pro cetera socordia neglegentiaque a Campanis actum: paulo plus quadringenta vehicula missa et pauca praeterea iumenta. Ob id castigatis ab Hannone quod ne fames quidem, quae mutas accenderet bestias, curam eorum stimulare posset, alia prodicta dies ad frumen-8 tum maiore apparatu petendum. Ea omnia, sicut acta erant, cum enuntiata Beneventanis essent, both consuls were in Samnium but seemed about to B.C. 212 invest Capua, already the Campanians were suffering hunger (the usual hardship of a long investment), because the Roman armies had prevented them from sowing. And so they sent legates to Hannibal, praying that, before the consuls should lead the legions into their lands and all the roads should be blocked by forces of the enemy, he should order grain to be brought from neighbouring places to Capua. Hannibal ordered Hanno to march with his army from the land of the Bruttii over into Campania, and to see to it that the Campanians should have a supply of grain. Hanno set out from the land of the Bruttii with his army, avoided camps of the enemy and the consuls, who were in Samnium, and when he was now nearing Beneventum, pitched camp on high ground three miles from the city itself. Then he ordered grain to be brought into camp from allied peoples of the neighbourhood, among whom it had been garnered in the summer; and he furnished troops to escort the supplies. Then he sent word to Capua, naming a day on which they should appear at the camp to get their grain, after bringing together from the farms on all sides every kind of vehicle and beast of burden. This order was carried out by the Campanians with their usual carelessness and indifference. Little more than four hundred vehicles were sent, and a few beasts of burden besides. For this they were censured by Hanno, that not even hunger, which, as he said, inflames even dumb brutes, could spur their diligence; and another day was assigned for getting their grain with ampler means of transport. When all this was reported, just as it happened, to the Beneventans, they at once

A.U.C. 512

legatos decem extemplo ad consules—circa Bovianum
9 castra Romanorum erant—miserunt. Qui cum auditis quae ad Capuam agerentur inter se comparassent ut alter in Campaniam exercitum duceret, Fulvius, cui ea provincia obvenerat, profectus nocte Bene-
10 venti moenia est ingressus. Ex propinquo cognoscit Hannonem cum exercitus parte profectum frumentatum; per quaestorem Campanis datum frumentum; duo milia plaustrorum, inconditam inermemque aliam turbam advenisse; per tumultum ac trepidationem omnia agi, castrorumque formam et militarem ordinem inmixtis agrestibus et [1] iis externis sublatum.

11 His satis compertis, consul militibus edicit, signa tantum armaque in proximam noctem expedirent;
12 castra Punica oppugnanda esse. Quarta vigilia profecti sarcinis omnibus impedimentisque Beneventi relictis, paulo ante lucem cum ad castra pervenissent, tantum pavoris iniecerunt ut, si in plano castra posita essent, haud dubie primo impetu capi potuerint.
13 Altitudo loci et munimenta defendere,[2] quae nulla ex parte adiri nisi arduo ac difficili ascensu poterant.
14 Luce prima proelium ingens accensum est. Nec vallum modo tutantur Poeni, sed, ut quibus locus aequior esset, deturbant nitentis per ardua hostes. XIV. Vincit tamen omnia pertinax virtus, et aliquot simul partibus ad vallum ac fossas perventum est, sed cum
2 multis vulneribus ac militum pernicie. Itaque

[1] et Madvig : om. P(1).
[2] defendere Alschefski : -erent PCRMB^{x} : -erunt DA : -erant $C^{1}B$.

---

[1] I.e. not Campanians.

sent ten legates to the consuls, the camp of the B.C. 212
Romans being near Bovianum. The consuls, on hearing what was going on near Capua, mutually arranged that one of them should lead his army into Campania, and Fulvius, to whom that assignment had fallen, set out and entered the walls of Beneventum at night. Being near now, he learned that Hanno had gone with a part of his army to procure grain; that through his quaestor grain had been furnished to the Campanians; that two thousand wagons and in addition a mixed and unarmed multitude had arrived; that everything was being done in confusion and excitement, and that the arrangement of the camp and military routine had been broken down by the influx of rustics, foreigners [1] at that.

These facts being sufficiently established, the consul ordered the soldiers to make ready their standards and arms, and nothing else, for the following night; they must attack the Carthaginian camp. Setting out at the fourth watch, leaving all their packs and baggage at Beneventum, they reached the camp shortly before daylight and inspired such panic that, if the camp had been placed on level ground, it could undoubtedly have been taken by the first assault. The lofty situation protected it, also the fortifications, which could not be approached from any side except by a steep and difficult slope. At daybreak a great battle blazed up. And the Carthaginians not only defended the earthwork but, as they had the more favourable situation, pushed down the enemy struggling up the steep slope. XIV. Nevertheless obstinate courage surmounted everything, and so the earthwork and the trenches were reached in several places at once, but with many wounds and heavy loss of convocatis legatis [1] tribunisque militum consul absistendum temerario incepto ait; tutius sibi videri reduci eo die exercitum Beneventum, dein postero castra [2] castris hostium iungi, ne exire inde Campani neve Hanno regredi posset; id quo facilius obtineatur, collegam quoque et exercitum eius se acciturum totumque eo versuros bellum. Haec consilia ducis, cum iam receptui caneret, clamor militum aspernantium tam segne imperium disiecit. Proxima forte hosti [3] erat cohors Paeligna, cuius praefectus Vibius Accaus arreptum vexillum trans vallum hostium traiecit. Execratus inde seque et cohortem, si eius vexilli hostes potiti essent, princeps ipse per fossam vallumque in castra inrupit. Iamque intra vallum Paeligni pugnabant, cum altera parte, Valerio Flacco tribuno militum tertiae legionis exprobrante Romanis ignaviam, qui sociis captorum castrorum concederent deeus, T. Pedanius princeps primus centurio, cum signifero signum ademisset, "Iam hoc signum et hic centurio" inquit "intra vallum hostium erit: sequantur qui capi signum ab hoste prohibituri sunt." Manipulares sui primum transcendentem fossam, dein legio tota secuta est. Iam et consul, ad conspectum transgredientium vallum mutato consilio, ab revocando ad incitandos hortandosque versus

A.U.C. 542

[1] legatis Alschefski : om. P(1).
[2] castra Crévier : om. P(1).
[3] forte hosti Madvig, Emend. : portae (-e) hostium P(1).

men. Accordingly the consul called together his B.C. 212 lieutenants and tribunes of the soldiers and told them he must give up his rash undertaking; that it seemed to him safer to lead the army back that day to Beneventum, and then on the following day to pitch camp close to that of the enemy, so that the Campanians might not be able to leave it nor Hanno to return. To accomplish that more readily, he would summon his colleague also and his army, and they would focus the entire war upon that point. These plans of the general were disrupted, when he was already sounding the recall, by the shouts of the soldiers rejecting an order so lacking in spirit. Nearest to the enemy happened to be a Paelignian cohort, whose prefect Vibius Accaus seized the banner and threw it over the enemy's earthwork. Then, with a curse upon himself and the cohort if the enemy should get possession of that banner, he was himself the first to dash over the trench and wall into the camp. And already the Paelignians were fighting inside the wall, when from the other side of the camp, while Valerius Flaccus, tribune of the soldiers of the third legion, was reproaching the Romans for their cowardice in yielding to allies the honour of capturing the camp, Titus Pedanius, first centurion of the principes, took a standard away from the standard-bearer and said "This standard and this centurion will in a moment be inside the enemy's wall. Let those follow who are to prevent the standard from being captured by the enemy." First the men of his own maniple followed him as he crossed the trench, then the whole legion. And now the consul at the sight of men crossing the wall changed his plan, turned from recalling his soldiers to arousing milites, ostendere in quanto discrimine ac periculo fortissima cohors sociorum et civium legio esset. 9 Itaque pro se quisque omnes per aequa atque iniqua loca, cum undique tela conicerentur armaque et corpora hostes obicerent, pervadunt inrumpuntque; multi volnerati etiam quos vires et sanguis desereret, ut intra vallum hostium caderent nite- 10 bantur. Capta itaque momento temporis velut in plano sita nec permunita castra. Caedes inde, non iam pugna erat omnibus intra vallum permixtis. 11 Supra sex[1] milia hostium occisa, supra septem milia capitum cum frumentatoribus Campanis omnique plaustrorum et iumentorum apparatu capta; et alia ingens praeda fuit quam Hanno, populabundus passim cum isset, ex sociorum populi 12 Romani agris traxerat. Inde deletis hostium castris Beneventum reditum, praedamque ibi ambo consules—nam et Ap. Claudius eo post paucos dies 13 venit—vendiderunt diviseruntque. Et donati quorum opera castra hostium capta erant, ante alios Aceaus Paelignus et T. Pedanius, princeps tertiae 14 legionis. Hanno ab Cominio Ocrito, quo nuntiata castrorum clades est, cum paucis frumentatoribus quos forte secum habuerat fugae magis quam itineris modo in Bruttios rediit. XV. Et Campani, audita sua pariter sociorumque clade, legatos ad

A.U.C. 542

[1] sex $R^2(7)$: ex PR : x P^x : decem vulgate.

and encouraging them, and pointed out to them in B.C. 212
what a critical and perilous situation were the bravest cohort of the allies and a legion of their fellow-citizens. And so, each doing his best, over ground favourable and unfavourable, while javelins were being hurled from every side and the enemy were interposing weapons and their bodies, they made their way and burst in. Many wounded men, even those whose strength and blood were ebbing, strove to fall inside the enemy's wall. And so in a moment's time the camp was captured, just as if pitched on level ground and not strongly fortified. Then came slaughter, no longer mere battle, since everything inside the wall was in confusion.

Over six thousand of the enemy were slain, over seven thousand men captured, including the Campanians who came for grain, and the entire train of wagons and mules. In addition there was the immense booty which Hanno, having set out to plunder far and wide, had taken from farms of allies of the Roman people. Then after destroying the enemy's camp they returned to Beneventum, and there the two consuls—for Appius Claudius came there a few days later—sold and divided the booty. And the men by whose efforts the camp of the enemy had been captured, were rewarded, first of all Accaus the Paelignian and Titus Pedanius, first centurion of the third legion. Hanno, leaving Cominius Ocritus, where he received news of the disaster at the camp, with the few men he happened to have with him to get grain, returned in what resembled a flight rather than a march to the land of the Bruttii. XV. And the Campanians, hearing of what was a disaster as much to themselves as to their allies, sent legates to

A.U.C. 542

Hannibalem miserunt, qui nuntiarent duos consules ad Beneventum esse, diei iter a Capua; tantum non ad portas et muros bellum esse; ni propere subveniat, celerius Capuam quam Arpos in potestatem hostium venturam. Ne Tarentum quidem, non modo arcem, tanti debere esse ut Capuam, quam Carthagini aequare sit solitus, desertam indefensamque populo Romano tradat. Hannibal, curae sibi fore rem Campanam pollicitus, in praesentia duo milia equitum cum legatis mittit, quo praesidio agros populationibus possent prohibere.

Romanis interim, sicut aliarum rerum, arcis Tarentinae praesidiique quod ibi obsideretur cura est. C. Servilius legatus, ex auctoritate patrum a P. Cornelio praetore in Etruriam ad frumentum coemendum missus, cum aliquot navibus onustis in portum Tarentinum inter hostium custodias pervenit. Cuius adventu qui ante in exigua spe vocati saepe ad transitionem ab hostibus per conloquia erant ultro ad transeundum hostis vocabant sollicitabantque. Et erat satis validum praesidium traductis ad arcem Tarenti tuendam qui Metaponti erant [1] militibus. Itaque Metapontini extemplo metu quo tenebantur liberati ad Hannibalem defecere.

Hoc idem eadem ora maris et Thurini fecerunt. Movit eos non Tarentinorum magis defectio Meta-

[1] qui Metaponti erant z : om. P(1). a lost line.

[1] Cf. XXIV. xlvi f.

Hannibal to report that the two consuls were at B.C. 212
Beneventum, a day's march from Capua; that the war was all but at their gates and walls; and that, if he did not come to their aid in haste, Capua would fall into the power of the enemy more promptly than Arpi.[1] They said that not even Tarentum, to say nothing of its citadel, ought to be of such importance that he should hand over to the Roman people the deserted and undefended Capua, which he had usually compared with Carthage. Hannibal, promising that the Campanian cause would be his concern, for the present sent two thousand horsemen with his lieutenants, that with this force they might be able to protect their farms from devastation.

The Romans meantime were concerned among other things for the citadel of Tarentum and the garrison there besieged. Gaius Servilius, who as lieutenant had been sent by Publius Cornelius, the praetor, into Etruria by authority of the senate to purchase grain, made his way through the enemy's blockade into the harbour of Tarentum with a number of shiploads. Thanks to his coming, the men who until then in their faint hope had often been invited by the enemy in parleys to change sides were actually inviting and urging the enemy to change sides. And the garrison was in fact strong enough, now that soldiers who were at Metapontum had been transferred to defend the citadel of Tarentum. Accordingly the Metapontines were at once relieved of the fear by which they were restrained, and went over to Hannibal.

The Thurians also, on the same coast, did the same. What impelled them was not more the pontinorumque, quibus indidem ex Achaia oriundi etiam cognatione iuncti erant, quam ira in Romanos

A.U.C. 542

8 propter obsides nuper interfectos. Eorum amici cognatique litteras ac nuntios ad Hannonem Magonemque, qui in propinquo in Bruttiis erant, miserunt, si exercitum ad moenia admovissent, se in potestatem
9 eorum urbem tradituros esse. M. Atinius Thuriis cum modico praesidio praeerat, quem facile elici ad certamen temere ineundum rebantur posse, non tam [1] militum, quos perpaucos habebat, fiducia quam iuventutis Thurinae; eam ex industria centuria-
10 verat armaveratque ad talis casus. Divisis copiis inter se duces Poeni cum agrum Thurinum ingressi essent, Hanno cum peditum agmine infestis signis ire ad urbem pergit, Mago cum equitatu tectus collibus
11 apte ad tegendas insidias oppositis subsistit. Atinius peditum tantum agmine per exploratores comperto in aciem copias educit, et fraudis intestinae et hostium
12 insidiarum ignarus. Pedestre proelium fuit persegne paucis in prima acie pugnantibus Romanis, Thurinis expectantibus magis quam adiuvantibus eventum; et Carthaginiensium acies de industria pedem referebat, ut ad terga collis ab equite suo 13 insessi hostem incautum pertraheret. Quo ubi est ventum, coorti cum clamore equites prope inconditam Thurinorum turbam nec satis fido animo unde

[1] tam z: om. P(1).

---

[1] Not the brother of Hannibal; xvi. 7 f., 24; xviii. 1; xxi. 4.
[2] So in mustering old men into the service in VI. ii. 6, and freedmen in X. xxi. 4.

revolt of the Tarentines and that of the Meta- B.C. 212 pontines, with whom they were linked by blood as well, being sprung from the same Achaia, than anger against the Romans on account of the recent execution of the hostages. Friends and relatives of these sent a letter and messengers to Hanno and Mago,[1] who were not far away in the land of the Bruttii, saying that, if they should bring up an army to their walls, they would themselves deliver the city into their power. Marcus Atinius was in command at Thurii with a garrison of moderate size, and they thought that he could easily be tempted to dash rashly into battle, from his confidence not so much in his soldiers, of whom he had very few, as in the young men of Thurii. He had purposely organized them in centuries[2] and armed them with a view to such emergencies. The Carthaginian generals divided their forces between them and, on entering the territory of Thurii, Hanno, with the infantry column ready to attack, proceeded to the city. Mago with the cavalry halted under cover of hills conveniently interposed to conceal an ambuscade. Atinius, informed of the infantry column alone by scouts, led his troops out into line, he being unaware both of the conspiracy within and of the enemy's ambuscade. The infantry battle was very lacking in spirit, for only a few Romans were fighting in the front line, and the men of Thurii were awaiting the outcome, rather than contributing to it. And the Carthaginian line purposely retreated, in order to draw the heedless enemy to the other side of the hill occupied by their own cavalry. When they reached the place, the cavalry, suddenly attacking with a shout, at once put to flight the mass of the Thurians, which was pugnabat stantem extemplo in fugam averterunt.

A.U.C. 542

14 Romani, quamquam circumventos hinc pedes, hinc eques urgebat, tamen aliquamdiu pugnam traxere; postremo et ipsi terga vertunt atque ad urbem
15 fugiunt. Ibi proditores conglobati cum popularium agmen patentibus portis accepissent, ubi Romanos fusos ad urbem ferri viderunt, conclamant instare Poenum, permixtosque et hostis urbem invasuros, ni propere portas claudant. Ita exclusos Romanos praebuere hosti ad caedem; Atinius tamen cum 16 paucis receptus. Seditio inde paulisper tenuit, cum [1] alii cedendum fortunae et tradendam urbem
17 victoribus censerent. Ceterum, ut plerumque, fortuna et consilia mala vicerunt: Atinio cum suis ad mare ac naves deducto, magis quia ipsi ob imperium in se mite ac iustum consultum volebant quam respectu Romanorum, Carthaginienses in urbem accipiunt.

18 Consules a Beneventō in Campanum agrum legiones ducunt non ad frumenta modo, quae iam in herbis erant, corrumpenda, sed ad Capuam oppug-
19 nandam, nobilem se consulatum tam opulentae urbis excidio rati facturos, simul et ingens flagitium imperio dempturos, quod urbi tam propinquae
20 tertium annum impunita defectio esset. Ceterum ne Beneventum sine praesidio esset, et ut ad subita

[1] cum, P(1) add another inde, variously emended by those who require alii . . . alii.

---

[1] In contrast with those who by admitting Atinius showed their preference for the Romans.

almost undisciplined and not entirely loyal to the side B.C. 212 on which they were fighting. The Romans, though surrounded and hard pressed on one side by the infantry, on the other by the cavalry, nevertheless kept on fighting for some time. Finally they also faced about and fled to the city. There the traitors massed together and admitted the column of their citizens through wide-open gates; but when they saw the routed Romans moving toward the city, they shouted that the Carthaginian was upon them, and unless they hastily closed the gates the enemy also, mingling with them, would make their way into the city. Thus they shut out the Romans and left them to be slain by the enemy. Atinius, however, with a few men was admitted. Then for a short time dissension continued, the other party [1] being of the opinion that they must yield to destiny and surrender the city to the victors. But, as usual, chance and bad advice prevailed. Atinius and his men were brought down to the sea and ships, more because they wished his personal safety, on account of his mild and just rule over them, than out of regard for the Romans, and then they admitted the Carthaginians to the city.

The consuls led their legions from Beneventum into the Campanian territory, not merely to ruin the grain, which was by now green, but also to besiege Capua. They thought to make theirs a notable consulship by the destruction of so rich a city, and at the same time to remove a great disgrace from the empire, in that the revolt of a city so near had been unpunished for three years.[2] But, not to leave Beneventum without a garrison, and, with a view to

[2] It was really over three years, from 216 B.C.

A.U.C. 542 belli, si Hannibal, quod facturum haud dubitabant, ad opem ferendam sociis Capuam venisset, equitis vim sustinere possent, Ti. Gracchum ex Lucanis cum equitatu ac levi armatura Beneventum venire iubent: legionibus stativisque ad obtinendas res in Lucanis aliquem praeficeret.

XVI. Graccho, prinsquam ex Lucanis moveret, 2 sacrificanti triste prodigium factum est: ad exta sacrificio perpetrato angues duo ex occulto adlapsi adedere iocur conspectique repente ex oculis abierunt. 3 Ideo[1] cum haruspicum monitu sacrificium instauraretur atque intentius exta reservarentur, iterum ac tertium tradunt adlapsos[2] libatoque iocinere intactos 4 angues abisse. Cum haruspices ad imperatorem id pertinere prodigium praemonuissent et ab occultis cavendum hominibus consultisque, nulla tamen 5 providentia fatum imminens moveri potuit. Flavus Lucanus fuit, caput partis eius Lucanorum, cum pars ad Hannibalem defecisset, quae cum Romanis stabat; et iam altero[3] anno[4] in magistratu erat, ab iisdem 6 illis creatus praetor. Is mutata repente voluntate locum gratiae apud Poenum quaerens neque transire ipse neque trahere ad defectionem Lucanos satis habuit, nisi imperatoris et eiusdem hospitis proditi capite ac sanguine foedus cum hostibus sanxisset.

[1] Ideo Köhler: id P(1): ob id Weissenborn: et Crévier.
[2] adlapsos Weissenborn: om. P(1).
[3] altero Weissenborn: om. P(1).
[4] anno PCR: hanno $R^1MBD.1$: annuo Jac. Gronovius: altero anno Weissenborn.

emergencies, if Hannibal should come to Capua, as B.C. 212 they had no doubt he would do, to lend aid to his allies, in order that they might be able to withstand the attack of his cavalry, they ordered Tiberius Gracchus to come from Lucania with his cavalry and light-armed troops to Beneventum. He was to put some one in command of the legions and permanent camps, in order to control the situation in Lucania.

XVI. As Gracchus was sacrificing before leaving Lucania, an unfavourable portent occurred. After the slaying of the victim two snakes gliding stealthily up to the entrails ate part of the liver, and on being noticed vanished suddenly from sight. When for that reason the sacrifice was repeated on the advice of the soothsayers, and while the entrails were being kept with greater care, they relate that the snakes for the second and the third time gliding up tasted the liver and went away unharmed. Although the soothsayers had warned in advance that that portent applied to the general, and that he must beware of men in hiding and of covert plans, still the impending fate could not be averted by any foresight. There was a Lucanian, Flavus, head of that party of the Lucanians which remained on the Roman side, although the other party had revolted to Hannibal. And he was now in the second year of his office, having been elected praetor by that same party. He suddenly changed his intention and, seeking to find favour with the Carthaginian, was not satisfied to change sides himself nor to draw the Lucanians into revolt without ratifying his agreement with the enemy by the life-blood of the general, betrayed though at the same time his guest-friend. He came

A.U.C. 542

7 Ad Magonem, qui in Bruttiis praeerat, clam in colloquium venit fideque ab eo accepta, si Romanum iis imperatorem tradidisset, liberos cum suis legibus venturos in amicitiam Lucanos, deducit Poenum in locum quo cum[1] paucis Gracchum adducturum
8 ait: Mago ibi pedites equitesque armatos—et capere eas latebras ingentem numerum—occuleret.
9 Loco satis inspecto atque undique explorato dies composita gerendae rei est. Flavus ad Romanum
10 imperatorem venit. Rem se ait magnam incohasse, ad quam perficiendam ipsius Gracchi opera opus esse: omnium populorum praetoribus qui ad Poenum in illo communi Italiae motu descissent, persuasisse ut redirent in amicitiam Romanorum, 11 quando res quoque Romana, quae prope exitium clade Cannensi venisset, in dies melior atque auctior fieret, Hannibalis vis senesceret ac prope ad nihilum
12 venisset; veteri delicto haud inplacabilis fore Romanos; nullam umquam gentem magis exorabilem promptioremque veniae dandae fuisse; quotiens re-
13 bellioni etiam maiorum suorum ignotum! Haec ab sese dicta; ceterum ab ipso Graccho eadem haec audire malle eos praesentisque contingere dextram 14 et id pignus fidei secum ferre. Locum se concilio iis dixisse a conspectu amotum, haud procul castris Romanis; ibi paucis verbis transigi rem posse ut to Mago, who was in command in the country of the B.C. 212 Bruttii, for a secret conference, and received his promise that, if he should surrender the Roman commander into their hands, the Lucanians as free men with their own laws would be accepted as friends. He then led the Carthaginian to a place to which he said he would bring Gracchus with a few men; there Mago should conceal armed infantry and cavalry; and the hiding-place had room, he said, for a very large number. After they had sufficiently examined the spot and reconnoitred all around, a day was settled upon for the execution of the plan. Flavus came to the Roman commander, saying that he had begun an important business for the completion of which he needed Gracchus' own help; that he had persuaded the magistrates of all the peoples which in that general commotion in Italy had gone over to the Carthaginians, to return to the friendship of the Romans, since the Roman state also, which had been nearly destroyed by the disaster at Cannae, was daily improving and increasing, while Hannibal's power was growing feebler and had been reduced almost to nothing. To their old offence, he said, the Romans would not be implacable; no people had ever been more easily entreated and readier to grant forgiveness. How often had a rebellion even of their own ancestors been pardoned! These things he said he had told them; but that they preferred to hear these same statements from Gracchus himself, and to take hold of his right hand there before them, and to carry with them that pledge of his honour. He had appointed for their council a place out of sight, not far from the Roman camp; there in a few words it could be

[1] quo cum Gronovius, Madvig: om. P(1): illo cum A^{v}.

A.U.C. 512

omne nomen Lucanum in fide ac societate Romana 15 sit. Gracchus fraudem et sermoni et rei abesse ratus ac similitudine veri captus cum lictoribus ac turma equitum e castris profectus duce hospite in 16 insidias praecipitat.[1] Hostes subito exorti, et, ne dubia proditio esset, Flavus iis se adiungit. Tela undique in Gracchum atque equites coniciuntur.
17 Gracchus ex equo desilit; idem ceteros facere iubet hortaturque ut, quod unum reliquum fortuna 18 fecerit, id honestent virtute: reliquum autem quid esse paucis a multitudine in valle silva ac montibus saepta circumventis praeter mortem?
19 Id referre, utrum praebentes corpora pecorum modo inulti trucidentur, an toti a patiendo expectandoque eventu in impetum atque iram versi, agentes audentesque, perfusi hostium cruore, inter exspirantium inimicorum cumulata armaque et corpora cadant.
20 Lucanum proditorem ac transfugam omnes peterent;
qui eam victimam prae se ad inferos misisset, eum decus eximium, egregium solacium suae morti 21 inventurum. Inter haec dicta paludamento circa laevum brachium intorto—nam ne scuta quidem 22 secum extulerant—in hostis impetum fecit. Maior quam pro numero hominum editur pugna. Iaculis maxime aperta corpora Romanorum, cum [2] undique ex altioribus locis in cavam vallem coniectus esset,

[1] praecipitat Madvig (possibly P^x): -tatus $P(1)$: -tatur B marg. Gronovius.

[2] cum Madvig, Conway: et cum $P(1)$.

settled that the whole Lucanian people should be B.C. 212 under the protection of the Romans and in alliance with them. Gracchus, thinking that both speech and proposal were free from guile, and misled by the plausibility of it, set out from the camp with his lictors and a troop of cavalry, and with a guest-friend as his guide fell into the ambush. The enemy suddenly came out, and, to leave no doubt about his treachery, Flavus joined them. Javelins assail Gracchus and his horsemen from every side. He springs from his horse, bids the rest to do the same and urges them to ennoble by courage the one thing fortune has left open to them. But to a few men surrounded by a multitude, in a valley hedged about by forest and mountains, what was left, he asked, but death? The one thing that mattered was whether they were to submit themselves like sheep to be slaughtered unavenged, or, far from calmly awaiting the outcome, were to be altogether bent on angry attack, and then, daring and doing, drenched by the blood of the enemy, among the heaps of arms and bodies of their dying foes, were to fall. They must all attack the Lucanian traitor and deserter. The man who sent that victim before him to the lower world would find great distinction and for his own death an extraordinary consolation. While thus speaking he wound his general's cloak around his left arm—for they had not taken even shields with them—and attacked the enemy. The battle was out of all proportion to the number of men engaged. The bodies of the Romans were especially unprotected against javelins, and were pierced by them, as they could be thrown from higher ground all around into the hollow valley. Gracchus, who

A.U.C. 542

23 transfiguntur. Gracchum iam nudatum praesidio vivum capere Poeni nituntur; ceterum conspicatus Lucanum hospitem inter hostis, adeo infestus confertos invasit ut parci ei sine multorum pernicie 24 non posset. Exanimem eum Mago extemplo ad Hannibalem misit ponique cum captis simul fascibus ante tribunal imperatoris iussit.

Haec si[1] vera fama est, Gracchus in Lucanis ad campos qui Veteres vocantur periit. XVII. Sunt qui in agro Beneventano prope Calorem fluvium contendant a castris cum lictoribus ac tribus servis
2 lavandi causa progressum, cum forte inter salicta innata ripis laterent hostes, nudum atque inermem saxisque quae volvit amnis propugnantem interfectum.
3 Sunt qui haruspicum monitu quingentos passus a castris progressum, uti loco puro ea quae ante dicta prodigia sunt procuraret, ab insidentibus forte locum duabus turmis Numidarum circumventum scribant. Adeo nec locus nec ratio mortis in viro
4 tam claro et insigni constat. Funeris quoque Gracchi varia est fama. Alii in castris Romanis sepultum ab suis, alii ab Hannibale—et ea vulgatior fama est—tradunt in vestibulo Punicorum castrorum
5 rogum extructum esse, armatum exercitum decucurrisse cum tripudiis Hispanorum motibusque armorum et corporum suae cuique genti adsuetis, ipso Hannibale

[1] si Madvig : om. P(1).

was by this time stripped of his defenders, the B.C. 212
Carthaginians strove to capture alive. But catching sight of his Lucanian guest-friend among the enemy, he dashed into the dense ranks with such animosity that he could not be spared without the loss of many lives. Mago at once sent the corpse to Hannibal and ordered it to be placed before the general's tribune together with the captured fasces.

If this is the true report, Graechus perished in Lucania, on the Old Plains, as they are called. XVII. There are some who maintain that in the region of Beneventum, by the river Calor, he had gone out of the camp with his lictors and three slaves to bathe, while enemies, as it happened, were hiding among the willows growing on the banks, and was slain, naked and unarmed and defending himself with stones which the river rolls along. There are some writers who say that on the advice of the soothsayers he had gone five hundred paces from the camp to make atonement on an uncontaminated spot for the prodigies mentioned above, and was overpowered by two troops of Numidians who chanced to be in ambush there. So far are both the place and the manner of his death from being established, in spite of his eminence and distinction. In regard to Graechus's funeral also reports vary. Some relate that he was buried in the Roman camp by his own men, others—and this is the prevalent report—that by Hannibal's order a pyre was erected directly outside the gate of the Carthaginian camp, and that the army defiled under arms, with dances by the Spanish troops and such movements of weapons and bodies as were customary for each tribe, while Hannibal himself

A.U.C. 542 omni rerum verborumque honore exequias celebrante.
6 Haec tradunt qui in Lucanis rei gestae auctores sunt. Si illis qui ad Calorem fluvium interfectum memorant credere velis, capitis tantum Gracchi
7 hostes potiti sunt; eo delato ad Hannibalem, missus ab eo confestim Carthalo, qui in castra Romana ad Cn. Cornelium quaestorem deferret; is funus imperatoris in castris celebrantibus cum exercitu Beneventanis fecit.

XVIII. Consules agrum Campanum ingressi cum passim popularentur, eruptione oppidanorum et Magonis cum equitatu territi et trepidi ad signa milites palatos passim revocarunt, et vixdum instructa acie fusi supra mille et quingentos milites
2 amiserunt. Inde ingens ferocia superbae suopte ingenio genti crevit, multisque proeliis laeessebant Romanos; sed intentiores ad cavendum consules una pugna fecerat ineaute atque inconsulte inita.
3 Restituit tamen his animos et illis minuit audaciam parva una res; sed in bello nihil tam leve est quod non magnae interdum rei momentum faciat.
4 T. Quinctio Crispino Badius Campanus hospes erat, perfamiliari hospitio iunctus. Creverat consuetudo, quod aeger Romae apud Crispinum Badius ante defectionem Campanam liberaliter comiterque curatus
5 fuerat. Is tum[1] Badius, progressus ante stationes quae pro porta stabant, vocari Crispinum iussit.

[1] Is tum Crévier : stu P : tum P^2(1).

[1] Not to be confused with another man of the same name in xxvi. 4; XXIV. xxxix. 12; and frequently in XXVII.

honoured the obsequies with every tribute in act B.C. 212
and word. These are the statements of those who vouch for its occurrence in Lucania. If you incline to believe those who state that he was slain at the river Calor, the enemy gained possession of Gracchus' head only. This being brought to Hannibal, Carthalo was at once sent by him to bring it to the Roman camp and Gnaeus Cornelius the quaestor. He conducted the funeral of the general in the camp, while the people of Beneventum joined with the army in doing him honour.

XVIII. While the consuls, on entering the Campanian region, were devastating it far and wide, being alarmed and dismayed by a sally of the Capuans and of Mago with his cavalry, they recalled their widely scattered soldiers to the standards, and being routed almost before their line was formed, lost over fifteen hundred men. Upon this the great overconfidence of a people naturally proud was greatly increased, and they sought to provoke the Romans by many battles. But a single engagement incautiously and imprudently begun had made the consuls more careful to be on their guard. One small occurrence, however, restored the courage of one army and lessened the boldness of the other. But in war nothing is so slight as not at times to bring about a great result. Titus Quinctius Crispinus[1] had one Badius, a Campanian, as his guest-friend, linked to him by intimate hospitality. Friendship had grown because in an illness Badius had been generously and kindly nursed at the house of Crispinus at Rome before the rebellion of Campania. This Badius at the time came up to the outposts stationed before the gate and bade them call

A.U.C. 542

Quod ubi est Crispino nuntiatum, ratus conloquium amicum ac familiare quaeri, manente memoria etiam in discidio publicorum foederum privati iuris, paulum
6 a ceteris processit. Postquam in conspectum venere, "Provoco te" inquit "ad pugnam, Crispine," Badius; "conscendamus equos summotisque aliis
7 uter bello melior sit decernamus." Ad ea Crispinus nec sibi nec illi ait hostes deesse in quibus virtutem ostendant; se, etiamsi in acie occurrerit, declinaturum, ne hospitali caede dextram violet; con-
8 versusque abibat. Enimvero ferocius tum Campanus increpare mollitiam ignaviamque et se digna probra in insontem iacere, hospitalem hostem appellans simulantemque parcere cui sciat parem se non esse.
9 Si parum publicis foederibus ruptis dirempta simul et privata iura esse putet, Badium Campanum T. Quinctio Crispino Romano palam duobus exercitibus audientibus renuntiare hospitium. Nihil sibi 10 cum eo consociatum, nihil foederatum, hosti cum hoste, cuius patriam ac penates publicos privatosque oppugnatum venisset. Si vir esset, congrederetur.
11 Diu cunctantem Crispinum perpulere turmales ne
12 impune insultare Campanum pateretur. Itaque tantum moratus dum imperatores consuleret permitterentne sibi extra ordinem in provocantem

Crispinus. When this was reported to Crispinus, he B.C. 212 went a little beyond the others, thinking a friendly and intimate conversation was wanted, since the memory of a personal tie lingered in spite of the rupture of public treaties. When they had come in sight of each other, "I challenge you to battle, Crispinus," said Badius. "Let us mount our horses and, with others kept at a distance, decide which is the better warrior." In reply Crispinus said that neither he nor Badius lacked enemies on whom to show his courage. For himself, even if he should meet the other in battle-line, he would avoid him, lest he stain his right hand with the blood of a guest-friend. And he turned and was walking away. Then in truth the Campanian more fiercely reviled the effeminacy and cowardice of Crispinus and hurled reproaches which he himself deserved against an innocent man, calling him a guest-enemy and a man who pretended to spare one to whom he knew he was not equal. If he thought that with the rupture of public treaties private ties had not also been broken, then, he said, Badius the Campanian, openly in the hearing of two armies, renounced the guest-friendship of Titus Quinctius Crispinus the Roman. For himself, an enemy, nothing was hallowed by association, nothing by compact, with him, an enemy, since he had come to attack his native city and the Penates of the state and of the household. If he was a man, let him come on. Crispinus, after long hesitation, was prevailed upon by his comrades not to allow the Campanian to revile him with impunity. And so he delayed only long enough to consult the generals as to whether they permitted him to fight out of ranks against an enemy who challenged him.

A.U.C. 542 hostem pugnare, permissu eorum arma cepit equumque conscendit et Badium nomine compellans ad
13 pugnam evocavit. Nulla mora a Campano facta est; infestis equis concurrerunt. Crispinus supra scutum sinistrum umerum Badio hasta transfixit, superque delapsum cum vulnere ex equo desiluit, ut pedes
14 iacentem conficeret. Badius, prinsquam opprimeretur, parma atque equo relicto ad suos aufugit;
15 Crispinus equum armaque capta et cruentam cuspidem insignis spoliis ostentans cum magna laude et gratulatione militum ad consules est deductus laudatusque ibi magnifice et donis donatus.

XIX. Hannibal ex agro Beneventano castra ad Capuam cum movisset, tertio post die quam venit
2 copias in aciem eduxit, haudquaquam dubius, quod Campanis absente se paucos ante dies secunda fuisset pugna, quin multo minus se suumque totiens
3 victorem exercitum sustinere Romani possent. Ceterum postquam pugnari coeptum est, equitum maxime incursu, cum iaculis obrueretur, laborabat Romana acies, donec signum equitibus datum est
4 ut in hostem admitterent equos. Ita equestre proelium erat, cum procul visus Sempronianus exercitus, cui Cn. Cornelius quaestor praeerat, utrique parti parem metum praebuit ne hostes novi adven-
5 tarent. Velut ex composito utrimque signum receptui datum, reductique in castra prope aequo Marte discesserunt; plures tamen ab Romanis primo

[1] For the forces Gracchus had commanded cf. xv. 20.

With their permission he took his arms and mounted B.C. 212 his horse, and addressing Badius by name called him out to battle. The Campanian made no delay; riding directly at each other they clashed. Crispinus with his spear pierced Badius' left shoulder above the shield; and after he fell wounded, leaped upon him from his horse, that, now dismounted, he might despatch the fallen. Badius, not to be overpowered, left shield and horse and fled to his own men. Crispinus, decked with spoils and displaying the horse and captured arms and his bloody spear, was conducted with much praise and congratulation on the part of the soldiers to the consuls, and there he was highly praised and rewarded with gifts.

XIX. Hannibal, having moved his camp from the region of Beneventum to the vicinity of Capua, led his troops out into battle-line on the third day after his arrival. Since in his absence the Campanians had had a successful battle a few days before, he had no doubt whatever that the Romans would be much less able to withstand himself and his repeatedly victorious army. But once the battle had begun, the Roman line was hard pressed, especially by the cavalry charge, being overwhelmed by their darts, until the signal was given to the cavalry to urge their horses against the enemy. Thus a cavalry battle was in progress when the distant sight of the Sempronian army,[1] commanded by Gnaeus Cornelius, the quaestor, inspired in both armies the same fear that fresh enemies were approaching. As if by agreement the signal for recall was given on both sides, and marching back to the camp they separated on almost even terms. Yet a larger number fell on the

A.U.C. 512

6 incursu equitum ecciderunt. Inde consules, ut averterent Capua Hannibalem, nocte quae secuta est diversi, Fulvius in agrum Cumanum, Claudius
7 in Lucanos abit. Postero die, cum vacua castra Romanorum esse nuntiatum Hannibali esset et duobus agminibus diversos abisse, incertus primo
8 utrum sequeretur, Appium institit sequi. Ille circumducto hoste qua voluit alio itinere ad Capuam redit.

Hannibali alia in his locis bene gerendae rei for-9 tuna oblata est. M. Centenius fuit cognomine Paenula, insignis inter primi pili centuriones et 10 magnitudine corporis et animo. Is, perfunctus militia, per P. Cornelium Sullam praetorem in senatum introductus petit a patribus uti sibi quinque milia 11 militum darentur: se peritum et hostis et regionum brevi operae pretium facturum et, quibus artibus ad id locorum nostri et duces et exercitus capti forent,
12 iis adversus inventorem usurum. Id non promissum magis stolide quam stolide creditum, tamquam
13 eadem militares et imperatoriae artes essent. Data pro quinque octo milia militum, pars dimidia cives, pars socii. Et ipse aliquantum voluntariorum in itinere ex [1] agris concivit ac prope duplicato exercitu in Lucanos pervenit, ubi Hannibal nequiquam 14 secutus Claudium substiterat. Haud dubia res

[1] ex Madvig: in P(1).

[1] A primi pili centurio (or primus pilus) was the ranking centurion of his legion, commanding the first century of the first maniple of the triarii.

Roman side because of the first charge of the horse- B.C. 212 men. Thereupon the consuls, in order to draw Hannibal away from Capua, marched off the following night in different directions, Fulvius into the region of Cumae, Claudius into Lucania. The next day Hannibal, on being informed that the Roman camp was empty and that they had marched away in different directions in two columns, was at first uncertain which to follow, but pushed on in pursuit of Appius, who after leading the enemy around wherever he pleased, returned by a different road to Capua.

Hannibal had another opportunity for success presented to him in this region. There was one Marcus Centenius, with the cognomen Paenula, conspicuous among the centurions of the highest rank [1] for his huge body and his courage. Having finished his military service, he was brought into the senate by Publius Cornelius Sulla, a praetor, and begged the fathers to give him five thousand soldiers. He, being well-acquainted, he said, both with the enemy and the country, would soon accomplish something worth while, and as for the arts by which both our generals and our armies had till then been ensnared, he would use them against their inventor. This was not more stupidly promised than stupidly believed, as if the qualities of soldier and general were the same. Instead of five thousand, eight thousand soldiers were given him, half of them citizens, half allies. And he himself on his march raised a considerable number of volunteers from the farms, and with his army nearly doubled reached Lucania, where Hannibal had halted after vainly pursuing Claudius. The result was never in doubt, erat, quippe inter Hannibalem ducem et centurionem, exercitusque alterum vincendo veteranum, alterum novum totum, magna ex parte etiam tumultuarium 15 ac semermem. Ut conspecta inter se agmina sunt et neutra pars detrectavit pugnam, extemplo instructae acies. Pugnatum tamen ut in nulla pari re; duas amplius horas constitit pugna spe[1] con-

A.U.C. 542

16 citante,[2] donec dux stetit, Romanam aciem.[3] Postquam is non pro vetere fama solum, sed etiam metu futuri dedecoris, si sua temeritate contractae cladi superesset, obiectans se hostium telis cecidit, fusa 17 extemplo est Romana acies; sed adeo ne fugae quidem iter patuit omnibus viis ab equite insessis, ut ex tanta multitudine vix mille evaserint, ceteri passim alii alia peste absumpti sint.

XX. Capua a consulibus iterum summa vi obsideri coepta est, quaeque in eam rem opus erant compor-
2 tabantur parabanturque. Casilinum frumentum convectum; ad Volturni ostium, ubi nunc urbs est, castellum communitum ibique et Puteolis, quos iam[4] ante Fabius Maximus munierat, praesidium impositum, 3 ut mare proximum et flumen in potestate essent. In ea duo maritima castella frumentum, quod ex Sardinia nuper missum erat quodque M. Iunius praetor ex Etruria coemerat, ab Ostia conveetum est, ut exerci-
4 tui per hiemem copia esset. Ceterum super eam cladem quae in Lucanis accepta erat volonum quo-

[1] -stitit pugna spe con- M. Müller: om. P(1), a lost line.
[2] concitante Madvig: concitata et P(1): -atae P^1*?*: -ata Sigonius, Walters.
[3] Romanam aciem P(1): -a acie A^y Valla.
[4] ibique . . . iam Conway, a line om. by P(1).

[1] Cf. XXIV. vii. 10.

as between Hannibal as commander and a centurion, B.C. 212 and between armies one of which was a veteran in victory and the other altogether raw, in large part also irregular and half-armed. When the columns were in sight of each other and neither side refused battle, the lines were immediately drawn up. They fought, however, as was to be expected where nothing was fairly matched. For more than two hours the battle continued, since hope inspired the Roman line so long as their commander held his ground. Not only in keeping with his old reputation, but also for fear of future disgrace, if he should survive a disaster brought on by his own rashness, he threw himself upon the weapons of the enemy and fell, whereupon the Roman line was at once routed. But, as all the roads were occupied by cavalry, so far were they from having any route open even for flight that out of so great a multitude barely a thousand escaped, while the rest scattering met death in various forms.

XX. The siege of Capua was resumed with intensity by the consuls, and all that was needed for the purpose was being brought together and made ready. Casilinum was the depot for grain. At the mouth of the Volturnus, where there is now a city, a stronghold was fortified, and there and at Puteoli,[1] which Fabius Maximus had previously fortified, a garrison was placed, that the sea in that neighbourhood and the river might be in their power. To these two strongholds by the sea the grain which had been sent recently from Sardinia and that which the praetor Marcus Junius had purchased in Etruria was transported from Ostia, so that the army might have a supply through the winter. But in addition to the disaster incurred in Lucania, the army of slave-

A.U.C. 542 que exercitus, qui vivo Graccho summa fide stipendia fecerat, velut exauctoratus morte ducis ab signis discessit.

5 Hannibal non Capuam neglectam neque in tanto discrimine desertos volebat socios; sed prospero ex temeritate unius Romani ducis successu in alterius ducis exercitusque opprimendi occasionem immine-
6 bat. Cn. Fulvium praetorem Apuli legati nuntiabant primo, dum urbes quasdam Apulorum quae ad Hannibalem descivissent oppugnaret, intentius rem egisse: postea nimio successu et ipsum et milites praeda impletos in tantam licentiam socordiamque effusos
7 ut nulla disciplina militiae esset. Cum saepe alias, tum paucis diebus ante expertus qualis sub inscio duce exercitus esset, in Apuliam castra movit. XXI. Circa Herdoneam Romanae legiones et praetor Fulvius erat. Quo ubi allatum est hostis adventare, prope est factum ut iniussu praetoris signis convulsis in aciem exirent; nec res magis ulla tenuit quam spes haud dubia suo id arbitrio ubi vellent facturos.
2 Nocte insequenti Hannibal, cum tumultuatum in castris et plerosque ferociter, signum ut daret,
3 institisse duci ad arma vocantis sciret, haud dubius prosperae pugnae occasionem dari, tria milia expeditorum militum in villis circa vepribusque et silvis disponit, qui signo dato simul omnes e latebris

---

[1] Cf. XXIV. xx. 8.

volunteers also, which had served with the utmost loyalty while Graechus lived, abandoned its standards, as if discharged by the death of the general. B.C. 212

Hannibal did not wish that Capua should be neglected nor his allies abandoned in such a crisis. But in view of a success due to the rashness of one Roman general he was eager for an opportunity to surprise a second general and army. Apulian legates were informing him that the praetor Gnaeus Fulvius had at first been very active while besieging some Apulian cities which had revolted to Hannibal; but that later, owing to unmerited success, both he himself and his soldiers, who were loaded with booty, had gone to such lengths in licence and indifference that there was no military discipline. Hannibal, who frequently at other times, and particularly within a few days, had discovered what an army is under an incompetent general, moved his camp into Apulia. XXI. Near Herdonea [1] were Roman legions and the praetor Fulvius. When the news reached them there that the enemy were approaching, they barely refrained from catching up their standards and going out into battle-line without orders from the praetor. And nothing restrained them more than the hope, now beyond question, that they would do so at their own discretion whenever they pleased. The following night Hannibal, knowing that there had been an uproar in the camp and that many, calling to arms, had over-confidently pressed the commander to give the signal, had no doubt that an opportunity for a victory was offered. He accordingly posted three thousand lightly equipped soldiers in farmhouses near by and in the thickets and the woods, to come out of their hiding-places all at once,

A.U.C. 512

4 existerent, et Magonem ac duo ferme milia equitum, qua fugam inclinaturam credebat, omnia itinera insidere iubet. His nocte praeparatis, prima luce 5 in aciem copias educit; nec Fulvius est cunctatus, non tam sua ulla spe quam militum impetu fortuito tractus. Itaque eadem temeritate qua processum in aciem est instruitur ipsa acies ad libidinem militum forte procurrentium consistentiumque quo loco ipsorum tulisset animus, deinde per libidinem aut 6 metum deserentium locum. Prima legio et sinistra ala in primo instructae et in longitudinem porrecta 7 acies. Clamantibus tribunis nihil introrsus roboris ac virium esse et, quaecumque impetum fecisset hostis, perrupturos, nihil quod salutare esset non modo ad animum sed ne ad aures quidem admittebat. 8 Et Hannibal haudquaquam similis dux neque simili exercitu neque ita instructo aderat. Ergo ne clamorem quidem atque impetum primum eorum 9 Romani sustinuere. Dux, stultitia et temeritate Centenio par, animo haudquaquam comparandus, ubi rem inclinatam ac trepidantis suos videt, equo arrepto cum ducentis ferme equitibus effugit; 10 cetera a fronte pulsa, inde a[1] tergo atque alis circumventa acies eo usque est caesa ut ex duodeviginti milibus hominum duo milia haud amplius evaserint. Castris hostes potiti sunt.

[1] inde a Weissenborn : in P(1).

---

[1] The alae were auxiliaries of the allies, each ala equal in strength to a legion (4200 men). When drawn up as here the second line would be made up of the other legion and the ala dextra. Such a formation was at times employed instead of the usual three lines, hastati, principes, triarii, of the legionaries. Cf. XXVII. i. 8; ii. 6.

when the signal was given. And he ordered Mago B.C. 212 and about two thousand horsemen to lie in wait along all the roads in the direction which he believed the flight would take. After making these preparations at night, he led his troops out into line at daybreak. Nor did Fulvius hesitate, dragged into it not so much by any hope of his own as by the haphazard impulse of the soldiers. And so, with the same recklessness with which they went out to form, they drew up even the line of battle according to the whim of soldiers who happened to dash forward and take their stand wherever their own fancy had carried them, and then capriciously or in fear abandoned their positions. The first legion and the left ala were placed in front,[1] and the line was made very long. Although the tribunes shouted that in depth it had no power to resist, and that wherever the enemy should make their attack they would pierce it, the men in line allowed no advice that was helpful to reach even their ears, not to say their attention. And there was Hannibal, surely not that sort of a general, nor with that sort of an army, drawn up in that fashion. Consequently the Romans did not withstand even their shout and the first onset. The general, a match for Centenius in folly and recklessness, but in courage by no means to be compared with him, seeing that the line was giving way and his own men in confusion, seized a horse and with about two hundred horsemen made his escape. The rest of the line, beaten back in front and then surrounded in the rear and on the wings, was so cut to pieces that out of eighteen thousand men not more than two thousand escaped. The camp was occupied by the enemy.

A.U.C. 542

XXII. Hac clades super aliam alia Romam cum essent nuntiatae, ingens quidem et luctus et pavor civitatem cepit; sed tamen quia consules, ubi summa rerum esset, ad id locorum prospere rem
2 gererent, minus his cladibus commovebantur. Legatos ad consules mittunt C. Laetorium M. Metilium qui nuntiarent ut reliquias duorum exercituum cum
3 cura colligerent darentque operam ne per metum ac desperationem hosti se dederent, id quod post Cannensem accidisset cladem, et ut desertores de 4 exercitu volonum conquirerent. Idem negotii P. Cornelio datum, cui et dilectus mandatus erat; isque per fora conciliabulaque edixit ut conquisitio volonum fieret iique ad signa reducerentur. Haec omnia intentissima cura acta.

5 Ap. Claudius consul D. Iunio ad ostium Volturni, M. Aurelio Cotta Puteolis praeposito, qui, ut quaeque naves ex Etruria ac Sardinia accessissent, 6 extemplo in castra mitterent frumentum, ipse ad Capuam regressus Q. Fulvium collegam invenit Casilino omnia deportantem molientemque ad
7 oppugnandam Capuam. Tum ambo circumsederunt urbem et Claudium Neronem praetorem ab Suessula
8 ex Claudianis castris exciverunt. Is quoque modico ibi praesidio ad tenendum locum relicto ceteris omnibus copiis ad Capuam descendit. Ita tria praetoria circa Capuam erecta; tres et [1] exercitus

[1] et P(2) Conway: om. A Weissenborn, Walters.

---

[1] I.e. the senate.
[2] In XXII. xxv. 3 he was tribunus plebis.
[3] Cf. above, note on v. 6.

XXII. When the news of these disasters one after B.C. 212 another had reached Rome, great sorrow and alarm, it is true, took possession of the state. Nevertheless because the consuls, to whom fell the supreme command, were up to that time successful, they were less disturbed by these disasters. They[1] sent Gaius Laetorius and Marcus Metilius[2] as legates to the consuls, to inform them that they should carefully gather up the remnants of the two armies, and see to it that in fear and despair they did not surrender to the enemy, as had happened after the disaster at Cannae; also that they should search for the deserters from the army of slave-volunteers. The same duty was given to Publius Cornelius, to whom the levy also had been assigned. And he issued an edict in the market-towns and local centres,[3] that search should be made for the slave-volunteers, and that they be brought back to their standards. All these things were done with the utmost diligence.

Appius Claudius, the consul, placed Decimus Junius in command at the mouth of the Volturnus and Marcus Aurelius Cotta at Puteoli, in order that, as fast as ships came in from Etruria and Sardinia, they should send the grain at once to the camps. He himself, on returning to Capua, found his colleague Quintus Fulvius transporting everything from Casilinum and making every preparation for the siege of Capua. Then they both invested the city and summoned the praetor, Claudius Nero, from the Claudian camp at Suessula. He, leaving there only a garrison of moderate size to hold the place, likewise came down with all the rest of his forces to Capua. Thus three headquarters were set up around Capua. There were three armies too that, diversis partibus opus adgressi fossa valloque circumdare urbem parant et castella excitant modicis

A.U.C. 512

9 intervallis multisque simul locis cum prohibentibus opera Campanis eo eventu pugnant ut postremo
10 portis muroque se contineret Campanus. Prius tamen quam haec continuarentur opera, legati ad Hannibalem missi qui quererentur desertam ab eo Capuam ac prope redditam Romanis obtestarenturque ut tunc saltem opem non circumsessis modo sed
11 etiam circumvallatis ferret. Consulibus litterae a P. Cornelio praetore missae ut, priusquam clauderent Capuam operibus, potestatem Campanis facerent ut qui eorum vellent exirent a Capua suasque res
12 secum ferrent: [1] liberos fore suaque omnia habituros qui ante idus Martias exissent; post eam diem quique exissent quique ibi mansissent, hostium
13 futuros numero. Ea pronuntiata Campanis atque ita spreta ut ultro contumelias dicerent minarenturque.

14 Hannibal ab Herdonea Tarentum duxerat legiones, spe aut vi aut dolo arcis Tarentinae potiundae; quod ubi parum processit, ad Brundisium flexit
15 iter, prodi id oppidum ratus. Ibi quoque cum frustra tereret tempus, legati Campani ad eum venerunt querentes simul orantesque; quibus Hannibal magnifice respondit et antea se solvisse obsidionem et nunc adventum suum consules non laturos.

[1] ferrent M^{1}? Madvig: inferrent $P(6)M$?: au- M?Ax: inde ferrent Weissenborn.

---

[1] In the name of the senate.

fell to work on different sides, made ready to encircle B.C. 212
the city with a ditch and an earthwork, and erected redoubts at moderate intervals; and at many points at the same time they fought with such success against the Campanians who endeavoured to hinder the works that finally the Campanians remained inside the gates and the wall. But before these siege-works could be made continuous, legates were sent to Hannibal, to complain that Capua had been deserted by him and almost given back to the Romans, and to implore him to bring aid, then at least, to men not only besieged but also encircled by entrenchments. The consuls received a letter from Publius Cornelius, the praetor, ordering[1] that, before enclosing Capua with their works, they should permit such of the Campanians as wished to do so to leave Capua and carry their possessions with them. Those who should leave before the fifteenth of March were to be free men and to keep all their property; those who left after that date and those who remained there were to be reckoned enemies. These terms were published to the Campanians, and were received with such contempt by them that they were actually insulting and made threats.

Hannibal had led his legions from Herdonea to Tarentum in the hope of getting possession of the citadel of Tarentum either by force or by ruse. When this did not succeed, he turned aside to Brundisium, thinking that town would certainly be betrayed. While there also he was wasting time, the Campanian legates came to him with complaints and at the same time entreaties. Hannibal replied to them grandly that he had previously raised a siege, and that now also the consuls would not with-

A.U.C. 512 16 Cum hac spe dimissi legati vix regredi Capuam iam duplici fossa valloque cinctam potuerunt.

XXIII. Cum maxume Capua circumvallaretur, Syracusarum oppugnatio ad finem venit, praterquam vi ac virtute ducis exercitusque, intestina 2 etiam proditione adiuta. Namque Marcellus initio veris incertus utrum Agrigentum ad Himilconem et Hippocraten verteret bellum an obsidione Syra- 3 cusas premeret, quamquam nec vi capi videbat posse inexpugnabilem terrestri ac maritimo situ urbem nec fame, ut quam prope liberi a Carthagine com- 4 meatus alerent, tamen, ne quid inexpertum relinqueret, transfugas Syracusanos—erant autem apud Romanos aliqui nobilissimi viri, inter defectionem ab Romanis, quia ab novis consiliis abhorrebant, pulsi—conloquiis suae partis temptare hominum animos iussit et fidem dare, si traditae forent Syra- 5 cusae, liberos eos ac suis legibus victuros esse. Non erat conloquii copia, quia multorum animi suspecti omnium curam oculosque eo [1] converterant ne quid 6 falleret tale admissum. Servus unus exulum, pro transfuga intromissus in urbem, conventis paucis initium conloquendi de tali re fecit. Deinde in [2] piscatoria quidam nave retibus operti circumvectique ita ad castra Romana conlocutique cum transfugis, stand his coming. With this hope the legates were sent away, and it was with difficulty that they were able to return to Capua, now surrounded by two trenches and a double earthwork. B.C. 212

[1] eo B Riemann : om. P(1).
[2] Deinde in z : dein P(1) : deinde A^2.

[1] Beyond the northern Wall of Dionysius, not far from the Hexapylon.

XXIII. Just as Capua was being encircled the siege of Syracuse came to an end, expedited not only by the vigour and valour of the general and the army but also by treachery within. For Marcellus, who at the beginning of the spring had been uncertain whether to shift the war to Agrigentum against Himilco and Hippocrates, or to press the siege of Syracuse, saw indeed that the city, impregnable in its position both on the landward and the seaward side, could not be taken by assault, nor by starvation, inasmuch as it was sustained by almost unhampered supplies from Carthage. Nevertheless, to leave nothing untried, deserters from Syracuse—and there were in the Roman lines some men of highest rank who during the estrangement from the Romans had been driven out because they were averse to a change of policy—were ordered by him to sound men of their faction in conferences, and to give them a pledge that, if Syracuse should be surrendered, they should live as free men and under their own laws. For a conference there was no opportunity, because the suspicious attitude of many men had attracted the attention and the eyes of all, to prevent such an offence from passing unnoticed. A single slave belonging to the exiles was admitted to the city as a deserter and by meeting a few men made a beginning of parleys on a matter of such moment. Then some men were hidden under nets on a fishing vessel, and thus sailed around to the Roman camp [1] and talked with the deserters. And

A.U.C. 542 et iidem saepius eodem modo et alii atque alii;
7 postremo ad octoginta facti. Et cum iam composita omnia ad proditionem essent, indicio delato ad Epicyden per Attalum quendam, indignantem sibi rem creditam non esse, necati omnes cum cruciatu sunt.

8 Alia subinde spes, postquam haec vana evaserat, excepit. Damippus quidam Lacedaemonius, missus ab Syracusis ad Philippum regem, captus ab Romanis
9 navibus erat. Huius utique redimendi et Epicydae cura erat ingens, nec abnuit Marcellus, iam tum Aetolorum, quibus socii Lacedaemonii erant, amicitiam
10 adfectantibus Romanis. Ad conloquium de redemptione eius missis medius maxime atque utrisque opportunus locus ad portum Trogilorum, propter
11 turrim quam vocant Galeagram, est visus. Quo cum saepius commearent, unus ex Romanis ex propinquo murum contemplans, numerando lapides aestimandoque ipse secum quid in fronte paterent
12 singuli, altitudinem muri, quantum proxime coniectura poterat, permensus humilioremque aliquanto pristina opinione sua et ceterorum omnium ratus esse et vel mediocribus scalis superabilem, ad Marcellum rem
13 defert. Haud spernenda visa; sed cum adiri locus, quia ob id ipsum intentius custodiebatur, non posset, 14 occasio quaerebatur; quam obtulit transfuga nuntians diem festum Dianae per triduum agi et, quia alia in obsidione desint, vino largius epulas celebrari

---

[1] Merely a small bay, of no value for large vessels.

[2] The tower was probably beyond the wall in the open country.

the same men did this repeatedly in the same way, B.C. 212 also others and again others. Finally they amounted to about eighty. And when now everything had been arranged for the betrayal, information was brought to Epicydes by one Attalus, who was outraged that the matter had not been confided to him, and they were all put to death with torture.

This hope having proved false, another at once took its place. Damippus a Lacedaemonian, who had been sent from Syracuse to King Philip, had been captured by Roman ships. Epicydes was very much concerned to ransom him at any cost, and Marcellus also was not averse, since the Romans were already courting the friendship of the Aetolians, whose allies the Lacedaemonians were. The men sent to confer in regard to the man's ransom thought that the most convenient place for both sides, and just half-way, was at the Trogili Harbour,[1] near the tower called Galeagra.[2] As they came there repeatedly, one of the Romans, observing the wall from near at hand, by counting the courses and making his own estimate of the height of each on its face, measured the height of the wall as nearly as he could by guesswork. And thinking it considerably lower than his own previous estimate of it and that of all the rest, and that it could be scaled by ladders even of moderate length, he reported to Marcellus. It did not seem a matter to be despised. But since the place, being more closely guarded for the very reason mentioned, could not be approached, they cast about for an opportunity. And this was offered by a deserter, reporting that the feast of Diana was being observed for three days, and that, since other things were lacking during the siege, it was with wine that the

A.U.C. 542 et ab Epicyde praebito universae plebei et per tribus a principibus diviso.

15 Quod ubi [1] accepit Marcellus, cum paucis tribunorum militum conlocutus, electisque per eos ad rem tantam agendam audendamque idoneis centurionibus militibusque et scalis in occulto comparatis, ceteris signum dari iubet ut mature corpora curarent quietique darent: nocte in expeditionem eundum 16 esse. Inde ubi id temporis visum quo de die epulatis iam vini satias principiumque somni esset, signi unius milites ferre scalas iussit; et ad mille fere 17 armati tenui agmine per silentium eo dedueti. Ubi sine strepitu ac tumultu primi evaserunt in murum, secuti ordine alii, cum priorum audacia dubiis etiam animum faceret. XXIV. Iam mille armatorum muri [2] ceperant partem, cum ceterae admotae sunt copiae [3] pluribusque scalis in murum evadebant signo ab 2 Hexapylo dato, quo per ingentem solitudinem erat perventum, quia magna pars in turribus epulati aut sopiti vino erant aut semigraves potabant; paucos tamen eorum improviso oppressos [4] in cubilibus 3 interfecerunt. Prope Hexapylon est portula; ea magna vi refringi coepta et e muro ex composito tuba datum signum erat et iam undique non furtim, 4 sed vi aperta [5] gerebatur res. Quippe ad Epipolas,

[1] quod ubi M^1: id ubi M^2: dubia $P(1)$.
[2] muri Madvig: om. $P(1)$: eam Harant.
[3] sunt copiae Weissenborn: om. $P(1)$.
[4] improviso oppressos Hertz: inpressos $P(1)$: oppressos xz.
[5] aperta Gronovius: aperte $P(1)$.

---

[1] I.e. the φυλαί, corresponding in a way to the Roman tribes.
[2] For this, the most important gate to the north, cf. XXIV. xxi. 7; xxxii. 5, etc.

banquets were more lavishly provided, this being B.C. 212 furnished to the entire populace by Epicydes and distributed among the tribes [1] by leading citizens.

On learning of this, Marcellus conferred with a few tribunes of the soldiers, and after these had chosen centurions and soldiers able to dare and do a thing of such importance, and after ladders had been secretly made ready, he ordered the signal to be given to the others to eat early and then rest. In the night, he said, they must go on a raid. Then, when it seemed to be late enough for those who had begun their feast during the day to be sated, he thought, with their wine and now to be falling asleep, he ordered the soldiers of one maniple to carry the ladders. And about a thousand armed men were led in a thin column to the place in silence. When the first men without noise and confusion had made their way to the top of the wall, the others followed one after another, since the boldness of those ahead of them gave courage even to the wavering. XXIV. The thousand armed men had already taken a part of the wall, when the rest of the forces were brought up, and on more ladders they were making their way to the top of the wall, a signal having been given from the Hexapylon.[2] To that point they had advanced without encountering a soul, since many of the enemy, after feasting in the towers, either had been put to sleep by their wine or, while half-intoxicated, were still drinking. A few of them, however, they surprised and slew in their beds. Near the Hexapylon there is a postern. This they had begun to break open with great force, and from the wall the signal had been given by a trumpet, as agreed; and now the fighting was from every side, no longer by stealth, but with open violence. For frequentem custodiis locum, perventum erat, terrendique magis hostes erant quam fallendi, sicut territi

A.U.C. 542

5 sunt. Nam simulac tubarum est auditus cantus clamorque tenentium muros partemque urbis, omnia teneri custodes rati[1] alii per murum fugere, alii salire de muro praecipitarique turba paventium.
6 Magna pars tamen ignara tanti mali erat et gravatis omnibus vino somnoque et in vastae magnitudinis urbe partium sensu non satis pertinente in omnia.
7 Sub lucem Hexapylo effracto Marcellus omnibus copiis urbem ingressus excitavit convertitque omnes ad arma capienda opemque, si quam possent, iam captae prope urbi ferendam.
8 Epicydes ab Insula, quam ipsi Nason vocant, citato profectus agmine, haud dubius quin paucos, per neglegentiam custodum transgressos murum,
9 expulsurus foret, occurrentibus pavidis tumultum augere eos dictitans et maiora ac terribiliora vero adferre, postquam conspexit omnia circa Epipolas armis completa, lacessito tantum hoste paucis missili-
10 bus retro in Achradinam agmen convertit, non tam vim multitudinemque hostium metuens quam ne qua intestina fraus per occasionem oreretur clausasque inter tumultum Achradinae atque Insulae inveniret
11 portas. Marcellus ut moenia ingressus ex superioribus locis urbem omnium ferme illa tempestate

[1] rati A^2 : om. $P(1)N$.

---

[1] Doric for Νῆσος, Insula.

[2] Timaeus, the historian of Sicily, had called Syracuse the greatest of Greek cities, the most beautiful of all cities; Cicero, de Re Publica III. 43; in Verrem IV. 117.

they had reached Epipolae, a well-guarded region, B.C. 212 and the enemy had rather to be terrified than deceived, as they were in fact terrified. For as soon as they heard the notes of the trumpet and the shouting of the men holding the walls and a part of the city, the guards, thinking the whole city was occupied, fled, some of them along the wall; others leaped from the wall or were pushed over by the panic-stricken crowd. A large part of the people, however, were unaware of the great danger; for all were heavy with wine and sleep, and in a city of immense size knowledge concerning its quarters failed to reach the whole. At daybreak Marcellus burst open the Hexapylon, and entering the city with his entire force awakened everybody and set them to arming themselves and bringing aid, if possible, to a city now all but captured.

Epicydes came out from the Island, which they themselves call Nasos,[1] with a quickly moving column, not doubting that he would drive out a few men who, owing to the carelessness of the guards had got over the wall. When men met him in alarm, he would say that they were adding to the confusion and bringing exaggerated and unduly alarming news. On discovering that in and near Epipolae armed men were everywhere, he merely challenged the enemy by a few missiles and then marched his column back into Achradina. He feared, not so much the attack of the enemy and their great numbers, as that some treachery within the city might have opportunity to break out, and he might find the gates of Achradina and the Island closed during the disturbance. Marcellus, on entering the walls and from the higher ground viewing one of the most beautiful of all cities[2] in pulcherrimam subiectam oculis vidit, inlacrimasse dicitur partim gaudio tantae perpetratae rei, partim 12 vetusta gloria urbis. Atheniensium classes demersae et duo ingentes exercitus cum duobus clarissimis ducibus deleti occurrebant et tot bella cum Carthagi-

A.U.C. 542

13 niensibus tanto cum discrimine gesta, tot tam opulenti tyranni regesque, praeter ceteros Hiero cum recentissimae memoriae rex, tum ante omnia quae virtus ei fortunaque sua dederat beneficiis
14 in populum Romanum insignis. Ea cum universa occurrerent animo subiretque cogitatio, iam illa momento horae arsura omnia et ad cineres reditura, 15 priusquam signa Achradinam admoveret, praemittit Syracusanos qui intra praesidia Romana, ut ante dictum est, fuerant, ut adloquio leni pellicerent[1] hostis ad dedendam urbem.

XXV. Tenebant Achradinae portas murosque maxume transfugae, quibus nulla erat per condiciones veniae spes; ei nec adire muros nec adloqui quem-
2 quam passi. Itaque Marcellus, postquam id ineptum inritum fuit, ad Euryalum signa referri iussit. Tumulus est in extrema parte urbis aversus a mari viaeque imminens ferenti in agros mediterraneaque insulae, percommode situs ad commeatus excipiendos.
3 Praerat huic arci Philodemus Argivus ab Epicyde impositus; ad quem missus a Marcello Sosis, unus

[1] pellicerent $M^1?A^2$: pellerent $P(1)$: im- Weissenborn.

---

[1] I.e. Nicias and Demosthenes.

[2] At the western apex of the triangle; a narrow ridge nearly 500 feet above the sea, with a commanding view.

that age lying before his eyes, is said to have wept, B.C. 212 partly for joy over his great achievement, partly for the ancient glory of the city. The sinking of the fleets of the Athenians and the destruction of two mighty armies along with two very distinguished generals[1] came to his mind, and so many wars waged with so great a risk against the Carthaginians; tyrants and kings, so many and so wealthy, above all Hiero, a king vividly remembered and also, above all that his own merit and success had given him, conspicuous for his favours to the Roman people. Since all that came to mind and the thought suggested itself that now in the course of an hour everything there would be in flames and reduced to ashes, before advancing his standards into Achradina, he sent forward the Syracusans who had been within the Roman lines, as has been said before, in order to entice the enemy by mild words to surrender the city.

XXV. Holding the gates and walls of Achradina were chiefly deserters, who had no hope of pardon if terms were made. They did not allow the men either to approach the walls or to speak to any one. And so Marcellus, now that this attempt was fruitless, ordered the standards to be carried back to Euryalus. This is a hill[2] in the most distant part of the city, facing away from the sea, and commanding the road which leads to the country and the interior of the island, very conveniently placed for receiving supplies. In command of this citadel[3] was Philodemus the Argive, posted there by Epicydes. Sosis, one of the slayers

[3] The crowning point of Dionysius' great fortifications, and still accounted the strongest of Greek fortresses, with its three fosses, its towers, and a complicated system of tunnels cut through solid rock.

A.U.C. 542

ex interfectoribus tyranni, cum longo sermone habito dilatus per frustrationem esset, rettulit Marcello tempus cum ad deliberandum sumpsisse. 4 Cum is diem de die differret, dum Hippocrates atque Himilco admoverent castra legionesque,[1] haud dubius, si in arcem accepisset eos, deleri 5 Romanum exercitum inclusum muris posse, Marcellus, ut Euryalum neque tradi neque capi vidit posse, inter Neapolim et Tycham—nomina ea partium urbis et instar urbium sunt—posuit castra, timens ne, si frequentia intrasset loca, contineri ab discursu miles 6 avidus praedae non posset. Legati eo ab Tycha et Neapoli cum infulis et velamentis venerunt, precantes 7 ut a caedibus et ab incendiis parceretur. De quorum precibus quam postulatis magis consilio habito Marcellus ex omnium sententia edixit militibus ne quis liberum corpus violaret: cetera praedae 8 futura. Castra testis[2] parietum pro muro saepta; portis regione platearum patentibus stationes praesidiaque disposuit, ne quis in discursu militum 9 impetus in castra fieri posset. Inde signo dato milites discurrerunt; refractisque foribus cum omnia terrore ac tumultu streperent, a caedibus tamen temperatum est; rapinis nullus ante modus fuit quam omnia diuturna felicitate cumulata bona

[1] -que C^1A^2: om. $P(1)$.

[2] testis M. Müller (after -que testis Rōhl, Riemann): -que tectis $P(1)$: obiectu Stroth, Madvig[3], Walters: contextu Madvig[1] (praef.), Luchs: contextis Heusinger.

[1] Cf. XXIV. xxx. 14.

[2] Here the text is very uncertain, but most of the emendations are open to serious objections, as involving Marcellus' use of more or less continuous house-walls—a feeble defence, and not easily to be reconciled with the idea of an open space lying between two built-up quarters of the city.

of the tyrant, was sent to him by Marcellus, and after B.C. 212 being balked and put off by the delivery of a long speech, he reported to Marcellus that Philodemus had taken time to consider. Philodemus was postponing from day to day, waiting for Hippocrates and Himilco to move up their camp and legions, and not doubting that, if he should get them into the citadel, the Roman army, shut up within the city walls, could be destroyed. Consequently Marcellus, seeing that Euryalus could neither be won by surrender nor by assault, pitched his camp between Neapolis and Tycha, these being the names of quarters of the city, virtually cities in themselves. For he feared that, if he should enter thickly settled parts, the soldiers in their eagerness for booty could not be restrained from scattering. To this camp came legates from Tycha and Neapolis with fillets and woollen bands,[1] praying that they be spared bloodshed and fires. Marcellus held a council in regard to their prayers—such they were rather than demands—and with the approval of all gave an order to the soldiers that no one should injure a free person; everything else would be spoil. The camp was enclosed by bricks from house-walls [2] to serve as a wall of defence. At those camp gates which opened toward the streets outposts and detachments were stationed by Marcellus, that no attack upon the camp might occur while the soldiers were dispersed. Then at a given signal the soldiers scattered. And although doors were forced and everywhere were the sounds of panic and uproar, they nevertheless refrained from bloodshed. To plundering there was no limit until they had carried away all the possessions accumulated in a long-continued prosperity.

A.U.C. 542

10 egesserunt. Inter haec et Philodemus, cum spes auxilii nulla esset, fide accepta ut inviolatus ad Epicyden rediret, deducto praesidio tradidit tumulum
11 Romanis. Aversis omnibus ad tumultum ex parte captae urbis Bomilcar noctem eam nactus qua propter vim tempestatis stare ad ancoram in salo Romana
12 classis non posset, cum triginta quinque navibus ex portu Syracusano profectus libero mari vela in altum dedit quinque et quinquaginta navibus Epicydae
13 et Syracusanis relictis; edoctisque Carthaginiensibus in quanto res Syracusana discrimine esset, cum centum navibus post paucos dies redit, multis, ut fama est, donis ex Hieronis gaza ab Epicyde donatus.

XXVI. Marcellus Euryalo recepto praesidioque addito una cura erat liber, ne qua ab tergo vis hostium in arcem accepta inclusos impeditosque moe-
2 nibus suos turbaret. Achradinam inde trinis castris per idonea dispositis loca spe ad inopiam omnium
3 rerum inclusos redacturum, circumsedit. Cum per aliquot dies quietae stationes utrimque fuissent, repente adventus Hippocratis et Himilconis ut ultro
4 undique oppugnarentur Romani fecit. Nam et Hippocrates castris ad magnum portum communitis signoque iis dato qui Achradinam tenebant castra vetera Romanorum adortus est, quibus Crispinus praeerat, et Epicydes eruptionem in stationes Marcelli fecit, et classis Punica litori quod inter urbem

[1] Cf. XXIV. xxxiii. 3; xxxix. 12.

prosperity. Meanwhile even Philodemus, having B.C. 212
no hope of assistance and receiving assurance that he might return unharmed to Epicydes, led his garrison out and surrendered the hill to the Romans. While the attention of all was diverted in the direction of the uproar of a city in part captured, Bomilcar, favoured by such a night that on account of a violent storm the Roman fleet could not ride at anchor in open water, came out of the harbour of Syracuse with thirty-five ships, and with no enemy to prevent, put to sea, leaving fifty-five ships to Epicydes and the Syracusans. And after informing the Carthaginians how critical was the situation at Syracuse, he returned after a few days with a hundred ships. He was presented with many gifts, it is reported, by Epicydes out of the royal treasures of Hiero.

XXVI. Marcellus, after getting possession of Euryalus and garrisoning it, was relieved of one fear, that some troops of the enemy in the rear might be admitted to the citadel and embarrass his men, hemmed in and hampered by the walls. He thereupon laid siege to Achradina with three camps placed in suitable positions, in the hope of reducing the beleaguered to absolute want. When the outposts on both sides had been inactive for some days, suddenly the arrival of Hippocrates and Himilco had the effect that the Romans were actually besieged on all sides. For Hippocrates, after fortifying a camp by the Great Harbour and giving the signal to the forces occupying Achradina, attacked the old Roman camp,[1] which was commanded by Crispinus, at the same time that Epicydes made a sally against Marcellus' outposts, and just when the Carthaginian fleet put in to the shore lying between the city and et castra Romana erat adpulsa est, ne quid praesidii Crispino submitti a Marcello posset. Tumultum tamen maiorem hostes praebuerunt quam certamen; nam et Crispinus Hippocraten non reppulit tantum munimentis, sed insecutus etiam est trepide fugientem, et Epicyden Marcellus in urbem compulit; satisque iam etiam in posterum videbatur provisum ne quid ab repentinis eorum excursionibus periculi foret. Accessit et ab [1] pestilentia commune malum quod facile utrorumque animos averteret a belli consiliis. Nam tempore autumni et locis natura gravibus, multo tamen magis extra urbem quam in urbe, intoleranda vis aestus per utraque castra omnium ferme corpora movit. Ac primo temporis ac loci vitio et aegri erant et moriebantur; postea curatio ipsa et contactus aegrorum volgabat morbos, ut aut neglecti desertique qui incidissent morerentur, aut adsidentis curantisque eadem vi morbi repletos secum traherent, cotidianaque funera et mors ob oculos esset et undique dies noctesque ploratus audirentur. Postremo ita adsuetudine mali efferaverant animos ut non modo lacrimis iustoque conploratu prosequerentur mortuos, sed ne efferrent quidem aut sepelirent, iacerentque strata exanima corpora inconspectu similem mortem expectantium, mortuique aegros, aegri validos cum metu, tum tabe ac pestifero odore corporum conficerent; et ut ferro potius morerentur, quidam invadebant soli hostium stationes.

A.U.C. 542

[1] ab Salvinius: ad P(1): ad haec A^y Walters: om. C^z Conway.

the Roman camp, to make it impossible for any force B.C. 212 to be sent to the aid of Crispinus by Marcellus. However, it was more of an uproar than a battle that the enemy offered. For Crispinus not only drove Hippocrates back from his fortifications, but also pursued him as he fled in disorder, and Marcellus likewise forced Epicydes into the city. And now, even for the future, he seemed to have sufficiently insured that there should be no danger from their sudden raids. And in addition pestilence brought to both sides a calamity which forthwith diverted the attention of the two armies from strategy. For owing to the autumn season and places naturally unhealthy, unendurable heat affected the health of nearly all the men in both camps, but much more outside the city than within. And at first they sickened and died owing to the season and their position. Later the mere care of the ill and contagion spread the disease, so that those who had fallen ill died neglected and abandoned, or else they carried off with them those who sat by them and those who nursed, having caught the same malignant disease. And so every day funerals and death were before their eyes, and wailings were heard on all sides day and night. Finally, from habituation to misery they had so lost their humane feelings that, so far from escorting the dead with tears and the wailing that was their due, they did not even carry them out and bury them; and dead bodies lay strewn about before the eyes of men awaiting a like death, and the dead seriously affected the ill, the ill the sound, not only through fear, but also by putrefaction and the pestilent odour of corpses. And some, to die by the sword instead, would dash into the outposts of 12 Multo tamen vis maior pestis Poenorum castra quam Romana invaserat; nam Romani[1] diu circumsedendo 13 Syracusas caelo aquisque adsuerant magis. Ex hostium exercitu Siculi, ut primum videre ex gravitate loci volgari morbos, in suas quisque propinquas 14 urbes dilapsi sunt: et Carthaginienses, quibus nusquam receptus erat, cum ipsis ducibus Hippocrate atque Himilcone ad internecionem omnes 15 perierunt. Marcellus, ut tanta vis ingruebat mali, traduxerat in urbem suos infirmaque corpora tecta et umbrae recreaverant; multi tamen ex Romano exercitu eadem peste absumpti sunt.

A.U.C. 542

XXVII. Deleto terrestri Punico exercitu Sieuli qui Hippocratis milites fuerant . . .,[2] haud magna oppida, ceterum et situ et munimentis tuta; tria milia alterum ab Syracusis, alterum quindecim abest; eo et commeatus e civitatibus suis comporta- 2 bant et auxilia accersebant. Interea Bomilcar iterum cum classe profectus Carthaginem, ita exposita fortuna sociorum ut spem faceret non ipsis modo salutarem opem ferri posse, sed Romanos quoque in 3 capta quodam modo urbe capi, perpulit ut onerarias naves quam plurumas omni copia rerum onustas 4 secum mitterent classemque suam augerent. Igitur centum triginta navibus longis, septingentis onerariis profectus a Carthagine satis prosperos

[1] invaserat; nam Romani H. J. Müller: om. P(1), a lost line.

[2] Missing are two town names and perhaps ceperant, in an omitted line.

---

[1] One of the two omitted towns was perhaps Bidis, mentioned by Cicero in Verrem II. 53. Rossbach and Conway thought that the other might be Dascon (Thucydides and Diodorus).

the enemy single-handed. A much more violent B.C. 212 epidemic, however, had attacked the Carthaginian camp than the Roman. For the Romans in their long blockade of Syracuse had grown more accustomed to the climate and the water. Of the enemy's army, the Sicilians scattered, each to his own neighbouring city, as soon as they saw that the disease was spreading owing to the unwholesomeness of the place, while the Carthaginians, who had no refuge anywhere, with even their generals, Hippocrates and Himilco, perished to the last man. Marcellus, as soon as the pestilence began to be so serious, had transferred his soldiers into the city, and shelter and shade had revived the invalids. Nevertheless many in the Roman army were carried off by the same pestilence.

XXVII. The Carthaginian land-army having been destroyed, the Sicilians who had been Hippocrates' soldiers had occupied . . .,[1] not large towns, but defended both by situation and fortifications. One of them is three miles from Syracuse, the other fifteen miles. To these they were bringing supplies from their own communities and also summoning auxiliaries. Meanwhile Bomilcar left for Carthage a second time with his fleet, and he set forth the situation of their allies in such terms as to inspire hope, not only that effectual aid could be lent to them, but also that the Romans could be captured in the virtually captured city. He thus prevailed upon them to send with him as many transports as possible, laden with all kinds of supplies, and to enlarge his fleet. Accordingly, setting out from Carthage with a hundred and thirty warships and seven hundred transports, he had winds quite favourable for the ventos ad traiciendum in Siciliam habuit; sed iidem

A.U.C. 512

5 venti superare eum Pachynum prohibebant. Bomilcaris adventus fama primo, dein praeter spem mora cum gaudium et metum in vicem Romanis Syra-
6 cusanisque praebuisset, Epicydes metuens ne, si pergerent iidem qui tum tenebant ab ortu solis flare per dies plures venti, classis Punica Africam
7 repeteret, tradita Achradina mercennariorum mili-
8 tum ducibus ad Bomilcarem navigat. Classem in statione versa in Africam habentem atque timentem navale proelium, non tam quod impar viribus aut numero navium esset—quippe etiam plures habebat —quam quod venti aptiores Romanae quam suae classi flarent, perpulit tamen ut fortunam navalis
9 certaminis experiri vellet. Et Marcellus, cum et Siculum exercitum ex tota insula conciri videret et eum ingenti commeatu classem Punicam adventare, ne simul terra marique inclusus urbe hostium urgeretur, quamquam impar numero navium erat, prohibere aditu Syracusarum Bomilcarem constituit.
10 Duae classes infestae circa promunturium Pachynum stabant, ubi prima tranquillitas maris in altum
11 evexisset, concursurae. Itaque cadente iam Euro, qui per dies aliquot saevierat, prior Bomilcar movit; cuius primo classis petere altum visa est, quo facilius
12 superaret promunturium; ceterum postquam tendere ad se Romanas naves vidit, incertum qua subita crossing to Sicily. But the same winds did not allow B.C. 212 him to round Pachynum. The report at first of Bomilcar's coming, and then its unexpected delay, brought rejoicing and fear by turns to Romans and Syracusans. Upon that Epicydes, fearing that, if the same winds which were then holding should continue to blow from the east for several days, the Carthaginian fleet would make for Africa again, turned over Achradina to the commanders of the mercenaries and sailed to meet Bomilcar, who was keeping his fleet in a roadstead facing Africa. He feared a naval battle, not so much because he was inferior in his forces and the number of his ships —in fact he had even more—as because the winds then blowing were more favourable to the Roman fleet than to his own. Nevertheless Epicydes gained his consent to try the fortune of a naval engagement. And Marcellus too, seeing that a Sicilian army was being brought together from the entire island and at the same time a Carthaginian fleet was approaching with unlimited supplies, and fearing that he might be hard pressed by land and sea, being shut up within the enemies' city, decided, although he was inferior in the number of his ships, to prevent Bomilcar from reaching Syracuse. The two opposing fleets lay on this side and that of the promontory of Pachynum, ready to engage as soon as calm weather should enable them to put to sea. And so, as the southeast wind, which had been blowing hard for some days, was now dropping, Bomilcar was the first to get under weigh. And at first his fleet appeared to be heading out to sea, the more readily to round the promontory. But on seeing that the Roman ships were steering towards

A.U.C. 512 territus re, Bomilcar vela in altum dedit missisque nuntiis Heracleam qui onerarias retro inde Africam repetere iuberent, ipse Siciliam praetervectus Tarentum petit. Epicydes, a tanta repente destitutus spe, ne in obsidionem magna ex parte captae urbis rediret, Agrigentum navigat, expectaturus magis eventum quam inde quicquam moturus.

XXVIII. Quae ubi in castra Siculorum sunt nuntiata, Epicyden Syracusis excessisse, a Carthaginiensibus relictam insulam et prope iterum traditam Romanis, legatos de conditionibus dedendae urbis explorata prius per conloquia voluntate eorum qui obsidebantur ad Marcellum mittunt. Cum haud ferme discreparet quin quae ubique regum fuissent Romanorum essent, Siculis cetera cum libertate ac legibus suis servarentur, evocatis ad conloquium iis quibus ab Epicyde creditae res erant, missos se simul ad Marcellum, simul ad eos ab exercitu Siculorum aiunt, ut una omnium qui obsiderentur quique extra obsidionem fuissent fortuna esset neve alteri proprie sibi paciscerentur quicquam. Recepti deinde ab iis, ut necessarios hospitesque adloquerentur, expositis quae pacta iam cum Marcello haberent, oblata spe salutis perpulere eos ut secum praefectos Epicydis Polyclitum et Philistionem et Epicyden, cui Sindon cognomen erat, adgrederentur. Interfectis iis et

[1] Cf. XXIV. xxxv. 3.

him, Bomilcar, alarmed by something unforeseen, B.C. 212 made sail for open water, and after sending messengers to Heraclea [1] to command the transports to return thence to Africa, he himself sailed along the coast of Sicily and made for Tarentum. Epicydes, suddenly bereft of a hope so high, in order not to return, only to share the siege of a city in large part captured, sailed to Agrigentum, intending to await the outcome, rather than to set anything in motion from there.

XXVIII. When these things were reported to the camp of the Sicilians, that Epicydes had left Syracuse, that the island had been abandoned by the Carthaginians and almost handed over a second time to the Romans, after first ascertaining by conferences the wish of the besieged, they sent legates to Marcellus to make terms for the surrender of the city. It was virtually agreed that all that had anywhere belonged to the kings should belong to the Romans, that everything else should be secured to the Sicilians along with freedom and their own laws. Accordingly the legates summoned to a conference the men to whom power had been entrusted by Epicydes, and said that they had been sent by the army of the Sicilians at the same time to Marcellus and to them, in order that all, the besieged and those who had been outside of the operations, might share the same lot and neither party make any special terms for itself. And then, being admitted by them, that they might speak with their relatives and guest-friends, they explained the terms which they had already settled with Marcellus, and by holding out assurances of safety prevailed upon them to join with themselves in an attack upon Epicydes' prefects, Polyclitus and Philistion and an Epicydes surnamed Sindon. After slaying them and multitudine ad contionem vocata, inopiam quaeque ipsi inter se fremere occulti[1] soliti erant conquesti, quamquam tot mala urgerent, negarunt fortunam accusandam esse, quod in ipsorum esset potestate

A.U.C. 542

7 quamdiu ea paterentur. Romanis causam oppugnandi Syracusas fuisse caritatem Syracusanorum, non odium; nam ut occupatas res ab satellitibus Hannibalis, deinde Hieronymi, Hippocrate atque Epicyde, audierint, tum bellum movisse et obsidere urbem coepisse, ut crudelis tyrannos eius, non ut
8 ipsam urbem expugnarent. Hippocrate vero interempto, Epicyde intercluso ab Syracusis et praefectis eius occisis, Carthaginiensibus omni possessione Siciliae terra marique pulsis, quam superesse causam Romanis cur non, perinde ac si Hiero ipse viveret, unicus Romanae amicitiae cultor, incolumis Syracusas
9 esse velint? Itaque nec urbi nec hominibus aliud periculum quam ab semet ipsis esse, si occasionem reconciliandi se Romanis praetermisissent; eam autem, qualis illo momento horae sit, nullam deinde fore, si simul liberatas ab impotentibus tyrannis . . .[2] apparuisset.

XXIX. Omnium ingenti adsensu audita ea oratio est. Praetores tamen prius creari quam legatos nominari placuit; ex ipsorum deinde praetorum

[1] occulti P(2): occulte A.

[2] A lacuna variously supplied, e.g. Syracusas esse et applicare se Romanis Madvig (two lines): accipere noluissent Walters (one line after apparuisset).

---

[1] Madvig's restoration is based upon the idea of an immediate return to their former friendship ("and was taking the Roman side"). Walters supplied the thought that the Romans might even reject such advances.

calling the populace to an assembly, they complained B.C. 212 of privation and other things at which among themselves they had been in the habit of murmuring in secret. And they said that, although so many hardships were a burden to them, they ought not to blame fortune, because it was in their own power to say how long they would endure them. The Romans, they said, had had as their ground for besieging Syracuse their love, not hatred, of the Syracusans. For on learning that the power had been seized by Hippocrates and Epicydes, minions of Hannibal and later of Hieronymus, it was then that they had made war and had begun to besiege the city, in order to capture, not the city itself, but its cruel tyrants. But now that Hippocrates had perished, that Epicydes had been cut off from Syracuse and his prefects slain, now that the Carthaginians had everywhere been driven by land and sea from their occupation of Sicily, what reason remained for the Romans not to wish Syracuse to be preserved, just as if Hiero himself, who was unrivalled in maintaining friendship with Rome, were still alive? Accordingly both for the city and for individuals there was no other danger than from themselves, if they should let slip the opportunity of a reconciliation with the Romans. Moreover so favourable an opportunity as there was at that moment, if it should be evident that Syracuse, once it had been freed from insolent tyrants, . . . ,[1] would never come again.

XXIX. The speech was heard with great and unanimous approval. It was decided, however, to elect magistrates before naming legates. Then out of the number of these magistrates' representatives

A.U.C. 542

2 numero missi oratores ad Marcellum, quorum princeps "Neque primo" inquit "Syracusani a vobis defecimus, sed Hieronymus, nequaquam tam
3 in vos impius quam in nos, nec postea pacem tyranni caede compositam Syracusanus quisquam, sed satellites regii Hippocrates atque Epicydes oppressis nobis hinc metu, hinc fraude turbaverunt. Nec quisquam dicere potest aliquando nobis libertatis tempus fuisse quod paeis vobiscum non fuerit.
4 Nunc certe caede eorum qui oppressas tenebant Syracusas cum primum nostri arbitrii esse coepimus, extemplo venimus ad tradenda arma, dedendos nos, urbem, moenia, nullam recusandam fortunam quae
5 imposita a vobis fuerit. Gloriam captae nobilissimae pulcherrimaeque urbis Graecarum dei tibi dederunt, Marcelle. Quidquid umquam terra marique memorandum gessimus, id tui triumphi titulo
6 accedit. Famaene credi velis quanta urbs a te capta sit, quam posteris quoque eam spectaculo esse, quo quisquis terra, quisquis mari venerit, nunc nostra de Atheniensibus Carthaginiensibusque tropaea, nunc tua de nobis ostendat, incolumesque Syracusas familiae vestrae sub clientela nominis Marcellorum 7 tutelaque habendas tradas? Ne plus apud vos Hieronymi quam Hieronis memoria momenti faciat. Diutius ille multo amicus fuit quam hic hostis, et were sent to Marcellus. The foremost of these said: B.C. 212

"In the beginning it was not we Syracusans who forsook your friendship, but Hieronymus, who was by no means so conscienceless toward you as toward us. And later the peace concluded on the assassination of the tyrant was broken, not by any Syracusan, but by the king's minions, Hippocrates and Epicydes, after they had subdued us, now by terrorizing, now by treason. Nor can any man say that there has ever been any time of freedom for us that was not a time of peace with you. Certain it is that now, when through the slaying of those who were holding Syracuse in subjection we have begun for the first time to be our own masters, we have come forthwith to give up our arms, to surrender ourselves, the city, the walls, to reject no lot which shall be imposed by you Romans. The glory of capturing the most notable and most beautiful of Greek cities the gods have given to you, Marcellus. All that we have ever accomplished on land and sea that is worthy of record is added to the distinction of your triumph. Would you wish men merely to believe tradition as to the greatness of the city you have captured, rather than that it be a sight even to posterity, a city which shall show to every man who comes by land or by sea, at one spot our trophies won from the Athenians and the Carthaginians, at another your trophies won from us, and that you hand over Syracuse intact to your house, to be kept under the clientship and tutelage of those who bear the name Marcellus? Let not the memory of Hieronymus have more weight with you Romans than that of Hiero. The latter was much longer your friend than the former your enemy; and you

A.U.C. 542

illius benefacta etiam re[1] sensistis, huius amentia
8 ad perniciem tantum ipsius valuit." Omnia et impetrabilia et tuta erant apud Romanos: inter ipsos plus belli ac periculi erat. Namque transfugae, tradi se Romanis rati, mercennariorum quoque militum auxilia in eundem compulere metum;
9 arreptisque armis praetores primum obtruncant, inde ad caedem Syracusanorum discurrunt quosque fors obtulit irati interfecere atque omnia quae in promptu
10 erant diripuerunt. Tum, ne sine ducibus essent, sex praefectos creavere, ut terni Achradinae ac Naso praeessent. Sedato tandem tumultu exequentibus sciscitando quae acta cum Romanis essent, dilucere id quod erat coepit, aliam suam ac perfugarum causam esse.

XXX. In tempore legati a Marcello redierunt, falsa eos suspicione incitatos memorantes nec causam expetendae poenae eorum ullam Romanis esse.
2 Erat e tribus Achradinae praefectis Hispanus, Moericus nomine. Ad eum inter comites legatorum de industria unus ex Hispanorum auxiliaribus est missus, qui sine arbitris Moericum nanctus primum quo in statu reliquisset Hispaniam—et nuper inde venerat—exponit: omnia Romanis ibi obtineri armis.
3 Posse eum, si operae pretium faciat, principem popularium esse, seu militare cum Romanis seu in patriam reverti libeat; contra, si malle obsideri

[1] re PC: pre P^2?(10): recentia M. Müller: rebus adversis Luchs.

---

[1] I.e. the mercenaries.
[2] We learn from XXVI. xxi. 13 that his name was Belligenes.

have had positive experience of the good deeds of B.C. 212
the one, while the other's folly resulted only in his own destruction." Everything could be obtained from the Romans and was already assured. It was among the Sicilians themselves that war and danger chiefly lay. For the deserters, thinking that they would surely be handed over to the Romans, aroused the mercenary auxiliaries also to the same fear. And seizing arms they[1] first slew the magistrates and then dispersed to massacre the Syracusans, and in anger they slew all whom chance threw in their way and carried off everything on which they could lay hands. Then, not to be without commanders, they chose six prefects, three to be in charge of Achradina and three of Nasus. When the uproar was at last stilled and they were diligently enquiring what terms had been made with the Romans, the truth began to dawn upon them, that their case was different from that of the deserters.

XXX. Just at the right moment the legates returned from Marcellus, stating that the mercenaries had been aroused by an unfounded suspicion, and that the Romans had no reason for demanding their punishment. One of the three prefects of Achradina was a Spaniard, Moericus by name. To him, among the retinue of the legates, one[2] of the Spanish auxiliaries was sent on purpose. Finding Moericus alone, he first explained the condition in which he had left Spain, from which he had recently come. The whole of that country, he said, was held by Roman arms. If he should do something worth while, he could be a chief among his own people, whether he preferred to serve on the Roman side or to return to his native town. On the other hand, if he pergat, quam spem esse terra marique clauso? 4 Motus his Moericus, cum legatos ad Marcellum mitti placuisset, fratrem inter eos mittit, qui per eundem illum Hispanum secretus ab aliis ad Marcellum deductus, cum fidem accepisset composuissetque 5 agendae ordinem rei. Achradinam redit. Tum Moericus, ut ab suspicione proditionis averteret omnium animos, negat sibi placere legatos commeare ultro citroque: neque recipiendum quemquam neque mittendum et, quo intentius custodiae serventur, opportuna dividenda praefectis esse, ut suae quisque partis tutandae reus sit. Omnes 6 adsensi sunt. Partibus dividendis ipsi regio evenit ab Arethusa fonte usque ad ostium magni portus; 7 id ut scirent Romani fecit. Itaque Marcellus nocte navem onerariam cum armatis remulco quadriremis trahi ad Achradinam [1] iussit exponique milites regione 8 portae quae prope fontem Arethusam est. Hoc cum quarta vigilia factum esset expositosque milites porta, ut convenerat, recepisset Moericus, luce prima Marcellus omnibus copiis moenia Achradinae adgre- 9 ditur, ita ut non eos solum qui Achradinam tenebant in se converteret, sed ab Naso etiam agmina armatorum concurrerent relictis stationibus suis ad vim 10 et impetum Romanorum arcendum. In hoc tumultu actuariae naves instructae iam ante circumvectaeque ad Nasum armatos exponunt, qui improviso adorti

A.U.C. 542

[1] Achradinam P(1): Nasum H. J. Müller.

---

[1] An evident error for the Island (Nasus), due possibly to Livy's attempt to combine several different accounts. There is further confusion in the passage which follows.

continued to prefer to be besieged, what hope was B.C. 212 there for a man shut in by land and sea? Moericus was impressed by these words, and when it was decided to send legates to Marcellus, sent his brother as one of them. He was escorted separately from the rest to Marcellus by that same Spaniard, and after receiving a promise and arranging the steps to be taken, returned to Achradina. Then Moericus, to divert the attention of everybody from the suspicion of treason, said he did not approve of having legates going back and forth; that none should be admitted or sent; and that, in order to keep a closer guard, suitable positions should be divided among the prefects, so that each should be responsible for the defence of his own section. All agreed. In the assignment of sections the region extending from the Fountain of Arethusa to the entrance of the Great Harbour fell to Moericus himself. He saw to it that the Romans knew that. Accordingly Marcellus ordered a transport with armed men to be towed at night by a four-banker to Achradina,[1] and the soldiers to be landed near the gate which is by the Fountain of Arethusa. This done at the fourth watch, and the soldiers landed there having been admitted according to agreement by Moericus through the gate, Marcellus at daybreak with all his forces assailed the walls of Achradina. The result was that not only did he turn the attention of the defenders of Achradina to himself, but from Nasus also columns of armed men, leaving their posts, united in haste, to ward off the violent attack of the Romans. During this confusion light vessels, previously equipped, sailed around to Nasus and landed their troops. These made an unexpected attack upon semiplenas stationes et adapertas fores portae, qua paulo ante excurrerant armati, haud magno certamine Nasum cepere desertam trepidatione et fuga 11 custodum. Neque in ullis minus praesidii aut pertinaciae ad manendum quam in transfugis fuit, quia ne suis quidem satis credentes e medio certa-

A.U.C. 542

12 mine effugerunt. Marcellus, ut captam esse Nasum comperit [1] et Achradinae regionem unam teneri Moericumque cum praesidio suis adiunctum, receptui cecinit, ne regiae opes, quarum fama maior quam res erat, diriperentur.

XXXI. Suppresso impetu militum ut iis qui in Achradina erant transfugis spatium locusque fugae
2 datus est, Syracusani tandem liberi metu portis Achradinae apertis oratores ad Marcellum mittunt, nihil petentis aliud quam incolumitatem sibi liberis-
3 que suis. Marcellus consilio advocato et adhibitis etiam Syracusanis qui per seditiones pulsi ab domo
4 intra praesidia Romana fuerant, respondit non plura per annos quinquaginta benefacta Hieronis quam paucis his annis maleficia eorum qui Syracusas tenuerint erga populum Romanum esse; sed pleraque eorum quo debuerint receidisse, foederumque ruptorum ipsos ab se graviores multo quam populus
5 Romanus voluerit poenas exegisse. Se quidem tertium annum circumsedere Syracusas, non ut populus Romanus servam [2] civitatem haberet, sed

[1] comperit Weissenborn: om. P(1): vidit (after ut) Walters.

[2] Romanus (i.e. R.) servam x Sigonius: reservatam P(10): -ta C.

the half-manned outposts and the open doors of the gate through which the armed men had dashed out a little while before, and with no great resistance captured Nasus, deserted by the excitement and flight of the guards. And no others showed less capacity to defend or determination to hold out than the deserters, since they did not quite trust even their own men and fled out of the midst of the conflict. Marcellus, on learning that Nasus had been captured and one section of Achradina occupied, also that Moericus with his force had joined the Romans, sounded the recall, to prevent the royal treasures, which were reported to be larger than they really were, from being plundered. B.C. 212

XXXI. The onslaught of the soldiers being checked and time and place for their flight given to the deserters who were in Achradina, the Syracusans, at last relieved of their fear, open the gates of Achradina and send representatives to Marcellus, asking nothing else than their own lives and those of their children. Marcellus, calling a council and admitting also those Syracusans who, after being driven from home during the uprisings, had been inside the Roman lines, replied that the good acts of Hiero toward the Roman people during fifty years had not been more numerous than the evil deeds done in the last few years by those who held Syracuse. But most of the misdeeds, he said, had reacted just as they should, and the men had exacted from themselves much more serious penalties for the broken treaties than the Roman people wished. For his part, he was besieging Syracuse for the third year, not that the Roman people might keep the city enslaved, but to prevent the commanders of deserters

A.U.C. 542

ne transfugarum alienigenarumque [1] duces captam 6 et oppressam tenerent. Quid potuerint Syracusani facere, exemplo vel eos esse Syracusanorum qui intra praesidia Romana fuerint, vel Hispanum ducem Moericum, qui praesidium tradiderit, vel ipsorum
Syracusanorum postremo serum quidem, sed forte
7 consilium. Sibi omnium laborum periculorumque circa moenia Syracusana terra marique tam diu exhaustorum nequaquam tanti eum [2] fructum esse 8 quod capere Syracusas [3] potuisset. Inde quaestor cum praesidio ab Naso [4] ad accipiendam pecuniam regiam custodiendamque missus. Urbs [5] diripienda militi data est custodibus divisis per domos eorum 9 qui intra praesidia Romana fuerant. Cum multa irae, multa avaritiae foeda exempla ederentur, Archimeden memoriae proditum est in tanto tumultu, quantum captae terror [6] urbis in discursu diripientium militum ciere poterat, intentum formis quas in pulvere descripserat, ab ignaro milite quis esset 10 interfectum; aegre id Marcellum tulisse sepulturaeque curam habitam, et propinquis etiam inquisitis honori praesidioque nomen ac memoriam eius 11 fuisse. Hoc maxume modo Syracusae captae; in quibus praedae tantum fuit, quantum vix capta

[1] alienigenarum Hertz: mercennariorum Gerlach: om. P(1) Walters (also the -que of PC).

[2] tanti eum Harant (without assuming a laeuna below): tantum P(1) Madvig, Conway.

[3] Here Madvig inserted potuerit, quantum, si servare: Conway (after capere), sibi contigerit, quantum si servare (two lines): Gronovius conj. quam si parcere Syracusis for quod capere Syracusas.

[4] ab Naso ad Geyer: ab nassum et P(4): ad nassum et C^1M^3BDA: ad Nassum ad z Walters.

[5] Urbs x Walters: om. P(1): Achradina Weissenborn.

and foreigners from holding it in captivity and subjection. What the Syracusans could have done was shown by the example either of those Syracusans inside the Roman lines, or of the Spanish commander Moericus, who surrendered his post, or finally of the belated but courageous resolution of the Syracusans themselves. To his mind it was by no means a sufficient reward for all the hardships and dangers, so long endured on land and sea about the Syracusan walls, that he had been able to capture Syracuse. Thereupon the quaestor was sent from Nasus with a force to receive and guard the royal funds. The city was given over to the soldiers to plunder, guards being first assigned to the houses of the men who had been inside the Roman lines. While many shameful examples of anger and many of greed were being given, the tradition is that Archimedes, in all the uproar which the alarm of a captured city could produce in the midst of plundering soldiers dashing about, was intent upon the figures which he had traced in the dust and was slain by a soldier, not knowing who he was;[1] that Marcellus was grieved at this, and his burial duly provided for; and that his name and memory were an honour and a protection to his relatives, search even being made for them. Such in the main was the capture of Syracuse,[2] in which there was booty in such quantity as there would scarcely have been B.C. 212

[1] Cf. Plutarch's account, Marcellus 19; Valerius Maximus VIII. 7. Ext. 7; Cicero de Finibus V. 50.

[2] Actually the fall of Syracuse appears to have taken place in the following year, 211 B.C.

---

[6] terror Böttcher: om. P(1): pavor Weissenborn.

A.U.C. 542 Carthagine tum fuisset, cum qua[1] viribus aequis certabatur.

12 Paucis ante diebus quam Syracusae caperentur, T. Otacilius cum quinqueremibus octoginta Uticam
13 ab Lilybaeo transmisit, et cum ante lucem portum intrasset, onerarias frumento onustas cepit, egressusque in terram depopulatus est aliquantum agri circa Uticam praedamque omnis generis retro ad navis
14 egit. Lilybaeum tertio die quam inde profectus erat cum centum triginta onerariis navibus frumento praedaque onustis rediit idque frumentum extemplo
15 Syracusas misit; quod ni tam in tempore subvenisset, victoribus victisque pariter perniciosa fames instabat.

XXXII. Eadem aestate in Hispania, cum biennio ferme nihil admodum memorabile factum esset consiliisque magis quam armis bellum gereretur, Romani imperatores egressi hibernis copias coniunxerunt.
2 Ibi consilium advocatum omniumque in unum congruerunt sententiae, quando ad id locorum id modo actum esset ut Hasdrubalem tendentem in Italiam retinerent, tempus esse id iam agi ut bellum in 3 Hispania finiretur. Et satis ad id virium credebant accessisse viginti milia Celtiberorum ea hieme ad arma excita. Hostium[2] tres exercitus erant:
4 Hasdrubal Gisgonis filius et Mago coniunctis castris quinque ferme dierum iter ab Romanis aberant;
5 propior erat Hamilcaris filius Hasdrubal, vetus in Hispania imperator; ad urbem nomine Amtorgim
6 exercitum habebat. Eum volebant prius opprimi

[1] cum qua P(1) : cum (quum) Madvig.

[2] excita. Hostium Alschefski : excitatum PRM : -ta Cz : -ti DA : excitorum Gronovius.

if Carthage, with which the conflict was on even terms, had at that time been captured. B.C. 212

A few days before Syracuse was taken, Titus Otacilius with eighty five-bankers crossed over from Lilybaeum to Utica. And having entered the harbour before daylight, he captured cargo-ships laden with grain, and disembarking ravaged a considerable area around Utica and drove booty of every kind back to the ships. On the third day after he had left Lilybaeum he returned thither with a hundred and thirty cargo-ships laden with grain and booty, and sent the grain at once to Syracuse. Had it not arrived so opportunely, a famine equally destructive to victors and vanquished was impending.

XXXII. In Spain in the same summer, when for about two years[1] nothing very notable had occurred and the war was being waged more by diplomacy than by arms, the Roman generals, on leaving their winter-quarters, united their forces. Thereupon a council was called and all were of one mind, that, since up to that time they had accomplished nothing except to hold Hasdrubal back from pushing on into Italy, it was time that their task should now be to end the war in Spain. And they believed they had sufficient reinforcements for that purpose in twenty thousand Celtiberians who had been called to arms that winter. The enemy had three armies. Hasdrubal, the son of Gisgo, and Mago with adjoining camps were about five days' march from the Romans. Nearer was Hasdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, a veteran commander in Spain. He had his army near a city called Amtorgis. It was he that the

[1] This apparently from a source which placed the defeat and death of the Scipios in 211 B.C.; cf. note on xxxvi. 14.

A.U.C. 542 duces Romani; et spes erat satis superque ad id virium esse; illa restabat cura, ne fuso eo perculsi alter Hasdrubal et Mago in avios saltus montesque 7 recipientes sese bellum extraherent. Optimum igitur rati divisis bifariam copiis totius simul Hispaniae amplecti bellum, ita inter se diviserunt ut P. Cornelius duas partes exercitus Romanorum sociorumque adversus Magonem duceret atque Hasdru- 8 balem, Cn. Cornelius cum tertia parte veteris exercitus Celtiberis adiunctis cum Hasdrubale Barcino 9 bellum gereret. Una profecti ambo duces exercitusque Celtiberis praegredientibus ad urbem Amtorgim in conspectu hostium dirimente amni ponunt castra. 10 Ibi Cn. Scipio cum quibus ante dictum est copiis substitit; P. Scipio profectus ad destinatam belli partem.

XXXIII. Hasdrubal postquam animadvertit exiguum Romanum exercitum in castris et spem omnem 2 in Celtiberorum auxiliis esse, peritus omnis barbaricae et praecipue earum [1] gentium in quibus per tot 3 annos militabat perfidiae, facili linguae commercio,[2] cum utraque castra plena Hispanorum essent, per occulta conloquia paciscitur magna mercede cum Celtiberorum principibus ut copias inde abducant. 4 Nec atrox visum facinus—non enim ut in Romanos verterent arma agebatur—et merces quanta vel

[1] earum Gronovius : omnium earum P(1).
[2] commercio z Conway : om. P(1).

[1] Probably the Baetis, as Iliturgi was not far away; cf. XXVIII. xix. 2.

Roman generals wished first to overpower; and they B.C. 212 hoped they had quite ample forces for that end. The one remaining concern was the fear that, if he was defeated, the other Hasdrubal and Mago might in alarm withdraw to pathless forests and mountains and prolong the war. They thought it best therefore to divide their forces into two armies and include the whole of Spain in their plan of operations. And they divided in such manner that Publius Cornelius should lead two-thirds of the army of Romans and allies against Mago and Hasdrubal, and that Gnaeus Cornelius with one-third of the old army and the Celtiberians in addition should carry on the war with Hasdrubal Barca. Setting out together, with the Celtiberians in the van, both generals and armies pitched camp near the city of Amtorgis, in sight of the enemy, but separated by a river.[1] There Gnaeus Scipio remained with the above-mentioned forces, while Publius Scipio set out for his previously appointed share of the war.

XXXIII. Hasdrubal first noted that there was only a small army of Romans in the camp and that all their hope was in the Celtiberian auxiliaries. Then, as he was well acquainted with every form of treachery practised by barbarians and particularly by those tribes among which he had been campaigning for so many years, and as oral communication was easy, since both camps were full of Spaniards, by means of secret conferences he made an agreement with the chief men of the Celtiberians at a high price that they should withdraw their troops. Nor did it seem an outrageous act—for it was not urged that they should turn their arms against the Romans—and a price which would have been ample even for engaging pro bello satis esset dabatur ne bellum gererent, et eum quies ipsa, tum reditus domum fructusque

A.U.C. 542

5 videndi suos suaque grata vulgo erant. Itaque non ducibus facilius quam multitudini persuasum est. Simul ne metus quidem ab Romanis erat, quippe
6 tam paucis, si vi retinerent. Id quidem cavendum semper Romanis ducibus erit exemplaque haec vere pro documentis habenda, ne ita externis credant auxiliis ut non plus sui roboris suarumque proprie
7 virium in castris habeant. Signis repente sublatis Celtiberi abeunt, nihil aliud quaerentibus causam obtestantibusque ut manerent Romanis respondentes
8 quam domestico se avocari bello. Scipio, postquam socii nec precibus nec vi retineri poterant, nec se aut parem sine illis hosti esse aut fratri rursus coniungi vidit posse, nec ullum aliud salutare consilium in 9 promptu esse, retro quantum posset cedere statuit, in id omni cura intentus necubi hosti aequo se committeret loco, qui transgressus flumen prope vestigiis abeuntium insistebat.

XXXIV. Per eosdem dies P. Scipionem par terror,
2 periculum maius ab novo hoste urgebat. Masinissa erat iuvenis, eo tempore socius Carthaginiensium, quem deinde clarum potentemque Romana fecit
3 amicitia. Is tum cum equitatu Numidarum et advenienti P. Scipioni occurrit et deinde adsidue in the war was offered them not to wage war. Again, B.C. 212 not only peace itself, but also a return home and the advantage of seeing their families and their property were attractions to the mass of them. Accordingly their leaders were not more easily persuaded than the rank and file. At the same time they had no fear from the Romans either, if they, being so few in number, should try to hold them by force. It will always be a necessary precaution for Roman generals, and these instances must really be accounted warnings, not so to trust their foreign auxiliaries as not to have in camp more of their own strength and of forces that are absolutely their own. The Celtiberians suddenly took up their standards and departed, and when Romans asked the reason and implored them to remain, they gave no other answer than that they were called away by a war at home. Scipio, now that his allies could not be held either by entreaties or by force, saw that he could neither be a match for the enemy without them nor rejoin his brother, and that no other promising plan was available. Thereupon he decided to retire as far as possible, taking every care and being on the alert not to expose himself anywhere on level ground to the enemy, who crossed the river and kept almost at their heels as they withdrew.

XXXIV. About the same time Publius Scipio was beset by a fear no less grave and a danger that was greater from a new enemy. There was the young Masinissa, at that time an ally of the Carthaginians, a man whom friendship with the Romans later made famous and powerful. With his Numidian cavalry he now encountered Publius Scipio on his advance, and also was continually at hand day and night, ready

A.U.C. 542

4 dies noctesque infestus aderat, ut non vagos tantum procul a castris lignatum pabulatumque progressos exciperet, sed ipsis obequitaret castris invectusque in medias saepe stationes omnia ingenti tumultu
5 turbaret. Noctibus quoque saepe incursu repentino in portis valloque trepidatum est, nec aut locus aut tempus ullum vacuum a metu ac sollicitudine erat
6 Romanis, compulsique intra vallum adempto rerum omnium usu. Cum prope iusta obsidio esset futuramque artiorem eam appareret, si se Indibilis, quem eum septem milibus et quingentis Suessetanorum
7 adventare fama erat, Poenis coniunxisset, dux cautus et providens Scipio victus necessitatibus temerarium capit consilium, ut nocte Indibili obviam iret et, quocumque occurrisset loco, proelium
8 consereret. Relicto igitur modico praesidio in castris praepositoque Ti. Fonteio legato media nocte pro-
9 fectus cum obviis hostibus manus conseruit. Agmina magis quam acies pugnabant; superior tamen, ut in tumultuaria pugna, Romanus erat. Ceterum et equites Numidae repente, quos fefellisse se dux ratus erat, ab lateribus circumfusi magnum terrorem
10 intulere, et [1] contracto adversus Numidas certamine novo tertius insuper advenit hostis, duces Poeni adsecuti ab tergo iam pugnantis; anceps que proelium Romanos circumsteterat incertos in quem potissimum hostem quamve in partem conferti
11 eruptionem facerent. Pugnanti hortantique impera-

[1] et Crévier: om. P(1).

to attack, so that he not only captured soldiers B.C. 212 who had wandered far from the camp in search of wood and fodder, but also rode up to the camp itself, and often dashing into the midst of the outposts threw everything into great confusion. By night also there was often alarm at the gates and on the earthwork owing to a sudden attack, nor was any place or time free from fear and anxiety for the Romans, and they were confined within their earthwork, unable to obtain anything. It was almost a regular blockade, and this would evidently be stricter if Indibilis, who was reported as approaching with seven thousand five hundred Suessetani, should join the Carthaginians. Consequently Scipio, though a general marked by caution and foresight, being forced by his straits, adopted the rash plan of going by night to meet Indibilis and giving battle wherever he should encounter him. Therefore, leaving a moderate garrison at the camp and putting his lieutenant, Tiberius Fonteius, in command of it, he set out at midnight, and on meeting the enemy engaged them. It was a battle of columns rather than lines; yet, so far as could be in an engagement without order, the Roman had the advantage. But the Numidian cavalry, whose notice the general had thought he had escaped, by outflanking them inspired great alarm, and in addition, when they had entered a fresh battle with the Numidians, a third enemy also arrived, the Carthaginian generals, who from the rear overtook them when already engaged. And the Romans found themselves between two battles, uncertain against which enemy and in which direction they should choose to break through in a mass. As the general was fighting and exhorting, tori et offerenti se ubi plurimus labor erat latus dextrum lancea traicitur; cuneusque is hostium qui in confertos circa ducem impetum fecerat, ut exanimem labentem ex equo Scipionem vidit, alacres gaudio cum clamore per totam aciem nuntiantes 12 discurrunt imperatorem Romanum cecidisse. Ea pervagata passim vox ut et hostes haud dubie pro 13 victoribus et Romani pro victis essent fecit. Fuga confestim ex acie duce amisso fieri coepta est; ceterum ut ad erumpendum inter Numidas leviumque armorum alia auxilia haud difficilis erat, ita 14 effugere tantum equitum aequantiumque equos velocitate peditum vix poterant, caesique prope plures in fuga quam in pugna sunt; nec superfuisset quisquam, ni praecipiti iam ad vesperum die nox intervenisset.

A.U.C. 542

XXXV. Haud segniter inde duces Poeni fortuna usi confestim e proelio vix necessaria quiete data militibus ad Hasdrubalem Hamilcaris citatum agmen rapiunt non dubia spe, cum [1] se [2] coniunxissent, 2 debellari posse. Quo ubi est ventum, inter exercitus ducesque victoria recenti laetos gratulatio ingens facta, imperatore tanto cum omni exercitu deleto et alteram pro haud dubia parem victoriam expectantes. 3 Ad Romanos nondum quidem fama tantae cladis pervenerat, sed maestum quoddam silentium erat et and exposing himself where there was most to be B.C. 212 done, his right side was pierced by a lance. And those of the enemy who in a wedge had made an attack upon the men pressing close about the general, on seeing the dying Scipio slipping from his horse, dashed everywhere along the line, wild with delight, shouting and announcing that the Roman commander had fallen. The broadcasting of that announcement far and wide made the enemy as good as victors beyond a doubt and the Romans as good as vanquished. Flight directly from the battle-line began, once they had lost their general. But while, so far as bursting through the Numidians and the light-armed auxiliaries as well was concerned, flight was not difficult, yet it was hardly possible for them to escape such numbers of horsemen and infantry who by their speed kept up with the horses. And almost more were slain in flight than in battle, nor would anyone have survived but for the coming on of night, as the day was now rapidly drawing to a close.

[1] cum Ax: om. P(2).
[2] se x: om. P(1).

XXXV. Then the Carthaginian generals directly after the battle, making no indifferent use of their success, barely allowed their soldiers necessary rest, and rushed their column with all speed in the direction of Hasdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, with the certain hope that, when they should unite with him, the war could be finished. Upon their arrival there was great congratulation between the armies and generals rejoicing in the recent victory, since so great a general and his entire army had been destroyed, and they were looking for just such another victory as beyond question. As for the Romans, not yet indeed had a report of the great disaster reached them, but there was a gloomy silence and an unexpressed foreboding,

A.U.C. 512

tacita divinatio, qualis iam praesagientibus animis
4 inminentis mali esse solet. Imperator ipse, praeterquam quod ab sociis se desertum, hostium tantum auctas copias sentiebat, coniectura etiam et ratione ad suspicionem acceptae cladis quam ad ullam bonam
5 spem pronior erat: quonam modo enim Hasdrubalem ac Magonem, nisi defunctos suo bello, sine certamine
6 addueere exercitum potuisse? Quo modo autem non obstitisse aut ab tergo secutum fratrem, ut, si prohibere quo minus in unum coirent et duces et exercitus hostium non posset, ipse certe cum fratre
7 coniungeret copias? His anxius curis id modo esse salutare in praesens eredebat, cedere inde quantum posset; exinde[1] una nocte ignaris hostibus et ob
8 id quietis aliquantum emensus est iter. Luec ut senserunt profectos, hostes praemissis Numidis quam poterant maxime citato agmine sequi coeperunt. Ante noctem adsecuti Numidae, nunc ab tergo, nunc in latera incursantes, consistere coegerunt ac tutari
9 agmen; quantum possent tamen tuto, ut simul pugnarent procederentque Scipio hortabatur, priusquam pedestres copiae adsequerentur. XXXVI. Ceterum nunc agendo, nunc sustinendo agmen eum aliquamdiu haud multum procederetur et nox iam
2 instaret, revocat e proelio suos Scipio et conlectos in tumulum quendam non quidem satis tutum, prae-

[1] exinde Conway: et inde P(1): et Gronovius.

such as is usually the forecast of impending misfor- B.C. 212 tune when men already have presentiments. The general himself, in addition to the knowledge that he had been deserted by his allies and that the enemy's forces had been so greatly increased, was more inclined by logical inference to suspect that a disaster had occurred than to entertain any good hope. For how, he thought, could Hasdrubal and Mago, unless they had quite finished their own war, have been able to bring up their army without an engagement? And how had his brother failed to confront them or to follow in their rear, so that, if unable to prevent the generals and armies of the enemy from uniting, he might himself at least combine his forces with those of his brother? Troubled by these anxieties, he believed that the one safe course at present was to retreat as far away as possible. Then in one night, while the enemy were unaware of it and hence made no move, he marched a considerable distance. In the morning the enemy, on discovering that they had gone, sent the Numidians in advance and began to follow them in a column at its utmost speed. Before night the Numidians had overtaken them, and charging now in the rear, now on the flanks, compelled them to halt and defend their column. Scipio kept encouraging them to fight and advance at the same time, so far, that is, as they could do so with safety, before the infantry forces should overtake them. XXXVI. But while he now urged his column forward, now ordered it to halt, for a long time little progress was being made and night was now at hand. Scipio therefore recalled his men from battle, concentrated them and led them up a hill that was not indeed quite safe, especially sertim agmini pereulso, editiorem tamen quam cetera circa erant, subducit. Ibi primo impedimentis et equitatu in medium receptis circumdati pedites haud difficulter impetus incursantium Numidarum arcebant; dein, postquam toto agmine tres imperatores cum tribus iustis exercitibus aderant apparebatque parum armis ad tuendum locum sine munimento valituros esse, circumspectare atque agitare dux coepit, si quo modo posset vallum circumicere. Sed erat adeo nudus tumulus et asperi soli ut nec virgulta vallo caedendo nec terra caespiti faciendo aut ducendae fossae aliive ulli operi apta inveniri posset; nec natura quicquam satis arduum aut abscisum erat quod hosti aditum ascensumve difficilem praeberet; omnia fastigio leni subvexa. Ut tamen aliquam imaginem valli obicerent, clitellas inligatas oneribus velut struentes ad altitudinem solitam circumdabant, cumulo sarcinarum omnis generis obiecto, ubi ad moliendum clitellae defuerant.

A.U.C. 542

Punici exercitus postquam advenere, in tumulum quidem perfacile agmen erexere; munitionis facies nova primo eos velut miraculo quodam tenuit, cum duces undique vociferarentur quid starent et non ludibrium illud, vix feminis puerisve morandis satis validum, distraherent diriperentque? Captum hostem teneri, latentem post sarcinas. Haec contemptim duces increpabant; ceterum neque transilire nec moliri onera obiecta nec caedere stipatas clitellas ipsisque obrutas sarcinis facile erat. At for a terrified column, but still was higher than the B.C. 21

country around it. There the infantry, surrounding the baggage and cavalry placed in the centre, at first kept off the charges of the Numidians without difficulty. Then, when three generals arrived in full force with three regular armies, and it was evident that they would be unable by arms to defend an unfortified position, the general began to cast about and consider whether he could in some way surround it with an earthwork. But the hill was so bare and rocky that neither could thickets be found for the cutting of stakes nor ground such that they could get turf or carry a trench in it or any other earthwork. And yet no spot was naturally so elevated or rugged as to make approach or ascent difficult for the enemy. Everywhere the ground rose at a gentle slope. However, in order to interpose some semblance of an earthwork, they laid up, as it were, to the usual height all around them, pack-saddles still tied to their loads, while, wherever the pack-saddles failed to make a barricade, they piled on top lighter baggage of every kind.

The Carthaginian armies, on arriving, very easily marched in column up the hill; but the strange appearance of the defences at first checked them in a certain amazement, while their commanders kept shouting from all sides, asking why they stood still and did not pull apart and scatter that pretence, hardly strong enough to delay women or children. The enemy, they said, was held captive, lurking behind his baggage. Such were the scornful taunts of the commanders. But it was not easy to leap over or clear away the baggage in front of them, nor to cut apart the mass of pack-saddles, buried under trudibus [1] cum amoliti obiecta onera armatis dedissent viam pluribusque idem partibus fieret, capta iam 12 undique castra erant. Pauci a multis perculsique a victoribus passim caedebantur; magna pars tamen militum, cum in propinquas refugisset silvas, in castra P. Scipionis, quibus Ti. Fonteius legatus prae- 13 erat, perfugerunt. Cn. Scipionem alii in tumulo primo impetu hostium caesum tradunt, alii cum paucis in propinquam castris turrim perfugisse; hanc igni circumdatam atque ita exustis foribus, quas nulla moliri potuerant vi, captam omnisque intus cum ipso imperatore occisos.

A.U.C. 512

14 Anno octavo postquam in Hispaniam venerat Cn. Scipio, undetricensimo die post fratris mortem, est interfectus. Luctus ex morte eorum non Romae 15 maior quam per totam Hispaniam fuit; quin apud civis partem doloris et exercitus amissi et alienata 16 provincia et publica trahebat clades; Hispaniae ipsos lugebant desiderabantque duces, Gnaeum magis, quod diutius praefuerat iis priorque et favorem occupaverat et specimen iustitiae temperantiaeque Romanae primus dederat.

XXXVII. Cum deleti exercitus amissaeque Hispa- 2 niae viderentur, vir unus res perditas restituit. Erat in exercitu L. Marcius Septimi filius, eques Romanus, [1] At trudibus W. Heraeus, Walters: traditisdibi PR (divi R^1: ibi CR^cM: dibu BD: diu A): trudentes sudibus Madvig.

---

[1] Correct, though inconsistent with Livy's general chronology, which would make it the seventh year; cf. XXI. xxxii. 3. In xxxviii. 6 also Livy has followed an authority who placed the disasters in Spain in 211 B.C.; cf. note on xxxii. 1.

the added loads. But after they had cleared away B.C. 212
the baggage in front of them with hooked poles and made a way for the armed men, and the same thing was being done in different places, the camp had by this time been captured from all sides. Everywhere there was slaughter of the few by the many, of the panic-stricken by the victorious. A large part of the soldiers, however, after fleeing into the neighbouring forest, made their escape to Publius Scipio's camp, of which Tiberius Fonteius, his lieutenant, was commander. As for Gnaeus Scipio, some relate that he was slain on the hill in the first onset of the enemy, others that with a few men he made his escape to a tower near the camp: that fire was lighted around this, and so, by burning the doors which they had been unable to force in any way, they captured the tower and all were slain in it along with the commander himself.

In the eighth year[1] after his arrival in Spain Gnaeus Scipio was killed, on the twenty-ninth day after the death of his brother. Grief for their deaths was not greater in Rome than throughout Spain; in fact among the citizens the destruction of armies and the loss of a province and the national disaster claimed a part in their sorrow, while all Spain mourned for the generals themselves and missed them, Gnaeus more than Publius, because he had been longer in command and had earlier won their favour, and had given for the first time an example of Roman justice and self-control.

XXXVII. While it seemed that the armies had been wiped out and all Spain lost, a single man repaired their shattered fortunes. In the army was Lucius Marcius, son of Septimus, a Roman knight, an active impiger iuvenis animique et ingenii aliquanto quam 3 pro fortuna in qua erat natus maioris. Ad summam indolem accesserat Cn. Scipionis disciplina, sub qua 4 per tot annos omnis militiae artis edoctus fuerat. Is [1] et ex fuga collectis militibus et quibusdam de praesidiis deductis haud contemnendum exercitum fecerat iunxeratque cum Ti. Fonteio, P. Scipionis legato.

A.U.C. 542

5 Sed tantum praestitit eques Romanus auctoritate inter milites atque honore ut, castris citra Hiberum communitis, cum ducem exercitus comitiis militari-6 bus creari placuisset, subeuntes alii aliis in custodiam valli stationesque, donec per omnis suffragium iret, ad L. Marcium cuncti summam imperii detule-7 rint. Omne inde tempus—exiguum id fuit—mu-niendis castris convehendisque commeatibus consumpsit, et omnia imperia milites cum inpigre, tum 8 haudquaquam abiecto animo exequebantur. Ceterum postquam Hasdrubalem Gisgonis venientem ad reliquias belli delendas transisse Hiberum et adpro-pinquare adlatum est, signumque pugnae propositum 9 ab novo duce milites viderunt, recordati quos paulo ante imperatores habuissent quibusque et ducibus et copiis freti prodire in pugnam soliti essent, flere omnes repente et offensare capita et alii manus ad caelum tendere deos incusantes, alii strati humi 10 suum quisque nominatim ducem implorare. Neque

[1] Is Weissenborn : hic $M^{z}A^{y}$: om. P(1).

young man of much more spirit and talent than was B.C. 212 to be expected in the station in which he had been born. In addition to his high promise he had had the training of Gnaeus Scipio, in which during so many years he had mastered all the arts of the soldier. This man had made an army that was not to be despised out of soldiers gathered up from the flight and in part withdrawn from garrison towns, and he had united it with that of Tiberius Fonteius, the lieutenant of Publius Scipio. But so preëminent was a mere Roman knight in his personal influence with the soldiers and in the respect they paid him that, after they had fortified a camp on this side of the Hiberus and decided that a commander of the army should be chosen in an election by the soldiers, relieving each other as sentries on the wall and in outpost duty until all had cast their votes, they unanimously conferred the high command upon Lucius Marcius. He then spent the whole time—and it was very short—in fortifying the camp and bringing up supplies. And the soldiers carried out all his commands, not only with energy, but also in no dejected spirit. But when the news came that Hasdrubal the son of Gisgo, on his way to wipe out the last remains of the war, had crossed the Hiberus and was approaching, and the soldiers saw the signal for battle raised by a new general, they remembered what commanders they had had a short time before, and upon what generals and forces they had usually relied as they went into battle. Suddenly they all were weeping and dashing their heads against obstacles; and some raised their hands to heaven, blaming the gods, others lying on the ground invoked their respective generals by name. And the wailing sedari lamentatio poterat excitantibus centurioni bus manipulares et ipso mulcente et increpante Marcio, quod in muliebris et inutiles se proiecissent fletus potius quam ad tutandos semet ipsos et rem publicam secum acuerent animos, et ne inultos 11 imperatores suos iacere sinerent, cum subito clamor tubarumque sonus—iam enim prope vallum hostes erant—exauditur. Inde verso repente in iram luctu discurrunt [1] ad arma ac velut accensi rabie discurrunt [2] ad portas et in hostem neglegenter atque incom-12 posite venientem incurrunt. Extemplo inprovisa res pavorem incutit Poenis, mirabundique unde tot hostes subito exorti prope deleto exercitu forent, unde tanta audacia, tanta fiducia sui victis ac fugatis, quis imperator duobus Scipionibus caesis exstitisset, quis castris praeesset, quis signum dedisset pugnae—13 ad haec tot tam necopinata primo omnium incerti stupentesque referunt pedem, dein valida inpressione 14 pulsi terga vertunt. Et aut fugientium caedes foeda fuisset aut temerarius periculosusque sequentium impetus, ni Marcius propere receptui dedisset signum obsistensque ad prima signa et quosdam ipse retinens concitatam repressisset aciem.

A.U.C. 512

Inde in castra avidos adhuc caedisque et sanguinis 15 reduxit. Carthaginienses trepide primo ab hostium vallo acti, postquam neminem insequi viderunt, metu

[1] discurrunt P(3) : om. Crévier, Jac. Gronovius.

[2] discurrunt P(1) Conway : concurrunt Gronovius : Madvig rejected discurrunt ad portas et.

could not be stilled, although the centurions tried to B.C. 212 arouse the men of their maniples and Marcius himself to calm them and upbraided them for having given themselves up to womanish and useless weeping, instead of whetting their courage to defend themselves and with them the state, and begged them not to let their commanders lie unavenged, when suddenly—for the enemy were now near the earthwork—a shout and the sound of trumpets were heard. Upon that, their grief instantly changing to anger, they scatter to arms, and as if fired by frenzy, to the different gates, and dash into the enemy coming on carelessly and in disorder. At once the unexpected act inspired alarm among the Carthaginians, and they wondered whence so many enemies had suddenly appeared after the army had been almost wiped out, whence came such boldness and self-confidence so great in men beaten and put to flight, what commander had arisen after the two Scipios had been slain, who was in command of the camp, who had given the signal for battle. In the face of all that—so many things so unexpected—they at first retreated, completely at a loss and dumbfounded; then beaten back by the strength of the attack they took to flight. And there would have been either a terrible slaughter of the fleeing or a reckless and dangerous attack on the part of the pursuers, had not Marcius promptly given the signal for the recall and kept back his own excited line, facing his men in the front line and laying hold of some with his own hands. He then led them back to camp still thirsting for slaughter and bloodshed. The Carthaginians were at first forced away in confusion from the enemies' earthwork; then, when they saw that no one was pursuing,

A.U.C. 542 substitisse rati, contemptim rursus et sedato gradu in castra abeunt.

16 Par neglegentia in castris custodiendis fuit; nam etsi propinquus hostis erat, tamen reliquias eum esse duorum exercituum ante paucos dies deletorum suc-
17 currebat. Ob hoc cum omnia neglecta apud hostis essent, exploratis iis Marcius ad consilium prima specie temerarium magis quam audax animum adie-
18 cit, ut ultro castra hostium oppugnaret, facilius esse ratus unius Hasdrubalis expugnari castra quam, si se rursus tres exercitus ac tres duces iunxissent, sua 19 defendi; simul aut, si successisset coeptis, erecturum se adflictas res aut, si pulsus esset, tamen ultro inferendo arma contemptum sui dempturum.

XXXVIII. Ne tamen subita res et nocturnus terror et iam non suae fortunae consilium perturbaret, adloquendos adhortandosque sibi milites ratus, 2 contione advocata ita disseruit: "Vel mea erga imperatores nostros vivos mortuosque pietas vel praesens omnium nostrum, milites, fortuna fidem cuivis facere potest mihi hoc imperium, ut amplum iudicio vestro, ita re ipsa grave ac sollicitum esse.
3 Quo enim tempore, nisi metus maerorem obstupefaceret, vix ita compos mei essem ut aliqua solacia invenire aegro animo possem, cogor vestram omnium vicem, quod difficillimum in luctu est, unus consulere.
4 Et ne tum quidem, ubi quonam modo has reliquias duorum exercituum patriae conservare possim cogi-they thought they had halted for fear, and with fresh contempt and at a slow pace they retired to their camp. B.C. 212

There was just as much carelessness in guarding the camp. For, although the enemy was near, still they kept reflecting that it was only a remnant of the two armies wiped out a few days before. Since for this reason every precaution had been omitted on the enemy's side, Marcius, informed of the facts, turned his attention to a plan at first sight reckless rather than bold, actually to attack the camp of the enemy, in the belief that it was easier to storm the camp of Hasdrubal alone than to defend his own, if the three armies and three generals should again unite. At the same time he thought that, if his efforts should prove successful, he would relieve his critical situation or, even if defeated, by venturing to attack he would at least take away their contempt for himself. XXXVIII. But for fear an unexpected action, and alarm in the night and a plan no longer in keeping with his present situation, might bring confusion, he thought he must address his soldiers and encourage them, called an assembly and spoke as follows: "Either my devotion to our commanders, living and dead, or the present situation of us all, soldiers, can convince any one that this high command, though a great honour as your tribute, is yet in fact a burden to me and an anxious care. For at a time when, if fear did not paralyse grief, I should scarcely have such self-control as would enable me to find some comfort for distress of mind, I am compelled —a most difficult thing in sorrow—alone to plan for all of you. And even when I must consider how I may be able to save these remnants of two armies

A.U.C. 512

tandum est, avertere animum ab assiduo maerore 5 licet.[1] Praesto est enim acerba memoria, et Scipiones me ambo dies noctesque curis insomniisque agitant 6 et excitant saepe somno, neu se neu invictos per octo annos in his terris milites suos, commilitones vestros, neu rem publicam patiar inultam, et suam disciplí-7 nam suaque instituta sequi iubent et, ut imperiis vivorum nemo oboedientior me uno fuerit, ita post mortem suam, quod in quaque re facturos illos fuisse 8 maxime censeam, id optimum dueere. Vos quoque velim, milites, non lamentis lacrimisque tamquam extinctos prosequi—vivunt vigentque fama rerum gestarum—, sed, quotienscumque occurret memoria illorum, velut si adhortantis signumque dantis 9 videatis eos, ita proelia inire. Nec alia profecto species hesterno die oblata oculis animisque vestris memorabile illud edidit proelium, quo documentum dedistis hostibus non cum Scipionibus extinctum esse 10 nomen Romanum et, cuius populi vis atque virtus non obruta sit Cannensi clade, ex omni profecto saevitia fortunae emersurum[2] esse.

11 "Nunc, quia tantum ausi estis sponte vestra, experiri libet quantum audeatis duce vestro auctore. Non enim hesterno die, cum signum receptui dedi sequentibus effuse vobis turbatum hostem, frangere audaciam vestram, sed differre in maiorem gloriam atque

[1] licet Gronovius: libet P(1) Riemann.
[2] emersurum xz: -am P(1) Madvig.

for our country, I may not turn my thoughts away B.C. 212 from unremitting grief. For a bitter memory is present with me, and both Scipios trouble me all day and all night with anxiety and loss of sleep, and often arouse me from slumber, bidding me not to allow either themselves or their soldiers, your comrades, undefeated in this land for eight years,[1] or the state, to go unavenged. And they command me to follow their teachings and their methods, and, just as while they lived not a man was more obedient to their orders than I, so after their death to hold that to be the best course which in each case I am confident they would have done. As for you, soldiers, I would have you also honour them, not with lamentations and tears as though dead. They live and work by the glory of their achievements. But whenever you shall remember them, just as if you saw them encouraging you and giving the signal,—in that spirit would I have you go into battle. It was surely no other image which presented itself yesterday to your eyes and minds and brought about that notable battle, by which you gave the enemy proof that the Roman name has not been extinguished with the Scipios, and that the people whose might and courage were not overwhelmed by the disaster at Cannae will surely survive any cruelty of Fortune.

"At present, because you have of your own accord shown such daring, I should like to find how much you have when your general gives the command. For yesterday, when I sounded the recall, as you in disorder were pursuing the routed enemy, it was not my wish to crush your boldness, but to reserve it for higher fame and a more favourable situation, that

[1] Cf. xxxvi. 14 and note.

A.U.C. 512

12 opportunitatem volui, ut postmodo praeparati incautos, armati inermes atque etiam sopitos per occasionem adgredi possetis. Nec huius occasionis spem, milites, forte temere, sed ex re ipsa conceptam
13 habeo. A vobis quoque profecto si quis quaerat quonam modo pauci a multis, victi a victoribus castra tutati sitis, nihil aliud respondeatis quam id ipsum timentis vos omnia et operibus firmata habuisse et
14 ipsos paratos instructosque fuisse. Et ita se res habet: ad id quod ne timeatur fortuna facit minime tuti sunt homines, quia quod neglexeris incautum
15 atque apertum habeas. Nihil omnium nunc minus metuunt hostes quam ne, obsessi modo ipsi atque oppugnati, castra sua ultro oppugnemus. Audeamus quod credi non potest ausuros nos; eo ipso quod
16 difficillimum videtur facilius erit. Tertia vigilia noctis silenti agmine ducam vos. Exploratum habeo non vigiliarum ordinem, non stationes iustas
17 esse. Clamor in portis auditus et primus impetus castra ceperit. Tum inter torpidos somno paventisque ad necopinatum tumultum et inermis in cubilibus suis oppressos illa caedes edatur a qua vos hesterno 18 die revocatos aegre ferebatis. Scio audax videri consilium: sed in rebus asperis et tenui spe fortissima quaeque consilia tutissima sunt, quia, si in occasionis momento cuius praetervolat opportunitas cunctatus paulum fueris, nequiquam mox omissam quaeras.
19 Unus exercitus in propinquo est, duo haud procul later, being well prepared and armed, you might be B.C. 212 able, as opportunity offered, to attack the unprepared and unarmed, and even the sleeping. And not haphazard or at random do I cherish a hope of this opportunity, soldiers, but from the actual situation. You too, if someone should ask how you, a few men, have defended your camp against many, the vanquished against the victors, would surely give no other answer than that, fearing just that, you had kept everything in a state of defence and also had been in readiness yourselves and in line. And the fact is this: men are least protected against the thing which success leads them not to fear, since what one has made light of remains unguarded and uncovered. There is nothing in the world which the enemy now fear less than that we, who have ourselves just been beset and attacked, may venture to attack their camp. Let us dare what it is incredible that we should dare: for the very reason that it appears most difficult it will be easier. In the third watch of the night I shall lead you in a silent column. I am assured that there is no relieving of sentries, no regular outposts. The sound of a shout at the gate and a first assault will at once capture the camp. Then, among men dazed with sleep and alarmed at the unexpected uproar and surprised unarmed in their beds, let there be the slaughter from which you were recalled yesterday under protest. I know it seems a bold plan. But in dangerous and desperate situations the bravest decisions are always the safest. For if at the opportune moment, whose advantage swiftly passes, one hesitates even a little, it is vain for one to look later for the neglected opportunity. One army is near, two not far away. If we attack now there is absunt. Nunc adgredientibus spes aliqua est, et 20 iam temptastis vestras atque illorum vires: si diem proferimus et hesternae eruptionis fama contemni desierimus, periculum est ne omnes duces, omnes copiae conveniant. Tres deinde duces, tres exercitus sustinebimus hostium quos Cn. Scipio incolumi 21 exercitu non sustinuit? Ut dividendo copias periere duces nostri, ita separatim ac divisi opprimi possunt hostes. Alia belli gerendi via nulla est. Proinde nihil praeter noctis proximae opportunitatem 22 expectemus. Ite deis bene iuvantibus, corpora curate, ut integri vigentesque eodem animo in castra hostium inrumpatis quo vestra tutati estis."

A.U.C. 542

23 Laeti et audiere ab novo duce novum consilium, et quo audacius erat magis placebat. Reliquum diei expediendis armis et curatione corporum con-sumptum et maior pars noctis quieti data est.
Quarta vigilia movere. XXXIX. Erant ultra proxuma castra sex milium intervallo distantes aliae copiae Poenorum. Valles cava intererat, condensa arboribus; in huius silvae medio ferme spatio cohors 2 Romana arte Punica abditur et equites. Ita medio itinere intercepto ceterae copiae silenti agmine ad proximos hostis ductae et, cum statio nulla pro portis neque in vallo custodiae essent, velut in sua 3 castra nullo usquam obsistente penetravere. Inde signa canunt et tollitur clamor. Pars semisomnos no little hope, and already you have tried your strength B.C. 212 and theirs. If we put off the day and owing to the report of yesterday's sally come to be no longer despised, there is danger that all the generals and all the forces may combine. Shall we then withstand the enemy's three generals, three armies, which Gnaeus Scipio with his army still undiminished did not withstand? Just as through dividing their forces our generals perished, so the enemy, if divided and in different places, can be overpowered. There is no other way of conducting the war. Therefore let us wait for nothing beyond the favourable moment to-night. Go with the kind aid of the gods, put yourselves in condition, that, sound and strong, you may burst into the camp of the enemy with the same spirit with which you defended yours."

With joy they heard of the new plan from their new commander, and the bolder it was the more it pleased them. The rest of the day was spent in putting their arms in order and themselves in condition; and the larger part of the night was given to rest. At the fourth watch they started. XXXIX. Beyond the nearest camp and at a distance of six miles from it were other forces of the Carthaginians. Between them there was a deep valley, densely wooded. About the middle of this wood a Roman cohort and cavalry were concealed after the Punic method. The road being thus cut off at the half-way, the rest of the forces were led in a silent column to the nearest enemy. And as there was no outpost before the gates nor sentinels on the earthwork, and no one anywhere opposed them, they made their way into the camp as if it were their own. Then the trumpets sound and a shout is raised. Some slay hostis caedunt, pars ignes casis stramento arido tectis iniciunt, pars portas occupant, ut fugam intercludant. 4 Hostes simul ignis, clamor, caedes velut alienatos sensibus nec audire nec providere quicquam sinunt. 5 Incidunt inermes inter catervas armatorum. Alii ruunt ad portas, alii obsaeptis itineribus super vallum 6 saliunt; et, ut quisque evaserat, protinus ad castra altera fugiunt, ubi ab cohorte et equitibus ex occulto procurrentibus circumventi caesique ad unum omnes 7 sunt; quamquam, etiamsi quis ex ea caede effugisset, adeo raptim a captis propioribus castris in altera transcursum castra ab Romanis est, ut praevenire 8 nuntius cladis non posset. Ibi vero, quo longius ab hoste aberant et quia sub lucem pabulatum lignatumque et praedatum quidam dilapsi fuerant, neglecta magis omnia ac soluta invenere, arma tantum in stationibus posita, milites inermes aut humi sedentes accubantesque aut obambulantes ante 9 vallum portasque. Cum his tam securis solutisque Romani calentes adhuc ab recenti pugna ferocesque victoria proelium incunt. Itaque nequaquam resisti in portis potuit; intra portas concursu ex totis castris ad primum clamorem et tumultum facto atrox proe- 10 lium oritur; diuque tenuisset, ni cruenta scuta Romanorum visa indicium alterius cladis, Poenis 11 atque inde pavorem iniecissent. Hic terror in fugam avertit omnis, effusique qua iter est, nisi quos

A.U.C. 512

the enemy half-asleep, some throw firebrands on B.C. 212
the dry, thatched huts, some seize the gates, to block escape. As for the enemy, fire, shouting and slaughter, all at once, make them virtually senseless and do not allow them to hear any orders or to look out for themselves. Unharmed they encounter bodies of armed men. Some rush to the gates, others, since the roads are blocked, leap over the earthwork. And everyone who escaped fled at once in the direction of the other camp; whereupon they were surrounded by the cohort and cavalry dashing out of their hiding-place and were slain to the last man. Yet, even if a man had escaped from that slaughter, so swiftly did the Romans hasten from the captured nearer camp to the other camp that news of the disaster could not anticipate them. But there, the farther it was from their enemy, and since some had scattered just before daylight to bring in fodder and firewood and booty, the more neglect and disorder did they find everywhere; only stacked arms at the outposts, the soldiers unarmed, either sitting and lying on the ground or strolling outside the wall and the gates. Against these men, so care-free and regardless of order, the Romans, who were still fired by their recent battle and made confident by victory, went into battle. And so no resistance whatever could be offered at the gates. Inside the gates there was a rush from every part of the camp at the first shouting and commotion, and a fierce battle began. It would have lasted long too, had not the sight of the Romans' bloody shields given the Carthaginians evidence of the other disaster and consequently inspired alarm. This terror made them all take to flight, and pouring out wherever a way could be found caedes oppressit, exuuntur castris. Ita nocte ac die bina castra hostium expugnata[1] ductu L. Marcii. 12 Ad triginta septem milia hostium caesa auctor est Claudius, qui annales Acilianos ex Graeco in Latinum sermonem vertit, captos ad mille octingentos triginta, 13 praedam ingentem partam; in ea fuisse clipeum argenteum pondo centum triginta septem cum 14 imagine Barcini Hasdrubalis. Valerius Antias una castra Magonis capta tradit, septem milia caesa hostium; altero proelio eruptione pugnatum cum Hasdrubale, decem milia occisa, quattuor milia 15 trecentos triginta captos. Piso quinque milia hominum, cum Mago cedentis nostros effuse sequeretur, 16 caesa ex insidiis scribit. Apud omnis magnum nomen Marcii ducis est; et verae gloriae eius etiam miracula addunt, flammam ei contionanti fusam e capite sine ipsius sensu cum magno pavore circum- 17 stantium militum; monimentumque victoriae eius de Poenis usque ad incensum Capitolium fuisse in templo clipeum, Marcium appellatum, cum imagine 18 Hasdrubalis.—Quietae deinde aliquamdiu in Hispania res fuere, utrisque post tantas in vicem acceptas

A.U.C. 542

[1] expugnata z Conway : oppugnata P(1).

---

[1] I.e. Q. Claudius Quadrigarius, who wrote in the time of Sulla. His history, in at least 23 books, began with the capture of the city by the Gauls. Acilius' Greek history of Rome had begun with the founding of the city. In 155 B.C. Acilius acted as interpreter when the three Greek philosophers, Carneades among them, appeared before the senate.

[2] Valerius, a contemporary of Claudius, wrote a voluminous history from the founding of Rome in upwards of 75 books. Here by exception his figures for the enemy slain are very moderate.

[3] L. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, the annalist, was consul in 133 B.C. His work, here cited for the last time in the extant Livy, —except those overtaken by the sword—they lost B.C. 212 possession of the camp. Thus in a night and a day two camps of the enemy were taken by assault under the command of Lucius Marcius. That about thirty-seven thousand of the enemy were slain is the statement of Claudius,[1] who translated Acilius' annals out of Greek into the Latin language; that about one thousand eight hundred and thirty were captured and a vast amount of booty taken. And in this he says that there was a silver shield weighing a hundred and thirty-seven pounds, bearing the likeness of Hasdrubal Barca. Valerius of Antium[2] relates that one camp was captured, that of Mago, and seven thousand of the enemy slain; that in a second battle they sallied out and fought with Hasdrubal; that ten thousand were slain, four thousand three hundred and thirty captured. Piso[3] states that five thousand men were slain from an ambush, while Mago was pursuing in disorder our retreating men. In all of them great is the name of Marcius the general. And to his real fame they add even marvels: that as he was speaking a flame burst from his head without his knowledge, causing great alarm among the soldiers who stood around him. They say that as a memorial of his victory over the Carthaginians, down to the burning of the Capitol there was in the temple a shield called the Marcian, bearing a likeness of Hasdrubal.[4]—Thereafter the situation in Spain was quiet for a long time, since both sides, after receiving and inflicting such losses probably consisted of seven books, beginning with the founding of the city.

[4] Pliny (N.H. XXXV. 14) says this shield hung above the door of the Capitoline temple until the fire of 84 B.C.

A.U.C. 542

inlatasque clades cunctantibus periculum summae rerum facere.

XL. Dum haec in Hispania geruntur, Marcellus captis Syracusis, cum cetera in Sicilia tanta fide atque integritate composuisset ut non modo suam gloriam sed etiam maiestatem populi Romani augeret, ornamenta urbis, signa tabulasque quibus abundabant Syracusae, Romam devexit, hostium
2 quidem illa spolia et parta belli iure; ceterum inde primum initium mirandi Graecarum artium opera licentiaeque huius[1] saera profanaque omnia vulgo spoliandi factum est, quae postremo in Romanos deos, templum id ipsum primum quod a Marcello
3 eximie ornatum est, vertit. Visebantur enim ab externis ad portam Capenam dedicata a M. Marcello templa propter excellentia eius generis ornamenta, quorum perexigua pars comparet.
4 Legationes omnium ferme civitatium Siciliae ad eum conveniebant. Dispar ut causa earum, ita condicio erat. Qui ante captas Syracusas aut non desciverant aut redierant in amicitiam, ut socii fideles accepti cultique; quos metus post captas Syracusas dediderat, ut victi a victore leges accepe-
5 runt. Erant tamen haud parvae reliquiae belli circa Agrigentum Romanis, Epicydes et Hanno, duces reliqui prioris belli, et tertius novus ab Hanni-

[1] huius Ussing, Conway: huic P(2): hinc A Walters.

---

[1] The Temples of Honos and Virtus were outside the gate, on the Appian Way; XXVI. xxxii. 4; XXVII. xxv. 7–9; Plutarch, Marcellus 28. Dedicated in 205 B.C. by Marcellus' son; XXIX. xi. 13. In the Temple of Virtus stood the famous sphaera (orrery) of Archimedes; Cicero de Re Publica I. 21.

upon each other, hesitated to risk a decisive engage- B.C. 212
ment.

XL. While these things were being done in Spain, it is true that Marcellus, after the capture of Syracuse, had settled matters in general in Sicily with such conscientiousness and honesty that he added not only to his own fame, but also to the dignity of the Roman people. But as regards the adornments of the city, the statues and paintings which Syracuse possessed in abundance, he carried them away to Rome. They were spoils of the enemy, to be sure, and acquired by right of war. Yet from that came the very beginning of enthusiasm for Greek works of art and consequently of this general licence to despoil all kinds of buildings, sacred and profane, a licence which finally turned against Roman gods, and first of all against the very temple which was magnificently adorned by Marcellus. For temples dedicated by Marcus Marcellus near the Porta Capena [1] used to be visited by foreigners on account of their remarkable adornments of that kind; but of these a very small part is still to be seen.

Embassies from nearly all the states in Sicily kept coming to him. As their pleas were different, so was their status. Those who before the capture of Syracuse either had not rebelled or had returned to friendly relations were admitted and honoured as faithful allies. Those whom fear had led to surrender after the capture of Syracuse, as vanquished received terms from the victor. There was left to the Romans, however, no small remainder of the war around Agrigentum, namely, Epicydes and Hanno, the surviving commanders in the previous war, and a third new general sent by Hannibal in place of bale in locum Hippocratis missus, Libyphoenicum generis Hippacritanus—Muttinen populares vocabant—, vir inpiger et sub Hannibale magistro omnis

A.U.C. 512

6 belli artes edoctus. Huic ab Epicyde et Hannone Numidae dati auxiliares, cum quibus ita pervagatus est hostium agros, ita socios ad retinendos in fide animos eorum ferendo in tempore cuique auxilium
7 adiit ut brevi tempore totam Siciliam impleret nominis sui, nec spes alia maior apud faventis rebus
8 Carthaginiensium esset. Itaque inclusi ad id tempus moenibus Agrigenti dux Poenus Syracusanusque, non consilio Muttinis quam fiducia magis ausi egredi extra muros ad Himeram amnem posuerunt
9 castra. Quod ubi perlatum ad Marcellum est, extemplo copias movit et ab hoste quattuor ferme milium intervallo consedit, quid agerent pararentve
10 expectaturus. Sed nullum neque locum neque tempus cunctationi consiliove dedit Muttines, transgressus amnem ac stationibus hostium eum ingenti 11 terrore ac tumultu invectus. Postero die prope iusto proelio compulit hostis intra munimenta. Inde revocatus seditione Numidarum in castris facta, eum trecenti ferme eorum Heracleam Minoam concessissent, ad mitigandos revocandosque eos profectus magno opere monuisse duces dicitur ne 12 absente se cum hoste manus conserrent. Id ambo aegre passi duces, magis Hanno, iam ante anxius gloria eius: Muttinem sibi modum facere, degene-

---

[1] I.e. Hippo Diarrhytus, northwest of Utica, on the coast.

Hippocrates. He was of Libyphoenician race, from B.C. 212
Hippacra,[1] and called Muttines by his countrymen, a man of energy who under Hannibal's teaching had mastered all the arts of war. He was furnished by Epicydes and Hanno with Numidian auxiliaries, with which he so thoroughly scoured the enemy's lands and sought out allies, in order to retain their loyalty by lending aid to each man at the right moment, that in a short time he filled all Sicily with his name and was the highest hope of those supporting the Carthaginian cause. And so, after being confined until then within the walls of Agrigentum, the Carthaginian general and the Syracusan, emboldened not more by the advice of Muttines than by their confidence in him to go outside the walls, pitched their camp by the river Himera. When news of this reached Marcellus, he at once set his troops in motion and established himself at a distance of about four miles from the enemy, to wait and see what they were doing or intending. But Muttines gave no occasion or time for hesitation, or for a plan of action; for he crossed the river and attacked the outposts of the enemy, causing great alarm and confusion. The next day by an engagement almost in regular form he drove the enemy inside their fortifications. Then he was recalled by a mutiny of the Numidians breaking out in the camp, after about three hundred of them had retired to Heraclea Minoa. On leaving, to pacify and recall these men, he is said to have expressly warned the generals not to engage the enemy in his absence. At that both generals were indignant, especially Hanno, already uneasy because of the man's fame. To think that Muttines, a degenerate African, should set a limit

A.U.C. 542

rem Afrum imperatori Carthaginiensi misso ab 13 senatu populoque! Is perpulit cunctantem Epicyden ut transgressi flumen in aciem exirent: nam si Muttinem opperirentur, et secunda pugnae fortuna evenisset, haud dubie Muttinis gloriam fore.

XLI. Enimvero indignum ratus Marcellus se, qui Hannibalem subnixum victoria Cannensi ab Nola reppulisset, his terra marique victis ab se hostibus cedere, arma propere capere milites et efferri signa
2 iubet. Instruenti[1] exercitum decem effusis equis advolant ex hostium acie Numidae nuntiantes populares suos, primum ea seditione motos qua
3 trecenti ex numero suo concesserint Heracleam, dein quod praefectum suum ab obtrectantibus ducibus gloriae eius sub ipsam certaminis diem ablegatum
4 videant, quieturos in pugna. Gens fallax promissi fidem praestitit. Itaque et Romanis crevit animus nuntio celeri per ordines misso, destitutum ab equite
5 hostem esse, quem maxime timuerant, et territi hostes, praeterquam quod maxima parte virium suarum non iuvabantur, timore etiam incusso, ne
6 ab suomet ipsi equite oppugnarentur. Itaque haud magni certaminis res[2] fuit: primus clamor atque impetus rem decrevit. Numidae cum in concursu quieti stetissent in cornibus, ut terga dantis suos viderunt, fugae tantum parumper comites facti,

[1] instruenti Gronovius: -te P(1).
[2] res Conway: om. P(1): proelium or res (after fuit) Weissenborn.

for him, a Carthaginian commander, sent by senate and people! He prevailed upon the hesitating Epicydes to cross the river and form their battle-line. For if they should wait for Muttines and the fortune of battle should favour, the glory, he said, would unquestionably fall to Muttines. B.C. 212

XLI. Marcellus, thinking it was a veritable outrage for him, a man who had driven Hannibal, backed by his victory at Cannae, from Nola, to yield to these enemies whom he had himself defeated on land and sea, ordered his soldiers to take up their arms in haste and the standard-bearers to set out. As he was drawing up his army, ten Numidians rode out of the enemy's ranks and at full speed up to him, reporting that their countrymen were aroused, first by the mutiny in which three hundred of their number had retired to Heraclea, and then by seeing their commander sent away just on the eve of battle by generals who belittled his reputation, and that in the fight they would remain inactive. A deceitful race kept its promise faithfully. And so the Romans' spirits rose when the message was sent swiftly through the ranks that the enemy had been deserted by his cavalry, which they had particularly dreaded; at the same time the enemy were terrified not only because they were having no help from the largest part of their forces, but also by the fear thus aroused that they might themselves be attacked by their own cavalry. Accordingly it was no great struggle; the first shout, the first onset, decided the matter. The Numidians, having remained motionless on the wings at the beginning of the battle, seeing their men retreating, shared only the flight with them for a short time. When they saw them all making for 7 postquam omnes Agrigentum trepido agmine petentes viderunt, ipsi metu obsidionis passim in civitatis proxumas dilapsi. Multa milia hominum caesa, capta . . .[1] et octo elephanti. Haec ultima in Sicilia Marcelli pugna fuit; victor inde Syracusas rediit.

A.U.C. 542

8 Iam ferme in exitu annus erat; itaque senatus Romae decrevit ut P. Cornelius praetor litteras Ca-
9 puam ad consules mitteret, dum Hannibal procul abesset nec ulla magni discriminis res ad Capuam gereretur, alter eorum, si ita videretur, ad magistratus 10 subrogandos Romam veniret. Litteris acceptis inter se consules compararunt ut Claudius comitia per-11 ficeret, Fulvius ad Capuam maneret. Consules Claudius creavit Cn. Fulvium Centumalum et P. Sulpicium Servii filium Galbam, qui nullum antea
12 curulem magistratum gessisset. Praetores deinde creati L. Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, 13 C. Sulpicius, C. Calpurnius Piso.[2] Pisoni iuris dictio urbana, Sulpicio Sicilia, Cethego Apulia, Lentulo Sardinia evenit. Consulibus prorogatum in annum imperium est.

[1] Perhaps sex milia (i.e. VI) Madvig.

[2] Names in this sentence are in part restored by Aldus and Sigonius. P(1) omit L. Cornelius Lentulus (13 and XXVI. i. 11) and M. (ii. 2), also C. Calpurnius (XXVI. iii. 9).

Agrigentum in a panic-stricken column, they themselves scattered in every direction to the neighbouring cities, fearing a siege. Many thousand men were slain . . . thousand captured, also eight elephants. This was Marcellus' last battle in Sicily; from it he returned as victor to Syracuse. B.C. 212

By this time the year was nearly at an end. Accordingly the senate at Rome decreed that Publius Cornelius, the praetor, should send a letter to the consuls at Capua, saying that, while Hannibal was far away and there was no decisive action around Capua, one of them, if they thought it best, should come to Rome for the replacement of magistrates. On receiving the letter the consuls arranged between them that Claudius should conduct the elections, and Fulvius remain near Capua. For the consulship Claudius announced the election of Gnaeus Fulvius Centumalus and Publius Sulpicius Galba, son of Servius, although he had previously held no curule office. As praetors the following were then elected: Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, Gaius Sulpicius, Gaius Calpurnius Piso. The duties of the city praetor fell to Piso,[1] Sicily to Sulpicius, Apulia to Cethegus, Sardinia to Lentulus. As for the consuls, their military authority was continued for one year.

[1] Evidently the duties of the praetor peregrinus also were assigned to the praetor urbanus, as for the two preceding years; cf. notes on i. 11 and iii. 2.

LIBRI XXV PERIOCHA

P. Cornelius Scipio, postea Africanus, ante annos aedilis factus. Hannibal urbem Tarenton praeter arcem, in quam praesidium Romanorum fugerat, per Tarentinos iuvenes, qui se noctu venatum ire simulaverant, cepit. Ludi Apollinares ex Marcii carminibus, quibus Cannensis clades praedicta fuerat, instituti sunt. A Q. Fulvio et Ap. Claudio consulibus adversus Hannonem Poenorum ducem prospere pugnatum est. Tib. Sempronius Graechus proconsul, ab hospite suo Lucano in insidias deductus, a Magone interfectus est. Centenius Paenula, qui centurio militaverat, cum petisset a senatu ut sibi exercitus daretur, pollicitusque esset, si hoc impetrasset, de Hannibale victoriam, $\overline{\text{VIII}}$ acceptis militum dux factus conflixit acie cum Hannibale et cum exercitu caesus est. Capua obsessa est a Q. Fulvio et Ap. Claudio consulibus. Cn. Fulvius praetor male adversus Hannibalem pugnavit, in quo proelio $\overline{\text{XX}}$[1] hominum ceciderunt; ipse cum equitibus ducentis effugit. Claudius Marcellus Syracusas expugnavit tertio anno et ingentem se virum gessit. In eo tumultu captae urbis Archimedes intentus formis quas in pulvere descripserat interfectus est. P. et Cn. Scipiones in Hispania tot rerum feliciter gestarum tristem exitum tulerunt, prope cum totis exercitibus caesi anno octavo quam in Hispaniam ierunt. Amissaque eius provinciae possessio foret, nisi L. Marcii equitis Romani virtute et industria contractis exercituum reliquiis eiusdem hortatu bina castra hostium expugnata essent. Ad $\overline{\text{XXVII}}$[2] caesa, ad[3] mille octingentos, praeda ingens capta. Dux Marcius appellatus est.

[1] This should be $\overline{\text{XVI}}$: cf. xxi. 10.

[2] An error for $\overline{\text{XXXVII}}$: cf. xxxix. 12.

[3] For ad (Sigonius) the MSS. have ex.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXV

Publius Cornelius Scipio, later Africanus, was made aedile before the legal age. Hannibal, with the aid of young Tarentines who had pretended that they were going hunting at night, captured the city of Tarentum, except the citadel, to which the Roman garrison had fled. The Ludi Apollinares were established in accordance with the oracles of Marcius, in which the disaster at Cannae had been predicted. A successful battle was fought by Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius, the consuls, against Hanno, a general of the Carthaginians. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, the proconsul, was led into an ambuscade by his Lucanian guest-friend and slain by Mago. Centenius Paenula, who had served as a centurion, after begging the senate to give him an army and promising a victory over Hannibal if he gained his request, received eight thousand soldiers, was made commander, engaged Hannibal in battle-line, and with his army was slain. Capua was besieged by Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius, the consuls. Gnaeus Fulvius, a praetor, was defeated in a battle with Hannibal in which twenty thousand men fell. Fulvius himself escaped with two hundred horsemen. Claudius Marcellus took Syracuse after two years and bore himself as a great man. In that uproar of the captured city Archimedes, while intent upon the figures he had traced in the dust, was slain. Publius and Gnaeus Scipio in Spain met with an unhappy end of their many successes, being slain with almost their entire armies in the eighth year after they went to Spain. And possession of that province would have been lost, had not the remnants of the armies been brought together by the bravery and activity of Lucius Marcius, a Roman knight, and with his encouragement two camps of the enemy been taken by storm. About twenty-seven thousand were slain, about one thousand eight hundred men and vast booty captured. Marcius was named commander.

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

IN THIRTEEN VOLUMES

VII

BOOKS XXVI—XXVII

TRANSLATED BY

FRANK GARDNER MOORE

PROFESSOR EMERITUS IN COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

LONDON

WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

MCMXLIII

414801

24.8.43

CONTENTS

PAGE

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE vii

THE MANUSCRIPTS ix

BOOK XXVI 1

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXVI 198

BOOK XXVII 201

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXVII 414

INDEX OF NAMES 417

MAPS AND PLANS—

1. CENTRAL ITALY . . . . . At end
2. LATIUM AND CAMPANIA . . . . . ,,
3. NORTH ITALY . . . . . ,,
4. SOUTH ITALY AND SICILY . . . . . ,,
5. TARENTUM . . . . . ,,
6. SPAIN . . . . . ,,
7. CARTHAGO NOVA . . . . . ,,
8. GREECE AND MACEDONIA . . . . . ,,

T. LIVI
AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XXVI

A.U.C. 543

I. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus P. Sulpicius Galba consules cum idibus Martiis magistratum inissent, senatu in Capitolium vocato, de re publica, de administratione belli, de provinciis exercitibusque patres 2 consuluerunt. Q. Fulvio Ap. Claudio, prioris anni consulibus, prorogatum imperium est atque exercitus quos habebant decreti, adiectumque ne a Capua, quam obsidebant, abscederent prius quam expugnas- 3 sent.[1] Ea tum cura maxime intentos habebat Romanos, non ab ira tantum, quae in nullam umquam civitatem iustior fuit, quam quod urbs tam nobilis 4 ac potens, sicut defectione sua traxerat aliquot populos, ita recepta inclinatura rursus animos videbatur 5 ad veteris imperii respectum. Et praetoribus prioris

[1] expugnassent z Aldus: oppugnassent P(1)JK.

---

[1] The first session of the senate was then regularly held on the Capitol in the Temple of Jupiter; XXIII. xxxi. 1;

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XXVI

I. Gnaeus Fulvius Centumalus and Publius Sul- B.C. 211
picius Galba, the consuls, having entered upon office on the Ides of March, summoned the senate to the Capitol [1] and consulted the fathers in regard to the state, the conduct of the war, and the provinces and armies. The military authority of Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius, consuls of the previous year, was continued, and the armies which they had were assigned to them, with orders in addition that they were not to withdraw from Capua, which they were besieging, until they had taken the city. That affair claimed the closest attention of the Romans at the time, not so much because of anger, which has never been more justified against any state, as because a city so important and powerful, which by its revolt had drawn with it a number of communities, in like manner, if recovered, might turn the scale to respect, so it seemed, for the old authority. And for the praetors of the previous year, Marcus

[1] XXIV. x. 1; and the new year began on the Ides of March; xxvi. 5; XXVII. vii. 7.

A.U.C. 543

anni, M. Iunio in Etruria, P. Sempronio in Gallia, cum binis legionibus quas habuerant prorogatum est 6 imperium. Prorogatum et M. Marcello, ut pro consule in Sicilia reliqua belli perficeret eo exercitu 7 quem haberet; si supplemento opus esset, suppleret de legionibus quibus P. Cornelius propraetore in 8 Sicilia praeesset, dum ne quem militem legeret ex eo numero quibus senatus missionem reditumque in 9 patriam negasset ante belli finem. C. Sulpicio, cui Sicilia evenerat, duae legiones quas P. Cornelius habuisset decretae et supplementum de exercitu Cn. Fulvii, qui priore anno in Apulia foede caesus fuga-
10 tusque erat. Huic generi militum senatus eundem quem Cannensibus finem statuerat militiae. Additum etiam utrorumque ignominiae est ne in oppidis hibernarent neve hiberna propius ullam urbem decem
11 milibus passuum aedificarent. L. Cornelio in Sardinia duae legiones datae quibus Q. Mucius praefuerat; supplementum, si opus esset, consules scribere iussi.
12 T. Otacilio et M. Valerio Siciliae Graeciaeque orae[1] cum legionibus classibusque quibus praeerant decretae; quinquaginta Graecia cum legione una, centum Sicilia cum duabus legionibus habebat[2] 13 naves. Tribus et viginti legionibus Romanis eo anno bellum terra marique est gestum.

II. Principio eius anni cum de litteris L. Marcii referretur, res gestae magnificae senatui visae:

[1] orae Walters: ora P(1)JK Aldus, Froben.
[2] habebat Walters: habebant P(1)JK.

---

[1] Cf. XXIV. xviii. 9; XXV. vii. 4.
[2] Not including the army in Spain; cf. XXIV. xi. 2.
[3] Cf. XXV. xxxvii. ff.

Iunius in Etruria, Publius Sempronius in Gaul, their B.C. 211 command was continued, with the two legions which each had had. The command of Marcus Marcellus also was continued, that as proconsul in Sicily he might finish the remainder of the war with the army which he had. If he should need reinforcements, he should provide them from the legions which Publius Cornelius, the propraetor, commanded in Sicily, provided he did not enlist any soldier from the number of those to whom the senate had refused a discharge and a return to their home towns before the end of the war. To Gaius Sulpicius, to whom Sicily had fallen, were assigned the two legions which Publius Cornelius had had, and reinforcements from Gnaeus Fulvius' army, which in the previous year had been terribly cut to pieces and put to flight in Apulia. For soldiers of this sort the senate had established the same term of service as for the men who were at Cannae.[1] It was added to the disgrace of both alike that they were not to winter in towns, nor to construct their winter quarters within ten miles of any city. To Lucius Cornelius in Sardinia were given the two legions which Quintus Mucius had commanded. Reinforcements, if necessary, the consuls were bidden to enroll. To Titus Otacilius and Marcus Valerius were assigned the coasts of Sicily and Greece, together with the legions and fleets which they commanded. Greece had fifty ships and one legion, Sicily a hundred ships and two legions. Twenty-three Roman legions[2] carried on the war that year on land and sea.

II. At the beginning of that year, when the letter of Lucius Marcius[3] was brought before the senate, titulus honoris, quod imperio non populi iussu, non ex auctoritate patrum dato " propraetor senatui " scripserat, magnam partem hominum offendebat: 2 rem mali exempli esse imperatores legi ab exercitibus et sollemne auspicandorum [1] comitiorum in castra et provincias, procul ab legibus magistratibusque, 3 ad militarem temeritatem transferri. Et cum quidam referendum ad senatum censerent, melius visum differri eam consultationem donec proficiscerentur equites qui ab Marcio litteras attulerant. 4 Rescribi de frumento et vestimentis exercitus placuit eam utramque rem curae fore senatui; adscribi autem " propraetori L. Marcio " non placuit, ne id ipsum quod consultationi reliquerant pro praeiudi- 5 cato ferret. Dimissis equitibus, de nulla re prius consules rettulerunt, omniumque in unum sententiae congruebant, agendum cum tribunis plebis esse, primo quoque tempore ad plebem ferrent quem cum imperio mitti placeret in Hispaniam ad eum exerci- 6 tum cui Cn. Scipio imperator praefuisset. Ea res cum tribunis acta promulgataque est; sed aliud certamen occupaverat animos.

A.U.C. 543

7 C. Sempronius Blaesus die dicta Cn. Fulvium ob exercitum in Apulia amissum in contionibus vexabat, multos imperatores temeritate atque inscitia exer-

[1] auspicandorum Madvig: -ciatorum P(3): -catorum AJK Aldus.

---

[1] A tribune of the plebs; cf. iii. 8. For the defeat in question cf. note on XXVII. i. 15.

his achievement was thought magnificent; but many B.C. 211 were offended by the official title used, since he had written "The Propraetor to the Senate," although his command had not been given him by order of the people, nor by authority of the senate. It was a bad precedent, they said, for generals to be chosen by armies, and for the sanctity of elections with the required auspices to be removed instead to camps and the provinces, far from laws and magistrates, at the bidding of reckless soldiers. And when some moved that the matter be laid before the senate, it seemed better to postpone deliberation on that point until the knights who had brought the letter from Marcius should depart. In regard to grain and clothing for the army, it was voted to reply that both matters would receive the attention of the senate, but not to address it "To the Propraetor Lucius Marcius," for fear he should get, as though already decided, the very thing which they had left to be considered. When the knights had been sent away, the consuls brought up that matter first of all, and there was complete unanimity that the tribunes of the plebs should be persuaded to bring before the plebs at the earliest possible moment the question as to whom they preferred to send with full authority to Spain and the army of which Gnaeus Scipio had been the commander-in-chief. The matter was arranged with the tribunes and due notice given; but a different dispute had claimed men's attention.

Gaius Sempronius Blaesus,[1] having named a day for the trial, was inveighing against Gnaeus Fulvius in harangues, because of the loss of his army in Apulia, insisting that many generals out of recklessness and lack of experience had led their citum in locum praecipitem perduxisse[1] dictitans, 8 neminem praeter Cn. Fulvium ante conrupisse omnibus vitiis legiones suas quam proderet. Itaque vere dici posse prius eos perisse quam viderent hostem, nec ab Hannibale, sed ab imperatore suo victos esse.

A.U.C. 543

9 Neminem, cum suffragium ineat, satis cernere cui imperium, cui exercitum permittat. Quid interfuisse inter Ti. Sempronium et Cn. Fulvium? Ti. Sem-
10 pronium,[2] cum ei servorum exercitus datus esset, brevi effecisse disciplina atque imperio ut nemo eorum generis ac sanguinis sui memor in acie esset,[3] praesidio sociis, hostibus terrori essent; Cumas, Beneventum aliasque urbes eos velut e faucibus
11 Hannibalis ereptas populo Romano restituisse: Cn. Fulvium Quiritium Romanorum exercitum, honeste genitos, liberaliter educatos servilibus vitiis imbuisse. Ergo effecisse ut feroces et inquieti inter socios, ignavi et inbelles inter hostes essent, nec impetum modo Poenorum, sed ne clamorem quidem sustinere 12 possent. Nec hercule mirum esse cessisse[4] milites in acie, cum primus omnium imperator fugeret:
13 magis mirari se aliquos stantis cecidisse, et non omnes comites Cn. Fulvi fuisse pavoris ac fugae. C. Flaminium, L. Paulum, L. Postumium, Cn. ac P. Scipiones cadere in acie maluisse quam deserere 14 circumventos exercitus: Cn. Fulvium prope unum

[1] perduxisse M^2? Aldus, Luchs: prae- $P(3)$: pro- B^2: duxisse conj. Luchs (earlier).
[2] et Cn. Fulvium? Ti. Sempronium Madvig: om. $P(1)JK$.
[3] esset $P(1)JK$: esset sed Conway.
[4] cessisse Alschefski: om. $P(1)J$.

[1] For the battle at Beneventum see XXIV. xv. f.
[2] Here called Quirites (rare of soldiers) to heighten the contrast with slaves.

armies into a dangerous place; but that no one B.C. 211 except Gnaeus Fulvius had ruined his legions with every vice before he betrayed them. And so it could be truly said that they were lost before they saw the enemy, and that they were defeated, not by Hannibal, but by their own commander. No one, in casting his vote, he said, clearly saw to what sort of man he was entrusting a command and an army. What had been the difference between Tiberius Sempronius and Gnaeus Fulvius? Tiberius Sempronius, though he had been given an army of slaves, by his training and authority had soon brought it about that no one of them in battle remembered his class and origin, and that they were a defence to allies, a terror to enemies. They had rescued Cumae, Beneventum[1] and other cities out of the jaws of Hannibal, as it were, and restored them to the Roman people. But Gnaeus Fulvius, having an army of Roman citizens,[2] men well born and brought up as free men, had steeped them in the vices of slaves. Consequently he had accomplished this, that they were overbearing and turbulent in their dealings with allies, cowardly and unwarlike towards the enemy, and unable to withstand even the battle-cry of the Carthaginians, to say nothing of their attack. And surely it was no wonder that the soldiers had given way in battle, when their commander was the first of all to flee. He wondered more, he said, that some had fallen where they stood, and that not all had shared the consternation and flight of Gnaeus Fulvius. Gaius Flaminius, Lucius Paulus, Lucius Postumius, Gnaeus and Publius Scipio had preferred to fall in battle-line rather than to desert their entrapped armies. But Gnaeus Fulvius, almost nuntium deleti exercitus Romam redisse. Facinus indignum esse Cannensem exercitum, quod ex acie fugerit, in Siciliam deportatum, ne prius inde dimittatur quam hostis ex Italia decesserit, et hoc idem 15 in Cn. Fulvi legionibus nuper decretum, Cn. Fulvio fugam ex proelio ipsius temeritate commisso impunitam esse, et eum in ganea lustrisque, ubi iuventam 16 egerit, senectutem acturum, milites qui nihil aliud peccaverint quam quod imperatoris similes fuerint, relegatos prope in exsilium ignominiosam pati militiam. Adeo imparem libertatem Romae diti ac pauperi, honorato atque inhonorato esse.

A.U.C. 543

III. Reus ab se culpam in milites transferebat: eos ferociter pugnam poscentis, productos in aciem non eo quo voluerint, quia serum diei fuerit, sed postero die, et tempore et loco aequo instructos, seu 2 famam seu vim hostium non sustinuisse. Cum effuse omnes fugerent, se quoque turba ablatum, ut Varronem Cannensi pugna, ut multos alios imperatores. 3 Qui [1] autem solum se restantem prodesse rei publicae, nisi si mors sua remedio publicis cladibus futura 4 esset, potuisse? [2] Non se inopia commeatus in loca iniqua incaute deductum, non agmine inexplorato euntem insidiis circumventum: vi aperta, armis, acie

[1] Qui $P(3)$: quid M^3BDAJK Aldus.
[2] esset, potuisse Gronovius: esse potuisset $P(1)JK$.

the only man to report the destruction of his army, B.C. 211 had returned to Rome. It was a shameful thing that the army of Cannae, for having escaped from the battle-line, had been deported to Sicily, not to be relieved of service there until the enemy withdrew from Italy, and that the same action had been taken recently in the case of Gnaeus Fulvius' legions; that the flight of Gnaeus Fulvius from a battle begun by his own recklessness should have gone unpunished, and he should be expecting to spend his old age in cook-shops and brothels in which he passed his youth, whereas the soldiers, whose only fault was that they were like their commander, had been all but exiled and were enduring military service in disgrace. So different was freedom at Rome for the rich and the poor, for the man who had held and the man who had not held public office!

III. The defendant shifted the blame from himself to the soldiers. They had been fiercely clamouring for battle, he said, when they were led out into line, not on the day they wished, since it was too late, but on the following day, and although drawn up at a favourable time and place, they failed to withstand the reputed or the real strength of the enemy. When they were all fleeing in disorder, he too was carried away by the crowd, as Varro in the battle of Cannae, as many other generals. How, he said, could he have been of service to the state by resisting all alone, unless his death was to be a remedy for national disasters? It was not that for lack of supplies he had been imprudently led into an unfavourable position; it was not that while advancing in column without reconnoitring he had been surprised and surrounded; it was by an open attack, by arms, by a

u.c. 543

victum. Nec suorum animos nec hostium in potestate habuisse: suum cuique ingenium audaciam aut pavorem facere. Bis est accusatus pecuniaque anquisitum; tertio testibus datis, cum, praeterquam quod omnibus probris onerabatur, iurati permulti dicerent fugae pavorisque initium a praetore ortum, ab eo desertos milites, cum haud vanum timorem ducis crederent, terga dedisse, tanta ira accensa est ut [1] capite anquirendum contio succlamaret. De eo quoque novum certamen ortum; nam cum bis pecunia anquisisset, tertio capitis se anquirere diceret, tribuni plebis appellati conlegae negarunt se in mora esse quo minus, quod ei more maiorum permissum esset, seu legibus seu moribus mallet, anquireret quoad vel capitis vel pecuniae iudicasset privato. Tum Sempronius perduellionis se iudicare Cn. Fulvio dixit, diemque comitiis ab C. Calpurnio praetore urbano petit. Inde alia spes ab reo temptata est, si adesse in iudicio Q. Fulvius frater posset, florens tum et fama rerum gestarum et propinqua spe Capuae potiundae. Id cum per litteras miserabiliter pro fratris capite scriptas petisset Fulvius, negassentque patres e re publica esse abscedi a Capua,

[1] ut P(1) Aldus: ut id A[4]JKz.

---

[1] At the first and again at the second hearing the accuser (Blaesus) stated the charge and the penalty demanded in case of conviction.

[2] Namely, the right to demand a severer punishment, after having twice announced that it would be a fine.

[3] I.e. by Fulvius.

[4] For a similar procedure cf. XXV. iii. 13 ff.

[5] The comitia centuriata, for the fourth hearing and a final verdict by popular vote. Cicero enumerates the formalities required, including the quarta accusatio; de Domo 45.

battle-line that he had been defeated. Neither the B.C. 211 spirit of his own men nor that of the enemy had been under his control: every man's own temperament, he said, produces boldness or consternation. Twice he was accused and a fine required;[1] at the third hearing witnesses were furnished, and he was not only loaded with every kind of reproach, but also many swore that the beginning of flight and panic was made by the praetor; that the soldiers, deserted by him, in the belief that the general's fear was not unfounded, had retreated. Thereupon such anger was kindled that the assembly shouted that the magistrate must demand a capital penalty. On that point[2] also a fresh dispute began. For when the accuser, having twice demanded a fine, said at the third hearing that he demanded capital punishment, the tribunes were appealed to.[3] And they said that they would not stand in their colleague's way, to prevent him from doing what was permitted him by ancestral custom, that is, from making his demand either according to the laws or according to custom, as he preferred, until he should condemn the defendant either to capital punishment or to pay a fine.[4] Upon that Sempronius said he judged Gnaeus Fulvius guilty of treason and asked of Gaius Calpurnius, the city praetor, a day for the assembly.[5] Then the defendant had recourse to another hope, in case his brother Quintus Fulvius might be able to attend at the trial, as he was then influential both from the fame of his successes and from the hope, now almost fulfilled, of taking Capua. After Fulvius had written a pitiful letter in that sense on behalf of his brother's life, and the senators had declared that leaving Capua was not to the interest of the state,

A.U.C. 543

12 postquam dies comitiorum aderat, Cn. Fulvius exsulatum Tarquinios abiit. Id ei iustum exsilium esse scivit plebs.

IV. Inter haec vis omnis belli versa in Capuam erat; obsidebatur tamen acrius quam oppugnabatur, nec aut famem tolerare servitia ac plebs poterant aut mittere nuntios ad Hannibalem per custodias 2 tam artas. Inventus est Numida qui acceptis litteris evasurum se professus praestaret promissum. Per media Romana castra nocte egressus spem accendit Campanis, dum aliquid virium superesset, ab omni 3 parte eruptionem temptandi. Ceterum in multis certaminibus equestria proelia ferme prospera faciebant, pedite [1] superabantur. Sed nequaquam tam laetum vincere quam triste vinci ulla parte erat ab 4 obsesso et prope expugnato hoste. Inita tandem ratio est ut quod viribus deerat arte aequaretur. Ex omnibus legionibus electi sunt iuvenes maxime vigore ac levitate corporum veloces; eis parmae breviores quam equestres et septena iacula quaternos longa pedes data, praefixa ferro quale hastis velitaribus 5 inest. Eos singulos in equos suos accipientes equites adsuefecerunt et vehi post sese et desilire perniciter, 6 ubi datum signum esset. Postquam [2] adsuetudine cotidiana satis intrepide fieri visum est, in campum qui medius inter castra murumque erat adversus

[1] pedite Gronovius: pedites P(1)JK.
[2] Postquam P(1)JK: postquam id Koch: id postquam M. Müller.

---

[1] Cf. the similar plebiscite XXV. iv. 9.
[2] I.e. to the Romans.
[3] Such had been mentioned in XXI. lv. 11, at the Trebia. But they were not combined with the cavalry.

when the day for the assembly was at hand Gnaeus B.C. 211
Fulvius went into exile at Tarquinii. The plebs voted that his exile was legal.[1]

IV. Meanwhile the whole effort of the war had been directed against Capua. But it was rather an intensive blockade than a series of assaults, and the slaves and commoners were unable either to endure hunger or to send messengers to Hannibal through guards so near to each other. A Numidian was discovered who took a letter, declared that he would make his way out, and kept his promise. Going out right through the Roman camp at night he inspired in the Capuans the hope that, while they still had some strength left, they might attempt a sally in all directions. But in the many engagements they were as a rule successful in cavalry battles, while in infantry they were worsted. To be victorious, however, was by no means so cheering[2] as it was depressing to be vanquished at any point by a beleaguered and almost captured enemy. At length a method was devised, so that what was lacking to their strength might be compensated by skilful tactics. Out of all the legions were picked young men who by reason of strength and lightness of build were the swiftest. These were furnished with round shields of smaller size than those used by cavalry, and seven javelins apiece four feet long and having iron heads such as are on the spears of the light-armed troops.[3] The horsemen would each of them take one of these men on to their own horses, and they trained them both to ride behind and to leap down nimbly when the signal was given. When thanks to daily practice they seemed to do this with sufficient daring, they advanced into the plain which lay half-way between the camp and

A.U.C. 543

7 instructos Campanorum equites processerunt, et, ubi ad coniectum teli ventum est, signo dato velites desiliunt. Pedestris inde acies ex equitatu repente in hostium equites incurrit, iaculaque cum impetu alia
8 super alia emittunt. Quibus plurimis in equos virosque passim coniectis permultos volneraverunt; pavoris tamen plus ex re nova atque inopinata iniectum est, et in perculsum hostem equites invecti fugam stragemque eorum usque ad portas fecerunt.
9 Inde equitatu quoque superior Romana res fuit;
10 institutum [1] ut velites in legionibus essent. Auctorem peditum equiti inmiscendorum centurionem Q. Navium ferunt,[2] honorique id ei apud imperatorem fuisse.

V. Cum in hoc statu ad Capuam res essent, Hannibalem diversum [3] Tarentinae arcis potiundae Capuae-
2 que retinendae trahebant curae. Vicit tamen respectus Capuae, in quam omnium sociorum hostiumque conversos videbat animos, documento futurae, qualemcumque eventum defectio ab Romanis habuisset.
3 Igitur magna parte impedimentorum relicta in Bruttiis et omni graviore armatu,[4] cum delectis peditum equitumque quam poterat aptissimus [5] ad maturandum iter in Campaniam contendit. Secuti tamen tam raptim euntem tres et triginta elephanti.
4 In valle occulta post Tifata, montem imminentem

[1] institutum $P(1)JK$: et institutum Ussing.
[2] ferunt $P(3)M^1$ Aldus : tradunt A^2JKz : fuerunt RM.
[3] diversum $P(1)JK$: in diversum C^1M^1x Aldus.

the city-wall in the face of the Capuan cavalry in battle-line. And when they had come within range, at a given signal the light-armed leaped to the ground. Thereupon an infantry line suddenly dashes out from the cavalry at the enemy's horsemen, and while attacking they hurl one javelin after another. By throwing a great number of these against horses and men in all directions, they wounded very many. But more consternation was created by the strange and the unexpected, and the cavalry charging into the frightened enemy caused them to flee with slaughter all the way to the gates. Thereafter the Roman side was superior in cavalry also; it was made the practice to have light-armed in the legions. The originator of combining infantry with cavalry they say was Quintus Navius, a centurion, and that for so doing honour was paid him by the general. B.C. 211

V. While matters stood thus at Capua, Hannibal was drawn in opposite directions by the desire to take the citadel of Tarentum and to hold Capua. However, regard for Capua prevailed, a city on which he saw that the attention of all his allies and enemies was concentrated, and one destined to be a striking example, whatever might be the result of its revolt from the Romans. Accordingly, leaving in the land of the Bruttii a large part of his baggage and all the heavy-armed, with picked infantry and cavalry he hastened into Campania in the best possible condition for a rapid march. In spite of his swift movement thirty-three elephants managed to follow him. He encamped in a closed valley behind Tifata, a moun-

[4] armatu $P(1)$ Gronovius: armatura $C^2M^1A^sJKz$.
[5] aptissimus $P(3)B^1J$: -is M^1A^sKx Aldus.

A.U.C. 543

Capuae, consedit. Adveniens cum castellum Galatiam praesidio vi pulso cepisset, in circumsedentis
5 Capuam se vertit, praemissisque nuntiis Capuam, quo tempore castra Romana adgressurus esset, ut eodem et illi ad eruptionem parati portis omnibus
6 sese effunderent, ingentem praebuit terrorem. Nam alia parte ipse adortus est, alia Campani omnes, equites peditesque, et cum iis Punicum praesidium, cui Bostar et Hanno praecrant, erupit.
7 Romani ut in re trepida, ne ad unam concurrendo partem aliquid indefensi relinquerent, ita inter sese
8 copias partiti sunt: Ap. Claudius Campanis, Fulvius Hannibali est oppositus: C. Nero propraetor cum equitibus sex legionum via quae Suessulam fert, C. Fulvius Flaccus legatus cum sociali equitatu
9 constitit e regione Volturni amnis. Proelium non solito modo clamore ac tumultu est coeptum, sed ad alium virorum, equorum armorumque sonum disposita in muris Campanorum inbellis multitudo tantum cum aeris crepitu, qualis in defectu lunae silenti nocte cieri solet, edidit clamorem ut averteret [1]
10 etiam pugnantium animos. Campanos facile a vallo Appius arcebat: maior vis ab altera parte Fulvium 11 Hannibal et Poeni urgebant. Legio ibi sexta loco cessit, qua pulsa cohors Hispanorum cum tribus elephantis usque ad vallum pervasit, ruperatque

[1] averteret $P(1)JK$: adverteret x Muretus.

---

[1] Unknown; not to be confused with Calatia, a city which had revolted in 216 B.C. (XXII. lxi. 11), and was not recovered by the Romans until later in this year, 211 B.C. (xvi. 5).

[2] Cf. Tacitus Annals I. xxviii: Plutarch Aemilius xvii. 4; Pliny N.H. II. 54.

tain commanding Capua. As he approached, he B.C. 211 first captured the stronghold of Galatia,[1] overpowering its garrison, and then directed his march against the besiegers of Capua. And sending word in advance to Capua, stating at what time he proposed to attack the Roman camp, so that they also, making ready for a sally, might at the same time burst out of all the gates, he inspired great alarm. For on one side he himself attacked, on the other all the Capuans, cavalry and infantry, sallied out, and with them the Carthaginian garrison, commanded by Bostar and Hanno.

The Romans in their alarm, so as not to leave one point undefended by rushing in the same direction, divided their forces among them as follows: Appius Claudius was placed facing the Capuans, Fulvius facing Hannibal: Gaius Nero, the propraetor, with the cavalry of six legions took his place along the road leading to Suessula, Gaius Fulvius Flaccus, the lieutenant, with the cavalry of the allies in the direction of the river Volturnus. The battle began not only with the usual shouting and uproar, but, in addition to the noise of men and horses and arms, the non-combatant populace of Capua disposed along the walls produced so much shouting, together with the clashing of bronze,[2] such as is usually kept up in the still night of a lunar eclipse, as to divert the attention even of the combatants. Appius was easily keeping the Capuans away from the earthwork of the camp; on the other side a larger force, Hannibal and the Carthaginians, were pressing Fulvius. There the sixth legion gave way, and after it had been forced back, a cohort of Spaniards with three elephants managed even to reach the earth-

A.U.C. 543

mediam aciem Romanorum et in ancipiti spe ac periculo erat utrum in castra perrumperet an interclu-12 deretur a suis. Quem pavorem legionis periculumque castrorum Fulvius ubi vidit, Q. Navium primoresque alios centurionum hortatur ut cohortem hostium sub
13 vallo pugnantem invadant: in summo discrimine rem verti; aut viam dandam iis esse—et minore conatu quam condensam aciem rupissent[1] in castra
14 inrupturos—aut conficiendos sub vallo esse. Nec magni certaminis rem fore; paucos esse et ab suis interclusos, et quae. dum paveat Romanus, interrupta acies videatur, eam. si se utrimque[2] in hostem vertat, 15 ancipiti pugna medios circumventuram. Navius ubi haec imperatoris dicta accepit, secundi hastati signum ademptum signifero in hostis infert, iacturum in medios eos minitans, ni se propere sequantur
16 milites et partem capessant pugnae. Ingens corpus erat et arma honestabant; et sublatum alte signum
17 converterat ad spectaculum cives hostesque. Ceterum postquam iam ad signa pervenerat Hispanorum, tum undique in eum tragulae coniectae et prope tota in unum acies versa; sed neque multitudo hostium neque telorum vis arcere impetum eius viri potuerunt.[3]

VI. Et M. Atilius legatus primi principis ex eadem

[1] rupissent Crévier: inrupissent $P(3)A^{z}JK$ Aldus.
[2] utrimque $PCM^{1}z$: utrumque RMBDAJK.
[3] potuerunt $P(3)$ Aldus: potuit AJKz.

work, and had broken through the Roman centre, B.C. 211 and wavered between the hope of breaking through into the camp and the danger of being cut off from their own troops. Fulvius, on seeing the alarm of the legion and the danger to the camp, bade Quintus Navius and other first centurions to attack the cohort of the enemy fighting beneath the earthwork. He said that it was a very critical moment; that either they must be allowed to pass—and it would be less of an effort for them to burst into the camp than it had been to break through the solid line—or else they must be disposed of beneath the earthwork. Also that it would not involve much fighting; they were few and cut off from their own men; and if the battle-line, which in the panic of the Romans seemed to have been broken through, should face against the enemy from both sides, it would enclose them between two fronts. Navius, on hearing these words of the commander, snatched a standard of the second maniple of the hastati from the standard-bearer and carried it towards the enemy, threatening that he would throw it into their midst if the soldiers did not quickly follow him and take a hand in the battle. A huge frame he had, and his arms added distinction; and the standard held aloft had attracted citizens and enemies to the sight. But when he had pushed through to the standards of the Spaniards, spears were then hurled at him from every side, and almost the entire line turned against him alone. But neither the numbers of the enemy nor the mass of weapons could beat off the attack of such a man.

VI. And Marcus Atilius, the lieutenant, started to carry the standard of the first maniple of the prin- legione signum inferre in cohortem Hispanorum coepit; et qui castris praeerant, L. Porcius Licinus et T. Popilius legati, pro vallo acriter propugnant elephantosque transgredientes in ipso vallo conficiunt. 2 Quorum corporibus cum oppleta fossa esset, velut aggere aut ponte iniecto transitum hostibus dedit. Ibi per[1] stragem iacentium elephantorum atrox 3 edita caedes. Altera in parte castrorum iam inpulsi erant Campani Punicumque praesidium et sub ipsa porta Capuae quae Volturnum fert pugnabatur; 4 neque tam armati inrumpentibus Romanis resistebant, quam porta ballistis scorpionibusque instructa missi- 5 libus procul hostis arcebat. Et suppressit impetum Romanorum volnus imperatoris Ap. Claudi, cui suos ante prima signa adhortanti sub laevo umero summum pectus gaeso ictum est. Magna vis tamen hostium ante portam est caesa, ceteri trepidi in 6 urbem conpulsi. Et Hannibal, postquam cohortis Hispanorum stragem vidit summaque vi castra hostium defendi, omissa oppugnatione recipere signa et convertere agmen peditum obiecto ab tergo 7 equitatu, ne hostis instaret, coepit. Legionum ardor ingens ad hostem insequendum fuit: Flaccus receptui cani iussit, satis ad utrumque profectum

A.U.C. 543

[1] per P(1)JK: super Ussing.

---

[1] In the second line, advancing to aid the hastati.

[2] A stronghold recently fortified at the mouth of the river Volturnus, later a city; cf. XXV. xx. 2.

cipes[1] of the same legion towards the cohort of B.C. 211
Spaniards, and at the same time Lucius Porcius Licinus and Titus Popilius, the lieutenants in command of the camp, fought with spirit on the earthwork and slew the elephants directly on the wall, as they were trying to cross. When the trench was filled with their bodies, it furnished the enemy with a passage, just as if an embankment or a bridge had been thrown over it. There, all over the heap of fallen elephants, a terrible slaughter ensued. On the other side of the camp the Capuans and the Carthaginian garrison had already been repulsed, and fighting was going on just outside the gate of Capua leading toward Volturnum.[2] And it was not so much the armed men that were resisting the Romans trying to burst in, as that the gate, armed with larger and smaller artillery, kept the enemy back by missiles hurled from a distance. The attack of the Romans was further checked by the wounding of Appius Claudius, the general encouraging his men at the front, when the upper part of his chest was struck by a javelin below the left shoulder. Nevertheless a great number of the enemy were slain before the gate, and the rest driven in disorder into the city. Hannibal likewise, seeing the slaughter of the Spanish cohort, and that the enemy's camp was being defended with the utmost vigour, gave up the attack upon it and began to recall his standards and to make his infantry beat a retreat, while interposing his cavalry in the rear, to prevent the enemy from pursuing. The legions showed great eagerness to pursue the enemy; but Flaccus ordered the recall to be sounded, thinking that enough had been accom-

A.U.C. 543

ratus, ut et Campani quam haud multum in Hannibale
8 praesidii esset, et ipse Hannibal sentiret. Caesa eo die quidam[1], qui huius pugnae auctores sunt, octo milia hominum de Hannibalis exercitu, tria ex Campanis tradunt, signaque Carthaginiensibus quindecim adempta, duodeviginti Campanis.

9 Apud alios nequaquam tantam molem pugnae inveni[2] plusque pavoris quam certaminis fuisse, cum inopinato in castra Romana Numidae Hispanique
10 cum elephantis inrupissent, elephanti per media castra vadentes stragem tabernaculorum ingenti sonitu ac fugam abrumpentium vincula iumentorum 11 facerent; fraudem quoque super tumultum adiectam, inmissis ab Hannibale qui habitu Italico gnari Latinae linguae iuberent consulum verbis, quoniam amissa castra essent, pro se quemque militum in 12 proxumos montes fugere; sed eam celeriter cognitam fraudem oppressamque magna caede hostium;
13 elephantos igni e castris exactos. Hoc ultimum, utcumque initum finitumque est, ante deditionem Capuae proelium fuit.

Medix tuticus, qui summus magistratus apud Campanos est, eo anno Seppius Loesius erat, loco 14 obscuro tenuique fortuna ortus. Matrem eius quondam pro pupillo eo procurantem familiare ostentum, cum respondisset haruspex summum quod esset imperium Capuae perventurum ad eum puerum, nihil ad eam spem adgnoscentem dixisse

[1] quidam Luchs: om. P(1)JK Conway.
[2] inveni P: inveniri P^{2}?(1): invenio $A^{s}JKz$.

[1] No doubt chiefly Valerius Antias; Vol. VI., p. 492, n. 2; below, xlix. 3, 5.
[2] Meaning proconsuls.
[3] Cf. XXIII. xxxv. 13; XXIV. xix. 2.

plished for both purposes—that the Campanians B.C. 211 should appreciate how little defence they had in Hannibal, and that Hannibal himself should be aware of it. Some of the authorities [1] on this battle relate that eight thousand men were slain in Hannibal's army, three thousand in the Campanian, and that fifteen standards were taken from the Carthaginians and eighteen from the Campanians.

In other writers I have found that the battle was by no means on such a scale, but that there was more panic than fighting, when Numidians and Spaniards with elephants had burst into the Roman camp unexpectedly, and while the elephants, on their way straight through the camp, were causing wreckage of tents in the midst of a terrible din, and making the beasts of burden break their halters and flee; that, in addition to the uproar, there was also a ruse; for Hannibal sent in men in Italian dress and acquainted with the Latin language, to bid the soldiers, in the name of the consuls,[2] each for himself to flee to the neighbouring mountains, since the camp had been taken; but that the ruse was quickly recognized and frustrated with great loss to the enemy; that the elephants were driven out of the camp by the use of fire. In whatever way it began and ended, this was the last battle before the surrender of Capua.

As medix tuticus,[3] which is the highest office among the Campanians, Seppius Loesius was serving that year, though born in a humble station and having slender means. They say that his mother on his behalf as a minor was once expiating a household portent, and when the soothsayer had given his answer that the very highest authority at Capua would come to that boy, she, finding nothing to 15 ferunt: "Ne tu perditas res Campanorum narras, ubi summus honos ad filium meum perveniet." 16 Ea ludificatio veri et ipsa in verum vertit; nam cum fame ferroque urgerentur nec spes ulla superesset sisti posse,[1] iis qui nati[2] in spem honorum erant 17 honores detrectantibus, Loesius querendo desertam ac proditam a primoribus Capuam, summum magistratum ultimus omnium Campanorum cepit.

A.U.C. 543

VII. Ceterum Hannibal, ut nec hostis elici amplius ad pugnam vidit neque per castra eorum perrumpi ad 2 Capuam posse, ne suos quoque commeatus intercluderent novi consules, abscedere ~~inrito incepto~~ et 3 movere a Capua statuit castra. Multa secum quonam[3] inde ire pergeret volventi subiit animum impetus caput ipsum belli Romam petendi, cuius rei semper cupitae praetermissam occasionem post Cannensem pugnam et alii volgo[4] fremebant et ipse 4 non dissimulabat: necopinato pavore ac tumultu non esse desperandum aliquam partem urbis occu- 5 pari posse; et si Roma in discrimine esset, Capuam extemplo omissuros aut ambo imperatores Romanos aut alterum ex iis, et si divisissent copias, utrumque infirmiorem factum aut sibi aut Campanis bene 6 gerendae rei fortunam daturos esse. Una ea cura angebat ne, ubi abscessisset, extemplo dederentur Campani. Numidam promptum ad omnia audenda agendaque[5] donis perlicit ut litteris acceptis specie

[1] posse Alschefski: om. P(1)JK.
[2] iis qui nati z Alschefski: om. P(1)JK.
[3] quonam A[1]JK Aldus: quo iam P(1)A[2]z.
[4] volgo P: om. Madvig, Hertz, Conway, without giving reason or citing MSS.
[5] agendaque Wesenberg: que P(3): om. M[1]DAJK Conway.

justify that hope, said "Surely you mean the ruin B.C. 211 of the Campanians, when the highest office shall come to my son." That mockery of a true prediction also came true. For when they were hard pressed by starvation and the sword, and there remained no hope that they could hold out, while those who were born to the expectation of public offices were refusing them, Loesius, who complained that Capua had been abandoned and betrayed by its leading men, was the last of all the Campanians to receive their highest magistracy.

VII. But Hannibal, seeing that it was impossible either to tempt the enemy into battle again, or to break a way through their camp to Capua, for fear the new consuls should cut off his supplies also, resolved to retire without accomplishing his undertaking and to move his camp away from Capua. While carefully considering whither he should remove, the impulse came to him to proceed to Rome, the very centre of the war. It was something which he had always desired to do, but after the battle of Cannae he had let the opportunity pass, as others commonly complained, and as he himself frequently admitted. In unexpected alarm and confusion it need not be beyond his hopes that some part of the city could be seized. And if Rome should be in danger, he thought that either both of the Roman commanders or one of them would at once abandon Capua: and that if they should divide their forces, each being weakened would give either himself or the Capuans the chance of success. Only one concern tormented him, the fear that as soon as he had withdrawn, the Capuans might at once be surrendered. A Numidian who was ready to dare and do anything was induced transfugae castra Romana ingressus, altera parte

A.U.C. 543

7 clam Capuam pervadat. Litterae autem erant adhortatione plenae: profectionem suam, quae salutaris illis foret, abstracturam ad defendendam Romam ab oppugnanda Capua duces atque exercitus
8 Romanos. Ne desponderent animos; tolerando
9 paucos dies totam soluturos obsidionem. Inde navis in flumine Volturno conprehensas subigi ad id quod iam ante praesidii causa fecerat castellum iussit.
10 Quarum ubi tantam copiam esse ut una nocte traici posset exercitus allatum est, cibariis decem dierum praeparatis deductas nocte ad fluvium legiones ante lucem traiecit.

VIII. Id priusquam fieret, ita futurum conpertum ex transfugis Fulvius Flaccus senatui Romam cum scripsisset, varie animi hominum[1] pro cuiusque
2 ingenio adfecti sunt. Ut in re tam trepida senatu extemplo vocato, P. Cornelius cui Asinae cognomen erat omnes duces exercitusque ex tota Italia, neque Capuae neque ullius alterius rei memor, ad urbis
3 praesidium revocabat. Fabius Maximus abscedi a Capua terrerique et circumagi ad nutus commina-
4 tionesque Hannibalis flagitiosum ducebat:[2] qui ad Cannas victor ire tamen ad urbem ausus non esset, eum a Capua repulsum spem potiundae urbis Romae

[1] animi hominum P(3): hominum animi AJK Aldus.
[2] ducebat P(1): dicebat JK.

---

[1] To protect his passage: not the same castellum as in vi. 3.
[2] He had been consul before this war, in 221 B.C.; cf. XXII. xxxiv. 1.

by Hannibal's gifts to take a letter, enter the Roman B.C. 211 camp under the guise of a deserter, and then from the other side of the camp make his way in secret to Capua. And the letter was filled with encouragements. His departure, Hannibal said, which would be of advantage to them, would draw off the Roman generals and armies from the siege of Capua to the defence of Rome. They should not be downcast; by holding out for a few days they would cause the entire blockade to be raised. He then ordered that boats on the Volturnus should be seized and rowed up to the fort which he had previously built for a defence.[1] And when word came that the number of these was such that his army could be ferried across in a single night, he had food prepared for ten days, led his legions down to the river by night, and transported them across before daylight.

VIII. Before this happened Fulvius Flaccus had learned from deserters that it was to be done, and had so written to the senate at Rome: whereupon men's feelings were differently stirred according to their several natures. As was natural in so alarming a situation, the senate was at once summoned, and Publius Cornelius, surnamed Asina,[2] with no thought of Capua or of anything else, was for recalling all the generals and armies from the whole of Italy for the defence of the city. But Fabius Maximus thought it a shameful thing to withdraw from Capua, to be frightened and led about at the beck of Hannibal and in response to his threats. To think, he said, that the man who, though victor at Cannae, had not ventured to go to the city, on being beaten back from Capua should have conceived the hope of capturing the city of 5 cepisse! Non ad Romam obsidendam, sed ad Capuae liberandam obsidionem ire. Romam cum eo exercitu qui ad urbem esset Iovem foederum ruptorum ab Hannibale testem deosque alios defensuros esse. 6 Has diversas sententias media sententia P. Valerii Flacci vicit, qui utriusque rei memor imperatoribus qui ad Capuam essent scribendum censuit quid ad urbem praesidii esset; quantas autem Hannibal copias duceret aut quanto exercitu ad Capuam 7 obsidendam opus esset, ipsos scire. Si ita[1] Romam e ducibus alter et exercitus pars mitti posset, ut ab reliquo et duce et exercitu Capua recte obsideretur, 8 inter se compararent Claudius Fulviusque utri obsidenda Capua, utri ad prohibendam obsidione patriam 9 Romam veniundum esset. Hoc senatus consulto Capuam perlato Q. Fulvius proconsul, cui, collega ex volnere aegro, redeundum[2] Romam erat, e tribus exercitibus milite electo, ad quindecim milia 10 peditum, mille equites Volturnum traducit. Inde cum Hannibalem Latina via iturum satis comperisset, ipse per Appiae municipia quaeque propter eam viam 11 sunt. Setiam. Coram, Lavinium praemisit, ut commeatus paratos et in urbibus haberent et ex agris deviis in viam proferrent, praesidiaque in urbes contraherent, ut sua cuique res publica in manu esset.

A.U.C. 543

IX. Hannibal quo die Volturnum est transgressus,

[1] Si ita Alschefski: sieta PCR: si et $C^{2}R^{1?}MBDAJK$ Aldus.

[2] aegro, redeundum Walters: aegro eundum C^{2}: aegrediundum PR; egrediundum $CR^{2}MBDAJKz$ (-endum JK).

---

[1] Consul 227 B.C.; ambassador to Hannibal at Saguntum, and to Carthage 218 B.C.; XXI. vi. 8.

Rome! It was not to besiege Rome that he was on B.C. 211
the march, but to raise the siege of Capua. As for Rome, Jupiter, witness of the treaties broken by Hannibal, and the other gods would defend her with the aid of the army stationed at the city. These conflicting motions were defeated by the compromise of Publius Valerius Flaccus,[1] who, mindful of both situations, proposed that they write to the generals at Capua, informing them what forces there were to defend the city; on the other hand, what forces Hannibal was taking with him or how large an army was needed for the siege of Capua they themselves knew. If one of the two generals and a part of the army could be sent to Rome, provided Capua should be duly besieged by the general and army remaining, then let Claudius and Fulvius arrange between them which of the two must besiege Capua, and which must come to Rome to prevent a siege of their native city. When this decree of the senate was brought to Capua, Quintus Fulvius, the proconsul, who, since his colleague was disabled by a wound, was obliged to return to Rome, after picking soldiers from three armies, led about fifteen thousand infantry and a thousand horsemen across the Volturnus. Thence, on learning definitely that Hannibal would march along the Latin Way, he himself sent word in advance to the towns along the Appian Way and such as are near that road, Setia, Cora, Lavinium, that they should have supplies on hand in the cities and also bring them down from farms at a distance to the road, and bring garrisons into the cities, so that each might have the defence of its public interests in hand.

IX. Hannibal on the day that he crossed the Vol-

A.U.C. 543

haud procul a flumine castra posuit: postero die praeter Cales in agrum Sidicinum pervenit. Ibi diem unum populando moratus per Suessanum Allifanumque et Casinatem agrum via Latina ducit. Sub Casino [1] biduo stativa habita et passim populationes factae. Inde praeter Interamnam Aquinumque in Fregellanum agrum ad Lirim fluvium ventum, ubi intercisum pontem a Fregellanis morandi itineris causa invenit. Et Fulvium Volturnus tenuerat amnis, navibus ab Hannibale incensis, rates ad traiciendum exercitum in magna inopia materiae aegre comparantem. Traiecto ratibus exercitu, relicum Fulvio expeditum iter, non per urbes modo sed circa viam expositis benigne commeatibus, erat; alacresque milites alius alium ut adderet gradum, memor ad defendendam iri [2] patriam, hortabantur. Romam Fregellanus nuntius, diem noctemque itinere continuato, ingentem attulit terrorem. Tumultuosius quam allatum erat volgatum periculum discursu [3] hominum adfingentium vana auditis totam urbem concitat. Ploratus mulierum non ex privatis solum domibus exaudiebatur, sed undique matronae in publicum effusae circa deum delubra discurrunt, crinibus passis aras verrentes, nixae genibus, supinas manus ad caelum ac deos tendentes orantesque ut urbem Romanam e manibus hostium eriperent

[1] Casino Ussing: Casinum P(1)JK.
[2] iri PCR: ire R^2*MDAJK Aldus*: irae B.
[3] volgatum periculum dis- Conway: propagatum dis- Madvig: om. P(1)JK, a lost line, these having simply cursu or other cases of the same word.

---

[1] Near Fregellae the Via Latina crossed the Liris, after steadily approaching it most of the way from Casinum.

turnus pitched camp not far from the river; on the next day he made his way past Cales into the region of the Sidicini. There he lingered one day devastating the country, and then led along the Latin Way through the territory of Suessa, Allifae and Casinum. Before Casinum he remained encamped two days, and ravaged the country in all directions. Then passing Interamna and Aquinum he came into the region of Fregellae as far as the river Liris,[1] where he found the bridge broken down by the men of Fregellae, to delay his march. Fulvius too had been detained by the river Volturnus, as the boats had been burned by Hannibal, and he had difficulty in getting together rafts for the transporting of his army, owing to the great scarcity of timber. After the army had been carried across on rafts, the rest of Fulvius' march was unhampered, as supplies had been generously set out for them not only in the cities, but also by the roadside. And the eager soldiers kept encouraging one another to quicken their pace, remembering that they were marching to defend their native city. To Rome a messenger from Fregellae, riding on for a day and a night, brought great alarm. Still greater confusion than at its first reception was occasioned by news of the danger spread by men who ran about, adding unfounded reports to what they had heard, and it stirred the entire city. The wailings of women were heard not only from private houses, but from every direction matrons pour into the streets and run about among the shrines of the gods, sweeping the altars with their dishevelled hair, kneeling, holding up their palms to heaven and the gods, and praying them to rescue the city of Rome from the hands of the enemy and to

B.C. 211

A.U.C. 543

matresque Romanas et liberos parvos inviolatos serva-9 rent. Senatus magistratibus in foro praesto est, si quid consulere[1] velint. Alii accipiunt imperia discedunt que ad suas quisque officiorum partes, alii offerunt se, si quo usus operae sit. Praesidia in arce, in Capitolio, in muris, circa urbem, in monte etiam
10 Albano atque arce Aefulana ponuntur. Inter hunc tumultum Q. Fulvium proconsulem profectum cum exercitu Capua adfertur; cui ne minueretur imperium, si in urbem venisset, decernit senatus ut Q.
11 Fulvio par cum consulibus imperium esset. Hannibal, infestius perpopulato agro Fregellano propter intercisos pontis, per Frusinatem Ferentinatemque et 12 Anagninum agrum in Labicanum venit. Inde Algido Tusculum petiit, nec receptus moenibus infra Tusculum dextrorsus Gabios descendit. Inde in Pupiniam exercitu demisso octo milia passuum ab 13 Roma posuit castra. Quo propius hostis accedebat, eo maior caedes fiebat fugientium praecedentibus Numidis, pluresque omnium generum atque aetatium capiebantur.

X. In hoc tumultu Fulvius Flaccus porta Capena cum exercitu Romam ingressus, media urbe per Carinas Esquilias contendit: inde egressus inter Esquilinam Collinamque portam posuit castra.
2 Aediles plebis commeatum eo comportarunt; con-

[1] consulere C^4A^1JK: consule PCR: consules R^2MDBA.

---

[1] Aefula, not far from Tibur, disappeared early, but gave its name to the Mons Aeflanus, which in Domitian's time (A.D. 88) was pierced by a long tunnel for the Aqua Claudia.

[2] According to Livy it had been a colony since 418 B.C.; IV. xlvii. 6; xlix 6.

[3] Between Rome and Tusculum. From it came the name of the tribus Pupinia; Festus p. 264 L.

keep Roman mothers and little children unharmed. B.C. 211
The senate is ready in the Forum for the magistrates, in case they wish its advice about anything. Some receive commands and depart each to the duty assigned him; others volunteer, if there be any need of their services. Garrisons are posted on the Citadel, on the Capitol, on the walls, around the city, also on the Alban Mount and on the citadel of Aefula.[1] In the midst of this turmoil word comes that Quintus Fulvius, the proconsul, has set out from Capua with an army. And that his military power may not be annulled if he should come into the city, the senate decrees that Quintus Fulvius shall have equal authority with the consuls. Hannibal, after laying waste the territory of Fregellae more ruthlessly on account of the breaking down of the bridges, came through the districts of Frusino and Ferentinum and Anagnia into that of Labici.[2] Then over Mount Algidus he went to Tusculum, and not being admitted to the city, he descended toward the right below Tusculum to Gabii. Thence he led his army down into the Pupinian district[3] and pitched camp eight miles distant from Rome. The nearer the enemy approached the greater was the slaughter of fugitives, as the Numidians were in the lead, and the greater was the number of the captured of every class and age.

X. In this confusion Fulvius Flaccus entered Rome with his army by the Porta Capena,[4] and hastened through the centre of the city by way of the Carinae to the Esquiline. Then going out he pitched his camp between Porta Esquilina and Porta Collina. The plebeian aediles brought supplies thither: the

[4] Cf. XXV. xl. 3.

A.U.C. 543

sules senatusque in castra venerunt; ibi de summa re publica consultatum. Placuit consules circa portas Collinam Esquilinamque ponere castra; C. Calpurnium praetorem urbanum Capitolio atque arci praeesse, et senatum frequentem in foro contineri, si quid in tam subitis rebus consulto opus esset. 3 Inter haec Hannibal ad Anienem fluvium tria milia passuum ab urbe castra admovit. Ibi stativis positis ipse cum duobus milibus equitum ad portam Collinam usque ad Herculis templum est progressus atque, unde proxime poterat, moenia situmque urbis 4 obequitans contemplabatur. Id eum tam licenter atque otiose facere Flacco indignum visum est; itaque immisit equites summoverique atque in castra 5 redigi hostium equitatum iussit. Cum commissum proelium esset, consules transfugas Numidarum, qui tum in Aventino ad mille et ducenti erant, media 6 urbe transire Esquilias iusserunt, nullos aptiores inter convalles tectaque hortorum et sepulcra et cavas [1] undique vias ad pugnandum futuros rati. Quos cum ex arce Capitolioque clivo Publicio in equis decurrentis quidam vidissent, captum Aventi- 7 num conclamaverunt. Ea res tantum tumultum ac fugam praebuit ut, nisi castra Punica extra urbem fuissent, effusura se omnis pavida multitudo fuerit; tunc in domos atque in tecta refugiebant, vagosque

[1] cavas $P(3)A^{\gamma}$ Aldus : vacuas $B^{2}AJKz$.

---

[1] Thus there would be three camps eastward of the Agger of Servius Tullius so-called, where Hannibal's attack might be anticipated.

[2] Site unknown.

[3] This street led from the northwest end of the Circus Maximus up on to the Aventine, and southward across that hill; cf. XXVII. xxxvii. 15; XXX. xxvi. 5.

consuls and the senate came to the camp; there they B.C. 211 deliberated on the most important matters of state. It was decided that the consuls should pitch their camps near the gates, Collina and Esquilina;[1] that Gaius Calpurnius, the city praetor, should be in command of the Capitol and the Citadel, and that the senate in full numbers should be kept in the Forum, in case there might be need of deliberation in such an emergency. Meanwhile Hannibal moved his camp to the river Anio, three miles from the city. There he established a permanent camp and himself with two thousand horsemen advanced toward Porta Collina as far as the Temple of Hercules,[2] and riding up surveyed the walls and situation of the city from the nearest possible point. That he should do so with such freedom and so at his leisure seemed to Flaccus a shame. Accordingly he sent his horsemen against him and ordered that the cavalry of the enemy be driven away and back into their own camp. After the engagement had begun, the consuls ordered the Numidian deserters, of whom there were at that time on the Aventine about twelve hundred, to pass through the centre of the city across the Esquiline, thinking that none were better suited to do battle in the valleys and around buildings in gardens, among tombs and along roads hemmed in on every side. When some men on the Citadel and the Capitol saw them riding down the Clivus Publicius,[3] they shouted that the Aventine had been captured. That caused so much confusion and flight that, if there had not been a Carthaginian camp outside the city, the whole panic-stricken multitude would have poured out. As it was they fled to their homes and into buildings, and as their own people in viis suos pro [1] hostibus lapidibus telisque incesse-8 bant. Nec comprimi tumultus aperirique error poterat refertis itineribus agrestium turba pecorumque quae repentinus pavor in urbem compulerat.

A.U.C. 543

9 Equestre proelium secundum fuit summotique hostes sunt. Et quia multis locis comprimendi tumultus erant qui temere oriebantur, placuit omnes qui dictatores, consules censoresve fuissent cum imperio 10 esse, donec recessisset a muris hostis. Et diei quod reliquum fuit et nocte insequenti multi temere excitati tumultus sunt compressique.

XI. Postero die transgressus Anienem Hannibal in aciem omnis copias eduxit: nec Flaccus consu-2 lesque certamen detrectavere. Instructis utrimque exercitibus in eius pugnae casum in qua urbs Roma victori praemium esset, imber ingens grandine mixtus ita utramque aciem turbavit ut vix armis retentis in castra sese receperint, nullius rei minore 3 quam hostium metu. Et postero die eodem loco acies instructas eadem tempestas diremit; ubi recepissent se in castra, mira serenitas cum tranquillitate 4 oriebatur. In religionem ea res apud Poenos versa est, auditaque vox Hannibalis fertur, potiundae sibi urbis Romae modo mentem non dari, modo fortunam.
5 Minuere etiam spem eius duae [2] aliae, parva magnaque, res, magna illa quod, cum ipse ad moenia urbis Romae armatus sederet, milites sub vexillis in supple-

[1] pro A$^{\nu}$JK Aldus: om. P(1)x.
[2] duae (i.e. ii) Madvig: et P(1)JK.

roamed the streets, they would hurl stones and javelins at them, as though they were enemies. Nor could the uproar be checked and their mistake revealed, since the roads were clogged by the crowd of rustics and the cattle that sudden alarm had driven into the city. The cavalry battle was successful and the enemy driven away. And because in many places disturbances which arose without reason had to be checked, it was decreed that all who had been dictators, consuls or censors should have full military power until the enemy should have retired from the walls. And in fact during the rest of the day and the following night many disturbances were provoked without reason and were checked. B.C. 211

XI. On the next day Hannibal crossed the Anio and led all his forces out into line, and Flaccus and the consuls did not refuse battle. After the armies had been drawn up on both sides for the issue of a battle in which the city of Rome was to be the prize for the victor, a great downpour mingled with hail so confused both battle-lines that, holding on to their arms with difficulty, they returned to camp, fearing everything more than the enemy. And the following day, when the lines were drawn up on the same spot, the same bad weather parted them. On both days, when they had retired to their camps, to their astonishment there came a clear sky and a calm. For the Carthaginians it became a solemn warning, and it is reported that Hannibal was heard to say that at one time the purpose to take Rome, at another the chance, was denied him. Two other things, small and great, further diminished his hope. The important thing was that he heard that, although he was sitting armed before the walls of the city of Rome, soldiers

A.U.C. 543

mentum Hispaniae profectos audiit, parva autem 6 quod per[1] eos dies eum forte agrum in quo ipse castra haberet venisse nihil ob id deminuto pretio 7 cognitum ex quodam captivo est. Id vero adeo superbum atque indignum visum, eius soli quod ipse bello captum possideret haberetque inventum Romae emptorem, ut extemplo vocato praecone tabernas argentarias quae circa forum Romanum essent iusserit venire.

8 His motus ad Tutiam fluvium castra rettulit, sex milia passuum ab urbe. Inde ad lucum Feroniae pergit ire, templum ea tempestate inclutum divitiis.
9 Capenates aliique qui[2] accolae eius erant primitias frugum eo donaque alia pro copia portantes multo auro argentoque id exornatum habebant. Iis omnibus donis tum spoliatum templum; aeris acervi, cum rudera milites religione inducti iacerent, 10 post profectionem Hannibalis magni inventi. Huius populatio templi haud dubia inter scriptores est.
Coelius Romam euntem ab Ereto devertisse eo Hannibalem tradit, iterque eius ab Reate Cutiliisque 11 et ab Amiterno orditur: ex Campania in Samnium, inde in Paelignos pervenisse, praeterque oppidum Sulmonem in Marrucinos transisse, inde Albensi agro in Marsos, hinc Amiternum Forulosque vicum

[1] per Kz: om. P(1)J.
[2] qui x Gronovius: om. P(1): *B*²*JK seem to have reduced* aliique qui to aliqui.

---

[1] I.e. small banners hanging from a cross-bar. The vexillum was used by detachments, here by recruits, as also by cavalry; cf. XXV. xiv. 4.

[2] In southern Etruria, at the foot of Mt. Soracte; XXVII. iv. 14 f.; XXXIII. xxvi. 8.

had set out under their banners[1] to reinforce Spain. B.C. 211
And the unimportant circumstance was that he learned from a prisoner that about that time the land on which he had his camp chanced to have been sold, with no reduction in price on that account. But it seemed to him so arrogant and such an indignity that a purchaser should have been found at Rome for the ground which he had seized in war and was himself its occupier and owner, that he forthwith summoned a herald and ordered the bankers' shops which were round the Roman Forum to be sold.

Influenced by these circumstances he moved his camp back to the river Tutia, six miles from the city. Thence he proceeded to the grove of Feronia,[2] a shrine which at that time was noted for its wealth. The people of Capena and others who lived near it used to carry thither first-fruits and gifts in addition according to their means, and had kept it richly adorned with gold and silver. Of all those gifts the temple was at that time despoiled. Great heaps of bronze were found after the departure of Hannibal, since the soldiers inspired by religious fear deposited crude lumps. As to the spoiling of this temple there is no uncertainty among the historians. Coelius relates that on his way to Rome Hannibal turned aside to it from Eretum, and traces his march from Reate and Cutiliae and Amiternum. He says that from Campania he came into Samnium, thence into the land of the Paelignians, and passing the town of Sulmo, over into the country of the Marrucini; thence through the territory of Alba[3] into that of the Marsians, and then to Amiternum and the village of

[3] Alba Fucens, northwest of the Lacus Fucinus; XXX. xvii. 2.

A.U.C. 543

12 venisse. Neque ibi error est quod tanti ducis tantique [1] exercitus vestigia intra tam brevis aevi memoriam potuerint confundi—isse enim ea con-13 stat—: tantum id interest, veneritne eo itinere ad urbem an ab urbe in Campaniam redierit.

XII. Ceterum non quantum Romanis pertinaciae ad premendam obsidione Capuam fuit, tantum ad
2 defendendam Hannibali. Namque per Samnium Apuliamque [2] et Lucanos in Bruttium agrum ad fretum ac Regium eo cursu contendit ut prope re-
3 pentino adventu incautos oppresserit. Capua etsi nihilo segnius obsessa per eos dies fuerat, tamen adventum Flacci sensit, et admiratio orta est non 4 simul regressum Hannibalem. Inde per conloquia intellexerunt relictos se desertosque et spem Capuae
5 retinendae deploratam apud Poenos esse. Accessit edictum proconsulum [3] ex senatus consulto propositum volgatumque apud hostis, ut qui civis Campanus
6 ante certam diem transisset sine fraude esset. Nec ulla facta est transitio, metu magis eos quam fide continente, quia maiora in defectione deliquerant
7 quam quibus ignosci posset. Ceterum quem ad modum nemo privato consilio ad hostem transibat, 8 ita nihil salutare in medium consulebatur. Nobilitas rem publicam deseruerant [4] neque in senatum cogi poterant; in magistratu erat qui non sibi honorem adiecisset, sed indignitate sua vim ac ius magistratui

[1] ducis tanti- Weissenborn: om. P(1)JK.
[2] per Samnium Apuliamque Luchs: om. P(1)JK, a lost line.
[3] proconsulum x: -lis $A^{v}K$ Aldus: abbreviated in P(1)J.
[4] deseruerant P(3): -rat $M^{1/2}AJK$ Aldus.

[1] Actually he avoided Campania and went on to the southernmost part of Italy: xii. 2.
[2] I.e. the people of Regium.

Foruli. And the uncertainty is not because the traces of so great a commander and so large an army could within the memory of so short a period have become confused, for it is agreed that he passed that way. The only difference is whether he came to the city by that route, or returned by it from the city into Campania.[1] B.C. 211

XII. But the Romans' persistence in pressing the siege of Capua was not matched by that of Hannibal in defending it. For through Samnium and Apulia and Lucania he hastened into the Bruttian region, to the strait and Regium, at such a pace as almost to overwhelm them[2] unawares by arriving suddenly. Capua, although during that time it had been besieged with no less spirit, nevertheless was aware of the coming of Flaccus, and began to wonder that Hannibal had not returned at the same time. Then by conversing with the enemy they learned that they had been deserted and abandoned, and that the hope of retaining Capua had been given up by the Carthaginians. There was also an edict of the proconsuls, posted and published among the enemy in accordance with a decree of the senate, that any Capuan citizen who changed sides before a certain date should suffer no penalty. And yet there was no changing of sides, for fear restrained them more than honour, because in their revolt they had committed offences too serious to be pardoned. But just as no one of his own motion went over to the enemy, so they made no promising plans for the common interest. The nobility had deserted the state and could not be brought together in the senate. In the office of magistrate was a man who had not gained additional honour for himself, but by his own unworthiness had 9 quem gerebat dempsisset. Iam ne in foro quidem aut publico loco principum quisquam apparebat; domibus inclusi patriae occasum cum suo exitio in dies exspectabant.

A.U.C. 543

10 Summa curae omnis in Bostarem Hannonemque, praefectos praesidii Punici, versa erat, suo non 11 sociorum periculo sollicitos. Ii conscriptis ad Hannibalem litteris non libere modo, sed etiam aspere, quibus non Capuam solam[1] traditam in manum hostibus, sed se quoque et[2] praesidium 12 in omnis cruciatus proditos incusabant: abisse eum in Bruttios velut avertentem sese, ne Capua in oculis eius caperetur. At hercule Romanos ne oppugnatione quidem urbis Romanae abstrahi a 13 Capua obsidenda potuisse; tanto constantiorem inimicum Romanum quam amicum Poenum esse. Si redeat Capuam bellumque omne eo vertat, et se 14 et Campanos paratos eruptioni fore. Non cum Reginis neque Tarentinis bellum gesturos transisse Alpis: ubi Romanae legiones sint, ibi et Carthaginiensium exercitus debere esse. Sic ad Cannas, sic ad Trasumennum rem bene gestam, coeundo conferundoque cum hoste castra, fortunam temptando.
5 In hanc sententiam litterae conscriptae Numidis, proposita mercede eam[3] professis operam, dantur. Ii specie transfugarum cum ad Flaccum in castra

[1] solam P(1): solum JK Aldus.
[2] et *A*²*JK Aldus*: om. P(1).
[3] eam Duker: iam P(1)JK.

[1] Cf. vi. 13 ff.

taken away power and authority from the office which B.C. 211
he was holding.[1] No longer did any one of the foremost citizens show himself even in the forum or any public place. Shut up in their houses they were awaiting from day to day the fall of their native city and their own destruction.

The chief responsibility had fallen wholly to Bostar and Hanno, commanders of the Carthaginian garrison, and they were concerned only for their own danger, not that of their allies. They wrote a letter to Hannibal in terms not only outspoken, but also bitter, in which they charged that it was not Capua alone that had been delivered into the hands of the enemy, but that they themselves also and the garrison had been abandoned to every kind of torture; that he had gone away to the land of the Bruttii, as though turning his back so that Capua should not be captured before his eyes. But assuredly, they said, the Romans could not be drawn away from besieging Capua even by an assault upon the city of Rome: so much more steadfast was the Roman as an enemy than the Carthaginian as a friend. If he should return to Capua and there concentrate the whole war, they and the Capuans likewise would be ready for a sally. It was not to wage war with the people of Regium and Tarentum that they had crossed the Alps. Where the Roman legions were, there ought the Carthaginian armies also to be. Thus at Cannae, thus at Trasumennus, by coming to grips and pitching camp near the enemy, by trying their luck they had met with success. A letter to this effect was given to Numidians who with a reward set before them promised to perform that service. Posing as deserters they had come before Flaccus in his camp, with the

A.U.C. 543 venissent, ut inde tempore capto abirent, famesque, quae tam[1] diu Capuae erat, nulli non probabilem
16 causam transitionis faceret, mulier repente Campana in castra venit, scortum transfugarum unius, indicatque imperatori Romano Numidas fraude composita
17 transisse litterasque ad Hannibalem ferre: id unum ex iis qui sibi rem aperuisset arguere sese paratam esse. Productus primo satis constanter ignorare se mulierem simulabat; paulatim dein convictus veris, 18 cum tormenta posci et parari videret, fassus[2] id ita
19 esse, litteraeque prolatae. Additum[3] etiam indicio quod celabatur, et alios specie transfugarum Numidas vagari in castris Romanis. Ii supra septuaginta comprensi et cum transfugis novis mulcati virgis manibusque praecisis Capuam rediguntur.

XIII. Conspectum tam triste supplicium fregit animos Campanorum. Concursus ad curiam populi factus coegit Loesium senatum vocare; et primoribus, qui iam diu publicis consiliis aberant, propalam minabantur, nisi venirent in senatum, circa domos eorum ituros se et in publicum omnis vi extracturos esse. Is timor frequentem senatum magistratui
2 praebuit. Ibi cum ceteri de legatis mittendis ad imperatores Romanos agerent, Vibius Virrius, qui

[1] tam P(1)JK Aldus: iam Sigonius.
[2] fassus P 3)*B*²*JK*: fassus est Madvig.
[3] Additum Duker, Madvig: et additum P(1)JK.

---

[1] The usual punishment for spies: XXII. xxxiii. 1.
[2] Cf. XXIII. vi.

intention of choosing the right moment and then B.C. 211
departing—and the famine which had lasted so long at Capua gave every man a plausible reason for deserting—when suddenly a Campanian woman, mistress of one of the deserters, came into the camp and informed the Roman general that the Numidians by agreement had pretended to change sides and were bearing a letter to Hannibal: that she was prepared to prove that charge against one of their number who had revealed the matter to her. On being produced, he at first quite firmly pretended that he did not know the woman. Then by degrees he was overpowered by the facts, and seeing that they were demanding and preparing torture, he admitted that it was true, and the letter was produced. She added to her information what they were trying to conceal, namely, that other Numidians also were abroad in the Roman camp playing the part of deserters. Over seventy of them were arrested, and together with the new deserters they were scourged with rods, and after their hands had been cut off[1] they were sent back to Capua.

XIII. The sight of so merciless a punishment broke the spirit of the Capuans. A gathering of the people before the Senate House compelled Loesius to summon the senate. And they openly threatened the leading citizens, who for a long time had been absent from public deliberations, that if they did not come into the senate, they would make the rounds of their homes and forcibly bring them all out into the streets. The fear of that gave the magistrate a full session of the senate. There, while all the rest were speaking of sending legates to the Roman generals, Vibius Virrius,[2] who had proposed rebellion from defectionis auctor ab Romanis fuerat, interrogatus 3 sententiam negat eos qui de legatis et de pace ac deditione loquantur meminisse nec quid facturi fuerint, si Romanos in potestate habuissent, nec quid 4 ipsis patiendum sit. "Quid? vos" inquit "eam deditionem fore censetis qua quondam, ut adversus Samnites auxilium impetraremus, nos nostraque

A.U.C. 543

5 omnia Romanis dedidimus?[1] Iam e memoria excessit quo tempore et in qua fortuna a populo Romano defecerimus? iam, quem ad modum in defectione praesidium, quod poterat emitti, per cruciatum et 6 ad contumeliam necarimus? quotiens in obsidentis quam inimice eruperimus, castra oppugnarimus, Hannibalem vocaverimus ad opprimendos eos?
hoc, quod recentissimum est, ad oppugnandam 7 Romam hinc eum miserimus? Age contra, quae illi infeste in nos fecerint, repetite, ut ex eo quid speretis habeatis. Cum hostis alienigena in Italia esset, et Hannibal hostis, et cuncta bello arderent, omissis omnibus, omisso ipso Hannibale, ambo consules et duo consulares exercitus ad Capuam oppugnandam 8 miserunt. Alterum annum circumvallatos inclusosque nos fame macerant, et ipsi nobiscum ultima pericula et[2] gravissimos labores perpessi, circa vallum ac fossas saepe trucidati ac prope ad extremum castris 9 exuti. Sed omitto haec: vetus atque usitata res est

[1] dedidimus Modius: dedimus *P*1*DJK Aldus.*
[2] et C: e P: om. RMBDAJK Aldus.

---

[1] Cf. VII. xxxi.
[2] Somewhat differently told in XXIII. vii. 3.

Rome, on being asked for his opinion, said that the men who were speaking of embassies and of peace and surrender did not recall either what they would have done, if they had had the Romans in their power, or what they themselves must suffer. "Tell me," he said, "do you suppose it will be the same kind of surrender as that under which we once gave up ourselves and all our possessions to the Romans, that we might obtain their aid against the Samnites?[1] Have you already forgotten in what a critical moment and in what a situation for the Roman people we have revolted from them? Have you already forgotten how at the time of our revolt we with torture and as an insult put to death a garrison which we might have let go?[2] or how often and with what bitterness we have made a sally against the besiegers, have beset their camps, have called in Hannibal to overpower them? or how—this the most recent occurrence—we have sent him away to lay siege to Rome? And now for the other side, recall what have been their acts of hostility towards us, that by so doing you may know what you have to expect. When a foreign enemy was in Italy, and that enemy Hannibal, and when everywhere were the flames of war, neglecting everything, neglecting even Hannibal, they sent both consuls and two consular armies to besiege Capua. Now for the second year they are wasting us away by starvation, shut up inside their contravallation, while they too like ourselves have endured the utmost dangers and most serious hardships, have been slain, many of them, about their earthworks and trenches, and have at last had their camp almost taken. But I pass over these things; to suffer hardships and dangers in besieging a city of B.C. 211 a.u.c. 543 in oppugnanda hostium urbe labores ac pericula pati. Illud irae atque odii exsecrabilis[1] indicium est:

10 Hannibal ingentibus copiis peditum equitumque castra oppugnavit et ex parte cepit: tanto periculo nihil moti sunt ab obsidione. Profectus trans Volturnum perussit Calenum agrum: nihil tanta
11 sociorum clade avocati sunt. Ad ipsam urbem Romam infesta signa ferri iussit: eam quoque tempestatem imminentem spreverunt. Transgressus Anienem[2] tria milia passuum ab urbe castra posuit, postremo ad moenia ipsa et ad portas accessit; Romam se adempturum eis, nisi omitterent Capuam, 12 ostendit: non omiserunt. Feras bestias caeco impetu ac rabie concitatas, si ad cubilia et catulos earum ire pergas, ad opem suis ferendam avertas:
13 Romanos Roma circumsessa, coniuges, liberi, quorum ploratus hinc prope exaudiebantur, arae, foci, deum delubra, sepulcra maiorum temerata ac violata a Capua non averterunt: tanta aviditas supplicii expetendi, tanta sanguinis nostri hauriendi est
14 sitis. Nec iniuria forsitan; nos quoque idem fecissemus, si data fortuna esset. Itaque quoniam aliter dis immortalibus est visum, cum mortem ne recusare quidem debeam, cruciatus contumeliasque quas parat hostis, dum liber, dum mei potens sum, effugere morte praeterquam honesta, etiam leni 15 possum. Non videbo Ap. Claudium et Q. Fulvium victoria insolenti subnixos, neque vinctus per urbem

[1] exsecrabilis C^2M^1JK Aldus: $P(1)$ add -que: inexpiabilis exsecrabilisque Alschefski, Conway.

[2] Anienem D Aldus: $P(3)$ add amnem (before the name JK).

---

[1] His first camp had been on the right bank of the Anio; x. 3; xi. 1; Polybius IX. v. 9.

the enemy is an old and familiar story. I proceed to B.C. 211 proof of anger and hatred that are unspeakable. Hannibal with immense forces of infantry and cavalry besieged and partly captured their camp: by such danger they were not moved at all to give up the siege. Setting out across the Volturnus he ravaged the territory of Cales with fire: by such a disaster to allies they were in no wise called away. He ordered his hostile standards to be carried to the city of Rome itself: that impending storm also they scorned. Crossing the Anio [1] he pitched camp three miles from the city, finally came close to the very walls and gates, showed that unless they should leave Capua he would take Rome away from them: they did not leave Capua. Wild beasts, though excited by blind impulse and fury, can be diverted to bring help to their young, if one goes towards their lairs and their whelps. As for the Romans, the siege of Rome, their wives and children, whose wailing could almost be heard from here, their altars and hearths, the shrines of their gods, the desecrated and profaned tombs of their ancestors did not divert them from Capua. Such is their ardour in demanding punishment, such their thirst to drink our blood. And perhaps not without reason; we too should have done the same, had the chance been given us. Therefore since the immortal gods have made a contrary decision, inasmuch as I ought under no circumstances to refuse death, I, while free and my own master, can escape tortures and insults which the enemy is preparing, by a death which is not only honourable, but also gentle. I shall not see Appius Claudius and Quintus Fulvius, emboldened by their insolent victory, nor shall I be dragged in chains

A.U.C. 543

Romanam triumphi spectaculum trahar, ut deinde in carcerem[1] conditus exspirem[2] aut ad[3] palum deligatus, lacerato virgis tergo, cervicem securi Romanae subiciam; nec dirui incendique patriam videbo, nec rapi ad stuprum matres Campanas virginesque et 16 ingenuos pueros. Albam, unde ipsi oriundi erant, a fundamentis proruerunt, ne stirpis,[4] ne memoria originum suarum exstaret: nedum eos Capuae parsuros credam, cui infestiores quam Carthagini
17 sunt. Itaque quibus vestrum ante fato cedere quam haec tot tam acerba videant in animo est iis apud 18 me hodie epulae instructae parataeque sunt. Satiatis vino ciboque poculum idem quod mihi datum fuerit circumferetur; ea potio corpus a cruciatu, animum a contumeliis, oculos, auris a videndis audiendisque omnibus acerbis indignisque quae manent victos vindicabit. Parati erunt qui magno rogo in propatulo aedium accenso corpora exanima iniciant.
19 Haec una via et honesta et libera ad mortem. Et ipsi virtutem mirabuntur hostes, et Hannibal fortis socios sciet ab se desertos ac proditos esse."

XIV. Hanc orationem Virri plures cum adsensu audierunt quam forti animo id quod probabant
2 exsequi potuerunt. Maior pars senatus, multis saepe bellis expertam populi Romani clementiam

[1] carcerem (or -carem) P(1)JK Aldus: carcere A^z Froben 2, Madvig (who omits aut).
[2] conditus exspirem W. Heraeus: om. P(1): expirem M. Müller (with in carcere).
[3] ad A^z*JK Aldus*: om. P(1).
[4] stirpis P(1)Jz: stirps Kz.

---

[1] Cf. I. xxix.

through the city of Rome as a spectacle in a triumph, B.C. 211 so that I may then breathe my last in the prison, or else, bound to a stake, with my back mangled by rods, may submit my neck to the Roman axe. Nor shall I see my native city destroyed and burned, nor Capuan matrons and maidens and free-born boys carried off to be dishonoured. Alba, from which they had themselves sprung, they levelled with its foundations,[1] that their stock, that the memory of their origin, might not survive; much less am I to believe that they will spare Capua, to which they are more hostile than to Carthage. Accordingly, as many of you as are minded to yield to fate before they see all these sights that are so bitter, for such in my house a feast is spread and in readiness today. When we have had our fill of wine and food, the same cup which has been served to me shall be carried round. That draught will defend the body from torture, the mind from insults, eyes and ears from seeing and hearing all the bitter and unseemly things which await the vanquished. Men will be ready to light a great pyre in the court[2] of the house and throw our lifeless bodies upon it. This is the one way, at once honourable and independent, that leads to death. Even our enemies will admire our courage, and Hannibal will also know that they were brave allies whom he has abandoned and betrayed."

XIV. This speech of Virrius more men heard with approval than had the courage to carry out what they commended. The majority of the senate, not doubting that the clemency of the Roman people,

[2] Here evidently the peristyle, not the atrium (as in XXIV. xvi. 17 and XXV. xii. 15). A forecourt (vestibulum) would have been too public.

A.U.C. 543

haud diffidentes sibi quoque placabilem fore, legatos ad dedendam Romanis Capuam decreverunt mise-3 runtque. Vibium Virrium septem et viginti ferme senatores domum secuti sunt, epulatique cum eo et, quantum facere potuerant alienatis mentibus vino ab imminentis sensu mali, venenum omnes sumpserunt;
4 inde misso convivio dextris inter se datis ultimoque conplexu conlacrimantes suum patriaeque casum, alii, ut eodem rogo cremarentur, manserunt, alii
5 domos digressi sunt. Inpletae cibis vinoque venae minus efficacem in maturanda morte vim veneni fecerunt: itaque noctem totam plerique eorum et diei insequentis partem cum animam egissent, omnes tamen prius quam aperirentur hostibus portae exspirarunt.

6 Postero die porta Iovis, quae adversus castra Romana erat, iussu proconsulum[1] aperta est. Ea intromissa
7 legio una et duae alae cum C. Fulvio legato. Is cum omnium primum arma telaque quae Capuae erant ad se conferenda curasset, custodiis ad omnes portas dispositis, ne quis exire aut emitti posset, praesidium Punicum comprehendit, senatum Campanum ire in 8 castra ad imperatores Romanos iussit. Quo cum venissent, extemplo iis omnibus catenae iniectae, iussique ad quaestores deferre quod auri atque argenti haberent. Auri pondo duo milia[2] septuaginta fuit, argenti triginta milia pondo et mille[3]

[1] proconsulum K Ruperti, Madvig: -lis B^2J: abbreviated $P(3)$.

[2] duo milia (i.e. ∞ ∞) PC: other MSS. omit.

[3] mille (i.e. ∞) PC: similar omission in others.

[1] Towards Tifata and its temple of Jupiter. By this gate the Via Appia seems to have left the city on its way to Beneventum.

known to them frequently in many wars, would be B.C. 211 forgiving to them also, voted and sent legates to surrender Capua to the Romans. About twenty-seven senators followed Vibius Virrius home; and after they had feasted with him, and so far as possible had deadened their minds with wine to the sense of impending misfortune, they all took the poison. Then at the end of the feast they gave each other the right hand and a last embrace, and weeping for their own fate and that of their native city, some remained, that they might be cremated on the same pyre, others left for their several homes. Filled with food and wine, their veins made the poison less effectual in hastening death. And so, although most of them were in the throes through the whole of the night and part of the following day, all of them, however, died before the gates were opened to the enemy.

On the next day the Jupiter Gate,[1] which faced the Roman camp, was opened by order of the proconsuls. By that gate one legion was admitted and two alae[2] with Gaius Fulvius, the lieutenant. He first of all saw to it that the arms and weapons that were in Capua should be brought to him; then posting sentinels at all the gates, that no one might be able to go out or be sent out, he seized the Carthaginian garrison, and ordered the Capuan senate to go to the Roman generals in the camp. Arrived there, they were all put in chains and bidden to bring to the quaestors what gold and silver they had. The amount of gold was two thousand and seventy pounds, of silver thirty-one thousand two hundred

[2] I.e. cavalry units of the allies, say 500 men each.

a.u.c. 543

9 ducenta. Senatores quinque et viginti Cales in custodiam, duodetriginta Teanum missi,[1] quorum de sententia maxime descitum ab Romanis constabat.

XV. De supplicio Campani senatus haudquaquam inter Fulvium Claudiumque conveniebat: facilis impetrandae veniae Claudius, Fulvii[2] durior sententia 2 erat. Itaque Appius Romam ad senatum arbitrium 3 eius rei totum reiciebat: percunctandi etiam aequum esse potestatem fieri patribus, num communicassent consilia cum aliquis[3] sociorum Latini nominis,[4] et 4 num ope eorum in bello forent adiuti. Id vero minime committendum esse Fulvius dicere ut sollicitarentur criminibus dubiis sociorum fidelium animi, et subicerentur indicibus quis neque quid diceret[5] neque quid facerent quicquam umquam pensi fuisset; itaque se eam quaestionem oppressurum 5 exstincturumque. Ab hoc sermone cum digressi essent, et Appius quamvis ferociter loquentem collegam non dubitaret tamen litteras super tanta 6 re ab Roma exspectaturum, Fulvius, ne id ipsum impedimentum incepto foret, dimittens praetorium tribunis militum ac praefectis socium imperavit uti duobus milibus equitum delectis denuntiarent ut ad tertiam bucinam praesto essent.

7 Cum hoc equitatu nocte Teanum profectus, prima luce portam intravit atque in forum perrexit; concursuque ad primum equitum ingressum facto

[1] missi M^2?AJK Aldus: misit $P(3)$.
[2] Fulvi(i) AJK Aldus: fulvio $P(3)$ Gronovius.
[3] aliquis $P(1)x$: aliquibus A^1JK Aldus.
[4] nominis $P(1)JK$ Aldus, adding municipiorum, a gloss, and repeating it (except P^1C^2?A^1K) after forent.

pounds. Of the senators known to have especially promoted revolt from the Romans twenty-five were sent to Cales to be imprisoned, twenty-eight to Teanum. B.C. 211

XV. On the punishment of the Capuan senators there was no kind of agreement between Fulvius and Claudius. Ready to hear a plea for pardon was Claudius; Fulvius' opinion was more inflexible. Accordingly Appius was inclined to refer the entire decision of the case to the senate at Rome. Furthermore he thought it right that the fathers should be given authority to enquire of these men whether they had shared their plans with some of the Latin allies, and whether they had been helped by them in the war. But Fulvius said that they must on no account run the risk of troubling the feelings of faithful allies by unsubstantiated charges and of exposing them to informers, who never had had any scruple as to what they were saying or what they were doing; hence he would quash and suppress that investigation. When they had separated directly after this speech, Appius had no doubt that his colleague, in spite of his fierce words, would wait, however, for a letter from Rome on a matter of such importance. But Fulvius for fear that very thing might hinder his project, dismissed the council, and ordered the tribunes of the soldiers and the prefects of allies to instruct two thousand picked cavalry to be ready at the bugle-call of the third watch.

Setting out by night for Teanum with this cavalry, he entered the gate at dawn and proceeded to the forum. At the first entry of the horsemen a crowd

[5] neque quid dicerent Alschefski: om. P(1)JK.

A.U.C. 543

magistratum Sidicinum citari iussit imperavitque ut produceret Campanos quos in custodia haberet. 8 Producti omnes virgisque caesi ac securi percussi. Inde citato equo Cales percurrit; ubi cum in tribunali consedisset productique Campani deligarentur ad palum, eques citus ab Roma venit litterasque a C. Calpurnio praetore Fulvio et senatus consultum 9 tradit. Murmur ab tribunali totam contionem pervasit differri rem integram ad patres de Campanis. Et Fulvius, id ita esse ratus acceptas litteras neque resolutas cum in gremio reposuisset, praeconi imperavit ut lictorem lege agere iuberet. Ita de iis quoque qui Calibus erant sumptum supplicium. 10 Tum litterae lectae senatusque consultum, serum ad impediendam rem actam quae summa ope adproperata 11 erat, ne impediri posset. Consurgentem iam Fulvium Taurea Vibellius Campanus, per mediam vadens turbam, nomine inclamavit et, cum mirabundus 12 quidnam sese vellet resedisset Flaccus, "Me quoque" inquit "iube occidi, ut gloriari possis multo fortiorem 13 quam ipse es virum abs te occisum esse." Cum Flaccus negaret profecto satis compotem mentis esse,[1] modo prohiberi etiam se, si id vellet, senatus consulto 14 diceret, tum Vibellius "Quando quidem" inquit "capta patria, propinquis amicisque amissis, cum ipse manu mea coniugem liberosque interfecerim,

[1] mentis esse $P(3)B^2$ Aldus, Priscian: esse mentis AJKz.

---

[1] I.e. no doubt the medix tuticus of the region in which Teanum lay.

[2] Not as prisoners of war, but as Roman citizens whose lives were forfeited because of dealing with the enemy; so ordained in the XII Tables; cf. Digest XLVIII. iv. 3.

gathered, and he bade that the Sidicinian magis- B.C. 211 trate[1] be summoned, and ordered him to bring out the Capuans whom he had under arrest. All were brought out, scourged with rods and beheaded.[2] Thence he hastened at full speed to Cales. There, after he had taken his seat on the tribunal and the Capuans were brought out and were being bound to stakes, came a horseman post haste from Rome and handed to Fulvius a letter from Gaius Calpurnius, the praetor, and a decree of the senate. Beginning at the tribunal a rumour spread through the whole assembly that the case of the Capuans was reserved for decision by the senators. Fulvius also thought that was the case, took the letter, but without breaking the seal, and having placed it in his bosom, commanded a herald to order the lictor to carry out the legal punishment. Thus was punishment visited upon those also who were at Cales. Then the letter was read and the decree of the senate, too late to prevent an action which had been hastened by every means, that prevention might be impossible. Just as Fulvius was rising from his seat, Taurea Vibellius the Capuan, striding through the middle of the crowd, called him by name, and when Flaccus, wondering what he wished of him, had sat down again, Vibellius said "Order me also to be slain, that you may be able to boast that a much braver man than you are yourself has been slain by you." When Flaccus said that the man was doubtless of unsound mind, and then added that, if he wished to do so, he was forbidden by the decree of the senate, thereupon Vibellius said "Since indeed, although my native city has been taken, my relatives and friends lost, and with my own hand I have killed my wife and ne quid indigni paterentur, mihi ne mortis quidem copia eadem est quae his civibus meis, petatur a virtute invisae huius vitae vindicta." Atque ita gladio quem veste texerat per adversum pectus transfixus, ante pedes imperatoris moribundus procubuit.

A.U.C. 543

XVI. Quia et quod ad supplicium attinet Campanorum et pleraque alia de Flacci unius sententia acta erant, mortuum Ap. Claudium sub deditionem Capuae quidam tradunt. Hunc quoque ipsum Tauream neque sua sponte venisse Cales neque sua manu interfectum, sed dum[1] inter ceteros ad palum deligatur,[2] quia parum inter strepitus exaudiri possent quae vociferaretur,[3] silentium fieri Flaccum iussisse; tum Tauream illa quae ante memorata sunt dixisse, virum se fortissimum ab nequaquam pari ad virtutem occidi; sub haec dicta iussu proconsulis praeconem ita pronuntiasse: "Lictor, viro forti adde virgas et in eum primum lege age." Lectum quoque senatus consultum, priusquam securi feriret, quidam auctores sunt, sed quia adscriptum in senatus consulto fuerit, si ei videretur, integram rem ad senatum reiceret, interpretatum esse quid magis e re publica duceret aestimationem sibi permissam. Capuam a Calibus reditum est, Atellaque et Calatia in deditionem acceptae. Ibi quoque in eos qui

[1] dum Froben 2, Conway: cum $P(1)JK$ Aldus.

[2] deligatur Froben 2, Conway: -atus $P(1)JK$ Aldus, Weissenborn (adding quiritaret).

[3] vociferaretur Harant, Conway: -feratur $P(3)A^{1?}$: -ferantur BDA: -ferabatur $C^4M^3A^sJ^1K$ Aldus.

---

[1] So Zonaras IX. vi. Livy at xxxiii. 4 says post captam (Capuam), following another authority. Appius died of his wound.

children, that they might suffer no indignity, for B.C. 211 myself there is not the same possibility even to die that these my fellow-citizens have had, let courage give me a release from this odious life." And so with a sword which he had concealed under his clothing he ran himself directly through the breast and fell dying at the feet of the general.

XVI. Because all that had to do with the punishment of the Capuans and many other things were done by the decision of Flaccus alone, some relate that Appius Claudius died just before the surrender of Capua.[1] Further, they say that Taurea himself did not voluntarily come to Cales, and was not slain by his own hand, but that while he was being bound along with the rest to a stake, because what he was shouting could not be heard clearly for the noise, Flaccus ordered silence; that then Taurea, as has been stated above, said that he, the bravest of men, was being killed by one who was in no way his equal in courage; that after these words the herald by order of the proconsul proclaimed "Lictor, give the brave man a beating; on him first the legal penalty!" Some authorities say that the decree of the senate also was read before he beheaded them; but that, because in the decree of the senate it was added that, if he saw fit,[2] he should refer the decision to the verdict of the senate, he interpreted it that they allowed him to decide which course he thought more to the interest of the state.

From Cales they returned to Capua, and the surrender of Atella and Calatia was received. There also punishment was inflicted on the responsible [2] Merely a polite formula, which Flaccus pretends to take seriously.

A.U.C. 543

6 capita rerum erant animadversum. Ita ad septuaginta principes senatus interfecti, trecenti ferme nobiles Campani in carcerem conditi, alii per sociorum Latini nominis urbes in custodias dati, variis casibus interierunt: multitudo alia civium Campanorum
7 venum data. De urbe agroque reliqua consultatio fuit, quibusdam delendam censentibus urbem praevalidam, propinquam, inimicam. Ceterum praesens utilitas vicit; nam propter agrum, quem omni fertilitate terrae satis constabat primum in Italia esse, urbs servata est, ut esset aliqua aratorum
8 sedes. Urbi frequentandae multitudo incolarum libertinorumque et institorum opificumque retenta: ager omnis et tecta publica populi Romani facta.
9 Ceterum habitari tantum tamquam urbem Capuam frequentarique placuit, corpus nullum civitatis nec senatum [1] nec plebis concilium nec magistratus esse:
10 sine consilio publico, sine imperio multitudinem, nullius rei inter se sociam, ad consensum inhabilem fore; praefectum ad iura reddenda ab Roma quo-
11 tannis missuros. Ita ad Capuam res compositae consilio ab omni parte laudabili. Severe et celeriter in maxime noxios animadversum; multitudo civium 12 dissipata in nullam spem reditus; non saevitum incendiis ruinisque in tecta innoxia murosque, et

[1] senatum JKzz Duker: senatus P(1) Aldus.

---

[1] Including the fifty-three executed at Teanum and Cales. For a more detailed statement of the terms meted out to Capua see below, xxxiv. 2 ff.

[2] I.e. at Rome, in the senate.

[3] A praefectus iure dicundo, elected by popular vote. The treatment of Capua in contrast with Corinth and Carthage is enlarged upon by Cicero, de Lege Agr. II. 84 and 88 f. Among leaders. Thus about seventy prominent senators B.C. 211 were put to death;[1] some three hundred noble Campanians who were put in prison, and others who were distributed among cities of Latin allies to be guarded, met death in different ways. The remaining mass of Campanian citizens were sold. In regard to the city and its territory discussion continued,[2] inasmuch as some thought a city very powerful, near, and unfriendly should be destroyed. But immediate advantage prevailed. For on account of the territory, which was well known to be foremost in Italy in all that the fertile soil produced, the city was preserved, that the tillers of the land might have some abode. To people the city the multitude of resident aliens and freedmen and petty tradesmen and artisans was retained. The whole territory and the buildings became public property of the Roman people. But it was decided that Capua, as a nominal city, should merely be a dwelling-place and a centre of population, but should have no political body nor senate nor council of the plebs nor magistrates. They thought that the multitude, without a public council, without military authority, having nothing in common amongst them, would be incapable of agreement; the Romans would send out every year a prefect to administer justice.[3] Thus matters concerning Capua were settled according to a plan that was in every respect praiseworthy. Stern and prompt was the punishment of the most guilty; the mass of citizens were scattered with no hope of a return; no rage was vented upon innocent buildings and city-walls by burning and demolition. And the prefectures Festus lists Capua, Casilinum, Volturnum (p. 262 L).

A.U.C. 543

cum emolumento quaesita etiam apud socios lenitatis species incolumitate urbis nobilissimae opulentissi-maeque. cuius ruinis omnis Campania, omnes qui Campaniam circa accolunt populi ingemuissent;
13 confessio expressa hosti quanta vis in Romanis ad expetendas poenas ab infidelibus sociis et quam nihil in Hannibale auxili ad receptos in fidem tuendos esset.

XVII. Romani patres perfuncti quod ad Capuam attinebat cura, C. Neroni ex iis duabus legionibus quas ad Capuam habuerat sex milia peditum et trecentos equites quos ipse legisset et socium Latini nominis peditum numerum parem et octingentos 2 equites decernunt. Eum exercitum Puteolis in naves impositum Nero in Hispaniam transportavit. Cum Tarraconem navibus venisset, expositisque ibi copiis et navibus subductis, socios quoque navalis multi-3 tudinis augendae causa armasset, profectus ad
Hiberum flumen exercitum ab Ti. Fonteio et L.
4 Marcio accepit. Inde pergit ad hostis ire. Hasdrubal Hamilcaris ad Lapides Atros castra habebat; in Ausetanis [1] is locus est inter oppida Iliturgim et Mentissam. Huius saltus fauces Nero occupavit.
5 Hasdrubal, ne [2] in arto res esset, caduceatorem misit qui promitteret, si inde emissus [3] foret, se omnem exercitum ex Hispania deportaturum.
6 Quam rem cum laeto animo Romanus accepisset, diem posterum Hasdrubal conloquio petivit ut

[1] Ausetanis $P(1)JK$: Oretanis Glareanus.

[2] occupavit. Hasdrubal, ne $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Froben : om. $P(3)$, a lost line.

[3] emissus Madvig : missus $P(1)JK$.

along with profit they sought a reputation among B.C. 211
the allies as well for clemency, by saving a very important and very rich city, over whose ruins all Campania, all the neighbouring peoples on every side of Campania, would have mourned. The enemy were forced to acknowledge what power the Romans possessed to exact punishment from faithless allies, and how helpless Hannibal was to defend those whom he had taken under his protection.

XVII. At Rome the senate, having discharged its responsibilities so far as concerned Capua, voted to assign to Gaius Nero six thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry of his own choosing, from the two legions which he had had before Capua, and from the Latin allies the same number of infantry and eight hundred cavalry. This army Nero embarked at Puteoli and transported to Spain. Arrived at Tarraco by sea, he there disembarked his troops, beached the ships, and armed even the crews, to increase his numbers. Then setting out for the river Ebro, he took over the army from Tiberius Fonteius and Lucius Marcius.[1] He thereupon proceeded against the enemy. Hasdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, was encamped at the Black Rocks. The place is in the country of the Ausetani, between the towns of Iliturgis[2] and Mentissa. Nero occupied the entrance to this pass. Hasdrubal, to avoid being entrapped, sent a herald to promise that if he should be allowed to get away, he would transport his entire army out of Spain. The Roman accepted the proposal with joy, and Hasdrubal asked for the next day for a conference, that in person they might draw up

[1] Cf. XXV. xxxvii. 2 ff.; XXVI. ii. 1 ff.
[2] Cf. XXIII. xlix. 5 and 12; XXIV. xli. 8 and 11.

A.U.C. 543

coram[1] leges conscriberentur de tradendis arcibus urbium dieque statuenda ad quam praesidia deducerentur suaque omnia sine fraude Poeni deportarent. 7 Quod ubi impetravit, extemplo primis tenebris atque inde tota nocte quod gravissimum exercitus erat Hasdrubal quacumque posset evadere e saltu[2] 8 iussit. Data sedulo opera est ne multi ea nocte exirent, ut ipsa paucitas cum ad hostem silentio fallendum aptior, tum ad evadendum per artas 9 semitas ac difficilis esset. Ventum insequenti die ad conloquium est; sed loquendo plura scribendoque dedita opera quae in rem non essent die consumpto, 10 in posterum dilatum est. Addita insequens nox spatium dedit et alios emittendi; nec postero die 11 res finem invenit. Ita aliquot dies disceptando palam de legibus noctesque emittendis clam e castris Carthaginiensibus absumptae. Et postquam pars maior emissa exercitus erat, iam ne iis quidem quae 12 ultro dicta erant stabatur; minusque ac minus, cum timore simul fide decrescente, conveniebat. Iam ferme pedestres omnes copiae evaserant e saltu, cum prima luce densa nebula saltum omnem camposque circa intexit. Quod ubi sensit Hasdrubal, mittit ad Neronem qui in posterum diem conloquium differret: illum diem religiosum Carthaginiensibus 13 ad agendum quicquam rei seriae[3] esse. Ne tum

[1] coram Madvig: romam $P(1)J$: romani (with conscriberent) M^2A^yK Aldus.

[2] e saltu $BDAJK$ Aldus: saltu M^1: salu $P(3)$.

[3] seriae G^2? Gronovius: seria $P(3)$: feria D: feriam M^2?: feriatum Aldus (and A, which omits esse).

the terms for the surrender of the citadels of cities B.C. 211 and fix a date before which the garrisons were to be evacuated, and the Carthaginians might remove all their property without molestation. Having gained that request, Hasdrubal at once gave orders that at dusk and then all through the night the heaviest troops should escape from the pass by any possible way. Great pains were taken not to have many leave that night, that even their small numbers might be better suited both to escaping the enemy's notice by silence and to making their way out by narrow and difficult paths. Next day they came to the conference;[1] but by speaking at unnecessary length and by purposely writing what was not to the point the day was spent, and postponement taken to the next day. The addition of the following night gave them time to send out others as well; and on the following day the business did not reach an end. Thus several days were spent in arguing openly about terms, and several nights in secretly sending Carthaginians away from the camp. And after the larger part of the army had been sent away, they ceased any longer to stand by even what they had been the first to propose. And there was less and less agreement, as honesty declined along with fear. By this time nearly all the infantry forces had escaped from the pass, when at daybreak a dense fog covered the whole pass and the meadows around. Hasdrubal on noticing that, sends a messenger to Nero, to postpone the conference until the next day: that day was banned among the Carthaginians, he said, for the doing of anything serious. As even then fraud was [1] Frontinus gives a brief account of Hasdrubal's ruse; Strat. I. v. 19.

A.U.C. 543

quidem suspecta fraus cum esset, data venia eius diei, extemploque Hasdrubal cum equitatu elephantisque castris egressus sine ullo tumultu in tutum evasit.
14 Hora ferme quarta dispulsa sole nebula aperuit diem, vacuaque hostium castra conspexerunt Romani.
15 Tum demum Claudius Punicam fraudem adgnoscens, ut se dolo captum sensit, proficiscentem institit sequi paratus confligere acie; sed hostis detrectabat 16 pugnam; levia tamen proelia inter extremum Punicum agmen praecursoresque Romanorum fiebant.

XVIII. Inter haec Hispaniae populi nec qui post cladem acceptam defecerant redibant ad Romanos, 2 nec ulli novi deficiebant. Et Romae senatui populoque post receptam Capuam non Italiae iam maior quam Hispaniae cura erat. Et exercitum augeri et
3 imperatorem mitti placebat; nec tam[1] quem mitterent satis constabat quam illud, ubi duo summi imperatores intra dies triginta cecidissent, qui in locum duorum succederet extraordinaria cura de-
4 ligendum esse. Cum alii alium nominarent, postremum eo decursum est ut proconsuli creando in Hispaniam comitia haberentur;[2] diemque comitiis consules

[1] tam Gronovius: tamen P(1)JK Aldus.
[2] haberentur Madvig: haberet (with populus before proconsuli) P(1)JK Aldus, Weissenborn.

---

[1] I.e. to the Romans.
[2] Nero as propraetor held a command of lower grade. He was succeeded by Silanus; xx. 4. Livy follows authorities who placed Scipio's election to the chief command and his departure for Spain in 211 B.C. and the capture of New Carthage in 210. In XXVII. vii. 5 f., however, he mentions the opposing view, which would give 210 and 209 respectively for these dates, the now accepted chronology. Cf. note l.c.

not suspected, excuse for that day was granted, and B.C. 211 forthwith Hasdrubal with his cavalry and elephants left camp, and without any noise escaped to a place of safety. At about the fourth hour the burning away of the fog by the sun cleared the air, and the Romans caught sight of the empty camp of the enemy. When Claudius, who until then did not recognize the Punic deception, perceived that he had been tricked, he pressed the pursuit of a departing enemy, he being all ready to engage in pitched battle. But the enemy refused battle. And yet there were slight engagements between the rear of the Carthaginian column and the advance guard of the Romans.

XVIII. Meanwhile of the peoples of Spain none who had revolted after the disaster occurred were returning to the Romans, and at the same time no new nations were revolting.[1] And at Rome, after the recovery of Capua, senate and people were no longer more concerned about Italy than about Spain. They favoured an increase of the army and the sending of a commander-in-chief:[2] nor were they so well agreed whom to send, as they were on this point, that, where two great commanders had fallen within thirty days, there a successor to both must be chosen with unusual care. While some were naming one man, others another, finally they had recourse to the holding of an election to name a proconsul[3] for Spain; and the consuls announced a date for the

[3] To be so styled there was no requirement that a man should have been consul or even praetor; cf. XXIX. xiii. 7. Scipio's father and uncle had been consuls before they went out to Spain. For their fate cf. XXV. xxxiv. 11 ff.; xxxvi. 13 f.

A.U.C. 543

5 edixerunt. Primo exspectaverant ut qui se tanto imperio dignos crederent nomina profiterentur. Quae ut destituta exspectatio est, redintegratus luctus acceptae cladis desideriumque imperatorum amissorum.

6 Maesta itaque civitas, prope inops consilii, comitiorum die tamen in campum descendit; atque in magistratus versi circumspectant ora principum aliorum alios intuentium fremuntque adeo perditas res desperatumque de re publica esse ut nemo 7 audeat in Hispaniam imperium accipere, cum subito P. Cornelius, Publi Cornelii eius [1] qui in Hispania ceciderat filius, quattuor et viginti ferme annos natus, professus se petere, in superiore unde conspici 8 posset loco constitit. In quem postquam omnium ora conversa sunt, clamore ac favore ominati extemplo 9 sunt felix faustumque imperium. Iussi deinde inire suffragium ad unum omnes non centuriae modo, sed etiam homines P. Scipioni imperium esse in Hispania 10 iusserunt. Ceterum post rem actam, ut iam resederat impetus animorum ardorque, silentium subito ortum et tacita cogitatio quidnam egissent. Nonne [2] 11 favor plus valuisset quam ratio? Aetatis maxime paenitebat; quidam fortunam etiam domus horrebant nomenque ex funestis duabus familiis in eas provincias

[1] Publi Cornelii eius Jac. Gronovius: om. P(1): P Cornelii M^2: illius ANJK Aldus: Publi filius eius Conway (omitting filius below).

[2] Nonne Madvig: novi P(1)J^1K: noni J.

---

[1] He had distinguished himself at seventeen in the battle of the Ticinus; XXI. xlvi. 7 ff.; Polybius X. iii, 4 ff., who with a later date for his command in Spain makes him twenty-election. At first people had waited for those who B.C. 211 thought themselves deserving of so important a command to hand in their names. When that hope was disappointed, grief for the disaster they had suffered was renewed, and regret for the lost generals.

And so the citizens mourned, being almost devoid of any plan; nevertheless on the election day they went down into the Campus. And turning towards the magistrates they scanned the faces of the leading men, who were looking at one and another of their number, and there were complaints that the situation was so desperate and hope for the state so given up that no man ventured to accept the command for Spain, when suddenly Publius Cornelius, son of that Publius Cornelius who had fallen in Spain, being about twenty-four years of age,[1] declared that he was a candidate, and took his place on higher ground from which he could be seen. Towards him all faces were turned, and then by their shouts of approval they at once predicted a fortunate and auspicious command. Then, bidden to cast their votes, not only all the centuries, but also every single man voted that Publius Scipio should have the command in Spain. But after the thing was done, now that impulsiveness and enthusiasm had subsided, there came a sudden silence and they thought to themselves, What had they done? Had not partiality outweighed reasoning? It was his youth that they especially regretted. Some also shrank from the destiny of the house, and from the name of one who was setting out from two afflicted families [2] for pro-seven at this time (l.c. vi. 10). Cf. XXVII. vii. 5 and note. Of course this Scipio had had no normal advancement.

[2] But at least a year has elapsed.

A.U.C. 543

ubi inter sepulcra patris patruique res gerendae essent proficiscentis.

XIX. Quam[1] ubi ab re tanto impetu acta sollicitudinem curamque hominum animadvertit, advocata contione ita de aetate sua imperioque mandato et bello quod gerundum esset magno elatoque animo 2 disseruit, ut ardorem eum qui resederat excitaret rursus novaretque et[2] impleret homines certioris spei quam quantam fides promissi humani aut ratio 3 ex fiducia rerum subicere solet. Fuit enim Scipio non veris tantum virtutibus mirabilis, sed arte quoque quadam ab iuventa in ostentationem earum 4 compositus, pleraque apud multitudinem aut ut[3] per nocturnas visa[4] species aut velut divinitus mente monita agens, sive et ipse capti quadam superstitione animi, sive ut imperia consiliaque velut sorte oraculi 5 missa sine cunctatione exsequerentur. Ad hoc iam inde ab initio praeparans animos, ex quo togam virilem sumpsit, nullo die prius ullam publicam privatamque rem egit quam in Capitolium iret ingressusque aedem consideret et plerumque solus 6 in secreto ibi tempus tereret. Hic mos, quem[5] per omnem vitam servabat,[6] seu consulto seu temere volgatae opinioni fidem apud quosdam fecit stirpis 7 eum divinae virum esse, rettulitque famam in Alexandro Magno prius volgatam, et vanitate et

[1] Quam M²A^y Aldus : qua vi *PC²R*¹ : qua P^xC^xRM : quod AJKz.

[2] et AJK Aldus : om. P(3).

[3] ut Duker, Weissenborn : om. P(1)JK.

[4] visa P(1)JK Eds., Conway : visas Fabri, Weissenborn, Luchs, Riemann.

[5] quem Weissenborn : qui Aldus : om. P(1)JK, Conway.

[6] servabat PCR : servabatur MBDAJKz Aldus : servatus C²x Gronovius, Conway.

vinces where his campaign must be about the tombs B.C. 211 of his father and his uncle.

XIX. When he noticed this anxiety and concern, following an action taken with such impulsiveness, Scipio called an assembly, and discoursed with such elevation of spirit on his age and the command entrusted to him and the war to be waged, that he again awakened and revived the ardour which had cooled, and filled men with a more assured hope than belief in a man's promise or reasoning based upon confidence of his success usually inspires. For Scipio was remarkable not only for his real abilities, but thanks to a certain skill also had from his youth adapted himself to their display, doing most of his actions before the public either as if they were prompted by visions in the night or inspired by the gods, whether because he also was possessed by a certain superstition, or in order that men might carry out without hesitation his commands and advice, as though emanating from an oracular response. More than that, preparing men's minds from the very beginning, from the time when he put on the manly gown, there was not a day on which he did any business public or private without going first to the Capitol, and after he had entered the temple, sitting down and usually passing the time there alone in seclusion.[1] This custom, which he maintained throughout his lifetime, confirmed in some men the belief, whether deliberately circulated or by chance, that he was a man of divine race. And it revived the tale previously told of Alexander the Great[2] and rivalling it as unfounded gossip, that his conception

[1] Before daylight according to Gellius VI (VII), i. 6.
[2] Plutarch Alexander ii. 4.

A.U.C. 543

fabula parem, anguis immanis concubitu conceptum, et in cubiculo matris eius visam persaepe prodigii eius speciem interventuque hominum evolutam
8 repente atque ex oculis elapsam. His miraculis numquam ab ipso elusa fides est; quin potius aucta arte quadam nec abnuendi tale quicquam nec palam
9 adfirmandi. Multa alia eiusdem generis, alia vera, alia adsimulata, admirationis humanae in eo iuvene excesserant modum; quibus freta tunc civitas aetati haudquaquam maturae tantam rerum molem tantumque imperium permisit.

10 Ad eas copias quas ex vetere exercitu Hispania habebat quaeque a Puteolis cum C. Nerone traiectae erant, decem milia militum et mille[1] equites adduntur; et M. Iunius Silanus propraetor adiutor ad res
11 gerendas datus est. Ita cum triginta navium classe—omnes autem quinqueremes erant—ostiis[2] Tiberinis profectus praeter oram Tusci maris, Alpesque . . . et[3] Gallicum sinum et deinde Pyrenaei circumvectus promunturium, Emporiis, urbe Graeca —oriundi et ipsi a Phocaea sunt—copias exposuit.
12 Inde sequi navibus iussis Tarraconem pedibus profectus conventum omnium sociorum—etenim legationes ad famam eius ex omni se provincia
13 effuderant—habuit. Naves ibi subduci iussit, remissis quattuor triremibus Massiliensium quae

[1] mille A^1JK Aldus: om. $P(3)$, space being left in P for numeral (∞).

[2] ostiis PRM: hostiis $CBDAJK$: ab ostiis Wesenberg.

[3] -que et A^1JK: neque $P(3)$: -que $C^xM^{1?}$: atque Aldus. Here a gap in the text is suspected (Crévier) on account of et ipsi § 11 and triremibus Massiliensium § 13.

[1] Gellius l.c. 3. To the Roman mind the serpent would be the Genius of the house.

was due to an immense serpent, and that the form of B.C. 211 the strange creature had very often been seen in his mother's chamber, and that, when persons came in, it had suddenly glided away and disappeared from sight.[1] He himself never made light of men's belief in these marvels; on the contrary it was rather promoted by a certain studied practice of neither denying such a thing nor openly asserting it. Many other things of the same sort, some true, some pretended, had passed the limits of admiration for a mere man in the case of this youth. Such were the things on which the citizens relied when at that time they entrusted to an age far from mature so great a responsibility and so important a command.

To the forces which Spain had from the old army, and those which had been transported under Gaius Nero from Puteoli, were added ten thousand infantry and a thousand cavalry. And Marcus Iunius Silanus, the propraetor, was assigned to aid in the conduct of the war. So with a fleet of thirty ships (and they were all five-bankers) Scipio set out from the mouth of the Tiber, sailed along the coast of the Tuscan Sea and past the Alps . . . and the Gallic Gulf, and then rounding the promontory of the Pyrenees, landed his troops at Emporiae, a Greek city, for they also[2] are sprung from Phocaea. Then ordering the ships to follow, and proceeding by land to Tarraco, he held an assembly of all the allies; for on hearing of his coming embassies had poured out from the entire province. There he ordered the ships to be beached, while he sent back four triremes of the Massilians

[2] As well as the Massilians, whose city must have been mentioned in the lacuna.

A.U.C. 543 14 officii causa ab domo prosecutae fuerant. Responsa inde legationibus suspensis varietate tot casuum dare coepit, ita elato ab ingenti virtutum suarum fiducia animo ut nullum ferox verbum excideret, ingensque omnibus quae diceret cum maiestas inesset tum fides.

XX. Profectus ab Tarracone et civitates sociorum et hiberna exercitus adiit, conlaudavitque milites quod duabus tantis deinceps cladibus icti provinciam 2 obtinuissent, nec fructum secundarum rerum sentire hostis passi omni cis Hiberum agro eos arcuissent, 3 sociosque cum fide tutati essent. Marcium secum habebat cum tanto honore ut facile appareret nihil minus vereri quam ne quis obstaret gloriae suae. 4 Successit inde Neroni Silanus, et in hiberna milites novi deducti. Scipio omnibus quae adeunda agendaque erant mature aditis peractisque Tarraconem 5 concessit. Nihilo minor fama apud hostis Scipionis erat quam apud civis sociosque, et divinatio quaedam futuri, quo minus ratio timoris reddi poterat oborti 6 temere, maiorem inferens metum. In hiberna diversi concesserant, Hasdrubal Gisgonis usque ad Oceanum et Gadis, Mago in mediterranea maxime supra Castulonensem saltum: Hasdrubal Hamilcaris filius proximus Hibero circa Saguntum hibernavit.

---

[1] It is already the end of the season; cf. § 6.

[2] In Carthaginian hands since 219 B.C. Polybius places the three Carthaginian armies somewhat differently (X. vii. 5).

which out of courtesy had escorted him from their home. Then he began to give answers to the embassies which were in suspense owing to the repeated changes of fortune, and that with high spirit indeed, due to his great faith in his own abilities, yet so that no over-confident word slipped from his lips, and that in all he said there was not only great dignity but also great sincerity. B.C. 211

XX. Setting out from Tarraco he visited cities of the allies and also winter quarters of the army,[1] and warmly praised the soldiers because, after suffering two such disasters in succession, they had held the province, and not allowing the enemy to feel any benefit from their successes, had kept them out of the whole region this side of the Ebro, and had loyally protected the allies. Marcius he kept by him in so much honour as to make it clear that he had not the least fear that anyone would stand in the way of his own fame. Then Silanus succeeded Nero, and the new soldiers were led into winter quarters. Scipio, having promptly visited all the necessary places and having done all that was to be done, retired to Tarraco. Not a whit less was Scipio's fame among the enemy than among citizens and allies, and there was a certain presentiment of the future, inspiring the greater fear in proportion as they were the less able to account for their unreasoned apprehension. They had withdrawn in different directions into winter quarters, Hasdrubal, the son of Gisgo, as far as the Ocean and Gades, Mago into the interior, especially beyond the Forest of Castulo. Hasdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, was the nearest to the Ebro in his winter quarters near Saguntum.[2]

B.C. 13 7 Aestatis eius extremo qua capta est Capua et Scipio in Hispaniam venit Punica classis ex Sicilia Tarentum accita ad arcendos commeatus praesidii 8 Romani quod in arce Tarentina erat, clauserat quidem omnis ad arcem a mari aditus, sed adsidendo diutius artiorem annonam sociis quam hosti[1] facie- 9 bat. Non enim tantum subvehi oppidanis per pacata litora apertosque portus praesidio navium Punicarum poterat quantum frumenti classis ipsa turba navali mixta ex omni genere hominum absu- 10 mebat, ut arcis praesidium etiam sine invecto, quia pauci erant, ex ante praeparato sustentari posset, Tarentinis classique ne invectum quidem sufficeret. 11 Tandem maiore gratia quam venerat classis dimissa est: annona haud multum laxaverat,[2] quia remoto maritimo praesidio subvehi frumentum non poterat.

XXI. Eiusdem aestatis exitu M. Marcellus ex Sicilia provincia cum ad urbem venisset, a C. Calpurnio praetore senatus ei ad aedem Bellonae datus 2 est. Ibi cum de rebus ab se gestis disseruisset, questus leniter non suam magis quam militum vicem quod provincia confecta exercitum deportare non licuisset, postulavit ut triumphanti urbem inire 3 liceret. Id non impetravit. Cum multis verbis actum esset utrum minus conveniret, cuius nomine

[1] hosti M^1AJK Aldus: hostis $P(3)$: hostibus Alschefski.
[2] laxaverat $P(1)JK$: laxata est conj. Luchs.

[1] Bomilcar, the admiral, was entreated by the Tarentines to sail away; Polybius IX. ix. 11.

At the end of the summer in which Capua was B.C. 211 taken and Scipio came to Spain a Carthaginian fleet was summoned from Sicily to Tarentum to cut off the supplies of the Roman garrison which was in the citadel of Tarentum, and it had indeed closed every approach to the citadel from the sea, but by lying there for a long time it was making the grain supply more limited for their allies than for the enemy. For it was impossible for such a quantity of grain to be brought to the townspeople by way of the peaceful shores and open harbours, under the protection of the Carthaginian ships, as the fleet itself was consuming, with its swarming crews, including men of every race. The result was that, while the garrison of the citadel, as being few in number, could be supported from previous stores without importation, for the Tarentines and the fleet even the imported grain was insufficient. In the end the departure of the fleet was more welcome than had been its coming.[1] The scarcity had not been much relieved, because, with the removal of naval protection, grain could not be brought in.

XXI. At the end of the same summer, upon the arrival of Marcus Marcellus at the city from his province of Sicily, a session of the senate in the Temple of Bellona was granted him by Gaius Calpurnius, the praetor. There after speaking of his achievements he complained gently, not more on his own account than that of the soldiers, because even after completing his task in the province, he had not been permitted to bring away his army, and he demanded that he be permitted to enter the city in triumph. That request was not granted. There was first a wordy discussion whether it was more illogical absentis ob res prospere ductu eius gestas supplicatio decreta foret et dis immortalibus habitus honos, ei praesenti negare triumphum, an quem tradere exercitum successori iussissent—quod nisi manente in provincia bello non[1] decerneretur—eum quasi debellato triumphare. cum exercitus testis meriti atque immeriti triumphi abesset, medium visum ut ovans urbem iniret. Tribuni plebis ex auctoritate senatus ad populum tulerunt ut M. Marcello quo die urbem ovans iniret imperium esset. Pridie quam urbem iniret in monte Albano triumphavit; inde ovans multam prae se praedam in urbem intulit. Cum simulacro captarum Syracusarum catapultae ballistaeque et alia omnia instrumenta belli lata et pacis diuturnae regiaeque opulentiae ornamenta, argenti aerisque fabrefacti vis, alia supellex pretiosaque vestis et multa nobilia signa, quibus inter primas Graeciae urbes Syracusae ornatae fuerant. Punicae quoque victoriae signum octo ducti elephanti; et non minimum fuere[2] spectaculum cum coronis aureis praecedentes Sosis Syracusanus et Moericus Hispanus, quorum altero duce[3] nocturno

A.U.C. 543

[1] non A^6 Aldus: num P: om. $P^2(1)JKz$: numquam conj. Weissenborn.

[2] fuere $P(3)A^y$ Aldus: fuit $AJKz$.

[3] duce $C^xA^x?JK$ Aldus: ducere PCR: ducente R^2MBDA.

[1] On horseback, or even on foot, not in the triumphal chariot. For the ovation cf. e.g. XXXIX. xxix. 5; Plutarch Marcellus xxii. 2; Cassius Dio LIV. viii.; Dionysius V. xlvii.; Gellius V. vi. 27.

[2] Cf. XXXIII. xxiii. 8; XLV. xxxviii. 4. This inferior form of triumph was often connected with the ovatio.

[3] Such representations of captured cities and towns were frequent features of triumphal processions. At the triumph of Lucius Scipio there were 134 oppidorum simulacra; XXXVII. lix. 3.

that he in whose name, though absent, a thanks- B.C. 211 giving for successes gained under his command had been decreed and honour rendered to the gods, should be denied a triumph when present, or on the other hand that he whom they had ordered to turn over his army to a successor—a vote which was not taken except when a war still remained in the province—should triumph just as though the war were finished, and in spite of the absence of the army to witness his triumph as deserved or undeserved. And then they adopted a compromise, that he should enter the city in an ovation.[1] The tribunes of the plebs on the authority of the senate brought before the people the proposal that Marcus Marcellus should have full military power on the day on which he entered the city in an ovation. On the day before his entry into the city he triumphed on the Alban Mount.[2] Then in his ovation he caused a great amount of booty to be carried before him into the city. Together with a representation of captured Syracuse[3] were carried catapults and ballistae and all the other engines of war, and the adornments of a long peace and of royal wealth, a quantity of silverware and bronzeware, other furnishings and costly fabrics, and many notable statues, with which Syracuse had been adorned more highly than most cities of Greece. As a sign of triumph over Carthaginians as well, eight elephants were in the procession. And not the least spectacle, in advance of the general and wearing golden wreaths, were Sosis[4] of Syracuse and Moericus[5] the Spaniard.

[4] Cf. xxx. 6; xxxi. 4. Probably not the same Sosis as in XXIV. and XXV.

[5] Cf. XXV. xxx.

U.C. 43 Syracusas introitum erat, alter Nasum quodque ibi
11 praesidii erat prodiderat. His ambobus civitas data et quingena iugera agri, Sosidi in agro Syracusano, qui aut regius aut hostium populi Romani fuisset, et aedes Syracusis cuius vellet eorum in quos belli iure
12 animadversum esset; Moerico Hispanisque qui cum eo transierant urbs agerque in Sicilia ex iis qui a 13 populo Romano defecissent, iussa dari. Id M. Cornelio mandatum ut, ubi ei videretur, urbem agrumque eis adsignaret. In eodem agro Belligeni, per quem inlectus ad transitionem Moericus erat, quadringenta iugera agri decreta.

14 Post profectionem ex Sicilia Marcelli Punica classis octo milia peditum, tria Numidarum equitum exposuit. Ad eos Murgentia et Ergetium urbes defecere.[1] Secutae defectionem earum Hybla et Macella sunt
15 et[2] ignobiliores quaedam aliae. Et Numidae praefecto Muttine vagi per totam Siciliam sociorum
16 populi Romani agros urebant. Super haec exercitus Romanus iratus, partim quod cum imperatore non devectus ex provincia esset, partim quod in oppidis hibernare vetiti erant, segni fungebantur militia, magisque eis auctor ad seditionem quam animus
17 decerat. Inter has difficultates M. Cornelius praetor et militum animos nunc consolando nunc castigando

[1] -tia et Ergetium urbes defecere Weissenborn : -tiaeterre P, a line lost after er : -i(a)eterr(a)e (1)JK.
[2] sunt et : Aldus : st PCRM : sunt AJK : et Weissenborn : om. M^3BC^2.

---

[1] Cethegus, who succeeded Marcellus in Sicily.
[2] Cf. XXV. xxx. 2, where no name is given.
[3] To share in the triumph of Marcellus. The remainder of the sentence refers to the legions in disgrace; i. 10; ii. 14.

With one of them as guide at night Syracuse had B.C. 211 been entered: the other had betrayed Nasus and the garrison there. To both of these citizenship was granted and five hundred iugera of land; to Sosis, in the territory of Syracuse, land which had either belonged to the king or to enemies of the Roman people, and a house at Syracuse, to be chosen by him from those owned by men whom they had punished by the law of war. To Moericus and the Spaniards who had changed sides with him a city and land in Sicily were ordered to be given, chosen from among those who had revolted from the Roman people. Instructions were given to Marcus Cornelius[1] to assign them a city and land wherever he saw fit. In the same region four hundred iugera of land were voted to Belligenes,[2] by whom Moericus had been induced to change sides.

After Marcellus' departure from Sicily a Carthaginian fleet landed eight thousand infantry and three thousand Numidian cavalry. To them the cities of Murgentia and Ergetium revolted. Their rebellion was followed by that of Hybla and Macella and some others of less importance. And the Numidians, roaming everywhere in Sicily under their prefect Muttines, burned over lands of allies of the Roman people. In addition the Roman army, being indignant, partly because it had not been transported out of the province along with its commander,[3] and partly because they had been forbidden to winter in towns, was serving without spirit. And what they lacked for a mutiny was a leader rather than the inclination. In the midst of these difficulties Marcus Cornelius, the praetor, quieted the soldiers' excitement, now by consoling, now by censuring them;

A.U.C. 543 sedavit, et civitates omnis quae defecerant in dicionem redegit; atque ex iis Murgentiam Hispanis quibus urbs agerque debebatur ex senatus consulto attribuit.

XXII. Consules cum ambo Apuliam provinciam haberent, minusque iam terroris a Poenis et Hannibale esset, sortiri iussi Apuliam Macedoniamque provincias. Sulpicio Macedonia evenit isque Laevino successit. 2 Fulvius Romam comitiorum causa arcessitus cum comitia consulibus rogandis haberet, praerogativa Voturia iuniorum T. Manlium Torquatum et T. 3 Otacilium absentem consules dixit.[1] Cum ad Manlium.[2] qui praesens erat, gratulandi causa turba coiret, nec dubius esset consensus populi, magna 4 circumfusus turba ad tribunal consulis venit, petitque ut pauca sua verba audiret centuriamque quae 5 tulisset suffragium revocari iuberet. Erectis omnibus exspectatione quidnam postulaturus esset, oculorum 6 valetudinem excusavit: impudentem et gubernatorem et imperatorem esse qui, cum alienis oculis ei omnia agenda sint, postulet sibi[3] aliorum capita 7 ac fortunas committi. Proinde, si videretur ei, redire in suffragium Voturiam iuniorum iuberet et meminisse in consulibus creandis belli quod in Italia 8 sit temporumque rei publicae. Vixdum requiesse auris a strepitu et tumultu hostili, quo paucos

[1] absentem consules dixit Fabri : om. P(1)JK in a lacuna of probably two lines.

[2] Cum ad Manlium Weissenborn : om. P(1)JK.

[3] sibi K : sibi post P(1)J : sibi potius Gronovius.

[1] I.e. by lot. Cf. the similar case in 215 B.C.; XXIV. vii. 12; ix. 3.

likewise he reduced to subjection all the city-states B.C. 211 which had revolted. And of these he assigned Murgentia to the Spaniards to whom a city with its territory was due in conformity with a decree of the senate.

XXII. Since both consuls had Apulia as their province, and there was now less alarm from the Carthaginians and Hannibal, they were ordered to cast lots for Apulia and Macedonia as their provinces. Macedonia fell to Sulpicius, and he succeeded Laevinus. Fulvius was summoned to Rome for the election, and while he was conducting the election for the choice of consuls, the century of the younger men of the Voturia tribe, having the right to vote first,[1] declared in favour of Titus Manlius Torquatus and Titus Otacilius as consuls, the latter being absent. When a crowd gathered before Manlius, who was present, in order to congratulate him, and the approval of the people was unquestioned, surrounded by a great crowd he came to the tribunal of the consul, begged him to hear a few words from him, and bade him recall the century which had cast its vote. While all were in suspense, waiting to know what he was going to demand, he gave the condition of his eyes as an excuse. Shameless, he said, was a pilot and a general too, who, though he must use other men's eyes for everything he did, demanded that the lives and fortunes of others be entrusted to him. Therefore, if Fulvius approved, let him order the Voturia century of the younger men to vote again, and in electing consuls to remember the war that was in Italy and the critical times for the state. Their ears had hardly yet had a respite from the noise and uproar of the enemy when ante menses arserint[1] prope moenia Romana. Post haec cum centuria frequens succlamasset nihil se mutare sententiae eosdemque consules dicturos 9 esse, tum Torquatus "Neque ego vestros" inquit "mores consul ferre potero neque vos imperium meum. Redite in suffragium et cogitate bellum Punicum in Italia et hostium ducem Hannibalem 10 esse." Tum centuria et auctoritate mota viri et admirantium circa fremitu, petiit a consule ut

A.U.C. 543

11 Voturiam seniorum citaret: velle sese cum maioribus natu conloqui et ex auctoritate eorum consules dicere. Citatis Voturiae senioribus, datum secreto
12 in Ovili cum iis conloquendi tempus. Seniores de tribus consulendum dixerunt esse, duobus plenis iam honorum, Q. Fabio et M. Marcello, et si utique novum aliquem adversus Poenos consulem creari vellent, M. Valerio Laevino: egregie adversus 13 Philippum regem terra marique rem gessisse. Ita de tribus consultatione data, senioribus dimissis iuniores suffragium ineunt. M.[2] Claudium, fulgentem tum Sicilia domita, et M. Valerium absentis consules dixerunt. Auctoritatem praerogativae omnes centu-
14 riae secutae sunt. Eludant nunc antiqua mirantis: non equidem, si qua sit sapientium civitas, quam

[1] arserint Alschefski: asserint P(1): cesserint M[1] Madvig, Conway.

[2] M., here P(1)J Aldus insert Marcellus or -um: K has normal order of the three names.

---

[1] The corresponding century of the same first class.

[2] A large enclosed area in the Campus Martius for election purposes. Ovile, its older name, gave way in general use to that of Saepta. Agrippa erected there a huge building, the Saepta Iulia, completed in 26 B.C.; Cassius Dio LIII. xxiii.

the city of Rome had been all but ablaze a few B.C. 211 months before. After these words the century en masse cried out they would not make any change in their opinion and would vote for the same men as consuls. Thereupon Torquatus said: "Neither shall I as consul be able to put up with your manners, nor will you with my authority. Vote again, and reflect that a Punic war is in Italy and the commander of the enemy Hannibal." Then the century, moved by the prestige of the man and the expressions of admiration on all sides, begged the consul to summon the Voturia century of the older men.[1] They wished, they said, to confer with their elders and on their authority to name consuls. When the older men of the Voturia had been summoned, time for a secret conference with them was granted in the Sheepfold.[2] The elders said that they must deliberate in regard to three men, two of them already full of honours, Quintus Fabius and Marcus Marcellus, and if they were quite decided to elect some new man as consul to face the Carthaginians, Marcus Valerius Laevinus; that he had carried on the war brilliantly against King Philip on land and sea. So after deliberation in regard to the three men had been allowed, the elders were sent away, and the younger men cast their vote. They voted for Marcus Claudius, at that time resplendent in the light of his conquest of Sicily, and Marcus Valerius as consuls, both being absent. The authority of the leading century was followed by all the rest. Let men now make sport of those who admire what is old.[3] For my part, if there should be a city-state of sages, such as philosophers imagine rather than docti fingunt magis quam norunt, aut principes graviores temperantioresque[1] a cupidine imperii aut multitudinem melius moratam censeam fieri posse. Centuriam vero iuniorum seniores consulere voluisse quibus imperium suffragio mandaret, vix ut veri simile sit parentium quoque hoc saeculo vilis levisque apud liberos auctoritas fecit.

[3] Cf. VI. xli. 8.

B.C. 43

XXIII. Praetoria inde comitia habita. P. Manlius Volso[2] et L. Manlius Acidinus et C. Laetorius et L. Cincius Alimentus creati sunt. Forte ita incidit ut comitiis perfectis nuntiaretur T. Otacilium, quem T. Manlio, nisi interpellatus ordo comitiorum esset, conlegam absentem daturus fuisse videbatur populus, mortuum in Sicilia esse. Ludi Apollinares et priore anno fuerant et eo anno ut fierent referente Calpurnio praetore, senatus decrevit ut in perpetuum voverentur. Eodem anno prodigia aliquot visa nuntiataque sunt. In aede Concordiae Victoria quae in culmine erat fulmine icta decussaque ad Victorias quae in antefixis erant haesit neque inde procidit. Et Anagniae[3] et Fregellis nuntiatum est murum portasque de caelo tactas,[4] et in foro Subertano sanguinis rivos per diem totum fluxisse, et Ereti lapidibus pluvisse, et Reate mulam peperisse.

[1] temperantioresque B^2J Sigonius: -atioresque $P(1)K$.
[2] Volso Aldus: Vulso Sigonius: valens $P(1)JKz$.
[3] Anagniae C Aldus: angnia P: anagnia $P^1(3)$.
[4] tactas $P^2(1)JK$(-tus D) Aldus: tacta P.

---

[1] The annalist: XXI. xxxviii. 3.
[2] At the upper end of the Forum, built after 367 B.C. Another temple in the citadel had been dedicated in 216 B.C.; XXIII. xxi. 7.

actually know, I am inclined to think that neither B.C. 211 could leading men possibly be of more solid worth and more self-controlled as regards the lust for power, nor could the populace show a higher character. But that a century of the younger men wished to confer with their elders as to men whom they should vote to entrust with a command should seem to us scarcely credible—this is due to the cheapened and diminished authority even of parents over their children in our day.

XXIII. Then an election for the praetorships was held. Elected were Publius Manlius Volso and Lucius Manlius Acidinus and Gaius Laetorius and Lucius Cincius Alimentus.[1] It was after the election, as it happened, that news came of the death in Sicily of Titus Otacilius, whom the people in his absence would, it seemed, have given as a colleague to Titus Manlius, if the course of the election had not been interrupted. The festival of Apollo had been observed in the previous year, and in order that it might be observed in this year also, the senate, on motion of Calpurnius, the praetor, decreed that it be vowed as a permanency. In the same year a number of prodigies were seen and reported. At the Temple of Concord[2] a Victory which stood on the pediment was struck by lightning, and being dislodged, it caught upon the Victories which were among the antefixes and did not fall farther. And at Anagnia and at Fregellae the wall and gates were reported to have been struck from heaven; and that at Forum Subertanum there had been streams of blood for a whole day; and that at Eretum there was a shower of stones; and that at Reate a mule had foaled. These prodigies were

A.U.C. 513

6 Ea prodigia hostiis maioribus sunt procurata, et obsecratio in unum diem populo indicta et novemdiale sacrum. Sacerdotes publici aliquot eo anno de-
7 mortui sunt novique suffecti: in locum M'. Aemili Numidae decemviri sacrorum M. Aemilius Lepidus, in locum M. Pomponi Mathonis pontificis C. Livius, 8 in locum Sp. Carvili Maximi auguris M. Servilius. T. Otacilius Crassus pontifex quia exacto anno mortuus erat, ideo nominatio in locum eius non est facta. C. Claudius flamen Dialis, quod exta perperam dederat, flamonio abiit.

XXIV. Per idem tempus M. Valerius Laevinus, temptatis prius per secreta conloquia principum animis, ad indictum ante ad id ipsum concilium
2 Aetolorum classe expedita venit. Ubi cum Syracusas Capuamque captam [1] in fidem in Italia Sicilia-
3 que [2] rerum secundarum ostentasset, adiecissetque iam inde a maioribus traditum morem Romanis colendi socios, ex quibus alios in civitatem atque aequum secum ius accepissent, alios in ea fortuna
4 haberent ut socii esse quam cives mallent; Aetolos eo in maiore futuros honore quod gentium trans-
5 marinarum in amicitiam primi venissent; Philippum eis et Macedonas gravis accolas esse, quorum se vim ac spiritus et iam fregisse et eo redacturum

[1] captam $P(1)$: capitam N: captas A^2JK Aldus, Froben: itas N^2.

[2] Italia Siciliaque Alschefski: italiaque $P(3)A^2JK$ Aldus: Sicilia Italiaque A^y Gronovius.

---

[1] The regular method of expiation when a shower of stones had been reported: XXI. lxii. 6; XXIII. xxxi. 15; XXV. vii. 9; XXVII. xxxvii. 4.

atoned for with full-grown victims, and a single day B.C. 211 of prayer was proclaimed to the people and nine days of ceremonies.[1] A number of public priests died that year, and new priests were appointed: in place of Manius Aemilius Numida, a decemvir in charge of rites, Marcus Aemilius Lepidus was appointed, in place of Marcus Pomponius Matho, a pontifex, Gaius Livius, in place of Spurius Carvilius Maximus, the augur, Marcus Servilius. Since Titus Otacilius Crassus, a pontifex, had died at the end of the year, no one was named to take his place. Gaius Claudius, flamen of Jupiter, abdicated his office because of an error in his placing the entrails.

XXIV. About the same time Marcus Valerius Laevinus, who had previously sounded the leading men in secret conferences, came on a swift sailing fleet to a council of the Aetolians already appointed for that very purpose. There he first set before them the capture of Syracuse and Capua, to convince them of success in Italy and Sicily, and in addition referred to the customary good treatment of allies as handed down to the Romans by their ancestors. Some of the allies, he said, they had admitted to citizenship and to the same rights as themselves, others they kept in so favoured a situation that they preferred to be allies rather than citizens: that the Aetolians would be held in all the higher honour because they would have been the first of the peoples across the sea to enter their friendship;[2] that Philip and the Macedonians were their oppressive neighbours, whose might and over-confidence he had

[2] Ptolemy Philadelphus sent an embassy to Rome about 273 B.C., but friendly relations were not followed by any formal alliance, as stated in Periocha 14.

c.c. 43

esse ut non iis modo urbibus quas per vim ademissent[1] Aetolis excedant, sed ipsam Macedoniam 6 infestam habeant; et Acarnanas, quos aegre ferrent Aetoli a corpore suo diremptos, restituturum se in 7 antiquam formulam iurisque ac dicionis eorum;— haec dicta promissaque a Romano imperatore Scopas, qui tum praetor gentis erat, et Dorimachus, princeps Aetolorum, adfirmaverunt auctoritate sua, minore cum verecundia et maiore cum fide vim maiestatem-
8 que populi Romani extollentes. Maxime tamen spes potiundae movebat Acarnaniae. Igitur conscriptae condiciones quibus in amicitiam societatem-
9 que populi Romani venirent; additumque ut, si placeret vellentque, eodem iure amicitiae Elei Lacedaemoniique et Attalus et Pleuratus et Scerdilaedus essent, Asiae Attalus, hi Thracum et Illyriorum
10 reges; bellum ut extemplo Aetoli cum Philippo terra gererent; navibus ne minus viginti quinque quinque-
11 remibus adiuvaret Romanus; urbium Corcyrae tenus ab Aetolia incipienti solum tectaque et muri cum agris Aetolorum, alia omnis praeda populi Romani esset, darentque operam Romani ut Acarnaniam
12 Aetoli haberent; si Aetoli pacem cum Philippo facerent, foederi adscriberent ita ratam fore[2]

[1] ademissent Aldus: ademisset P(1)JKz Conway.
[2] fore Muretus (x?): eorum P(1)JK Aldus.

[1] I.e. στρατηγός.
[2] Meaning the cities in Acarnania and a large part of Epirus.

already broken and would further reduce to such a B.C. 211 pass that they would not only retire from the cities which they had forcibly taken from the Aetolians, but also would find Macedonia itself continually endangered. And as for the Acarnanians, whose forcible separation from their federation the Aetolians resented, he said he would restore them to the old written basis, establishing both the rights and the supremacy of the Aetolians. These statements and promises by the Roman general were confirmed by the authority of Scopas, then magistrate [1] of the tribe, and of Dorimachus, a leading man of the Aetolians, while they extolled the might and majesty of the Roman people, using less restraint and bringing more conviction. But most effective was the hope of getting possession of Acarnania. Accordingly the terms were written down under which they should enter friendship and alliance with the Roman people; furthermore that, if so disposed and willing, the Eleans and Lacedaemonians and Attalus and Pleuratus and Scerdilaedus should have the same rights of friendship, Attalus being king of Asia and the last mentioned kings of the Thracians and Illyrians; that the Aetolians should at once wage war against Philip by land; that the Roman should assist with not less than twenty-five ships with five banks of oars; that, of the cities between the Aetolian border and Corcyra [2] the soil and buildings and city-walls, together with their territory, should belong to the Aetolians, all the rest of the booty to the Roman people; and that the Romans were to see to it that the Aetolians should have Acarnania. If the Aetolians should make peace with Philip they were to append to the treaty that the peace would be

c.c. 43 pacem si Philippus arma ab Romanis sociisque
13 quique eorum dicionis essent abstinuisset; item si populus Romanus foedere iungeretur regi, ut caveret ne ius ei belli inferendi Aetolis sociisque eorum
14 esset. Haec convenerunt, conscriptaque biennio post Olympiae ab Aetolis, in Capitolio ab Romanis, ut testata sacratis monumentis essent, sunt posita.
15 Morae causa fuerant retenti Romae diutius legati Aetolorum; nec tamen impedimento id rebus gerendis fuit. Et Aetoli extemplo moverunt adversus Philippum bellum, et Laevinus Zacynthum—parva insula est propinqua Aetoliae; urbem unam eodem quo ipsa est nomine habet; eam praeter arcem vi cepit—et Oeniadas Nasumque Acarnanum captas 16 Aetolis contribuit; Philippum quoque [1] satis implicatum bello finitimo ratus, ne Italiam Poenosque et pacta cum Hannibale posset respicere, Corcyram ipse se recepit.

XXV. Philippo Aetolorum defectio Pellae hibernanti adlata est. Itaque quia primo vere moturus
2 exercitum in Graeciam erat, ut [2] Illyrios finitumasque eis urbes ab tergo metu quietas [3] Macedonia haberet, expeditionem subitam in Oricinorum atque Apolloniatium fines fecit, egressosque Apolloniatas cum magno
3 terrore ac pavore compulit intra muros. Vastatis

[1] quoque P(1)JK: -que Weissenborn.
[2] ut Alschefski: om. P(1).
[3] quietas P(3) Alschefski: quietas ut ANJK Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Set up in temples, as was usual among Greeks and Romans.
[2] Breaking a treaty made with him six years before.
[3] Cf. XXIV. xl.

valid only in case Philip should refrain from war B.C. 211 with the Romans and their allies and those who were subject to the latter. In like manner, if the Roman people should make a treaty with the king, they should take care that he have no right to invade the land of the Aetolians and their allies. These terms were agreed upon, and not until two years later were the texts set up, at Olympia by the Aetolians, on the Capitol by the Romans, that they might be attested by consecrated records.[1] The reason for the delay had been the retention of the Aetolian envoys for a long time at Rome. And yet that did not hinder active measures. On the one hand the Aetolians at once began the war against Philip, on the other Laevinus captured Zacynthus. This is a small island, near Aetolia, and has one city of the same name as the island itself; that city he took by storm, except for its citadel. And after capturing Oeniadae and Nasus, belonging to the Acarnanians, he annexed them to Aetolia. Thinking that Philip also was sufficiently involved in a war with neighbours to prevent him from having any possible thought of Italy and the Carthaginians and treaties with Hannibal, he himself retired to Corcyra.

XXV. As Philip was wintering at Pella, the estrangement of the Aetolians[2] was reported to him. Accordingly because he intended at the beginning of spring to move his army into Greece, in order that Macedonia should keep the Illyrians in her rear and the cities near them intimidated, he made a sudden incursion into the territories of Oricum and Apollonia,[3] and when the Apollonians came out of their city, he drove them inside their walls, causing great proximis Illyrici in Pelagoniam eadem celeritate vertit iter: inde Dardanorum urbem Sintiam, in Macedoniam transitum Dardanis facturam, cepit. His raptim actis, memor Aetolici iunctique cum eo Romani belli per Pelagoniam et Lyncum et Bottiaeam in Thessaliam descendit—ad bellum secum adversus Aetolos capessendum incitari posse homines credebat—et relicto ad fauces Thessaliae Perseo cum quattuor milibus armatorum ad arcendos aditu Aetolos, ipse, priusquam maioribus occuparetur rebus, in Macedoniam atque inde in Thraciam exercitum ac Maedos duxit. Incurrere ea gens in Macedoniam solita erat, ubi regem occupatum externo bello ac sine praesidio esse regnum sensisset. Ad frangendas igitur vires[1] gentis simul[2] vastare agros et urbem Iamphorynnam, caput arcemque Maedicae, oppugnare coepit. Scopas ubi profectum in Thraciam regem occupatumque ibi bello audivit, armata omni iuventute Aetolorum bellum inferre Acarnaniae parat. Adversus quos Acarnanum gens, et viribus impar et iam Oeniadas Nasumque amissa[3] cernens Romanaque insuper arma ingruere, ira magis instruit quam consilio bellum. Coniugibus liberisque et senioribus super sexaginta annos in propinquam Epirum missis, ab quindecim ad sexaginta annos

A.U.C. 543

[1] vires C^4 Madvig: om. $P(1)JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[2] gentis simul Conway: om. $P(1)$ etc.; one line has been lost.

[3] amissa P Madvig, Conway (without remark): -sas Gronovius, Weissenborn.

---

[1] A high mountain region between the upper Peneus and the Aoüs rivers.

[2] No doubt through the Vale of Tempe.

panic and alarm. After ravaging the nearest parts B.C. 211 of Illyricum, he changed the direction of his march with the same speed into Pelagonia. Then he captured a city of the Dardanians, Sintia, as likely to afford a passage for the Dardanians into Macedonia. So much having been done in haste, mindful of the Aetolian war and the Roman war combined with it, he came down through Pelagonia and Lyncus [1] and Bottiaea into Thessaly,[2] believing that men could be aroused to join him in undertaking a war against the Aetolians, and leaving Perseus at the pass into Thessaly [3] with four thousand armed men, to prevent the Aetolians from entering, he led his army, before he should be engaged in more important matters, into Macedonia and thence into Thrace and against the Maedi. That tribe had been in the habit of making raids into Macedonia, whenever it knew that the king was engaged in a foreign war and the kingdom unprotected. Therefore to break its power he began at the same time to lay waste the country and to besiege the city of Iamphorynna, the capital and citadel of Maedica. Scopas, on learning that the king had gone into Thrace and was there occupied with a war, armed all the young men among the Aetolians and prepared to invade Acarnania. Against these the Acarnanian tribe, inferior in strength, and at the same time seeing Oeniadae and Nasus lost and a war with Rome impending in addition, prepared for war out of resentment rather than calculation. Sending away wives and children and the older men above sixty years to the nearest part of Epirus, from fifteen years of age up to sixty

[3] I.e. from the south via Thermopylae: XXVIII. v. 8; XXXVI. xv. 6 ff.

u.c. 543

12 coniurant nisi victores se non redituros: qui victus acie excessisset, eum ne quis urbe, tecto, mensa, lare reciperet, diram exsecrationem in popularis, obtestationem quam sanctissimam potuerunt adversus
13 hospites composuerunt; precatique simul Epirotas sunt ut, qui suorum in acie cecidissent, eos uno tumulo contegerent, adfigerentque[1] humatis titu-
14 lum: "Hic siti sunt Acarnanes, qui adversus vim atque iniuriam Aetolorum pro patria pugnantes
15 mortem occubuerunt."[2] Per haec incitatis animis castra in extremis finibus suis obvia hosti posuerunt. Nuntiis ad Philippum missis, quanto res in discrimine esset, omittere Philippum id quod in manibus erat coegerunt bellum, Iamphorynna per deditionem
16 recepta et prospero alio successu rerum. Aetolorum impetum tardaverat primo coniurationis fama Acarnanicae; deinde auditus Philippi adventus regredi 17 etiam in intimos coegit fines. Nec Philippus, quamquam, ne opprimerentur Acarnanes, itineribus magnis ierat, ultra Dium est progressus. Inde, cum audisset reditum Aetolorum ex Acarnania, et ipse Pellam rediit.

XXVI. Laevinus veris principio a Corcyra profectus navibus superato Leucata promunturio cum venisset Naupactum, Anticyram inde se petiturum edixit, ut praesto ibi Scopas Aetolique essent.

[1] adfigerentque Madvig: -liberentque PRM: -hiberentque CM²?BDAJK Aldus: -icerentque Weissenborn, Conway.
[2] occubuerunt P(3) Aldus: oppetierunt AJKz.

---

[1] Viz. the Epirotes.
[2] Dium, at the foot of Mt. Olympus, was a strong city, commanding both the coast road into Macedonia from they took an oath that they would not return except as victors: should any man come out of the battle defeated, they drew up a dreadful curse upon their countrymen, a most solemn adjuration adressed to their hosts:[1] that no one should receive that man into the city, into his house, to his table, to his hearth. And at the same time they besought the Epirotes to cover under one mound all of their men who were to fall in battle, and to set up this inscription for those they had buried: "Here lie the Acarnanians who, fighting for their country against the violence and injustice of the Aetolians, have met their death." Having aroused their spirits by these means, they pitched camp facing the enemy at their very frontier. Sending messengers to Philip to inform him how great was the danger, they compelled him to give up the war which he had on hand, after the surrender of Iamphorynna and in spite of his other successes. The Aetolians' attack was delayed at first by the report of the oath of the Acarnanians, and then news of Philip's approach forced them to retire far back into the interior. And Philip, although he had been making forced marches to prevent the Acarnanians from being overpowered, did not advance beyond Dium.[2] Thence, on hearing that the Aetolians had returned from Acarnania, he too returned to Pella. B.C. 211

XXVI. Laevinus at the beginning of spring set out by ship from Corcyra, rounded the promontory of Leucata, and on reaching Naupactus, made it known by an edict that he would proceed to Anticyra, and that Scopas and the Aetolians should meet him there.

[1] Thessaly and a road leading down from the pass northwest of the mountain.

A.U.C. 543

2 Sita Anticyra est in Locride[1] laeva parte sinum
3 Corinthiacum intranti: breve terra iter eo, brevis navigatio ab Naupacto est. Tertio ferme post die utrimque oppugnari coepta est. Gravior a mari oppugnatio erat, quia et tormenta machinaeque omnis generis in navibus erant, et Romani inde oppugnabant. Itaque intra paucos dies recepta urbs per deditionem Aetolis traditur, praeda ex pacto Romanis
4 cessit. Litterae interea Laevino redditae consulem eum absentem declaratum, et successorem venire P. Sulpicium: ceterum diuturno ibi morbo inplicitus serius spe omnium Romam venit.

A.U.C. 544

5 M. Marcellus cum idibus Martiis consulatum inisset, senatum eo die moris modo causa habuit, professus nihil se absente conlega neque de re publica
6 neque de provinciis acturum. Scire se frequentis Siculos prope urbem in villis obtrectatorum suorum esse; quibus tantum abesse ut per se non liceat
7 palam Romae crimina edita[2] ab inimicis volgare, ut, ni simularent aliquem sibi timorem absente conlega dicendi de consule esse, ipse eis extemplo daturus senatum fuerit. Ubi quidem conlega venisset, non passurum quicquam prius agi quam ut Siculi in

[1] Locride z: locide P: same or loci de (3)B^2JKx: Phocide Cellarius.

[2] edita Madvig, Emend.: edita ficta $P(3)A^r$: edicta ficta BD: edicta facta $AJKx$: edita fictaque z Aldus: ficta Ussing.

---

[1] The stronghold of Anticyra in Locris, only 20 miles east of the mouth of the Gulf of Corinth, is less well known than the city of the same name in Phocis, ca. 40 miles farther (by the

Anticyra is situated in Locris, on the left as one B.C. 211 enters the Gulf of Corinth.[1] It is a short journey by land, a short sail thither from Naupactus. About two days later the siege began from both sides. More serious was the attack from the sea, because the artillery and engines of all kinds were on the ships, also because it was the Romans who were besieging from that side. And so within a few days the city surrendered and was turned over to the Aetolians, while the booty fell to the Romans in accordance with the agreement. A letter was delivered meanwhile to Laevinus informing him that in his absence he had been declared consul, and that his successor, Publius Sulpicius, was on the way. But contracting a long illness there, he came to Rome later than anyone had anticipated.

Marcus Marcellus, having entered upon his con- B.C. 210
sulship on the Ides of March, held a session of the senate on that day merely as a matter of custom, declaring that in the absence of his colleague he would do nothing concerning either the state or the provinces. He knew, he said, that a large number of Sicilians were near the city at the country-places of his detractors; that so far was it from being true that these men were not permitted by him to noise abroad openly at Rome the charges emanating from his personal foes, that he would himself immediately have given them a hearing in the senate but for their pretending no little fear to speak of the consul in the absence of his colleague. When indeed his colleague should arrive, he said, he would not allow any business to be taken up prior to the question of road) to the east. Cf. W. A. Oldfather in Pauly-Wissowa, Lokris, 1226.

A.U.C. 544

8 senatum introducantur. Dilectum prope a M. Cornelio per totam Siciliam habitum, ut quam plurumi questum de se Romam venirent; eundem litteris falsis urbem inplesse, bellum in Sicilia esse, 9 ut suam laudem minuat. Moderati animi gloriam eo die adeptus consul senatum dimisit; ac prope iustitium omnium rerum futurum videbatur donec alter consul ad urbem venisset.

10 Otium, ut solet, excitavit plebis rumores: belli diuturnitatem[1] et vastatos agros circa urbem, qua infesto agmine isset Hannibal, exhaustam dilectibus Italiam et prope[2] quotannis[3] caesos exercitus quere-11 bantur, et consules bellicosos ambo viros acresque nimis et feroces creatos qui vel in pace tranquilla bellum excitare possent, nedum in bello respirare civitatem forent passuri.

XXVII. Interrupit hos sermones nocte quae pridie Quinquatrus fuit pluribus simul locis circa forum in-
2 cendium ortum. Eodem tempore septem tabernae quae postea quinque, et argentariae quae nunc novae
3 appellantur, arsere; conprehensa postea privata aedificia—neque enim tum basilicae erant—, conprehensae lautumiae forumque piscatorium et atrium

[1] diuturnitatem A^{r}x: -tate P(1)JK Aldus.
[2] prope Gronovius: pro re P(1)Jz: per te K: pro rep. Aldus.
[3] quotannis Gronovius: quodannis P: quod cannis P^{2}(3) (cannensis AJKz): cannis Aldus.

---

[1] Cf. xxi. 13, 17.
[2] Chief festival of Minerva, 19th to 23rd of March. Cf. Festus pp. 304, 306 L; Ovid Fasti III. 809 ff. and Frazer's note.
[3] The rows of shops on opposite sides of the Forum were public property, but leased to tenants, chiefly bankers and money-changers. The New Shops were on the north side.

bringing the Sicilians before the senate. It was almost a levy that Marcus Cornelius[1] had conducted all over Sicily, in order that as many as possible might come to Rome to complain of himself. He added that Cornelius had also filled the city with letters falsely stating that there was a war in Sicily, in order to detract from the praise of the speaker. After winning a reputation for moderation on that day, the consul dismissed the senate. And it seemed that public business would be almost at a standstill until the other consul should come to the city. B.C. 210

Inaction, as usual, stirred up talk among the common people. They kept complaining of the duration of the war and of the devastation of farms around the city, wherever Hannibal had passed with his hostile army; of the draining of Italy by levies, and of armies cut to pieces almost every year; and of the election to both consulships of men of war, with an excess of spirit and confidence, who even in unruffled peace were capable of stirring up war, and were still less likely in time of war to allow the state a breathing-spell.

XXVII. Such utterances were interrupted on the night before the Quinquatrus[2] by a fire which broke out in several places at once about the Forum. At the same time the seven shops which later were five, and the bankers' offices, now called Tabernae Novae, caught fire;[3] then private houses took fire—for there were no basilicas then,—the quarter of the Quarries[4] took fire, and the Fish Market and the

[4] The Lautumiae were near the Carcer, west of the Comitium.

U.C. 544

4 regium. Aedis[1] Vestae vix defensa est tredecim maxime servorum opera, qui in publicum redempti
5 ac manu missi sunt. Nocte ac die continuatum incendium fuit, nec ulli dubium erat humana id fraude factum esse, quod pluribus simul locis, et iis diversis,
6 ignes coorti essent. Itaque consul ex auctoritate senatus pro contione edixit qui, quorum opera id conflatum[2] incendium, profiteretur, praemium fore
7 libero pecuniam, servo libertatem. Eo praemio inductus Campanorum Calaviorum servus—Manus ei nomen erat—indicavit dominos et quinque praeterea iuvenes nobiles Campanos quorum parentes a Q. Fulvio securi percussi erant id incendium fecisse,
8 volgoque facturos alia, ni conprendantur.[3] Conprehensi ipsi familiaeque eorum. Et primo elevabatur index indiciumque: pridie eum verberibus castigatum ab dominis discessisse; per iram ac
9 levitatem ex re fortuita crimen commentum. Ceterum ut coram coarguebantur, et quaestio ex ministris facinoris foro medio haberi coepta est, fassi omnes, atque in dominos servosque conscios animadversum est; indici libertas data et viginti milia aeris.
10 Consuli Laevino Capuam praetereunti circumfusa multitudo Campanorum est obsecrantium cum lacrimis ut sibi Romam ad senatum ire liceret oratum, si qua misericordia tandem flecti possent, ne se ad

[1] Aedis PC: -des RMBDAJK.

[2] conflatum. here perhaps esset has been omitted (inserted by Madvig after incendium).

[3] -prendantur $P^2(3)$: -prehendantur BDAJK.

---

[1] For contracts to rebuild this House of the Vestals and the Macellum cf. XXVII. xi. 16.

[2] Under torture, as being slaves.

Atrium Regium.[1] The Temple of Vesta was saved B.C. 210 with difficulty chiefly by the aid of thirteen slaves, who were purchased by the state and manumitted. The fire held on night and day, and no one doubted that it was the work of incendiaries, since the flames had burst out in several places at once, and places not adjacent at that. Accordingly the consul on the authority of the senate declared before an assembly that any man who made known through whose action the fire had been kindled should have, if a freeman, money as his reward, if a slave, his freedom. Led by that reward a slave of the Capuan Calavii—his name was Manus—declared that his masters, and in addition five young men, Capuan nobles, whose fathers had been beheaded by Quintus Fulvius, had set that fire, and would set others everywhere if they were not arrested. They were arrested, themselves and their slaves. And at first they tried to discredit the informer and the information. It was said that, having been punished by scourging the day before, he had left his masters; that owing to anger and worthless character he had made up a charge out of a chance occurrence. But when they were accused in the presence of the informer, and an examination[2] of those who had served them in the crime began in the centre of the Forum, they all confessed, and punishment was visited upon the masters and their slave accomplices. The informer was given his liberty and twenty thousand asses.

As the consul Laevinus was passing Capua, a multitude of Capuans flocked about him, begging him with tears to be permitted to go to the senate at Rome, to plead with them, if they could at last be touched by any sense of pity, not to proceed utterly to destroy

A.U.C. 544

ultimum perditum irent nomenque Campanorum a 11 Q. Flacco deleri sinerent. Flaccus sibi privatam simultatem cum Campanis negare ullam esse: publicas inimicitias [1] et esse et futuras, quoad eo 12 animo esse erga populum Romanum sciret. Nullam enim in terris gentem esse, nullum infestiorem populum nomini Romano. Ideo se moenibus inclusos tenere eos, quia,[2] si qui evasissent aliqua, velut feras bestias per agros vagari et laniare et trucidare
13 quodcumque obvium detur. Alios ad Hannibalem transfugisse, alios ad Romam incendendam profectos. Inventurum in semusto foro consulem vestigia
14 sceleris Campanorum. Vestae aedem petitam et aeternos ignes et conditum in penetrali fatale pignus imperi Romani. Se minime censere tutum esse Campanis potestatem intrandi Romana moenia
15 fieri. Laevinus Campanos, iure iurando a Flacco adactos, quinto die quam ab senatu responsum accepissent Capuam redituros, sequi se Romam
16 iussit. Hac circumfusus multitudine, simul Siculis obviam egressis secutisque Romam, praebuit speciem dolentis duarum [3] clarissimarum urbium excidio ac celeberrimis viris victos bello accusatores in urbem 17 adducentis. De re publica tamen primum ac de provinciis ambo consules ad senatum rettulere.

[1] inimicitias, P(3) add hostilis.
[2] quia P(1)J Weissenborn (rejected by Madvig): quod K: quippe Friedersdorff.
[3] speciem dolentis duarum M. Müller: om. P(1)JK, a lost line.

them, and not to allow Quintus Flaccus to wipe out B.C. 210
the Capuan people. Flaccus said that he had no personal quarrel with the Capuans; his enmity was national, and would be as long as he knew they were so disposed toward the Roman people. For no nation, no people in the world was more hostile to the Roman people. He was keeping them shut up inside the walls for the reason that, if any escaped in some way, they roamed like wild beasts over the country and mangled and slew all that met them. Some had deserted, he said, to Hannibal, others had gone to set Rome on fire. In the half-burned Forum the consul would find traces of the crime of the Capuans. Vesta's temple had been the object of attack, and the eternal fires, and, hidden away in its holy place, the fateful pledge [1] of Roman rule. He did not think it at all safe to give the Capuans permission to enter the walls of Rome. After Flaccus had required the Capuans to take an oath that they would return to Capua on the fifth day after they should receive the senate's answer, Laevinus bade them follow him to Rome. Surrounded by this multitude, while at the same time the Sicilians came out to meet him and followed him into Rome, he bore the appearance of a man grieving for the destruction of two very famous cities, and bringing into the city the vanquished in war to be the accusers of men of the greatest eminence. Nevertheless it was in regard to the state and the provinces that the two consuls first introduced business into the senate.

[1] The Palladium, the sacred image of Athena, said to have been brought from Troy.

u.c. 544

XXVIII. Ibi Laevinus, quo statu Macedonia et Graecia, Aetoli, Acarnanes Locrique essent, quasque 2 ibi res ipse egisset terra marique, exposuit: Philippum inferentem bellum Aetolis in Macedoniam retro ab se conpulsum ad intuma penitus regni abisse, legionemque inde deduci posse; classem satis esse ad 3 arcendum Italia regem. Haec de se deque provincia cui praefuerat consul: tum de provinciis communis relatio fuit. Decrevere patres ut alteri consulum Italia bellumque cum Hannibale provincia esset, alter classem cui T. Otacilius praefuisset Siciliamque provinciam cum L. Cincio praetore obtineret. 4 Exercitus eis duo decreti qui in Etruria Galliaque essent; eae quattuor erant legiones; urbanae duae superioris anni in Etruriam, duae quibus Sulpicius consul praefuisset in Galliam mitterentur. 5 Galliae et legionibus praeesset quem consul cuius 6 Italia provincia esset praefecisset; in Etruriam C. Calpurnius post praeturam prorogato in annum imperio missus. Et Q. Fulvio Capua provincia 7 decreta prorogatumque in annum imperium; exercitus civium sociorumque minui iussus, ut ex duabus legionibus una legio, quinque milia peditum et trecenti equites essent, dimissis qui plurima sti- 8 pendia haberent, et sociorum septem milia peditum et trecenti[1] equites relinquerentur, eadem ratione

[1] trecenti (ccc) P(1) JK: cccc conj. Weissenborn.

---

[1] The Locrians are ad led on account of the capture of their Anticyra: xxvi. 1–3.

XXVIII. There Laevinus explained how matters B.C. 210 stood with Macedonia and Greece, the Aetolians, Acarnanians and Locrians,[1] and what had been his own achievements there by land and sea: that when Philip was on the point of invading Aetolia, he had driven him back into Macedonia, retiring into the very heart of his kingdom: and that the legion could be withdrawn from that country: that the fleet was enough to keep the king away from Italy. So much did the consul report in regard to himself and the province, his late command. Then they both brought up the question of the provinces. The senate decreed that Italy and the war with Hannibal should be the province of one consul, that the other should have the fleet which Titus Otacilius had commanded and Sicily as his province, with Lucius Cincius, the praetor. To the consuls were assigned the two armies which were in Etruria and Gaul: these were four legions. The two city legions of the previous year were to be sent into Etruria: the two which Sulpicius had commanded as consul, into Gaul. Gaul and its legions were to be under the command of the man appointed by the consul whose province was Italy. Into Etruria Gaius Calpurnius was sent after his praetorship, with his command extended for a year. And to Quintus Fulvius Capua was assigned as his province, and his command was extended for a year. A reduction in the army of citizens and allies was ordered, so that out of two legions should be formed one, five thousand infantry and three hundred horsemen, while those who had the largest number of campaigns were discharged, and of the allies there should remain only seven thousand infantry and three hundred horsemen,

c. stipendiorum habita[1] in veteribus militibus di-9 mittendis. Cn. Fulvio consuli superioris anni nec de provincia Apulia nec de exercitu quem habuerat quicquam mutatum; tantum in annum prorogatum imperium est. P. Sulpicius, conlega eius, omnem exercitum praeter socios navalis iussus dimittere est.
10 Item ex Sicilia exercitus cui M. Cornelius praeesset, ubi consul in provinciam venisset, dimitti iussus.
11 L. Cincio praetori ad obtinendam Siciliam Cannenses
12 milites dati. duarum instar legionum. Totidem legiones in Sardiniam P. Manlio Volsoni praetori decretae, quibus L. Cornelius in eadem provincia 13 priore anno praefuerat. Urbanas legiones ita scribere consules iussi ne quem militem facerent qui in exercitu M. Claudii, M. Valerii, Q. Fulvi fuisset, neve eo anno plures quam una et viginti Romanae legiones essent.

XXIX. His senatus consultis perfectis sortiti[2] provincias consules. Sicilia et classis Marcello, Italia cum bello adversus Hannibalem Laevino evenit.
2 Quae sors, velut iterum captis Syracusis, ita exanimavit Siculos, exspectatione sortis in consulum conspectu stantis, ut comploratio eorum flebilesque voces et extemplo oculos hominum converterint et
3 postmodo sermones praebuerint. Circumibant enim

[1] habita P(1) Aldus: inita JK.
[2] sortiti DAJK Aldus: sortirii PR: sortiri CMB: sortiri iussi conj. Weissenborn.

[1] I.e. the army which Laevinus had had the year before in Greece. But in the next year Sulpicius still kept one legion; XXVII. vii. 15.

with the same reckoning of campaigns in discharg- B.C. 210
ing old soldiers. For Gnaeus Fulvius, consul in the previous year, no change was made either in regard to his province of Apulia, or as to the army he had had: his command was merely extended for a year. Publius Sulpicius, his colleague, was bidden to discharge his entire army,[1] except the marines. From Sicily in the same way the army which Marcus Cornelius commanded was ordered to be discharged as soon as the consul should reach the province. In order to hold Sicily the soldiers from Cannae, amounting to about two legions, were given to Lucius Cincius, the praetor. The same number were assigned for Sardinia to Publius Manlius Volso, the praetor—legions which Lucius Cornelius had commanded in the same province the preceding year. As for the city legions, the consuls were ordered to enrol them, with the restriction that they should not enlist any man who had been in the army of Marcus Claudius, Marcus Valerius, or Quintus Fulvius,[2] and that there should not be in that year more than twenty-one Roman legions.

XXIX. After these decrees of the senate were completed, the consuls cast lots for their provinces. Sicily and the fleet fell to Marcellus, Italy with the war against Hannibal to Laevinus. That allotment, just as if Syracuse had again been captured, so badly frightened the Sicilians, who were standing before the eyes of the consuls while awaiting the result, that their lamentation and tearful voices at once attracted the eyes of men and later occasioned remark. For [2] I.e. there were to be no veterans who had been discharged from the armies mentioned above in §§ 6–10, partly under the names of later commanders.

A.U.C. 544

senatorum domos[1] cum veste sordida, adfirmantes se non modo suam quosque[2] patriam, sed totam Siciliam relicturos, si eo Marcellus iterum cum 4 imperio redisset. Nullo suo merito eum ante inplacabilem in se fuisse: quid iratum, quod Romam de se questum venisse Siculos sciat, facturum? Obrui Aetnae ignibus aut mergi freto satius illi
5 insulae esse quam velut dedi noxae inimico. Hae Siculorum querellae domos primum nobilium circumlatae celebrataeque sermonibus, quos partim misericordia Siculorum, partim invidia Marcelli exci-
6 tabat, in senatum etiam pervenerunt. Postulatum a consulibus est ut de permutandis provinciis senatum consulerent. Marcellus, si iam auditi ab senatu Siculi essent, aliam forsitan futuram fuisse sententiam
7 suam dicere: nunc, ne quis timore frenari eos dicere posset,[3] quo minus de eo libere querantur in cuius potestate mox futuri sint, si conlegae nihil intersit,
8 mutare se provinciam paratum esse; deprecari senatus praeiudicium: nam cum extra sortem conlegae optionem dari provinciae inicum fuerit, quanto maiorem iniuriam, immo contumeliam esse, sortem suam ad eum transferri?
9 Ita senatus, cum quid placeret magis ostendisset quam decresset,[4] dimittitur. Inter ipsos consules permutatio provinciarum, rapiente fato Marcellum

[1] domos Weissenborn: om. P(1).
[2] quosque Madvig: quisque P(1)JK Aldus: quemque A[y] Valla, Gronovius.
[3] posset P(1)NJK: possit J. H. Voss.
[4] decresset P: -crevisset P[1]?(1) Conway.

[1] Since a vote of the senate that an exchange of provinces be made would prejudice any subsequent action concerning Marcellus' administration in Sicily.

they went the rounds of the senators' houses in mourning garb, asserting that they would not only leave, each group of them, their native city, but all Sicily, if Marcellus should return again in command. For no fault of theirs he had before been merciless to them; what would he do when angry, knowing that Sicilians had come to Rome to complain about himself? It was better for that island to be overwhelmed by the fires of Aetna or sunk in the strait than to be handed over as it were to a personal foe for punishment. These complaints of the Sicilians, at first circulated in the homes of the nobles, and repeated in conversations inspired partly by pity for the Sicilians, partly by antagonism to Marcellus, even reached the senate. It was demanded of the consuls that they raise in the senate the question of an exchange of provinces. Marcellus said that, if the Sicilians had already been heard by the senate, his opinion would perhaps have been different. As it was, to prevent any one from saying that they were restrained by fear from freely complaining about the man in whose power they would presently be, he was ready, if it was of no consequence to his colleague, to exchange his province. He deprecated, he said, a verdict from the senate in advance;[1] for, granted that it would have been unfair for the choice of a province to be given to his colleague without casting lots, how much greater was the injustice, or rather the insult, if his own allotment should be transferred to that colleague? B.C. 210

Accordingly the senate adjourned, after showing what it favoured, but making no such decree. Between themselves the consuls made an exchange of provinces, for Fate was sweeping Marcellus in the l.c. 10 ad Hannibalem, facta est, ut ex quo primus post 4 adversissimas haud adversae[1] pugnae gloriam ceperat, in eius laudem postremus Romanorum imperatorum, prosperis tum maxime bellicis rebus, caderet.

XXX. Permutatis provinciis Siculi in senatum introducti multa de Hieronis regis fide perpetua erga populum Romanum verba fecerunt, in gratiam
2 publicam avertentes: Hieronymum ac postea Hippocraten atque Epicyden tyrannos cum ob alia, tum propter defectionem ab Romanis ad Hannibalem invisos fuisse sibi. Ob eam causam et Hieronymum a principibus iuventutis prope[2] publico consilio
3 interfectum, et in Epicydis Hippocratisque caedem septuaginta nobilissimorum iuvenum coniurationem factam; quos Marcelli mora destitutos, quia ad praedictum tempus exercitum ad Syracusas non admovisset, indicio facto omnis ab tyrannis inter-
4 fectos. Eam quoque Hippocratis et Epicydis tyrannidem Marcellum excitasse Leontinis crudeliter
5 direptis. Numquam deinde principes Syracusanorum desisse ad Marcellum transire pollicerique se urbem, cum vellet, ei tradituros; sed eum primo vi
6 capere maluisse; dein cum id neque terra neque mari omnia expertus potuisset, auctores traditarum Syracusarum fabrum aerarium Sosim et Moericum

[1] adversissimas haud Madvig: om. $P(1)NJK$, a lost line, variously supplied.
[2] prope z Aldus: pro $P(1)Nxz$: om. M^1A^2JK.

---

[1] At Nola; XXIII. xvi.
[2] As Flaminius and Aemilius Paulus had fallen. The death of Marcellus actually occurred two years later, in his 5th consulship; XXVII. xxvii.
[3] About eighty in number in XXV. xxiii. 6.
[4] Cf. l.c. § 7.

direction of Hannibal. The result was that he who, B.C. 210 after the greatest reverses, had been the first to win from Hannibal the glory of a battle that was not a reverse,[1] added to his opponent's fame, being the last of the Roman commanders to fall,[2] at the very moment of success in the war.

XXX. After the exchange of provinces the Sicilians were introduced into the senate, and spoke at length on the invariable loyalty of King Hiero towards the Roman people, laying that to the credit of the state. As for Hieronymus, and later, Hippocrates and Epicydes, the tyrants, they said they had themselves hated them for other reasons and especially because of their desertion from the Romans to Hannibal. On that account Hieronymus had been slain by the foremost of the young men, almost as if by a verdict of the people. And also to bring about the death of Epicydes and Hippocrates a conspiracy of seventy young men of the highest rank had been formed.[3] These men, they said, had been left in the lurch by the delay of Marcellus, in that he had not brought up his army to Syracuse at the time named in advance, and when an informer appeared, they had all been slain by the tyrants.[4] That tyranny also of Hippocrates and Epicydes had been provoked by Marcellus' cruel plundering of Leontini. After that, they said, leading men among the Syracusans had never ceased going over to Marcellus and promising that, whenever he wished it, they would turn the city over to him; but that at first he had preferred to take it by force; then, when after all his efforts he had proved unable to do so either by land or by sea, he had preferred to have the coppersmith Sosis and the Spaniard Moericus advocating

A.U.C. 544

Hispanum quam principes Syracusanorum habere, totiens id nequiquam ultro offerentis, praeoptasse, quo scilicet iustiore de causa vetustissimos socios populi
7 Romani trucidaret ac diriperet. Si non Hieronymus ad Hannibalem defecisset, sed populus Syracusanus et senatus, si portas Marcello Syracusani publice et non oppressis Syracusanis tyranni eorum Hippocrates et Epicydes clausissent, si Carthaginiensium animis
8 bellum cum populo Romano gessissent, quid ultra quam quod fecerit, nisi ut deleret Syracusas, facere
9 hostiliter Marcellum potuisse? Certe praeter moenia et tecta exhausta urbis et refracta[1] ac spoliata deum delubra, dis ipsis ornamentisque eorum
10 ablatis, nihil relictum Syracusis esse. Bona quoque multis adempta, ita ut ne nudo[2] quidem solo reliquiis[3] direptae fortunae[4] alere sese ac suos possent. Orare se patres conscriptos ut, si nequeant omnia, saltem quae compareant cognoscique possint restitui
11 dominis iubeant. Talia conquestos cum excedere ex templo, ut de postulatis eorum patres consuli
12 possent, Laevinus iussisset, "Maneant immo"[5] inquit Marcellus "ut coram iis respondeam, quando ea condicione pro vobis, patres conscripti, bella

[1] et refracta Sp? Froben 2 : ac refracta P : sacra fracta P^{1}?(1)JK Aldus.
[2] nudo P(3)JK Froben : in nudo Madrig.
[3] reliquiis P (in repeated lines) Froben 2 : reliis Sp : reliquis P (before repetition) (1)JK.
[4] fortunae P (in repeated lines) CSp Froben 2 : nae P^{2}(3)JK.
[5] immo Sp : imo Froben 2 : om. P(1)JK.

---

[1] It was now ager publicus (cf. xvi. 8), to be leased normally from the censors, by exception from a general; XXVII. iii. 1.
[2] The Curia had been duly inaugurated as a templum.

the surrender of Syracuse, rather than the leading B.C. 210 Syracusans, although these volunteered again and again to do so, but to no purpose. His motive, of course, was to have the more reasonable excuse for slaughtering and plundering the oldest allies of the Roman people. If it had been not Hieronymus that went over to Hannibal, but the Syracusan people and senate, if it had been the Syracusans that by an act of the state closed the gates to Marcellus, and not rather their tyrants, Hippocrates and Epicydes, after overpowering the Syracusans, if with the animus of Carthaginians they had waged war against the Roman people, what hostile deed could Marcellus have done beyond what he did do, unless it be to destroy Syracuse? Certainly apart from the city-walls and the emptied houses and the sanctuaries of the gods, broken open and despoiled by removal of the statues of the gods themselves and their adornments, nothing had been left at Syracuse. Their landed property also had been taken away from many,[1] so that they could not support themselves and their families, even on the bare soil, with the help of what was left of their plundered possessions. They implored the conscript fathers, they said, if it was impossible for them to restore everything, to order that at least what was visible and could be identified be returned to the owners. After they had uttered such complaints and Laevinus had ordered them to leave the temple,[2] that the fathers might be able to deliberate in regard to their demands, "No, no," said Marcellus, "let them wait, that I may answer them to their faces, since such are the terms on which we wage war in your behalf, conscript fathers, that we have men vanquished by gerimus ut victos armis accusatores habeamus, duae [1] captae hoc anno urbes, Capua Fulvium reum, Marcellum Syracusae habeant."

A.U.C. 544

XXXI. Reductis in curiam legatis tum consul "Non adeo maiestatis" inquit "populi Romani imperiique huius oblitus sum, patres conscripti, ut, si de meo crimine ambigeretur, consul dicturus
2 causam accusantibus Graecis fuerim. Sed non quid ego fecerim in disquisitionem venit—nam quidquid [2] in hostibus feci ius belli defendit—sed quid isti pati debuerint. Qui si non fuerunt hostes, nihil interest, nunc an vivo Hierone Syracusas violaverim.
3 Sin autem desciverunt a populo Romano, si [3] legatos nostros ferro atque armis petierunt, urbem ac moenia clauserunt, exercituque Carthaginiensium adversus nos tutati sunt, quis passos esse hostilia,
4 cum fecerint, indignatur? Tradentis urbem principes Syracusanorum aversatus sum; Sosim et Moericum Hispanum quibus tantam rem [4] crederem potiores habui. Non estis extremi Syracusanorum,
5 quippe qui aliis humilitatem obiciatis: quis est vestrum qui se mihi portas aperturum, qui armatos milites meos in urbem accepturum promiserit? Odistis et exsecramini eos qui fecerunt, et ne hic [5]

[1] duae $P(1)JK$: duaeque Conway: et duae Ussing.

[2] nam quidquid $P(1)$: quem quidquid Sp Froben 2; the eight following words (in . . sed quid) are omitted in $P(1)$, but preserved by Sp, with a single correction (Rhenanus) in defendit for -dendi.

[3] a populo Romano, si (i.e. a p. Ro. si) Madvig: a p. R. Fabri: portasi P^2: portas $P^2(1)$: om. A^2JK Aldus, Froben.

[4] tantam rem x Aldus, Froben: rem tantam A^2JKx: tantam $P(1)$: Böttcher and Conway place rem after crederem.

[5] hic Aldus, Froben: his $P(1)K$: hiis J.

our arms as accusers, and of the two cities captured B.C. 210
this year Capua has Fulvius as its defendant, Syracuse has Marcellus."

XXXI. When the legates had been led back into the Senate House, the consul said: "Not so forgetful have I been of the majesty of the Roman people and of this authority of mine, conscript fathers, that if it were a question of a charge brought against me, I as consul would have pleaded my case with Greeks as my accusers. But it is not what I have done that is to be inquired into—for whatever I did in the case of enemies is defended by the law of war—but what they deserved to suffer. If they have not been enemies, it makes no difference whether it was recently or in the time of Hiero that I desolated Syracuse.[1] But if they rebelled against the Roman people, if they attacked our ambassadors with sword and arms,[2] closed their city and walls, defended them against us with an army of Carthaginians, who is indignant because they suffered hostile acts, when they have committed them? When leading men among the Syracusans tried to surrender the city, I rejected them; I preferred Sosis and Moericus the Spaniard as the men to whom I should entrust so important a matter. You are not Syracusans of the lowest rank, inasmuch as you reproach others with their humble station. Who is there among you who promised that he would open the gates to me, that he would admit my soldiers under arms into the city? You hate and curse those who did so, and even here

[1] An indirect way of saying, Why did they bring in Hiero? Cf. xxx. 1.

[2] They escaped, though their ship was captured; XXIV. xxxiii. 2.

quidem contumeliis in eos dicendis parcitis; tantum 6 abest ut et ipsi tale quicquam facturi fueritis. Ipsa humilitas eorum, patres conscripti, quam isti obiciunt, maximo argumento est me neminem qui navatam operam rei publicae nostrae vellet aversatum esse.
7 Et antequam obsiderem Syracusas, nunc legatis mittendis, nunc ad conloquium eundo temptavi pacem; et posteaquam neque legatos violandi verecundia erat, nec mihi ipsi congresso ad portas cum principibus responsum dabatur, multis terra marique exhaustis laboribus tandem vi atque armis 8 Syracusas cepi. Quae captis acciderint apud Hannibalem et Carthaginienses victos iustius quam apud 9 victoris populi senatum quererentur. Ego, patres conscripti, Syracusas spoliatas si negaturus essem, numquam spoliis earum urbem Romam exornarem.
Quae autem singulis victor aut ademi aut dedi,
cum belli iure tum ex cuiusque merito satis scio me 10 fecisse. Ea vos rata habeatis, patres conscripti, necne,[1] magis rei publicae interest quam mea.
Quippe mea fides exsoluta est: ad rem publicam pertinet ne acta mea rescindendo alios in posterum 11 segniores duces faciatis. Et quoniam coram et Siculorum et mea verba audistis, patres conscripti, simul templo excedemus, ut me absente liberius

[1] necne x Aldus, Froben: ne P(1)JK.

[1] Legates at the gates are mentioned in XXIV. xxxiii. 4 and XXV. xxiii. 10, but Marcellus is not named. Cf. Plutarch you do not refrain from uttering insults against them. B.C. 210

So far is it from the truth that you also would have done anything of the sort. Their humble rank, conscript fathers, of which those men make a reproach, is itself the strongest proof that I did not turn my back upon any man who wished to serve our state. And before I laid siege to Syracuse, I endeavoured, now by sending embassies, now by going to a conference, to secure peace. And it was not until after they showed no shame in injuring ambassadors, and no answer was given even to myself, when I met with their leading men at the gates,[1] that, having endured many hardships on land and sea, I at last captured Syracuse by force of arms. Of what befell the captured it is more reasonable for them to complain in the presence of Hannibal and the defeated Carthaginians than in the senate of a victorious nation. For myself, conscript fathers, if I had been intending to deny the despoiling of Syracuse, I should never be using its spoils to adorn the city of Rome. But in what I as victor either took from individuals or gave to them, I am quite sure that I acted both according to the law of war and in accordance with each man's desert. Whether you confirm those acts, conscript fathers, or not, concerns the state more than myself. For my duty has been fully discharged: it is to the interest of the state that you do not make other commanders less energetic for the future by annulling my acts. And seeing that you have heard face to face the words of the Sicilians, and mine as well, conscript fathers, we shall leave the temple at the same time, so that in my [1] Marcellus xviii. 2, where he takes part in conferences near a certain tower.

A.U.C. 544

consuli senatus possit." Ita dimissi Siculi,[1] et ipse in Capitolium ad dilectum discessit.

XXXII. Consul alter de postulatis Siculorum ad patres rettulit. Ibi cum diu sententiis certatum esset, et magna pars senatus, principe eius sententiae 2 T. Manlio Torquato, cum tyrannis bellum gerendum fuisse censerent, hostibus et Syracusanorum et populi Romani, et urbem recipi, non capi, et receptam legibus antiquis et libertate stabiliri, non fessam 3 miseranda servitute bello adfligi; inter tyrannorum et ducis Romani certamina praemium victoris in medio positam urbem pulcherrimam ac nobilissimam perisse, horreum atque aerarium quondam populi Romani, cuius munificentia ac donis multis tempestatibus, hoc denique ipso Punico bello adiuta ornataque 4 res publica esset. Si ab inferis existat rex Hiero, fidissimus imperi Romani cultor, quo ore aut Syracusas aut Romam ei ostendi posse, cum, ubi semirutam ac spoliatam patriam respexerit, ingrediens Romam in vestibulo urbis, prope in porta, spolia patriae 5 suae visurus sit?—haec taliaque cum ad invidiam consulis miserationemque Siculorum dicerentur, mi- 6 tius tamen decreverunt patres: acta M.[2] Marcelli quae is gerens bellum victorque egisset rata habenda

[1] dimissi Siculi C: -sis siculi PRJ: -sis -lis M[1]BDAJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] acta M. Weissenborn: ctam P: tam P2: cam M causam A[s]JK: causa M[6] Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] As an ally, after its surrender.

[2] For Hiero's ample gifts see XXII. xxxvii; XXIII. xxi. 5 and xxxviii, 13.

[3] The reference is to the two temples built by Marcellus outside the Porta Capena and adorned by him with spoils of Syracuse; XXVII. xxv. 7 ff. Cf. Vol. VI, p. 494 n. They were still unfinished; cf. xxxi. 9.

absence the senate can deliberate with greater free- B.C. 210 dom." So the Sicilians were dismissed, and he himself withdrew to the Capitol to conduct the levy.

XXXII. The other consul laid the matter of the Sicilians' demands before the fathers. Among them for a long time there was a conflict of opinions, and many senators, with Titus Manlius Torquatus as spokesman for that opinion, thought that they should have gone to war with the tyrants, enemies both of the Syracusans and of the Roman people, and that the city ought to have been taken over,[1] not captured, and once taken over, should have been confirmed in the possession of its former laws and its freedom, not crushed by war when already exhausted by a pitiful slavery. They said that in the conflicts between the tyrants and the Roman commander the most beautiful and famous of cities, set up in the midst as a prize for the victor, had been destroyed, the granary and treasury formerly of the Roman people, for by its generous gifts on many occasions, and last of all in this very Punic war,[2] the republic had been aided and enriched. If King Hiero, most faithful in his devotion to the Roman empire, should rise from the lower world, with what face could they show him either Syracuse or Rome, when after a backward look at his native city, half-ruined and despoiled, upon entering Rome he was to see in the forecourt of the city, almost at the gate, the spoils of his own city?[3] Although these words and others to the same effect were spoken in order to arouse hatred against the consul and pity for the Sicilians, the senate nevertheless adopted a milder decree: that the acts of Marcus Marcellus, during his conduct of the war and as victor, were to be ratified; for the U.C. 44 esse; in relicum curae senatui fore rem Syracusanam, mandaturosque consuli Laevino ut, quod[1] sine iactura rei publicae fieri posset, fortunis eius civitatis 7 consuleret. Missis duobus senatoribus in Capitolium ad consulem, uti rediret in curiam, et introductis 8 Siculis, senatus consultum recitatum est; legatique benigne appellati ac dimissi ad genua se Marcelli consulis proiecerunt obsecrantes[2] ut quae deplorandae ac levandae calamitatis causa dixissent veniam eis daret, et in fidem clientelamque se urbemque Syracusas acciperet. Pollicens hoc[3] consul clementer appellatos eos dimisit.

XXXIII. Campanis deinde senatus datus est, quo- 2 rum oratio miserabilior, causa durior erat. Neque enim meritas poenas negare poterant, nec tyranni erant in quos culpam conferrent;[4] sed satis pensum poenarum tot veneno absumptis, tot securi percussis 3 senatoribus credebant: paucos nobilium superstites esse,[5] quos nec sua conscientia ut quicquam de se gravius consulerent impulerit, nec victoris ira capitis damnaverit; eos libertatem sibi suisque et bonorum aliquam partem orare, cives Romanos, adfinitatibus

[1] ut, quod Alschefski: vi quod P: quod P^2?(1) Gronovius: quoad z.

[2] obsecrantes AJK Aldus, Froben: et obsecrantes P(3): orantes et obsecrantes Weissenborn.

[3] Pollicens hoc Böttcher: potens oc (for sōc or s.c?)P(3): potens senatus consulto Walters: potens sui Alschefski: post haec M^3A^1JK Aldus, Froben.

[4] conferrent P(3) Aldus: deferrent BDANJKz.

[5] superstites esse A^1N^2JK Aldus, Froben: superior esse P: -iores esse P^2(1)A^2N: superesse Alschefski.

future the Syracusan state would be cared for by the B.C. 210
senate, and they would instruct the consul Laevinus to take measures for the property of its citizens, so far as could be done without loss to the republic. Two senators were sent to the consul on the Capitol, that he should return to the Senate House; and after the Sicilians had been brought in, the decree of the senate was read. And the legates, dismissed with kind words, threw themselves down before the knees of Marcellus, the consul, imploring him to pardon what they had said in lamenting and seeking to mitigate their misfortune, and that he would take them and the city of Syracuse under his protection and patronage. Making this promise the consul spoke to them gently and dismissed them.

XXXIII. The Campanians then had their hearing in the senate, and their speech was more pitiful, their case more difficult. For they could not deny that punishment had been deserved, nor were there tyrants on whom they could throw the blame. But they believed that a sufficient penalty had been paid, since so many senators had been carried off by poison, so many executed by beheading; that few of the nobles survived, whom neither their conscience had prompted to do violence to themselves, nor an angry victor had condemned to death. Those were the men who were begging, they said, for freedom for themselves and their families and for some part of their property, being Roman citizens,[1] linked to them in many cases through relations by marriage, and plerosque et propinquis iam[1] cognationibus ex conubio vetusto iunctos.

[1] Cf. § 10. Roman citizenship had been conferred upon the Campanian knights in 339 B.C., and civitas sine suffragio upon all the Campanians soon after; cf. VIII. xi. 16; xiv. 10.

4 Summotis deinde a templo paulisper dubitatum an arcessendus a Capua Q. Fulvius esset—mortuus enim post captam Claudius consul erat—ut[2] coram imperatore qui res gessisset, sicut inter Marcellum 5 Siculosque disceptatum fuerat, disceptaretur. Dein cum M. Atilium, C. Fulvium fratrem Flacci, legatos eius, et Q. Minucium et L. Veturium Philonem, item Claudii legatos, qui omnibus gerendis rebus adfuerant, in senatu viderent nec Fulvium avocari a Capua nec 6 differri Campanos vellent, interrogatus sententiam M. Atilius Regulus, cuius ex iis qui ad Capuam 7 fuerant maxima auctoritas erat. "In consilio" inquit "arbitror me fuisse consulibus, Capua capta cum quaereretur eequi Campanorum bene meritus 8 de re publica nostra esset. Duas mulieres conpertum est, Vestiam Oppiam Atellanam Capuae habitantem et Paculam Cluviam, quae quondam quaestum corpore fecisset, illam cotidie sacrificasse pro salute et victoria populi Romani, hanc captivis egentibus 9 alimenta clam suppeditasse; ceterorum omnium Campanorum eundem erga nos animum quem Carthaginiensium fuisse, securique percussos a Q. Fulvio fuisse[3] magis quorum dignitas inter alios 10 quam quorum culpa eminebat. Per senatum agi de

[1] iam Froben 2 : iamiam $P(1)NJK$ Aldus : etiam Madvig : iam etiam Gronovius.

[2] ut A^sJK Aldus, Froben : om. $P(1)N$.

[3] Fulvio fuisse A^sJK Aldus. Froben : fulvi cisse P : fulvio vicisse $P^2(3)$: Fulvio esse Gronovius.

---

[1] At this time proconsul. For his death cf. xvi. 1.

[2] I.e. former legati before Capua.

now by close blood relations in consequence of their long-established right of intermarriage. B.C. 210

Then after they had been conducted out of the temple, there was for a short time hesitation whether Quintus Fulvius should be summoned from Capua—for Claudius, the consul,[1] had died after the capture of the city—in order that the discussion might go on in the presence of the general who had conducted the campaign, just as it had been carried on between Marcellus and the Sicilians. Then, when they saw Flaccus' lieutenants[2] in the senate, namely his brother Gaius Fulvius and Marcus Atilius, also Claudius' lieutenants, Quintus Minucius and Lucius Veturius Philo, men who had witnessed everything that was done, and they did not wish Fulvius to be recalled from Capua nor the Campanians to be put off, Marcus Atilius Regulus, who had the greatest influence of all the men who had been at Capua, was asked his opinion. "I testify," he said, "that I was one of the advisers to the consuls when, after the capture of Capua, the question was raised whether there was anyone of the Campanians who had deserved well of our republic. It was ascertained that there were two women only, Vestia Oppia, of Atella, domiciled at Capua, and Pacula Cluvia, who had formerly been a harlot; that the former had sacrificed every day for the safety and victory of the Roman people, and the latter had secretly supplied food to needy captives; that all the rest of the Campanians had had the same feelings towards us as had the Carthaginians; and those beheaded by Quintus Fulvius were the men whose rank rather than their guilt was conspicuous among the others. I do not see that it is possible for action to be taken

A.U.C. 544

Campanis, qui cives Romani sunt, iniussu populi non video posse, idque et apud maiores nostros in Satricanis factum esse, cum defecissent, ut M. Antistius tribunus plebis prius rogationem ferret, sciscerentque plebs uti senatui de Satricanis sententiae 11 dicendae ius esset. Itaque censeo cum tribunis plebis agendum esse ut eorum unus pluresve rogationem ferant ad plebem qua nobis statuendi de 12 Campanis ius fiat." L. Atilius tribunus plebis ex auctoritate senatus plebem in haec verba rogavit: "Omnes Campani, Atellani, Calatini, Sabatini, qui se dediderunt in arbitrium dicionemque populi Romani 13 Q. Fulvio proconsuli, quosque una secum dedidere,[1] quaeque una secum dedidere, agrum urbemque, divina humanaque, utensiliaque sive quid aliud dediderunt, de iis rebus quid fieri velitis vos rogo, 14 Quirites." Plebes sic iussit: "Quod senatus iuratus, maxima pars, censeat, qui adsient,[2] id volumus iubemusque."

XXXIV. Ex hoc plebei scito senatus consultus Oppiae Cluviaeque primum bona ac libertatem restituit: si qua alia praemia petere ab senatu vellent,
2 venire eas Romam. Campanis in familias singulas decreta facta, quae non operae pretium est omnia

[1] quosque . . . dedidere P: rejected by Madvig (following z Aldus), while P^1 or P^2 wished to delete the quaeque clause, which (1)JKz omit.

[2] adsient Cobet: adsidens P(1) Aldus, Froben: assidens DJK: adsidet C[4].

[1] Satricum, near Antium and subject to it, revolted to the Samnites in 319 B.C. Livy's account at IX. xvi. 10 does not cover the procedure here mentioned, but tells only of the severity of Papirius Cursor.

[2] All non-citizens, including freedmen and the rest mentioned in xvi. 5.

by the senate in regard to the Campanians, who are B.C. 210 Roman citizens, without the command of the people; and I see that in the time of our ancestors also the procedure in the case of the Satricani, after their revolt, was that Marcus Antistius, tribune of the plebs, first introduced a bill, and the plebs voted that the senate should have the right to pronounce judgment upon the men of Satricum.[1] Accordingly I think that we must persuade the tribunes of the plebs that one or more of them should propose to the plebs a bill by which we should be given the right to decide in regard to the Campanians." Lucius Atilius, tribune of the plebs, by authority of the senate brought before the plebs a bill in these terms: "All the Capuans, Atellani, Calatini, Sabatini, who under Quintus Fulvius, the proconsul, surrendered themselves to the will and authority of the Roman people, and the men[2] whom they have surrendered along with themselves, and the possessions which they have surrendered along with themselves, the land and the city, property of gods and property of men, and implements or anything else that they have surrendered—concerning those matters, Quirites, I ask you what you wish to be done." The plebs ordered as follows: "What the senate under oath, a majority of those present, shall decree, that is our wish and command."

XXXIV. In accordance with this plebiscite the senate, on being consulted, restored to Oppia and Cluvia first their property and their freedom: if they wished to request other compensations from the senate, it ordered them to come to Rome. For the Capuans, family by family,[3] decrees were passed,

[3] For he is speaking of the aristocracy.

A.U.C. 544

3 enumerare: aliorum bona publicanda, ipsos liberosque eorum et coniuges vendendas, extra filias quae enupsissent priusquam in populi Romani potestatem
4 venirent; alios in vincula condendos, ac de iis posterius consulendum; aliorum Campanorum summam [1] etiam census distinxerunt publicanda necne
5 bona essent. Pecua captiva praeter equos et mancipia praeter puberes virilis sexus [2] et omnia quae solo non continerentur restituenda censuerunt
6 dominis. Campanos omnis, Atellanos, Calatinos, Sabatinos, extraquam qui eorum aut ipsi aut parentes
7 eorum apud hostis essent, liberos esse iusserunt, ita ut nemo eorum civis Romanus aut Latini nominis esset, neve quis eorum qui Capuae fuisset, dum portae clausae essent, in urbe agrove Campano intra certam diem maneret; locus ubi habitarent trans Tiberim qui non contingeret Tiberim daretur;
8 qui nec Capuae nec in urbe Campana quae a populo Romano defecisset per bellum fuissent, eos cis Lirim
9 amnem Romam versus, qui ad Romanos transissent, priusquam Capuam Hannibal veniret, cis Volturnum emovendos censuerunt, ne quis eorum propius mare quindecim milibus passuum agrum aedificiumve
10 haberet. Qui eorum trans Tiberim emoti essent, ne ipsi posterive eorum uspiam pararent haberentve

[1] summam $P(1)JKM^{1\frac{1}{2}}$: summa M^2 Duker.
[2] virilis sexus CM^2AJK Aldus, Froben: viriles sexus $P(3)$: virile secus Jac. Gronovius.

---

[1] This class of persons retained their freedom and part of their property.
[2] I.e. in the Carthaginian army.
[3] In the interior of Etruria; § 10.

which it is not worth while to recount in full. The property of some of them was to be confiscated, themselves and their children and wives sold, except the daughters who, before they became subject to the authority of the Roman people, had married into other communities. Others were to be put in chains and action concerning them considered later. In the case of other Capuans they graded their census rating also, to determine whether their property should be confiscated or not.[1] As for captured cattle, except horses, they decreed that they be restored to their owners, and slaves, except adult males, also everything which was not attached to the soil. All Capuans, Atellani, Calatini, Sabatini, except such of them as had been with the enemy,[2] either themselves or their fathers, were to be free men, it was ordered, with the reservation that no one of them should be a Roman citizen or reckoned a Latin, and that no one of them who had been at Capua while the gates were closed should remain in the city or in the territory of Capua beyond a certain date: that a region across the Tiber, but not touching the Tiber, be given them as a dwelling-place.[3] As for those who during the war had not been in Capua nor in a Campanian city which had revolted from the Roman people, it was voted that these should be removed this side of the Liris river in the direction of Rome; and that those who had come over to the Romans before Hannibal came to Capua should be removed this side of the Volturnus, no one of them to have land or building nearer the sea than fifteen miles.[4] Of those removed across the Tiber, neither the men themselves nor their descendants were to acquire or B.C. 210

[4] Thus they were to be cut off from maritime commerce.

A.U.C. 544

nisi in Veiente,[1] Sutrino Nepesinove agro, dum ne cui maior quam quinquaginta iugerum agri modus 11 esset. Senatorum omnium quique magistratus Capuae, Atellae, Calatiae gessissent bona venire Capuae iusserunt; libera corpora quae venum dari placuerat 12 Romam mitti ac Romae venire. Signa, statuas aeneas quae capta de hostibus dicerentur, quae eorum sacra ac profana essent ad pontificum collegium reiecerunt. Ob haec decreta maestiores aliquanto quam Romam venerant Campanos dimiserunt. Nec iam Q. Fulvii saevitiam in sese, sed iniquitatem deum atque exsecrabilem fortunam suam incusabant.

XXXV. Dimissis Siculis Campanisque dilectus habitus. Scripto deinde exercitu de remigum supple-
2 mento agi coeptum: in quam rem cum neque hominum satis, nec ex qua pararentur stipendiumque acciperent pecuniae quicquam ea tempestate in
3 publico esset, edixerunt consules ut privati [2] ex censu ordinibusque, sicut antea, remiges darent cum
4 stipendio cibariisque dierum triginta. Ad id edictum tantus fremitus hominum, tanta indignatio fuit ut magis dux quam materia seditioni deesset: secundum Siculos Campanosque plebem Romanam perdendam
5 lacerandamque sibi consules sumpsisse. Per tot annos tributo exhaustos nihil reliqui praeter terram

[1] Veiente. $A^{z}N^{2}JK$; Aldus, Froben add aut.
[2] privati Froben 1: privatim $P(1)JK$ Aldus, Conway: privato z.

---

[1] In 214 B.C.: XXIV. xi. 7 f.

hold anywhere except in the districts of Veii, Sutrium B.C. 210
or Nepete, with the provision that no one was to have a larger amount of land then fifty iugera. The property of all senators and of those who had held office at Capua, Atella, Calatia they ordered to be sold at Capua; that the free persons who, it had been voted, should be offered for sale be sent to Rome and sold at Rome. Images, statues of bronze, which were said to have been captured from the enemy, they referred to the college of pontiffs, to decided which of them were sacred and which profane. In view of these decrees the Campanians were much sadder when dismissed than when they had come to Rome. And no longer did they lay the blame upon the harshness of Quintus Fulvius towards them, but upon the partiality of the gods and their accursed fortune.

XXXV. The Sicilians and Campanians having been sent away, a levy was held. Then when an army had been enrolled, they began to take up the question of recruiting more oarsmen. For this purpose, inasmuch as there was neither a sufficient supply of men, nor any money at that time in the treasury out of which they might be procured and receive their pay, the consuls in an edict ordered that private citizens according to their census and classes, as before,[1] should furnish oarsmen, with pay and rations for thirty days. In response to that edict there was such protest among the people, such indignation, that what was lacking for an uprising was a leader rather than fuel. Next after the Sicilians and Campanians the consuls, they said, had taken upon themselves the task of ruining and mangling the Roman populace. Exhausted by tribute for so many years, they had nothing left nudam ac vastam habere. Tecta hostis incendisse, servos agri cultores rem publicam abduxisse, nunc ad militiam parvo aere emendo, nunc remiges

A.U.C. 544

6 imperando; si quid cui argenti aerisve fuerit, stipendio remigum et tributis annuis ablatum. Se ut dent quod non habeant nulla vi, nullo imperio cogi posse. Bona sua venderent; in corpora quae reliqua essent saevirent; ne unde redimantur quidem
7 quicquam superesse. Haec non in occulto, sed propalam in foro atque oculis ipsorum consulum
8 ingens turba circumfusi fremebant; nec eos sedare consules nunc castigando, nunc consolando poterant. Spatium deinde iis tridui se dare ad cogitandum dixerunt; quo ipsi ad rem inspiciendam et expe-
9 diendam[1] usi sunt. Senatum postero die habuerunt de remigum supplemento; ubi cum multa disseruissent cur aequa plebis recusatio esset, verterunt orationem eo ut dicerent privatis id seu aequum seu
10 iniquum onus iniungendum esse; nam unde, cum pecunia in aerario non esset, paraturos navalis socios? Quo modo autem sine classibus aut Siciliam obtineri aut Italia Philippum arceri posse aut tuta Italiae litora esse?

XXXVI. Cum in hac difficultate rerum consilium haereret, ac prope torpor quidam occupasset homi-
2 num mentes, tum Laevinus consul: magistratus

[1] et expediendam Alschefski: -damque K Aldus, Froben: -dam P(1)J.

---

[1] For the emergency tax (direct) cf. XXIII. xxxi. 1 and xlviii. 8. Normally citizens were exempt from this tributum. It was regarded as a forced loan, to be repaid later, e.g. after a triumph in 187 B.C.; XXXIX. vii. 5.

but the land, bare and desolate. Their houses had B.C. 210 been burned by the enemy, the slaves who tilled the soil had been taken away by the state, now by purchase at a low price for military service, now by impressing them as oarsmen. If a man had any money in silver or bronze, it had been taken away for the pay of oarsmen and the yearly taxes.[1] As for themselves, they could not be compelled by any force, by any authority, to give what they did not have. Let their property be sold, let their bodies —all that remained—be harshly treated; not even for the purposes of a ransom was anything left to them. Such were the complaints of a great multitude, not in secret, but openly in the Forum and even before the eyes of the consuls, as they flocked about them. And the consuls, now upbraiding, now consoling, were unable to quiet them. Thereupon they said that they gave the people three days for reflection, a time which they themselves employed in looking into the matter and seeking a solution. The following day they held a session of the senate on the recruiting of more oarsmen. There, after setting forth many reasons why refusal on the part of the populace was fair, they so far altered their language as to say that the burden, whether fair or unfair, must be laid upon private citizens. For from what source were they to get crews, when there was no money in the treasury? And without fleets how could either Sicily be held, or Philip kept away from Italy, or the coasts of Italy be safe?

XXXVI. When in this difficult situation wisdom faltered, and a kind of lethargy had almost taken possession of men's minds, Laevinus, the consul, said that, as magistrates are superior to the senate in senatui et senatum populo, sicut honore praestent,[1] ita ad omnia quae dura atque aspera essent subeunda

A.U.C. 544

3 duces[2] debere esse. "Si, quod[3] iniungere inferiori velis, id prius in te ac tuos[4] ipse iuris statueris, facilius omnis oboedientis habeas. Nec impensa gravis est, cum ex ea[5] plus quam pro virili parte sibi quemque
4 capere principum vident. Itaque classes si[6] habere atque ornare volumus populum Romanum, privatos sine recusatione remiges dare, nobismet ipsis pri-
5 mum imperemus. Aurum, argentum, aes[7] signatum omne senatores crastino die in publicum conferamus, ita ut anulos sibi quisque et coniugi et liberis, et filio bullam, et quibus uxor filiaeve sunt singulas
6 uncias pondo auri relinquant; argenti qui curuli sella sederunt equi ornamenta et libras pondo, ut salinum patellamque deorum causa habere possint;
7 ceteri senatores libram argenti tantum; aeris signati quina milia in singulos patres familiae re-
8 linquamus: ceterum omne aurum, argentum, aes signatum ad triumviros mensarios extemplo deferamus nullo ante senatus consulto facto, ut voluntaria conlatio et certamen adiuvandae rei publicae excitet ad aemulandum animos primum equestris
9 ordinis, dein reliquae plebis. Hanc unam viam

[1] praestent P(3): praestet A[1]JK Aldus, Froben, Conway: praestitit MBD.

[2] duces Crévier: ducem P(1)JK Aldus, Froben.

[3] quod Madvig: quid P(3)R[1]JK Aldus, Froben.

[4] tuos, here a second si is added in A[1]JK Aldus, Froben; not in P(1) or Madvig.

[5] ex ea z Madvig: ea P(1)z: eam A[1]JK.

[6] classes si Alschefski: si classes Madvig: classes P(1)JK: ut classem Aldus, Froben.

[7] aes z (cf. § 8): om. P(1)JK.

dignity, and as the senate is superior to the people, so ought they to be leaders in shouldering all that was hard and drastic. "If there is a duty which you wish to lay upon an inferior, and you first set up the same obligation as against yourself and your family, you more readily find everyone submitting. And the outlay is not burdensome, when they see every prominent man taking upon himself more than his share in it. Accordingly, if we wish the Roman people to have fleets and equip them, and private citizens to furnish oarsmen without protest, let us first impose that upon ourselves. Gold, silver, coined bronze, let us senators bring it all into the treasury tomorrow, with the reservation that each is to leave a ring for himself and for his wife and his children, and a bulla for a son, and those who have a wife or daughters may leave for each an ounce of gold by weight. Of silver those who have occupied curule chairs may leave horse-trappings [1] and one pound each, so that they may keep a salt-cellar and a saucer for offerings to the gods. The rest of the senators may leave only a pound of silver. Of coined bronze let us leave five thousand asses to each paterfamilias. All the rest of the gold, silver, coined bronze let us forthwith deposit with the bank commissioners,[2] without first making any decree of the senate, so that a voluntary contribution and competition in helping the republic may stir up to rivalry, first the spirit of the knightly order, and then of the plebeians as well. This is the one way we consuls B.C. 210

[1] I.e. phalerae, disks or medallions, a distinction here reserved for a small number of the senators; cf. XXII. lii. 5; XXX. xvii. 13.

[2] Cf. XXIV. xviii. 12; XXIII. xxi. 6.

A.U.C. 544

multa inter nos conlocuti consules invenimus; ingredimini dis bene iuvantibus. Res publica incolumis et privatas res facile salvas praestat; publica prodendo tua nequiquam serves."

10 In haec tanto animo consensum est ut gratiae
11 ultro consulibus agerentur. Senatu inde misso pro se quisque aurum et [1] argentum et aes in publicum conferunt, tanto certamine iniecto ut prima aut [2] inter primos nomina sua vellent in publicis tabulis esse, ut nec triumviri accipiundo nec scribae refe-
12 rundo sufficerent. Hunc consensum senatus equester ordo est secutus, equestris ordinis plebs. Ita sine edicto, sine coercitione magistratus nec remige in supplementum nec stipendio res publica eguit; paratisque omnibus ad bellum consules in provincias profecti sunt.

XXXVII. Neque aliud [3] tempus belli fuit quo Carthaginienses Romanique pariter variis casibus immixti [4] magis in ancipiti spe ac metu fuerint.
2 Nam Romanis et in provinciis, hinc in Hispania adversae res, hinc prosperae in Sicilia luctum et
3 laetitiam miscuerant: et in Italia cum Tarentum amissum damno et dolori, tum arx cum praesidio
4 retenta praeter spem gaudio fuit; et terrorem subitum pavoremque urbis Romae obsessae et oppugnatae Capua post dies paucos capta in laetitiam
5 vertit. Transmarinae quoque res quadam vice

[1] et C: om. P(3)JK Aldus, Froben.
[2] aut Madvig: ut P: *om. P*²(1)JK Aldus, Froben.
[3] aliud Kx Perizonius: aliud magis P(1)J Aldus, Froben.
[4] immixti *MA*²*JKz Madvig*: immixtis P(3)*M*¹ Aldus, Weissenborn.

[1] For the ultimate repayment of all these voluntary loans cf. XXIX. xvi. 1–3; XXXI. xiii. 2 ff.

have found, after conferring together at length; B.C. 210 enter upon it with the kind aid of the gods! The commonwealth, if preserved, easily assures the preservation of private wealth also. In betraying what belongs to the commonwealth one tries in vain to save one's own possessions."

To these words agreement was so spirited that they actually thanked the consuls. The senate then adjourned, and each man brought his own gold and silver and bronze into the treasury, while such rivalry was aroused to have their names the first or among the first men on the public records, that neither were the commissioners equal to the task of receiving nor the clerks to that of making the entries. The knightly order followed this unanimity of the senate, the populace that of the knights.[1] Thus without an edict, without constraint on the part of the magistrates, the state lacked neither oarsmen to fill the complement nor their pay. And every preparation for war being complete, the consuls set out for their provinces.

XXXVII. And there was no other time in the war when Carthaginians and Romans, equally involved in changing fortunes, were in a more uncertain state of hope and fear. That is, for the Romans, in the provinces, defeat in Spain on the one hand, success in Sicily on the other, had mingled sorrow and rejoicing; so also in Italy the capture of Tarentum brought loss and grief, while the retention of the citadel and garrison contrary to expectation brought joy. And the sudden alarm and panic when the city of Rome was beset and attacked was turned into gladness by the taking of Capua a few days later. Overseas also were events balanced with a certain alternation:

u.c. 544 pensatae: Philippus hostis tempore haud satis opportuno factus. Aetoli novi adsciti socii Attalusque Asiae rex, iam velut[1] despondente fortuna Romanis 6 imperium orientis. Carthaginienses quoque Capuae amissae Tarentum captum aequabant, et ut ad moenia urbis Romanae nullo prohibente se pervenisse in gloria ponebant, ita pigebat inriti incepti, pudebat- 7 que adeo se spretos ut sedentibus ipsis ad Romana moenia alia porta exercitus Romanus in Hispaniam 8 duceretur. Ipsae quoque Hispaniae quo propius spem venerant tantis duobus ducibus exercitibusque caesis debellatum ibi ac pulsos inde Romanos esse, eo plus ab L. Marcio, tumultuario duce, ad vanum et inritum victoriam redactam esse indignationis 9 praebebant. Ita aequante fortuna suspensa omnia utrisque[2] erant, integra spe, integro metu, velut illo tempore primum bellum inciperent.

XXXVIII. Hannibalem ante omnia angebat quod Capua pertinacius oppugnata ab Romanis quam defensa ab se multorum Italiae populorum animos aver- 2 terat, quos neque omnis tenere praesidiis, nisi vellet in multas parvasque partis carpere exercitum, quod minime tum expediebat, poterat, nec deductis praesidiis spei liberam vel obnoxiam timori sociorum relin- 3 quere fidem. Praeceps in avaritiam et crudelitatem

[1] velut AJK Froben 1 : vel P(3) Aldus; om. M.
[2] utrisque M^{7} : utriusque P(1) : utrinque $A^{2}JK$ Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] But this rhetorical balance does not do justice to Hannibal's sense of what he had lost in the fall of Capua. Cf. xxxviii. 1.
[2] I.e. that they might gain the favour of the winning side.

Philip's turning enemy at an inopportune moment, B.C. 210
the addition of the Aetolians and Attalus, King of Asia, as new allies, just as if fortune were now pledging to the Romans rule over the East. The Carthaginians likewise balanced the capture of Tarentum against the loss of Capua;[1] and although they made it their boast that they had reached the walls of the city of Rome with no one preventing, yet they were annoyed at the failure of their undertaking and ashamed to find themselves so scorned that, while they were sitting before the walls of Rome, out of another gate marched a Roman army bound for Spain. As for their Spanish provinces, the nearer they had come to the hope that, after the slaughter of two great commanders and armies, the war there was over and the Romans driven out, the more indignation did those very provinces arouse that the victory had been rendered null and void by Lucius Marcius, an emergency commander. Thus with Fortune maintaining the balance, there was general suspense for both sides, hope remaining unchanged, fear unchanged, as though they were then for the first time beginning the war.

XXXVIII. Hannibal was above all else distressed that Capua, besieged with more persistence by the Romans than it was defended by himself, had estranged from him many peoples in Italy, not all of whom could he hold by garrisons, unless he were willing to parcel out his army in many small detachments, which was not at all to his advantage at that time. Nor on the other hand could he by withdrawing his garrisons leave the loyalty of allies free to hope[2] or exposed to fear. Naturally inclined to greed and cruelty, his temperament favoured despoiling what

u.c. animus ad spolianda quae tueri nequibat, ut vastata
544 4 hosti relinquerentur, inclinavit. Id foedum consilium cum incepto, tum etiam exitu fuit. Neque enim indigna patientium modo abalienabantur animi, sed ceterorum etiam; quippe ad pluris exemplum quam 5 perpessio malorum[1] pertinebat. Nec consul Romanus temptandis urbibus, sicunde spes aliqua se ostendisset, deerat.

6 Salapiae principes erant Dasius et Blattius; Dasius Hannibali amicus, Blattius quantum ex tuto poterat rem Romanam fovebat et per occultos nuntios spem proditionis fecerat Marcello; sed sine 7 adiutore Dasio res transigi non poterat. Multum ac diu cunctatus, et tum quoque magis inopia consilii potioris quam spe effectus, Dasium appellat;[2] at ille, cum ab re aversus, tum aemulo potentatus 8 inimicus, rem Hannibali aperit. Arcessito utroque Hannibal cum pro tribunali quaedam ageret mox de Blattio cogniturus, starentque summoto populo accusator et reus, Blattius de proditione Dasium 9 appellat.[3] Enimvero ille, velut in manifesta re, exclamat sub oculis Hannibalis secum de proditione agi. Hannibali atque eis qui aderant quo audacior 10 res erat, minus similis veri visa est: aemulationem profecto atque odium esse, et id crimen adferri

[1] perpessio malorum conj. Conway, a lost line: om. P(1), K omitting quam also: calamitas Aldus, Froben, Madvig: pestis Harant: pernicies Weissenborn.

[2] appellat Madvig: -abat P(1)JK Aldus, Conway.

[3] appellat Madvig, Emend., Conway: -abat P(1)JK Aldus, Madvig.

---

[1] Between Arpi and Cannae, on a lake close to the Adriatic. Hannibal had once wintered there; XXIV. xx. 15; xlvii. 9. Cf. XXVII. i. 1 and xxviii. 5 ff. Later Sal(a)pia was removed

he was unable to protect, in order to leave desolated B.C. 210 lands to the enemy. That policy was shameful in the beginning, and especially so in the outcome. For not only were those who suffered undeserved treatment alienated, but all the rest as well; for the lesson reached larger numbers than did the suffering. Nor did the Roman consul fail to work upon the feelings of cities, if any hope had showed itself from any quarter.

At Salapia[1] Dasius and Blattius were leading citizens. Dasius was friendly to Hannibal, Blattius promoted the Roman cause so far as he safely could, and through secret messengers had roused in Marcellus a hope of betrayal. But without the aid of Dasius the matter could not be carried out. After much hesitation for a long time, and even then rather owing to the lack of a better plan than with the hope of success, he addressed himself to Dasius. But Dasius, being not only averse to the project, but also unfriendly to one who was his rival for the highest position, disclosed the matter to Hannibal. When both had been summoned, and Hannibal on the tribune was occupied with certain business, intending presently to hear the case of Blattius, and accuser and defendant were standing there, while the crowd had been cleared away, Blattius addressed himself to Dasius on the treason. Dasius, to be sure, as though the evidence was clear, cried out that before Hannibal's eyes he was being urged to turn traitor. To Hannibal and his assessors the matter seemed less credible as being so bold. It was only their rivalry and hatred surely, they said, and the charge to a healthier situation and by cutting a canal became a seaport; Vitruvius I. iv. 12; Strabo VI. iii. 9.

quod, quia testem habere non posset,[1] liberius fingenti 11 esset. Ita [2] inde dimissi sunt. Nec Blattius ante abstitit tam audaci incepto quam idem obtundendo, docendoque quam ea res ipsis patriaeque salutaris esset, pervicit ut praesidium Punicum—quingenti [3] autem Numidae erant—Salapiaque traderetur Mar-12 cello. Nec sine caede multa tradi potuit. Longe fortissimi equitum toto Punico exercitu erant.
Itaque quamquam inprovisa res fuit, nec usus equorum in urbe erat, tamen armis inter tumultum 13 captis et eruptionem temptaverunt et, cum evadere nequirent, pugnantes ad ultumum occubuerunt, nec plus quinquaginta ex his [4] in potestatem hostium 14 vivi venerunt. Plusque aliquanto damni haec ala equitum amissa Hannibali quam Salapia fuit;
nec deinde umquam Poenus, quo longe plurimum valuerat, equitatu superior fuit.

XXXIX. Per idem tempus cum in arce Tarentina vix inopia tolerabilis esset, spem omnem praesidium quod ibi erat Romanum praefectusque praesidii atque arcis M. Livius in commeatibus ab Sicilia missis habe-2 bant, qui ut tuto praeterveherentur oram Italiae, 3 classis viginti ferme navium Regii stabat. Praerat classi commeatibusque D. Quinctius, obscuro genere ortus, ceterum multis fortibus factis militari gloria 4 inlustris. Primo quinque naves, quarum maximae

[1] posset $P(1)JK$ Aldus: possit Madvig.
[2] esset. Ita A^1JKx Conway: sitia P: (-ti)s ita or (-ti) ita $P^2(1)$.
[3] quingenti (=D) Sigonius from Valerius Max. III. viii. Ext. 1: om. $P(1)$: hii A^2J: hi Aldus, Froben: ii K.
[4] his $P(1)$ Aldus, Froben: hiis J: iis K.

[1] It had been his for six years.

brought was of a sort in which the fabricator had the B.C. 210 more freedom because it could not have a witness. So they were discharged. And Blattius did not desist from so bold an undertaking until by dinning the same story into his ears, and by showing how advantageous for themselves and their native city it was, he prevailed upon Dasius to have the Carthaginian garrison—now it consisted of five hundred Numidians—and Salapia surrendered to Marcellus. And it was not without much bloodshed that it could be surrendered. They were far the bravest horsemen in the entire Carthaginian army. Accordingly, although the attack was unexpected, and they had no use of their horses in the city, nevertheless catching up their arms in the midst of the uproar, they attempted a sally, and being unable to escape, they fell fighting to the last, and not more than fifty of them came alive into the hands of the enemy. The loss of this regiment of cavalry was considerably more serious for Hannibal than that of Salapia.[1] And at no later time was the Carthaginian superior in cavalry, in which had been easily his greatest strength.

XXXIX. About the same time, when in the citadel of Tarentum scarcity was barely endurable, the Roman garrison posted there and Marcus Livius, the commander of the garrison and citadel, had all their hopes in supplies sent from Sicily; and that these might safely pass along the coast of Italy, a fleet of about twenty ships lay at anchor at Regium. Commanding the fleet and in charge of supplies was Decimus Quinctius, a man of unknown family, but made famous as a soldier by many brave deeds. At first only five ships, of which the largest were two duae triremes, a Marcello ei traditae erant;[1] postea rem impigre saepe gerenti tres additae quinqueremes; postremo ipse a sociis Reginisque et a Velia et a Paesto debitas ex foedere exigendo, classem viginti navium, sicut ante dictum est, efficit. Huic ab Regio profectae classi Democrates cum pari navium Tarentinarum numero quindecim milia ferme ab urbe ad Sapriportem obvius fuit. Velis tum forte inprovidus futuri certaminis Romanus veniebat; sed circa Crotonem Sybarimque suppleverat remigio navis, instructamque et armatam egregie pro magnitudine navium classem habebat. Et tum forte sub idem[2] tempus et venti vis omnis cecidit et hostes in conspectu fuere, ut ad componenda armamenta expediendumque remigem ac militem ad imminens certamen satis temporis esset. Raro alias tantis animis iustae concurrerunt classes, quippe cum in maioris discrimen rei quam ipsae erant pugnarent, Tarentini, ut recuperata urbe ab Romanis post centesimum prope annum, arcem etiam liberarent, spe commeatus quoque hostibus, si navali proelio possessionem maris ademissent, interclusuros,[3] Romani, ut retenta possessione arcis ostenderent non vi ac virtute, sed proditione ac furto Tarentum amissum.

U.C. 544

Itaque ex utraque parte signo dato cum rostris

[1] erant P(1)JK Aldus, Froben, but all add habuit.

[2] idem, AJK Aldus, Froben add fere.

[3] spe . . . interclusuros P(3): spem . . . interclusuri A[s]JK Aldus, Froben.

[1] A Latin colony of 273 B.C., but a great part of its population were Greeks; still famous for its Doric temples.

[2] Its site has not been discovered.

[3] I.e. Thurii. Only here does Livy use the older name.

triremes, had been assigned to him by Marcellus. B.C. 210
Later, as he repeatedly showed energy, three quinqueremes were added. Finally by personally demanding from the allies and from Regium and Velia and Paestum [1] the ships due under the treaty, he formed a fleet of twenty ships, as has been said above. This fleet had sailed from Regium, when Democrates with an equal number of Tarentine ships met it off Sapriportis,[2] about fifteen miles from the city. At that time the Roman, as it happened, was approaching under sail, not foreseeing an impending battle. But in the neighbourhood of Croton and Sybaris [3] he had fully manned the ships with oarsmen, and had a fleet remarkably equipped and armed considering the size of the ships. And it happened then that about the same time the wind dropped entirely and the enemy came in sight, with the result that time enough was left to take down the rigging [4] and to get the oarsmen and soldiers ready for the battle that was imminent. Seldom have regular fleets ever clashed with such spirit, since they were fighting for a greater issue than themselves. The Tarentines, having regained their city from the Romans after almost a hundred years,[5] fought to free the citadel as well, in the hope that they would cut off the enemy's supplies also, if by a naval battle they should deprive them of their command of the sea; the Romans, in order to show by keeping their hold upon the citadel that Tarentum had been lost, not by force and courage, but by treachery and a surprise.

Accordingly after the signal had been given on [4] Cf. XXI. xlix. 11.

[5] In reality only 62 years since its capture by the Romans, 272 B.C.

A.U.C. 544

concurrissent neque retro navem inhiberent nec dirimi ab se hostem paterentur, quam quis indeptus navem erat ferrea iniecta manu, ita conserebant ex propinquo pugnam ut non missilibus tantum, sed gladiis etiam prope conlato pede gereretur res. 13 Prorae inter se iunctae haerebant, puppes alieno remigio circumagebantur. Ita in arto stipatae erant naves ut vix ullum telum in mari[1] vanum intercideret; frontibus velut pedestris[2] acies urge- 14 bant, perviaeque naves pugnantibus erant. Insignis tamen inter ceteras pugna fuit duarum quae primae 15 agminum concurrerant inter se. In Romana nave ipse Quinctius erat, in Tarentina Nico, cui Perconi fuit cognomen, non publico modo sed privato etiam odio invisus atque infestus Romanis, quod eius factionis erat quae Tarentum Hannibali prodiderat. 16 Hic Quinctium simul pugnantem hortantemque suos incautum hasta transfigit. Ille ut[3] praeceps cum 17 armis procidit ante proram, victor Tarentinus in turbatam duce amisso navem inpigre transgressus cum summovisset hostis, et prora iam Tarentinorum esset, puppim male conglobati tuerentur Romani, repente et alia a puppe triremis hostium apparuit; 18 ita in medio circumventa Romana navis capitur.

[1] mari P(1) Aldus, Froben: mare JK Forchhammer.
[2] pedestris P(1)JK Aldus, Conway: pedestres Fabri, Madvig.
[3] Ille ut A[1]JK Conway: ille atque P(1) Aldus, Froben: atque ille Ruperti, Madvig.

---

[1] The grappling-hook was attached to a stout chain. Cf. the harpagones (poles, each carrying an iron hook) similarly used in XXX. x. 16. Cf. XXXVI. xliv. 8; Frontinus Strat. II. iii. 24; Caesar B.C. I. lvii. 2; Pliny N.H. VII. 209.

both sides, and they had encountered each other B.C. 210 with their beaks and did not reverse their motion with oars nor allow the enemy to cast loose from them, a commander closing in on a ship would throw grappling-irons [1] on it, and they engaged in a battle at such close quarters that they fought not only with missiles, but also with swords, almost man to man. The bows in contact could not detach themselves, the sterns were swung about by the efforts of the enemy's oarsmen. So closely massed together were the ships that hardly a missile fell without effect between them into the sea. Forming each a front, like a battle-line on land, they tried to push each other back, and the ships were a highway for the combatants. Conspicuous, however, among all the rest was the battle between the two ships which had encountered each other at the head of the columns. On the Roman ship was Quinctius himself, on the Tarentine was Nico, surnamed Perco, who hated the Romans and was hated by them with a hatred that was not only national but also personal, because he was of the party which had betrayed Tarentum to Hannibal. As Quinctius was fighting and at the same time encouraging his men, Nico ran him through with a spear while off his guard. When Quinctius with his weapons fell forward over the bow, the victorious Tarentine boldly crossed over on to the ship thrown into confusion by the loss of its commander; and when he had driven the enemy back, and the bow was now in the hands of the Tarentines, while the Romans, massed together, were vainly defending the stern, suddenly another trireme of the enemy also appeared astern. Thus the Roman ship was caught between them and captured. Con-

A.U.C. 544

Hinc ceteris terror iniectus, ubi [1] praetoriam navem captam videre; fugientesque passim aliae in alto mersae, aliae in terram remis abreptae mox praedae 19 fuere Thurinis Metapontinisque. Ex onerariis, quae cum commeatu sequebantur, perpaucae in potestatem hostium venere; aliae ad incertos ventos hinc atque illinc obliqua transferentes vela in altum evectae sunt.
20 Nequaquam pari fortuna per eos dies Tarenti res gesta. Nam ad quattuor milia hominum frumenta-
21 tum egressa cum in agris passim vagarentur, Livius, qui arci praesidioque Romano praeerat, intentus in omnis occasiones gerendae rei, C. Persium, inpigrum virum, cum duobus milibus et quingentis [2]
22 armatorum ex arce emisit, qui vage effusos per agros palatosque adortus cum diu passim cecidisset, paucos ex multis, trepida fuga incidentis semiapertis portarum foribus, in urbem compulit, neque multum
23 afuit quin [3] urbs eodem impetu caperetur. Ita aequatae res ad Tarentum, Romanis victoribus terra, Tarentinis [4] mari. Frumenti spes, quae in oculis fuerat, utrosque frustrata pariter.

XL. Per idem tempus Laevinus consul, iam magna parte anni circumacta, in Siciliam veteribus novisque sociis exspectatus cum venisset, primum ac potissimum omnium ratus Syracusis nova pace inconditas

[1] ubi Wölfflin: uti M^2 Conway: utin $P(3)$: ut C^2BDAJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] et quingentis (=D) Alschefski: et $P(3)$: om. BDAJK Aldus, Froben.

[3] neque multum afuit quin (after Alschefski) Madvig, a lost line: ne $P(3)JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[4] terra, Tarentinis z: terra x: om. $P(1)J$, a lost line: cartaginensibus K: terra, Carthaginiensibus Conway.

---

[1] Cf. § 7 and note.

[2] I.e. for the Tarentines.

sequently alarm was inspired on the rest of the ships when they saw the flagship captured. And as they fled in all directions, some were sunk in open water, others were quickly rowed to the shore and presently fell a prey to the men of Thurii [1] and Metapontum. Of the transports, which were following with the supplies, very few fell into the power of the enemy. The rest shifted their sails obliquely, now this way, now that, according to the variable winds, and put out to sea. B.C. 210

By no means so successful [2] was the fighting at Tarentum during those days. For while about four thousand men who had gone out to get grain were roaming about the country, Livius, who was in command of the citadel and the Roman garrison, was alert for every opportunity of an engagement. He sent out from the citadel Gaius Persius, an active man, with two thousand five hundred armed men. After Persius, attacking men widely dispersed over the farms and wandering about, had for a long time been slaying them everywhere, he drove the few survivors into the city, as in their excited flight they dashed into the half-opened gates. And by that same onslaught the city was all but taken. Thus were issues balanced near Tarentum, the Romans being victors on land, the Tarentines on the sea. The hope of grain—a hope which had been very real—was equally illusory for both sides.

XL. About the same time Laevinus, the consul, when a large part of the year had already gone by, arrived in Sicily awaited by the old and the new allies. Accordingly he thought it of the very first importance to settle affairs at Syracuse, that were in disorder owing to the short time since the peace.

B.C. 44

componere res, Agrigentum inde, quod belli reliquum erat tenebaturque a Carthaginiensium valido praesidio, duxit legiones. Et adfuit fortuna incepto. Hanno erat imperator Carthaginiensium, sed omnem in Muttine Numidisque spem repositam habebant. Per totam Siciliam vagus praedas agebat ex sociis Romanorum neque intercludi ab Agrigento vi aut arte ulla nec quin erumperet, ubi vellet, prohiberi poterat. Haec eius gloria quia iam imperatoris quoque famae officiebat, postremo in invidiam vertit, ut ne bene gestae quidem res iam Hannoni propter auctorem satis laetae essent. Postremo[1] praefecturam eius filio suo dedit, ratus cum imperio auctoritatem quoque ei inter Numidas erepturum. Quod longe aliter evenit; nam veterem favorem eius sua insuper invidia auxit; neque ille indignitatem iniuriae tulit confestimque ad Laevinum occultos nuntios misit de tradendo Agrigento. Per quos ut est facta fides compositusque rei gerendae modus, portam ad mare ferentem Numidae cum occupassent pulsis inde custodibus aut caesis, Romanos ad id[2] ipsum missos in urbem acceperunt. Et cum agmine iam in media urbis ac forum magno tumultu iretur, ratus Hanno non aliud quam tumultum ac secessionem, id quod et ante acciderat, Numidarum esse, ad conprimendam seditionem processit. Atque ille, cum ei multitudo maior

[1] Postremo $C^{x}M^{2x}B$, also (with propter prefixed) $P(3)B^{2}$ and so (with propterea) A^{x}: propterea JK: propter quae Aldus, Froben.

[2] id C^{4} Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)JK$.

[1] Below the colossal unfinished Temple of Zeus, about two miles from the sea at the mouth of the Hypsas (no real harbour); Polybius IX. xxvii. 2.

Then he led his legions to Agrigentum, being the last B.C. 210 remnant of the war and held by a strong garrison of Carthaginians. And in fact fortune favoured the undertaking. Hanno was the general of the Carthaginians, but all their hope continued to rest upon Muttines and the Numidians. Roaming all over Sicily, Muttines was carrying off booty from allies of the Romans, and he could neither be shut off from Agrigentum by force or by any ruse, nor be prevented from sallying out whenever he pleased. This distinction of the man, as already eclipsing the reputation of the general also, finally developed into hatred, so that not even successes any longer brought much joy to Hanno on account of the man who was responsible for them. Finally he gave Muttines' command of the cavalry to his own son, thinking that with the command he would take away his prestige also among the Numidians. But it turned out quite differently. For by his own unpopularity he even increased the old-time partiality for Muttines. And the latter did not put up with a shameful wrong, but at once sent secret messengers to Laevinus in regard to the betrayal of Agrigentum. These men having reassured the consul and arranged a plan of action, the Numidians seized the gate leading toward the sea,[1] driving away or slaying the guards: whereupon they admitted Romans sent for that very purpose into the city. And when now they were marching in column into the centre of the city and to the market-place with a great uproar, Hanno, thinking it was nothing more than an outbreak and mutiny of the Numidians, as had happened before also, went forth to quell the uprising. But when he caught sight of a crowd in the distance larger than the number of the u.c. 544 quam Numidarum procul visa, et clamor Romanus haudquaquam ignotus ad auris accidisset, priusquam 11 ad ictum teli veniret, capessit fugam. Per aversam portam emissus adsumpto comite Epicyde cum paucis ad mare pervenit, nactique opportune parvum navigium, relicta hostibus Sicilia, de qua per tot 12 annos certatum erat, in Africam traiecerunt. Alia multitudo Poenorum Siculorumque ne temptato quidem certamine cum caeci in fugam ruerent clausique exitus essent, circa portas caesa.

13 Oppido recepto Laevinus qui capita rerum Agrigenti erant virgis caesos securi percussit, ceteros praedamque vendidit; omnem pecuniam Romam
14 misit. Fama Agrigentinorum cladis Siciliam cum pervasisset, omnia repente ad Romanos inclinaverunt. Prodita brevi sunt viginti oppida, sex vi capta; voluntaria deditione in fidem venerunt ad quadra-
15 ginta. Quarum civitatium principibus cum pro cuiusque merito consul pretia [1] poenasque exsolvisset, coegissetque Siculos positis tandem armis ad agrum
16 colendum animos convertere, ut esset non incolarum modo alimentis frugifera insula, sed urbis Romae atque Italiae, id quod multis saepe tempestatibus fecerat, annonam levaret, ab Agathyrna inconditam
17 multitudinem secum in Italiam transvexit. Quattuor milia hominum erant, mixti ex omni conluvione, exsules, obaerati, capitalia ausi plerique, cum [2] in civitatibus suis ac sub legibus vixerant, et postquam

[1] pretia P(3): praemia AJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] cum Madvig: et cum P(1)JK Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Probably that to the east of the lofty citadel (1080 ft.), and on the northeast side of the city.
[2] He himself returned to Sicily; XXVII. v. 15.

Numidians, and the shouts of the Romans, by no B.C. 210 means unfamiliar, had reached his ears, he took to flight before coming within range of a missile. Escaping by the gate farthest from the enemy[1] and taking Epicydes as his companion, with a few men he made his way to the sea. And fortunately finding a small vessel and leaving to the enemy Sicily, for which the struggle had lasted so many years, they crossed over to Africa. While the rest of the Carthaginians and Sicilians in a body, without even attempting to fight, were blindly fleeing, and ways of escape had been closed, they were slain near the gates.

On gaining possession of the town, Laevinus scourged and beheaded the responsible men at Agrigentum, and sold the rest and the booty. All the money he sent to Rome. When the news of the disaster to the Agrigentines had been carried all over Sicily, suddenly there was a general trend towards the Romans. Betrayed soon after were twenty towns, six taken by assault; by voluntary surrender about forty came under Roman protection. After the consul had bestowed upon the leading men of these states the reward or the penalty that each deserved, and had compelled the Sicilians to lay down their arms at last and turn their attention to tilling the soil, so that the island might not only produce food enough for the inhabitants, but might relieve the grain market of the city of Rome and of Italy, as it had often done on many occasions, he took with him an unruly mob from Agathyrna over into Italy.[2] There were four thousand men, refuse of every kind, exiles, debtors, guilty, many of them, of capital offences, so long as they had lived in their own cities and under the laws; and they were dragging out an eos ex variis causis fortuna similis conglobaverat Agathyrnam, per latrocinia ac rapinam tolerantes 18 vitam. Hos neque relinquere Laevinus in [1] insula tum primum nova pace coalescente velut materiam novandis rebus satis tutum ratus est, et Reginis usui futuri erant ad populandum Bruttium agrum adsuetam latrociniis quaerentibus manum. Et quod ad Siciliam attinet eo anno debellatum est.

U.C. 544

XLI. In Hispania principio veris P. Scipio navibus deductis evocatisque edicto Tarraconem sociorum auxiliis classem onerariasque ostium inde Hiberi
2 fluminis petere iubet. Eodem legiones ex hibernis convenire cum iussisset, ipse cum quinque milibus sociorum ab Tarracone profectus ad exercitum est. Quo cum venisset, adloquendos maxime veteres milites qui tantis superfuerunt [2] cladibus ratus,
3 contione advocata ita disseruit: "Nemo ante me novus imperator militibus suis, priusquam opera eorum usus esset, gratias agere iure ac merito
4 potuit: me vobis, priusquam provinciam aut castra viderem, obligavit fortuna, primum quod ea pietate erga patrem patruumque meum vivos mortuosque
5 fuistis, deinde quod amissam tanta clade provinciae possessionem integram et populo Romano et successori
6 mihi virtute vestra obtinuistis. Sed cum iam benignitate deum id paremus atque agamus, non ut ipsi maneamus in Hispania, sed ne Poeni maneant,

[1] in $C^4M^2A^s$ Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)JK$.
[2] superfuerunt $P(1)Jx$: -fuerant K Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Livy has expanded the speech found in his sources, such as that which Polybius puts in the mouth of Scipio (X. vi. 2 ff.).

existence by highway robbery and plundering, after B.C. 210 their common misery, for one reason or another, had concentrated them at Agathyrna. These men Laevinus did not think it quite safe to leave on the island, then for the first time attaining unity under the recent peace, as being fuel for a revolution, and at the same time they would prove useful to the men of Regium, who were looking for a band accustomed to brigandage, in order to devastate the Bruttian territory. And so far as concerned Sicily the war was finished that year.

XLI. In Spain at the beginning of spring Publius Scipio launched his ships, and after summoning to Tarraco the allied auxiliaries by an edict, he ordered the fleet and the transports to sail thence to the mouth of the river Ebro. Having ordered the legions to leave their winter quarters and meet at the same point, he himself with five thousand allies set out from Tarraco to join the army. Arrived there, and thinking he must address particularly the old soldiers, survivors of defeats so serious, he summoned the men to an assembly and spoke as follows:[1] "No new general in command before me has been able with reason and deservedly to thank his soldiers before he had made use of their services. In my case, before I could see my province or camp, Fortune laid me under obligation to you, in the first place because you have showed such devotion towards my father and uncle, living and dead, and then because, when possession of the province had been lost by so great a disaster, you by your courage have held it intact both for me as their successor and for the Roman people. But now with the favour of the gods we are preparing and striving, not to remain in Spain our-

v.c. 544

nec ut pro ripa Hiberi stantes arceamus transitu hostes, sed ut ultro transeamus transferamusque
7 bellum, vereor ne cui vestrum maius id audaciusque consilium quam aut pro memoria cladium nuper
8 acceptarum aut pro aetate mea videatur. Adversae pugnae in Hispania nullius in animo quam meo minus oblitterari possunt, quippe cui pater et patruus intra triginta dierum spatium, ut aliud super aliud cumularetur familiae nostrae funus, interfecti 9 sunt; sed ut familiaris paene orbitas ac solitudo frangit animum, ita publica cum fortuna tum virtus desperare de summa rerum prohibet. Ea fato quodam data[1] nobis sors est ut magnis omnibus bellis victi vicerimus.

10 "Vetera omitto, Porsennam,[2] Gallos, Samnites: a Punicis bellis incipiam. Quot classes, quot duces, 11 quot exercitus priore bello amissi sunt! Iam quid hoc bello memorem? Omnibus aut ipse adfui cladibus aut quibus afui, maxime unus omnium eas sensi. Trebia, Trasumennus, Cannae quid aliud sunt quam monumenta occisorum exercituum con-
12 sulumque Romanorum? Adde defectionem Italiae, Siciliae maioris partis, Sardiniae; adde ultimum terrorem ac pavorem, castra Punica inter Anienem ac moenia Romana posita et visum prope in portis victorem Hannibalem. In hac ruina rerum stetit una integra atque immobilis virtus populi Romani;

[1] data Gronovius: nata P(3): (quo) donata JKx Aldus, Froben: innata A^5.

[2] Porsennam $P^2(3)C^4Jx$: -sinam P (probably): -senam Kx.

selves, but to prevent the Carthaginians from B.C. 210 remaining, and not to stand on the bank of the Ebro and keep the enemy from crossing, but taking the offensive to cross over and shift the scene of the war. Consequently I am afraid that that design may seem to some of you too great and too bold to be in keeping either with the memory of disasters recently incurred or with my years. As for the reverses in Spain, there is no man from whose mind it is less possible for them to be effaced than from mine, for my father and uncle fell within the space of thirty days, that for our family one fatality might be piled upon another. But although within the family it is crushing to be all but orphaned and left desolate, yet the destiny of the state and her courage forbid me to despair of her preservation. It is a lot assigned to us by some fate that in all the great wars we have been first defeated and then victorious.

"Ancient examples I pass over, Porsenna, the Gauls, the Samnites. I shall begin with the Punic Wars. How many fleets, how many generals, how many armies were lost in the former war! And now in the present war what shall I say has happened? In every disaster I was either present myself, or if absent, I above all others felt them. Trebia, Trasumennus, Cannae, what are they but memorials of Roman armies and consuls fallen? Add the revolt of Italy, of the greater part of Sicily, of Sardinia: add that extreme of alarm and panic, a Carthaginian camp pitched between the Anio and the walls of Rome, and the sight of a victorious Hannibal almost at the gates. In this general crash the one thing left standing, intact and immovable, was the courage of the Roman people. It was this that raised and

A.U.C. 544

13 haec omnia strata humi erexit ac sustulit. Vos omnium primi, milites, post Cannensem cladem vadenti Hasdrubali ad Alpis Italiamque, qui si se cum fratre coniunxisset, nullum iam nomen esset populi Romani, ductu auspicioque patris mei obstitistis; et hae secundae res illas adversas sustinuerunt. 14 Nunc benignitate deum omnia secunda, prospera, in dies laetiora ac meliora in Italia Siciliaque geruntur. 15 In Sicilia Syracusae, Agrigentum captum, pulsi tota insula hostes, receptaque provincia in dicionem[1] populi Romani est: in Italia Arpi recepti, Capua 16 capta. Iter omne ab urbe Roma trepida fuga emensus Hannibal, in extremum angulum agri Bruttii compulsus nihil iam maius precatur deos quam ut incolumi cedere atque abire ex hostium terra liceat. 17 Quid igitur minus conveniat, milites, quam, cum aliae super alias clades cumularentur ac di prope ipsi cum Hannibale starent, vos hic cum parentibus meis—aequentur enim etiam honore nominis—sustinuisse labantem fortunam populi Romani, nunc eosdem, cum iam[2] illic omnia secunda laetaque 18 sunt,[3] animis deficere? Nuper quoque quae[4] acciderunt utinam tam sine meo luctu quam . . .[5]

[1] dicionem Aldus, Luchs: -ione P(1)JKxz Madvig.

[2] cum iam (cū iā) Madvig: quia P(1) Aldus, Froben, Riemann, Conway: cum z J. H. Voss.

[3] sunt, for this JK and one x have sint.

[4] quae $A^{z}JKx$ Aldus, Froben: om. P(1).

[5] Here begins in P(1)N the long lacuna extending to xliii. 8. The missing text is almost completely preserved for us in $A^{z}JKx$ Aldus and Froben, having been supplied from the Spirensis, in which the passage, misplaced in book XXVII, was found by Rhenanus.

set up all the scattered debris. When Hasdrubal B.C. 210
after the rout at Cannae was on his way to the Alps and Italy—and if he had joined his brother even the name of the Roman people would be no more—you were the very first, soldiers, to stand in his path under the command and auspices of my father. And victory here has upheld defeats there. Now by the favour of the gods everything in Italy and Sicily is flourishing and successful, more cheering and better from day to day. In Sicily Syracuse and Agrigentum [1] have been captured, the enemy driven out of the entire island, and the recovered province is under the rule of the Roman people. In Italy Arpi has been recovered, Capua taken. The entire road from the city of Rome has been traversed in nervous flight by Hannibal, who, driven into the farthest corner of the Bruttian land, now prays the gods for nothing greater than that he may be allowed to retire in safety and leave the enemy's country. What therefore is less consistent, soldiers, than that, while disasters were being piled one upon another and the gods themselves, one might almost say, were on Hannibal's side, you here under my fathers—for let them be coupled in that honourable name also—upheld the wavering fortune of the Roman people, but that at present, when in Italy everything is now favourable and encouraging, you, the same men, should be faint-hearted? Recent occurrences also I could wish had been as free from sorrow for me as . . .[2]

[1] In reality the capture of Agrigentum occurred late in the summer (xl init.), while the speech is imagined to have been delivered in the spring.

[2] Lost is the end of this paragraph and the beginning of the next.

A.U.C. 544

". . . Nunc dii immortales imperii Romani praesides, qui centuriis omnibus ut mihi imperium iuberent dari fuere auctores, iidem auguriis auspiciisque et per nocturnos etiam visus omnia laeta ac prospera 19 portendunt. Animus quoque meus, maximus mihi ad hoc tempus vates, praesagit nostram Hispaniam esse, brevi extorre hinc omne Punicum nomen maria
20 terrasque foeda fuga impleturum. Quod mens sua sponte divinat, idem subicit ratio haud fallax. Vexati ab iis socii nostram fidem per legatos implorant; tres duces discordantes, prope ut defecerint alii ab aliis, trifariam exercitum in diversissimas
21 regiones distraxere. Eadem in illos ingruit fortuna quae nuper nos adflixit; nam et deseruntur ab sociis, ut prius ab Celtiberis nos, et diduxere exercitus, 22 quae patri patruoque meo causa exitii fuit. Nec discordia intestina coire eos in unum sinet, neque singuli nobis resistere poterunt. Vos modo, milites, favete nomini Scipionum, suboli imperatorum vestro-
23 rum velut accisis recrescenti stirpibus. Agite, veteres milites, novum exercitum novumque ducem traducite Hiberum, traducite in terras cum multis fortibus
24 factis saepe a vobis peragratas. Brevi faciam ut, quem ad modum nunc noscitatis in me patris patruique similitudinem oris vultusque et lineamenta 25 corporis, ita ingenii, fidei virtutisque effigiem [1] vobis reddam, ut revixisse aut renatum sibi quisque Scipionem imperatorem dicat."

[1] effigiem Hertz: exemplum ef- A^{1}JKx: exemplum ac ef- Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] In Polybius' briefer speech Scipio stresses this point (X. vi. 5; vii. 3).

[2] Cf. XXV. xxxiii; Polybius l.c. vi. 2.

". . . Now the immortal gods, who are protectors of the Roman empire, who inspired all the centuries of the people to order that the command be bestowed upon me, by auguries and auspices and visions in the night are likewise forecasting only joy and success. My own mind as well, heretofore my greatest soothsayer, foresees that Spain is ours, that soon all the Carthaginians, banished from here, will cover seas and lands with their disgraceful flight. What the mind of itself divines undeluded reasoning also suggests. Harassed by them their allies through embassies are begging for our help. Three generals, unable to agree,[1] so that they have almost proved disloyal to each other, have dispersed their army in three parts in widely scattered regions. The same fortune which lately crushed us is assailing them. For they are being deserted by their allies, as formerly were we by the Celtiberians,[2] and also they have separated their armies, which was the cause of destruction for my father and uncle. Neither will internal strife permit them to unite, nor will they be able singly to resist us. Only do you, soldiers, look with favour upon the name of the Scipios, upon the scion of your generals, growing again, as it were, from stems that have been cut down. Come now, veterans, lead a new army and a new commander across the Ebro, lead them over into lands often traversed by you with many deeds of bravery. Just as now you note in me a resemblance to my father and uncle in face and countenance and recognize the lines of the figure, so I will soon take pains to reproduce for you an image of their minds, of their loyalty and courage, so that each man shall say that there has come back to life, or has been born again, his general Scipio."

B.C. 210

A.U.C 544

XLII. Hac oratione accensis militum animis, relicto ad praesidium regionis eius M. Silano cum tribus milibus peditum et trecentis equitibus, ceteras omnes copias—erant autem viginti quinque milia peditum, duo milia quingenti equites—Hiberum traiecit. 2 Ibi quibusdam suadentibus ut, quoniam in tris tam diversas regiones discessissent Punici exercitus, proximum adgrederetur, periculum esse ratus ne eo facto in unum omnes contraheret, nec par esset unus tot exercitibus, Carthaginem Novam interim oppugnare 3 statuit, urbem cum ipsam opulentam suis opibus, tum hostium omni bellico apparatu plenam—ibi arma, ibi pecunia, ibi totius Hispaniae obsides erant—, 4 sitam praeterea cum opportune ad traiciendum in Africam, tum super portum satis amplum quantaevis classi et nescio an unum in Hispaniae 5 ora qua nostro adiacet mari. Nemo omnium quo iretur sciebat praeter C. Laelium. Is classe circummissus ita moderari cursum navium iussus erat ut eodem tempore Scipio ab terra exercitum 6 ostenderet et classis portum intraret. Septimo die ab Hibero Carthaginem ventum est simul terra marique. Castra ab regione urbis qua in septemtrionem versa est posita; his ab tergo—nam frons 7 natura tuta erat—vallum[1] obiectum. Etenim[2] sita

[1] vallum Rhenanus, Froben 2 : nullum Sp : nullum vallum A¹JKx Aldus : duplex vallum Schelius from Polybius X. ix. 7, Weissenborn.

[2] Etenim Sp²A¹ Froben 2 : ceterum JKx Aldus.

---

[1] Five hundred in Polybius l.c. vi. 7.

[2] Polybius gives the same figures, ix. 6 f.

[3] Six days for the march is incredible, since the distance is 2600 stadia (325 miles) according to Polybius III. xxxix. 6, or 298 miles in the Antonine Itinerary.

XLII. Having fired the spirits of the soldiers by this speech, and leaving for the defence of the region Marcus Silanus with three thousand infantry and three hundred[1] horsemen, all the rest of the forces—and they were twenty-five thousand infantry and two thousand five hundred cavalry[2]—he led across the Ebro. There, although some tried to persuade him that, since the Carthaginian armies had withdrawn into three regions so widely scattered, he should attack the nearest of them, he thought there was danger that by doing so he might cause them all to concentrate and one army might not be a match for so many armies. Consequently he decided meanwhile to lay siege to New Carthage, a city both itself rich in its own resources and filled with the enemy's warlike equipment of every kind. There were his arms, there his money, there hostages from all Spain. Furthermore the city was not only situated favourably for the passage to Africa, but also on a harbour ample enough for the greatest fleet, and perhaps the only port on the coast of Spain where it faces our sea. Not a man except Gaius Laelius knew whither they were going. He was sent with the fleet round the headlands, under previous orders so to regulate the speed of his ships that Scipio might display his army on the landward side at the same time that the fleet was entering the harbour. On the seventh day from the Ebro they reached (New) Carthage by sea and land at the same time.[3] Camp was pitched opposite the city where it faces the north.[4] At the rear of the camp—for the front was protected by nature—an earthwork was thrown up. For the B.C. 210

[4] Rather the eastern side.

A.U.C. 544

Carthago sic est: sinus est maris media fere Hispaniae ora, maxime Africo vento oppositus, ad duo milia[1] et quingentos passus introrsus retractus, paulo[2] plus passuum mille et ducentos[3] in latitudinem patens. 8 Huius in ostio sinus parva insula obiecta ab alto portum ab omnibus ventis praeterquam Africo tutum facit. Ab intimo sinu paeninsula excurrit, tumulus is ipse in quo condita urbs est, ab ortu solis et a meridie cincta mari; ab occasu stagnum claudit paulum etiam ad septemtrionem fusum, incertae altitudinis 9 utcumque exaestuat aut deficit[4] mare. Continenti urbem iugum ducentos fere et quinquaginta passus patens coniungit. Unde cum tam parvi operis munitio esset, non obiecit vallum imperator Romanus, 10 seu fiduciam hosti superbe ostentans, sive ut subeunti saepe ad moenia urbis recursus pateret.

XLIII. Cetera quae munienda erant cum perfecisset, naves etiam in portu, velut maritimam quoque ostentans obsidionem, instruxit; circumvectusque classem cum monuisset praefectos navium ut vigilias nocturnas intenti[5] servarent, omnia 2 ubique primo obsessum hostem conari, regressus in [1] ad duo milia supplied by Sigonius from Polybius X. x. 1.

[2] paulo A¹JKx Aldus: paululo Sp? Froben 2.
[3] mille et ducentos supplied by Madvig from Polybius l.c.
[4] aut deficit Sp?A¹ Froben 2: om. JKx Aldus.
[5] intenti Sp Froben 2: interim A¹JKx Aldus.

---

[1] Polybius, who had visited the place, gives a fuller description (X. x.), to which Livy is directly or indirectly indebted, reproducing the mistaken orientation of the city. Cf. H. H. Scullard, Scipio Africanus, pp. 289 ff. The city and its brilliant capture must have been fully treated in Plutarch's lost life of Scipio.

[2] Polybius' orientation of the bay was correct.

situation of (New) Carthage is as follows:[1] there is B.C. 210 an arm of the sea about half-way down the coast of Spain, a bay that mainly faces the southwest wind[2] and makes inland about two miles and a half, with a breadth of little more than a mile and one-fifth. At the mouth of this bay a small island facing the harbour on the seaward side makes it safe from all winds except the southwest. From the innermost part of the bay a peninsula runs out, the very hill on which the city was built, skirted by sea on the east[3] and the south.[4] On the west[4] a lagoon hems the city in, extending somewhat to the north[4] also: it is of varying depth according as the sea is coming in or going out.[5] With the mainland a ridge about two hundred and fifty paces wide connects the city. Although fortification on this side would have involved so little labour, the Roman commander did not throw up an earthwork, whether as proudly displaying his confidence to the enemy, or that, as he repeatedly approached the walls of the city, retirement might be open to him.

XLIII. Having completed such other works of fortification as were necessary, he drew up the ships also in the harbour, as though to display a blockade from the sea as well. And making the round of the fleet he reminded the commanders of the vessels to keep a close watch at night, saying that a blockaded enemy at first makes every attempt wherever pos-

[3] Really south, since these points of the compass must be corrected clockwise almost 90 degrees.

[4] Making the necessary corrections, S = W, W = N, N = E.

[5] Explained as caused by winds, not as Polybius, Livy and Appian thought, by tides; for there is no tide on the east coast of Spain. Cf. Scullard, op. cit. pp. 78 f.

A.U.C. 544

castra, ut consilii sui rationem, quod ab urbe potissimum oppugnanda bellum orsus esset, militibus ostenderet et spem potiundae cohortando faceret, contione advocata ita disseruit: "Ad urbem unam oppugnandam si quis vos adductos credit, is magis operis vestri quam emolumenti rationem exactam, milites, habet. Oppugnabitis enim vere moenia unius urbis, sed in una urbe universam ceperitis Hispaniam. Hic sunt obsides omnium nobilium regum populorumque: qui simul in potestate vestra erunt, extemplo omnia quae nunc sub Carthaginiensibus sunt in dicionem tradent; hic pecunia omnis hostium, sine qua neque illi gerere bellum possunt, quippe qui mercennarios exercitus alant, et quae nobis [1] maximo usui ad conciliandos animos barbarorum erit; hic tormenta, arma, omnis apparatus belli est, qui simul et [2] vos instruet et hostis nudabit. Potiemur praeterea cum pulcherrima opulentissimaque urbe, tum opportunissima portu egregio unde terra marique quae belli usus poscunt suppeditentur. Quae cum magna ipsi habebimus, tum dempserimus hostibus multo maiora. Haec illis arx, hoc horreum, aerarium, armamentarium, hoc omnium rerum receptaculum est: huc rectus ex Africa cursus est; haec una inter Pyrenaeum et Gadis statio; hinc omni Hispaniae imminet Africa . . ." [3]

[1] nobis Aldus, Froben: vobis A^sJKx.

[2] et Sp^2A^s Froben 2: om. by the rest.

[3] Here ends the passage from the Spirensis, replacing two leaves lost out of P (or its archetype); cf. xli. 18. To fill the following gap other MSS. (Aldus also and Froben) have several lines of indifferent text, obviously not genuine. No further readings of Spirensis are known until xlvi. 2.

[1] Lost is the conclusion of Scipio's speech, probably including rewards promised for bravery, and stating that sible. He then returned to the camp to explain to B.C. 210 the soldiers the reason for his plan, in having elected to begin the campaign with the siege of a city, and in order that by encouraging them he might inspire the hope of its capture, called an assembly, and spoke as follows: "If any man believes that you have been brought here to besiege a single city, he has justly reckoned your labour, soldiers, rather than the profit. For it is true that you are to attack the walls of a single city, but in that single city you will have taken the whole of Spain. Here are the hostages of all the important kings and peoples; and once they are in your power, they will immediately surrender all that is now subject to the Carthaginians. Here is all the money of the enemy, without which, inasmuch as they maintain mercenary armies, they are incapable of waging war, while it will be of the greatest service to us in winning the support of the barbarians. Here is their artillery, their arms, all their war material, which will equip you and at the same time will strip the enemy. Furthermore we shall gain possession of a city very beautiful and very rich, likewise most convenient in its remarkable harbour, from which by land and sea everything which the needs of war demand may be supplied. We shall not only have these great advantages ourselves, but shall deprive the enemy of things much more important. This is their citadel, this is their granary, their treasury, their arsenal, this their storehouse for everything. To this port lies the direct course from Africa; this is the one roadstead between the Pyrenees and Gades: from this Africa menaces the whole of Spain. . . ."[1]

[1] Neptune had appeared to him in a dream and had pledged his aid at the right moment; Polybius X. xi. 6 f.

A.U.C. 544

XLIV. . . . armaverat.[1] Cum terra marique instrui oppugnationem videret, et ipse copias ita
2 disponit: oppidanorum duo milia ab ea parte qua castra Romana erant opponit; quingentis militibus arcem insidit, quingentos tumulo urbis in orientem verso inponit; multitudinem aliam quo clamor, quo subita vocasset res intentam ad omnia occurrere
3 iubet. Patefacta deinde porta eos quos in via ferente ad castra hostium instruxerat emittit.[2] Romani duce ipso praecipiente parumper cessere, ut propiores subsidiis in certamine ipso summittendis essent.
4 Et primo haud impares stetere acies; subsidia deinde identidem summissa e castris non averterunt solum in fugam hostis, sed adeo effusis institerunt ut, nisi receptui cecinisset, permixti fugientibus inrupturi fuisse in urbem viderentur.
5 Trepidatio vero non in proelio maior quam tota urbe fuit. Multae stationes pavore atque fuga[3] desertae sunt relictique muri, cum qua cuique
6 erat proximum desiluissent. Quod ubi[4] egressus[5] Scipio in tumulum quem Mercuri vocant anim-

[1] armaverat $P(1)$: deleted A^s: om. JKx Aldus, Froben.
[2] emittit Weissenborn: mittit $P(1)JK$ Aldus.
[3] fuga Gronovius: oga P: loga $P^{1?}$: loca (3) and (with deserta) AJK_2.
[4] ubi Aldus, Froben, Salmasius: ob $P(1)$.
[5] egressus Salmasius: veressus $P^{1?}R$: variously altered in (1): versus Aldus, Froben.

[1] Missing is the narrative also of the beginning of the assault (l.c. xii. 1 ff.). The subject of the broken sentence is to be supplied from xlvi. 8 f., i.e. Mago, commandant of the place. He had armed available civilians.

XLIV. . . . had provided them with arms.[1] When B.C. 210
he saw the preparations for a siege by land and sea, he also disposed his troops as follows: two thousand of the townsmen he stationed against the enemy on that side on which lay the Roman camp; the citadel [2] he garrisoned with five hundred soldiers; five hundred he posted on the hill in the city towards the east; [3] the rest of the multitude he ordered to be on the alert in every direction and to confront the enemy wherever shouting or an emergency should call them. Then opening the gate he sent out the men he had drawn up on a street leading towards the camp of the enemy. The Romans, instructed by the general himself, drew back for a short time, that they might be nearer the reinforcements to be sent in the midst of the engagement. And at first the battle-lines stood fairly matched; then reinforcements sent again and again from the camp not only put the enemy to flight, but so pressed upon them in their disorder that, if Scipio had not sounded the recall, they would, it seemed, have mingled with the fugitives, and burst into the city.

But the alarm in the battle was no greater than that throughout the city. Many positions were deserted in panic and flight, and the walls were abandoned, when the men had leaped down, each taking the shortest way. When this was noticed by Scipio, who had climbed the hill which they call Mercury's Hill,[4]

[2] A height close to the wall on its northwest side, above the bridge and a gate leading to it.

[3] I.e. facing south (correcting Polybius' orientation; l.c. x. 8). On it was a temple of Aesculapius.

[4] On this hill, east of the isthmus, the Roman camp had been pitched.

u.c. 544

advertit[1] multis partibus nudata defensoribus moenia esse, omnis e castris excitos ire ad oppugnandam 7 urbem et ferre scalas iubet. Ipse trium prae se iuvenum validorum scutis oppositis—ingens enim iam vis omnis generis telorum e muris volabat—ad urbem succedit, hortatur, imperat quae in rem sunt,
8 quodque plurumum ad accendendos militum animos intererat, testis spectatorque virtutis atque ignaviae
9 cuiusque adest. Itaque in volnera ac tela ruunt, neque illos muri neque superstantes armati arcere
10 queunt quin certatim ascendant. Et ab navibus eodem tempore ea quae mari adluitur pars urbis oppugnari coepta est. Ceterum tumultus inde 11 maior quam vis adhiberi poterat. Dum adplicant, dum raptim[2] exponunt scalas militesque, dum qua cuique proximum est in terram evadere properant, ipsa festinatione et certamine alii alios inpediunt.

XLV. Inter haec repleverat iam Poenus armatis muros, et vis magna ex ingenti[3] copia congesta
2 telorum suppeditabat. Sed neque viri nec tela nec quicquam aliud aeque quam moenia ipsa sese defendebant. Rarae enim scalae altitudini aequari poterant, et quo quaeque altiores, eo infirmiores
3 erant. Itaque cum summus quisque evadere non posset, subirent tamen alii, onere ipso frangebantur. Quidam stantibus scalis, cum altitudo caliginem oculis offudisset, ad terram delati sunt.
4 Et cum passim homines scalaeque ruerent, et ipso

[1] vocant animadvertit C^1 Salmasius: (-ium) cantanti advertit $P(3)JK$.

[2] raptim Crévier: partim $P(1)JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[3] ex ingenti Gronovius: et ingenti $P(1)$: et ingens $A^6?JK$ Aldus, Froben.

namely, that at many points the walls were stripped B.C. 210 of defenders, he gave orders to call all the men out of camp, to advance to the attack upon the city and to bring ladders. He himself, while three strong young men held their shields in front of him—for a great number of missiles of every kind were flying from the walls—comes up to the city, gives encouragement and pertinent orders, and, what was of most importance in firing the soldiers' spirits, is at hand as witness and spectator of every man's courage or cowardice. And so the men dash on in the face of wounds and missiles, and neither walls nor armed men standing on them can restrain them from vying with each other in the attempt to climb. And at the same time from the ships an attack began upon that part of the city which is washed by the sea. But from that side they were able to create an uproar rather than to launch an attack. In making fast, in hastily landing ladders and men, in their impatience to get ashore, each the shortest way, they hindered one another by their very haste and rivalry.

XLV. Meanwhile the Carthaginian had now fully manned the walls with armed men, and he had a great number of missiles ready at hand out of his immense reserves. But neither men nor missiles nor anything else defended the walls so much as the walls were their own defence. For few ladders could reach to their height, and the higher these were the weaker. And so since the highest man could not climb over, but nevertheless others kept coming up, the ladders were breaking by the mere weight. Some men, although the ladders stood, owing to the dizziness produced by the height fell to the ground. And while everywhere men and ladders were dropping, successu audacia atque alacritas hostium cresceret, signum receptui datum est: quod spem non praesentis modo ab tanto certamine ac labore quietis obsessis, sed etiam in posterum dedit, scalis et corona capi urbem non posse: opera et difficilia esse et tempus datura [1] ad ferendam opem imperatoribus suis.

A.U.C. 544

6 Vix prior tumultus conticuerat cum Scipio ab defessis iam volneratisque recentis integrosque alios accipere scalas iubet et [2] vi maiore adgredi urbem.
7 Ipse, ut ei nuntiatum est aestum decedere, quod per piscatores Tarraconenses, nunc levibus cumbis, nunc, ubi eae siderent, vadis pervagatos stagnum, conpertum habebat facilem pedibus ad murum transitum dari, eo secum [3] armatos quingentos [4]
8 duxit. Medium ferme diei erat, et ad id, quod sua sponte cedente in mare aestu trahebatur aqua, acer etiam septemtrio ortus inclinatum stagnum eodem quo aestus ferebat et adeo nudaverat vada ut alibi umbilico tenus aqua esset, alibi genua vix superaret.
9 Hoc cura ac ratione compertum in prodigium ac deos vertens Scipio, qui ad transitum Romanis mare verterent et stagna auferrent viasque ante numquam initas humano vestigio aperirent, Neptunum iubebat ducem itineris sequi ac medio stagno evadere ad moenia.

[1] datura Kz Froben 1 : -rum P(1)Jz Aldus.
[2] et JK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1).
[3] eo secum Gronovius : eoseum P : eos P^2(1)JK : eo M^2x Aldus, Froben.
[4] quingentos (= D) Weissenborn (cf. xlvi. 2) : om. P(1) JK Aldus.

---

[1] It was now late in the day; so Polybius X. xiii. 11.
[2] In the previous winter; Polybius l.c. viii. 7.
[3] See above, p. 167, n. 5.
[4] For Polybius' conflicting statement cf. note 1.

and the enemies' boldness and zest were increasing B.C. 210 just because of their success, the signal for the recall was given.[1] This gave the besieged not only the hope of present respite from such conflict and effort, but also confidence for the future that the city could not be taken by ladders and encirclement; that siege-works were difficult and would also give time for their generals to bring aid.

Hardly had the first uproar been stilled when Scipio orders the ladders to be taken from men now weary and wounded, by others who were fresh and uninjured, and that an attack in greater force should be made upon the city. As for himself, having been informed by fishermen of Tarraco[2] who had crossed the lagoon everywhere, now in light vessels, now, when these would go aground, through shallow water, that an easy crossing on foot up to the wall was possible, Scipio, when word was brought to him that the tide was ebbing,[3] led five hundred armed men with him to the place. It was about the middle of the day,[4] and in addition to the draining away of the water of itself as the tide ebbed seaward, a fierce north wind also had sprung up and was carrying the receding lagoon in the same direction as the tide, and had so laid bare the shoals that in one place the water was up to the navel only, in another scarcely reached beyond the knees. What he had ascertained by painstaking and calculation, Scipio represented as a miracle and an act of the gods, who for the passage of the Romans were diverting the sea, he said, and draining lakes and opening up ways never before trodden by man's foot. And he bade them to follow Neptune as their guide on the march, and to make their way straight across the lagoon to the walls.

A.U.C. 544

XLVI. Ab terra ingens labor succedentibus erat; nec altitudine tantum moenium impediebantur, sed quod defensores adgredientis[1] ad ancipites utrimque ictus subiectos habebant Romanos, ut latera infestiora subeuntibus quam adversa corpora essent. At parte in[2] alia quingentis et per stagnum facilis transitus et in murum ascensus inde fuit; nam neque opere emunitus erat, ut ubi ipsius loci ac stagni praesidio satis creditum foret, nec ulla armatorum statio aut custodia opposita, intentis omnibus ad opem eo[3] ferendam unde periculum ostendebatur.

Ubi urbem sine certamine intravere, pergunt inde quanto maximo cursu poterant ad eam portam circa quam omne contractum certamen erat. In quod adeo intenti omnium non animi solum fuere, sed etiam oculi auresque pugnantium spectantiumque et[4] adhortantium pugnantis, ut nemo ante ab tergo senserit[5] captam urbem quam tela in aversos inciderunt et[6] utrimque ancipitem hostem habebant. Tunc turbatis defensoribus metu et moenia capta, et porta intus forisque pariter refringi coepta; et mox caedendo confectis ac distractis, ne iter impediretur, foribus armati impetum fecerunt. Magna multitudo et muros transcendebat, sed ii passim ad caedem oppidanorum versi; illa quae portam ingressa erat iusta acies cum ducibus, cum ordinibus

[1] defensores adgredientis conj. Conway: euntes (or -is) P(1) JK Aldus, Froben: coeuntis N: many conjectures.

[2] in, suspected by Weissenborn, Conway; defended by Friedersdorff.

[3] eo Sp²N² Froben 2: of- P(3): om. MBANJK Aldus.

[4] et A²JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

[5] senserit Sp² Froben 2: sentiret P(3)ANJK Aldus, with different order.

[6] et Sp Froben 2: om. P(1)NJK Aldus.

XLVI. On the landward side it was a very serious B.C. 210 task for men approaching the walls; and they were hindered not only by the height of these, but also because the defenders had the attacking Romans doubly exposed to wounds on the right and on the left, so that as they approached their sides were in greater danger than the front of their bodies. But on the other side of the city the five hundred found both an easy passage across the lagoon and then an easy climb to the top of the wall. For it had not been built up to the full height, since they had sufficient confidence in the protection offered by the position itself and by the lagoon, and there was no post of armed men nor a guard to confront them, since all were intent upon bringing aid to any quarter from which danger was indicated.

Having entered the city without a struggle, they then proceeded with all possible speed to the gate round which the whole battle had been brought on. On that fighting so intent were not only the minds, but also the eyes and ears of all the fighters and spectators and of those who were encouraging the fighters, that no one was aware that the city had been captured in their rear until missiles fell upon their backs and they had the enemy on both front and rear. Then as the defenders were panic-stricken, the walls were captured and men began to batter down the gate at the same time from within and from without. And presently, when the gates had been chopped to pieces and dragged off, so as not to block the passage, the armed men charged. A great multitude climbed over the wall also, but they scattered in all directions to slay the townspeople. The regular formation which had entered the gate made its way with its

A.U.C. 544

8 media urbe usque [1] in forum processit. Inde cum duobus itineribus fugientis videret hostis, alios ad tumulum in orientem versum, qui tenebatur quingentorum militum praesidio, alios in arcem, in quam et ipse Mago cum omnibus fere armatis qui muris pulsi fuerant refugerat, partim [2] copiarum ad tumulum expugnandum mittit, partim [3] ipse ad arcem
9 ducit. Et tumulus primo impetu est captus, et Mago arcem conatus defendere, cum omnia hostium plena videret neque spem ullam esse, se arcemque et 10 praesidium dedidit. Quoad dedita arx est, caedes tota urbe passim factae, nec ulli puberum qui obvius fuit parcebatur; tum signo dato caedibus finis factus; ad praedam victores versi, quae ingens omnis generis fuit.

XLVII. Liberorum capitum virile secus ad decem milia capta. Inde qui cives Novae Carthaginis erant dimisit, urbemque et sua omnia quae reliqua eis
2 bellum fecerat restituit. Opifices ad duo milia hominum erant; eos publicos fore populi Romani edixit, cum spe propinqua libertatis, si ad ministeria
3 belli enixe operam navassent. Ceteram multitudinem incolarum iuvenum ac validorum servorum in classem ad supplementum remigum dedit; et 4 auxerat navibus octo [4] captivis classem. Extra

[1] usque N^2: om. $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben.
[2] partim $P(3)N$: partem $C^1M^2A^2JK$ Aldus, Froben.
[3] partim $P(1)$: partem C^1A^1 Aldus: om. $SpJK$ Froben 2.
[4] octo $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben: XVIII Sigonius from Polybius X. xvii. 13.

---

[1] I.e. south; cf. p. 167, n. 3.
[2] Eighteen in Polybius l.c. xvii. 13; cf. below, xlix. 6. The preceding figures, however, show how closely Livy officers and its ranks through the centre of the city B.C. 210

even into the market-place. From that point Scipio saw the enemy fleeing down two streets, one party towards the hill facing the east [1] and held by a garrison of five hundred soldiers, the rest into the citadel, into which Mago also with nearly all the armed men who had been beaten back from the walls had fled for refuge. Accordingly he sent part of his forces to storm the hill, and himself led a part to the citadel. The hill was taken at the first assault, and Mago, who attempted to defend the citadel, seeing the whole city filled with the enemy and that there was no hope, surrendered himself and the citadel with its garrison. Until the surrender of the citadel there was slaughter everywhere throughout the city, and they did not spare any adult who met them. Then the signal was given and an end was made of slaughter. The victors turned to the spoils, which were immense and of every kind.

XLVII. Of male free men about ten thousand were captured. From that number Scipio released those who were citizens of New Carthage and restored to them their city and also all the property which the war had spared to them. The artisans numbered about two thousand men. These he announced would be public slaves of the Roman people, with the not distant hope of freedom if they should actively exert themselves in providing the equipment for war. The rest of the multitude, made up of young non-citizens and strong slaves, he turned over to the fleet to recruit the oarsmen: and he had enlarged the fleet by eight [2] captured ships. Apart followed him; not as in §§ 5 ff. drawing from a different source.

A.U.C. 544

hanc multitudinem Hispanorum obsides erant, quorum perinde ac si sociorum liberi essent cura habita. Captus et apparatus ingens belli: catapultae maximae formae centum viginti, minores ducentae octoginta una; ballistae maiores viginti tres, minores quinquaginta duae, scorpionum maiorum minorumque et armorum telorumque ingens numerus; signa militaria septuaginta quattuor. Et auri argentique[1] relata ad imperatorem magna vis: paterae aureae fuerunt ducentae septuaginta sex, librales[2] ferme omnes pondo; argenti infecti[3] signatique decem et octo milia et trecenta pondo, vasorum argenteorum magnus numerus; haec omnia C. Flaminio quaestori adpensa adnumerataque sunt; tritici quadringenta[4] milia modium, hordei ducenta septuaginta. Naves onerariae sexaginta tres in portu expugnatae captaeque,[5] quaedam cum suis oneribus, frumento, armis, aere praeterea ferroque et linteis et sparto et navali alia materia ad classem aedificandam, ut minimum omnium inter tantas opes belli captas[6] Carthago ipsa fuerit.

XLVIII. Eo die Scipio, C. Laelio cum sociis navalibus urbem custodire iusso, ipse in castra legiones reduxit fessosque milites omnibus uno die belli operibus, quippe qui et acie dimicassent et capienda

[1] -que M^2ANJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(3)$ Conway.

[2] librales Sp^2A^6JK Froben 2. Conway: libras $P(3)$ Gronovius: librae AN Aldus, Madvig.

[3] infecti Gronovius: facti $P(3)JK$ Aldus, Froben: facte AN.

[4] quadringenta PRB^2D: quadraginta (or XL) $CMBANJK$ Aldus, Froben.

[5] captaeque A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: que $P(3)$.

[6] belli captas Sp^2N^s Froben 2: belli castas P: bellicas $P^2(1)N^2JK$ Aldus.

from this multitude were the Spanish hostages, who B.C. 210 were cared for just as if they were the children of allies. Captured also was a vast amount of war material: a hundred and twenty catapults of the largest model, two hundred and eighty-one of the smaller; twenty-three larger ballistae, fifty-two smaller; larger and smaller scorpions and arms and missile weapons, a vast number: seventy-four military standards. Of gold also and silver a large quantity was brought to the general. There were two hundred and seventy-six gold paterae,[1] nearly all of them weighing a pound; of silver, the unwrought and coined, there were eighteen thousand three hundred pounds, of silver vessels a large number. All of these, after weighing and counting, were delivered to Gaius Flaminius, the quaestor. Of wheat there were four hundred thousand pecks; of barley two hundred and seventy thousand. Sixty-three merchantmen were attacked and captured in the harbour, some with their cargoes, grain, arms, also bronze and iron and linen and Spanish broom[2] and ship timber also for the building of a fleet, so that in the midst of these great resources for the war that were captured (New) Carthage itself was the smallest part of it all.

XLVIII. On that day Scipio, after ordering Gaius Laelius with the marines to guard the city, himself led the legions back into camp. And as the soldiers were exhausted by all the warlike operations combined in a single day—since they had fought in line of battle,

[1] Deep saucers used as drinking cups, but usually mentioned when a libation was poured.

[2] Esparto, of which much was grown near New Carthage for use in making ropes, etc., cf. XXII. xx. 6.

A.U.C. 544

urbe tantum laboris periculique adissent et capta cum iis qui in arcem confugerant iniquo etiam loco pugnas-
3 sent, curare corpora iussit. Postero die militibus navalibusque sociis convocatis primum dis immortalibus laudes gratesque egit, qui se non urbis solum opulentissimae omnium in Hispania uno die compotem fecissent, sed ante eo congessissent omnis Africae atque Hispaniae opes, ut neque hostibus quicquam relinqueretur, et sibi ac suis omnia super-
4 essent. Militum deinde virtutem conlaudavit quod eos non eruptio hostium, non altitudo moenium, non inexplorata stagni vada, non castellum in alto tumulo situm, non munitissima arx deterruisset quo minus transcenderent omnia perrumperentque.
5 Itaque quamquam omnibus omnia deberet, praecipuum muralis coronae decus eius esse qui primus murum ascendisset; profiteretur qui se dignum eo
6 duceret dono. Duo professi sunt, Q. Trebellius,[1] centurio legionis quartae, et Sex. Digitius, socius navalis. Nec ipsi tam inter se acriter contendebant quam studia excitaverant uterque sui corporis
7 hominum. Sociis C. Laelius, praefectus[2] classis, 8 legionariis M. Sempronius Tuditanus aderat. Ea contentio cum prope seditionem veniret, Scipio tris recuperatores cum se daturum pronuntiasset qui cognita causa testibusque auditis iudicarent uter

[1] Trebellius Sp?A^1JK Froben 2 : tiberilius $P(1)N$.
[2] praefectus N^1 marg. Rhenanus, Froben 2 : que tectus Sp : q. or que $P(3)N$: om. C^2A^2JK Aldus.

[1] A rare example of an open competition for a military distinction to be awarded.

and in taking the city had been involved in such exertion and danger, and after the capture had contended, on unfavourable ground at that, with those who had sought refuge in the citadel—he ordered them to rest. On the following day he called together the soldiers and marines, and first praised and thanked the immortal gods, who had made him master in a single day, not only of the richest of all the cities in Spain, but had previously accumulated there all the resources of Africa and Spain, so that nothing was left to the enemy, while for himself and his men there was abundance of everything. He went on to praise warmly the courage of the soldiers because neither a sally of the enemy, nor the height of walls, nor the unsounded waters of the lagoon, nor the fortress on a lofty hill, nor the very strongly fortified citadel had deterred them from climbing over or bursting through every obstacle. Accordingly, although he owed everything to everybody, the special distinction of a mural crown belonged to the man who had been the first to climb the wall; let him who thought himself deserving of that gift declare himself.[1] Two came forward as claimants, Quintus Trebellius, a centurion of the fourth legion, and Sextus Digitius, a marine. And these men themselves were not so much hotly competing with one another, as already fanning the partisanship of the men of their respective arms of the service. The marines were supported by Gaius Laelius, admiral of the fleet, the legionaries by Marcus Sempronius Tuditanus. When the strife was verging on mutiny, Scipio announced that he would name three arbiters to hear the claims, and after taking testimony, to decide which of the two had been the first to climb B.C. 210

A.U.C. 544

9 prior in oppidum transcendisset, C. Laelio et M. Sempronio, advocatis partis utriusque, P. Cornelium Caudinum de medio adiecit eosque tris recuperatores 10 considere et causam cognoscere iussit. Cum res eo maiore ageretur certamine quod amoti tantae dignitatis non tam advocati quam moderatores studiorum fuerant, C. Laelius relicto consilio ad 11 tribunal ad Scipionem accedit, eumque docet rem sine modo ac modestia agi, ac prope esse ut manus inter se conferant. Ceterum, etiam si vis absit, nihilo minus detestabili exemplo rem agi, quippe ubi 12 fraude ac periurio decus petatur virtutis. Stare hinc legionarios milites, hinc classicos, per omnis deos paratos iurare magis quae velint quam quae sciant vera esse, et obstringere periurio non se solum suumque caput, sed signa militaria et aquilas sacra- 13 mentique religionem. Haec se [1] ad eum de sententia P. Cornelii et M. Sempronii deferre. Scipio conlaudato Laelio ad contionem advocavit pronuntiavitque se satis compertum habere Q. Trebellium [2] et Sex. Digitium pariter in murum escendisse, seque eos ambos [3] virtutis causa coronis muralibus donare. 14 Tum reliquos prout cuiusque meritum virtusque erat donavit; ante omnis C. Laelium praefectum

[1] Haec se A'N'JK Aldus, Froben : haec P(1)N Madvig.
[2] Trebellium : see p. 182, crit. n. 1.
[3] ambos N'JK Aldus, Froben ; om. P(1)N.

over the wall into the town. Then in addition to B.C. 210 Gaius Laelius and Marcus Sempronius, who represented this faction and that, he named Publius Cornelius Caudinus, a neutral, and ordered the three arbiters to sit down and hear the case. This was argued with all the more heat because they were separated from men of such high rank, who had acted less as representatives than as a check upon party feelings. Whereupon Gaius Laelius left the council, went up to Scipio on his tribune, and informed him that the matter was being debated without limit or self-restraint, and that the soldiers were on the point of laying hands on each other. But he said that, even if there should be no violence, they were nevertheless setting an abominable precedent in seeking by deception and perjury to win a reward for courage. On one side the legionaries were standing, he said, on the other the marines, ready to swear by all the gods rather what they wished to have true than what they knew to be true, and ready to involve not only themselves and their own persons in the perjury, but also the military standards and eagles and the sanctity of the oath of allegiance; that he was making this report to him on the advice of Publius Cornelius and Marcus Sempronius. Scipio warmly praised Laelius, summoned the soldiers to an assembly and declared that he was reliably informed that Quintus Trebellius and Sextus Digitius had climbed to the top of the wall at the same moment, and that for their courage he bestowed mural crowns upon them both. Then he rewarded the rest, each according to his desert and his courage. Above all the others he placed Gaius Laelius, admiral of the fleet, on a level with himself in every kind classis et omni genere laudis sibimet ipse [1] aequavit et corona aurea ac triginta bubus donavit.

A.U.C. 544

XLIX. Tum obsides civitatium Hispaniae vocari iussit; quorum quantus numerus fuerit piget scribere, quippe cum [2] alibi trecentos ferme, alibi tria milia [3] septingentos viginti quattuor fuisse inveniam. 2 Aeque et alia inter auctores discrepant. Praesidium Punicum alius decem, alius septem, alius haud plus quam duum milium fuisse scribit. Capta alibi decem milia capitum,[4] alibi supra quinque et viginti 3 invenio.[5] Scorpiones maiores minoresque ad sexaginta captos scripserim, si auctorem Graecum sequar Silenum; si Valerium Antiatem, maiorum scorpionum sex milia, minorum tredecim [6] milia; adeo nullus 4 mentiendi modus est. Ne de ducibus quidem convenit. Plerique Laelium praefuisse classi, sunt 5 qui M. Iunium Silanum dicant; Arinen praefuisse Punico praesidio deditumque Romanis Antias Valerius, 6 Magonem alii scriptores tradunt. Non de numero navium captarum, non de pondere auri atque argenti et redactae pecuniae [7] convenit. Si aliquis adsentiri

[1] ipse $P(3)JK$: ipsi AN Aldus, Froben, Madvig.
[2] cum A^sJK Froben 2: ubi $P(1)$ $(A^2)N$ Aldus.
[3] tria milia (∞ ∞ ∞)PC: om. by the rest.
[4] alibi decem milia capitum A^sN^2JK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$, a lost line.
[5] invenio A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: -ias P: -ias or -ies (1).
[6] tredecim Gronovius: decem tria $P(3)N$: decem et tria AN^2: XIII DA^sJK Aldus, Froben: decem et tria AN^2; cf. crit. note on XXVII. xxix. 8.
[7] redactae pecuniae $P(1)$ NJK Aldus: -ta -nia Sp Froben 2, Conway.

of commendation, and also presented him with a golden wreath and thirty oxen. B.C. 210

XLIX. Then he ordered the hostages of the states of Spain to be summoned. How great was their number I dislike to state, since in one source I find that they were about three hundred,[1] in another three thousand seven hundred and twenty-four. There is no less disagreement on other matters also between the authorities. One writes that the Carthaginian garrison consisted of ten thousand men, another of seven thousand, another of not more than two thousand.[2] As for the captives, in one writer[3] I find ten thousand persons, in another above twenty-five thousand. I should set down about sixty larger and smaller scorpions as captured, if I were to follow a Greek authority, Silenus,[4] if Valerius Antias, then six thousand of the larger scorpions, thirteen thousand of the smaller; so lacking is any limit to his mendacity. Even as to the generals there is no agreement. Most say that Laelius commanded the fleet, there are some who say it was Marcus Iunius Silanus. Valerius Antias relates that Arines was in command of the Carthaginian garrison and surrendered to the Romans, other writers that it was Mago. There is no agreement as to the number of ships captured, none as to the weight of gold and silver and of money brought in. If one must agree

[1] Over 300, says Polybius X. xviii. 3.

[2] In Polybius 1000 only for the regular garrison, but an emergency force of 2000 was recruited; xii. 2 f.

[3] I.e. Polybius xvii. 6.

[4] Who was with Hannibal and wrote in Greek on his campaigns; Nepos Hann. xiii. 3. Coelius used him (Cicero de Div. I. 49). Known to Polybius, but not mentioned by him; only here in Livy. For Valerius cf. note on vi. 8.

A.U.C. 544

7 necesse est, media simillima [1] veri [2] sunt. Ceterum vocatis obsidibus primum universos bonum animum
8 habere iussit: venisse enim [3] eos in populi Romani potestatem, qui beneficio quam metu obligare homines malit exterasque gentis fide ac societate
9 iunctas habere quam tristi subiectas servitio. Deinde acceptis nominibus civitatium recensuit captivos, quot cuiusque populi essent, et nuntios domum misit
10 ut ad suos quisque recipiendos veniret. Si quarum forte civitatium legati aderant, eis praesentibus suos restituit; ceterorum curam benigne tuendorum C. Flaminio quaestori attribuit.

11 Inter haec e media turba obsidum mulier magno natu, Mandonii uxor, qui frater Indibilis Ilergetum reguli erat, flens ad pedes imperatoris procubuit obtestarique coepit ut curam cultumque feminarum
12 impensius custodibus commendaret. Cum Scipio nihil defuturum iis [4] profecto diceret, tum rursus mulier "Haud magni ista facimus" inquit; "quid enim huic fortunae non satis est? Alia me cura aetatem harum intuentem—nam ipsa iam extra peri-13 culum iniuriae muliebris sum—stimulat." Et [5] aetate et forma florentes circa eam Indibilis filiae erant aliaeque [6] nobilitate pari, quae omnes eam pro 14 parente colebant. Tum Scipio "Meae populique Romani disciplinae causa facerem" inquit "ne quid

[1] simillima $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: similia Sp Froben 2.
[2] veri M^1BSp Froben 2: veris $DANJK$ Aldus: veneris $P(3)$.
[3] enim A^sN^sJK: om. by the rest.
[4] iis Sp: his N^s: om. $P(3)NJK$ Aldus, Froben 2.
[5] stimulat. Et PC: stimulat $C^4(3)N^sJK$: simul Sp Froben 2 (with angit inserted above after alia me): animum stimulat z Aldus.
[6] filiae erant aliaeque SpN^s Froben 2: filiaeque PC: filii aeque $(3)N^2$.

with some authorities, moderate figures are the most B.C. 210 probable. To resume, calling the hostages, Scipio first bade them all to be of good cheer; for they had come into the power of the Roman people, which prefers to bind men by favour rather than by fear, and to keep foreign nations linked by loyalty and alliance, rather than reduced to a harsh slavery. Then on learning the names of the states, he made a list of the captives, showing how many belonged to each people, and sent messengers to their homes, bidding that each man come to recover his own children. If ambassadors of any states happened to be there, he restored their hostages to them directly.[1] The task of kindly protecting the rest he assigned to Gaius Flaminius, the quaestor.

Meanwhile out of the midst of the crowd of hostages came an elderly woman, the wife of Mandonius, who was the brother of Indibilis, prince of the Ilergetes, and weeping she fell at the feet of the general and began to implore him to charge the guards more strictly with the care and comfort of the women. When Scipio said that they would surely lack nothing, the woman then replied: "We do not greatly care," she said, "for such things: for in our condition what is not sufficient? It is another concern which impels me as I look at these maidens; for as for myself, I am beyond the danger of violence done to woman." And in the bloom of youth and beauty the daughters of Indibilis were standing about her, and others of no less rank, all of whom paid her the honour due a parent. Then Scipio said: "Thanks to my own training and that of the Roman quod sanctum usquam esset apud nos violaretur; nunc ut id curem inpensius vestra quoque virtus dignitasque facit, quae ne in malis quidem oblitae decoris matronalis estis." Spectatae deinde integritatis viro tradidit eas, tuerique haud secus verecunde ac modeste quam hospitum coniuges ac matres iussit.

[1] In Polybius he takes the hostages with him on his way to Tarraco; l.c. xx. 8.

A.U.C. 544

L. Captiva deinde a militibus adducitur ad eum adulta virgo, adeo eximia forma ut quacumque incedebat converteret omnium oculos. Scipio, percunctatus patriam parentesque, inter cetera accepit desponsam eam principi Celtiberorum; adulescenti Allucio nomen erat. Extemplo igitur parentibus sponsoque ab domo accitis, cum interim audiret deperire eum sponsae amore, ubi primum venit, accuratiore cum sermone quam parentis adloquitur: "Iuvenis" inquit "iuvenem appello, quo minor[1] sit inter nos huius[2] sermonis verecundia. Ego, cum sponsa tua capta a militibus nostris ad me ducta[3] esset audiremque tibi eam cordi esse, et forma faceret fidem, quia ipse, si frui liceret ludo aetatis, praesertim in recto et legitimo[4] amore, et non res publica animum nostrum occupasset, veniam mihi dari sponsam impensius amanti vellem, tuo, cuius possum, amori faveo. Fuit sponsa tua apud me eadem

[1] quo minor N^s Gronovius: quo minus Sp Froben 2: minor $P(1)NJK$ Aldus.
[2] huius $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben: before inter SpN^s.
[3] ducta $P(3)N$: deducta AN^1JK Aldus, Froben.
[4] et legitimo $P(3)Sp^?$ Froben 2: legitimoque $ANJK$ Aldus.

people I would see to it that nothing which is any- B.C. 210 where sacred should suffer violence among us. But as it is, I am moved to an even stricter care in that respect by the courage and dignity of you women also, who even in misfortune have not forgotten what is seemly for a matron." He then handed them over to a man of proved uprightness, and ordered him to protect them with no less respect and modesty than the wives and mothers of guest-friends.

L. Then there was brought to him as a captive by the soldiers a grown maiden of a beauty so extraordinary that, wherever she went, she drew the eyes of everyone. Scipio, upon enquiring about her native city and her parents, learned among other things that she had been betrothed to a leading man of the Celtiberians. The young man's name was Allucius. Accordingly he at once summoned parents and fiancé from home, and as soon as he had arrived, Scipio, having heard meantime that he was desperately in love with his betrothed, addressed him in more studied language than he had used towards the parents. "As a young man," he said, "I speak to you as a young man—to lessen embarrassment between us in this conversation. It was to me that your betrothed was brought as a captive by our soldiers, and I learned of your love for her—and her beauty made that easy to believe. Therefore, since in my own case, if it were only permitted me to enjoy the pleasures of youth, especially in a proper and legitimate love, and had not the state preoccupied my attention, I should wish to be pardoned for an ardent love of a bride, I favour what is in my power—your love. Your betrothed has been qua apud soceros tuos parentisque suos verecundia; servata tibi est, ut inviolatum et dignum me teque 7 dari tibi donum posset. Hanc mercedem unam pro eo munere paciscor: amicus populo Romano sis et, si me virum bonum credis esse, qualis patrem patruumque meum iam ante hae gentes norant, scias 8 multos nostri similes in civitate Romana esse, nec ullum in terris hodie populum dici posse quem minus tibi hostem tuisque esse velis aut amicum malis." 9 Cum[1] adulescens simul pudore et gaudio perfusus,[2] dextram Scipionis tenens, deos omnis invocaret ad gratiam illi pro se referendam, quoniam sibi nequaquam satis facultatis pro suo animo atque illius erga se merito[3] esset, parentes inde cognatique virginis 10 appellati; qui, quoniam gratis sibi redderetur virgo, ad quam redimendam satis magnum attulissent 11 auri pondus, orare Scipionem ut id ab se donum acciperet coeperunt, haud minorem eius rei apud se gratiam futuram esse adfirmantes quam redditae 12 inviolatae foret virginis. Scipio, quando tanto opere peterent, accepturum se pollicitus poni ante pedes iussit vocatoque ad se Allucio "Super dotem" inquit "quam accepturus a socero es, haec tibi a me dotalia dona accedent," aurumque tollere ac 13 sibi habere iussit. His laetus donis honoribusque

A.U.C. 544

[1] Cum Sp Froben 2 : om. P(1)NJK Aldus.

[2] perfusus Sp Froben 2 : perusus P : -cusus P^2R : -cussus R^2MBDAN : -culsus CA^{vi} Aldus.

[3] merito SpN^sK Froben 2 : om. P(1)NJ Aldus.

in my camp with the same regard for modesty as B.C. 210 in the house of your parents-in-law, her own parents. She has been kept for you, so that she could be given you as a gift, unharmed and worthy of you and of me. This is the only price that I stipulate in return for that gift: be a friend to the Roman people, and if you believe me to be a good man, such as these tribes formerly came to know in my father and uncle, be assured that in the Roman state there are many like us, and that no people in the world can be named to-day which you would be less desirous of having as an enemy to you and yours, or more desirous of having as a friend." The young man, overcome by embarrassment and at the same time by joy, holding Scipio's right hand, called upon all the gods to compensate him on his own behalf, since he was far from having sufficient means to do so in accordance with his own feeling and the other's services to himself. Whereupon the parents and blood-relations of the maiden were summoned. They began to entreat Scipio, because the maiden, for whose ransom they had brought, as they said, a considerable weight of gold, was being restored to them without price, to accept that gift from them, assuring him that they would feel no less gratitude for his acceptance than for the restoration of the maiden unharmed. Scipio, since they so earnestly besought, promised that he would accept it, ordered the gift to be laid before his feet, and calling Allucius to him, said: "In addition to the dowry which you are about to receive from your father-in-law, this will be added by me as a nuptial gift to you." And he ordered him to take up the gold and keep it. Delighting in this gift and courteous treatment he was dimissus domum, implevit popularis laudibus meritis Scipionis: venisse dis simillimum iuvenem, vincentem omnia cum armis tum benignitate ac beneficiis. 14 Itaque dilectu clientium habito cum delectis mille et quadringentis equitibus intra paucos dies ad Scipionem revertit.

A.U.C. 544

LI. Scipio retentum secum Laelium, dum captivos obsidesque et praedam ex consilio eius disponeret, 2 satis [1] omnibus compositis, data quinqueremi et [2] captivis cum [3] Magone et quindecim fere senatoribus qui simul cum eo capti erant in navem [4] inpositis 3 nuntium victoriae Romam mittit. Ipse paucos dies quibus morari Carthagine statuerat exercendis 4 navalibus pedestribusque copiis absumpsit. Primo die legiones in armis quattuor milium spatio decurrerunt; secundo die arma curare et tergere ante tentoria iussi; tertio die rudibus [5] inter se in modum iustae pugnae concurrerunt praepilatisque missilibus iaculati sunt; quarto die quies data; quinto iterum 5 in armis decursum est. Hunc ordinem laboris quietisque, quoad Carthagine morati sunt, servarunt. 6 Remigium classicique milites tranquillo in altum evecti, agilitatem navium simulacris navalis pugnae 7 experiebantur. Haec extra urbem terra marique corpora simul animosque ad bellum acuebant; urbs ipsa strepebat apparatu belli fabris omnium generum

[1] satis $P(3)NJK$ Aldus: rebus SpN^s Froben 2 (inserted after omnibus by Walters, who keeps satis).

[2] et Johnson: e Madvig: om. $P(1)Sp$, etc.

[3] cum SpN^s Froben 2: -que PC: atque Madvig: om. $(1)NJK$ Aldus.

[4] navem JK Madvig (cf. Polybius X. xix. 8): nave C^4M^1BDAN Aldus, Froben: nave ut $P(3)$: naves sex (i.e. VI) Conway.

[5] rudibus $P(1)N$: sudibus M^6JK Aldus, Froben.

sent away to his home, and he filled his countrymen B.C. 210 with the well-earned praises of Scipio, saying that there had come a most godlike youth, conquering everything by arms and especially by generosity and favours. And so, after conducting a levy among his clients, he returns within a few days to Scipio with fourteen hundred picked horsemen.

LI. Scipio kept Laelius by him until with his advice he should dispose of captives and hostages and the booty. Then when everything had been properly arranged, he furnished him with a five-banker,[1] put on shipboard the captives with Mago and about fifteen senators who had been captured with him, and sent Laelius to Rome to report the victory. He himself spent the few days during which he had decided to remain at (New) Carthage in drilling his naval and land forces. On the first day the legions would run under arms for four miles; on the second they were ordered to take care of their arms and clean them in front of their tents; on the third day with wooden foils they encountered each other after the manner of a regular battle and hurled missile weapons provided with a button at the end: on the fourth day they were given a rest; on the fifth they again ran quickly under arms. This disposition of work and rest they maintained so long as they remained at (New) Carthage. The oarsmen and marines, when the sea was calm, would sail out into open water and test the mobility of their ships in sham naval battles. Such training outside the city by land and sea steeled both bodies and minds for war. The city itself rang with preparations for war, since artisans

[1] Polybius also mentions the quinquereme only (xix. 8). But a small convoy is to be presumed; cf. XXVII. vii. 4.

A.U.C. 544

8 in publicam officinam[1] inclusis. Dux cuncta pari cura obibat: nunc in classe ac navali erat, nunc cum legionibus decurrebat.[2] nunc operibus aspiciendis tempus dabat, quaeque in officinis quaeque in armamentario ac navalibus fabrorum multitudo pluruma 9 in singulos dies certamine ingenti faciebat. His ita incohatis refectisque quae quassata erant muri,[3] dispositisque praesidiis ad custodiam urbis, Tarraconem est profectus, a multis legationibus protinus 10 in via aditus, quas partim dato responso ex itinere dimisit, partim distulit Tarraconem, quo omnibus novis veteribusque sociis edixerat conventum. Et cuncti fere qui cis Hiberum incolunt populi, multi etiam ulterioris provinciae convenerunt.

11 Carthaginiensium duces primo ex industria famam captae Carthaginis conpresserunt; deinde, ut clarior res erat quam ut tegi ac dissimulari posset, eleva- 12 bant verbis: necopinato adventu ac prope furto unius diei urbem unam Hispaniae interceptam, cuius[4] rei tam parvae praemio elatum insolentem iuvenem inmodico gaudio speciem magnae victoriae 13 imposuisse; at ubi adpropinquare tres duces, tres victores hostium exercitus audisset, occursuram ei 14 extemplo domesticorum funerum memoriam. Haec in volgus iactabant, haudquaquam ipsi ignari quantum sibi ad omnia virium Carthagine amissa decessisset.

[1] -cam officinam Sp (omitting a line from -li fabris to in publi-) Walters: -ca officina P(1)NJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] nunc in classe . . . decurrebat SpN[s] Froben 2: om. P(1)NJK Aldus (three lines lost).

[3] quae quassata erant muri SpN[s], Froben 2: qua quassaverant muris P: same omitting qua P1, but with quos CA[s] Aldus: qua quassati erant, muris Crévier.

[4] cuius P(1)NJK Aldus, Froben: eius Sp.

of all kinds were shut up in public workshops. The general inspected everything with the same care; now he was on the fleet and the docks, now he was with the legions as they ran; now he was giving his time to viewing the work that was done from day to day in shops and arsenal and on the docks, with the utmost rivalry, by the great multitude of artisans. Having made such a beginning, and having repaired battered parts of the wall, and leaving forces posted to defend the city, he set out for Tarraco, being approached by many embassies in the course of his march. Some of these he answered and dismissed without stopping, some he postponed till he reached Tarraco, at which he had announced an assembly for all the allies new and old. And nearly all the peoples dwelling on this side of the Ebro came together, and many also from the farther province. B.C. 210

The Carthaginian commanders at first purposely suppressed the news of the capture of (New) Carthage. Then, when the matter was too well known to be concealed or masked, their language would minimize it, saying that by a sudden arrival and almost by stealth on a single day a single city of Spain had been seized; and carried away by success on so small a scale, an arrogant youth in an excess of joy had given it the appearance of a great victory; but when he heard that three generals, three victorious armies of the enemy were approaching, there would at once come to him the memory of the losses in his family. Such were their remarks in public, but in themselves they were by no means unaware what a mass of resources for every purpose had gone with the loss of (New) Carthage.

LIBRI XXVI PERIOCHA

Hannibal ad tertium lapidem ab urbe Roma super Anienem castra posuit. Ipse cum duobus milibus equitum usque ad ipsam Capenam portam, ut situm urbis exploraret, obequitavit. Et cum per triduum in aciem utrimque exercitus omnis descendisset, certamen tempestas diremit; nam cum in castra redisset, statim serenitas erat. Capua capta est a Q. Fulvio et Ap. Claudio consulibus. Principes Campanorum veneno sibi mortem consciverunt. Cum senatus Campanorum deligatus esset ad palos, ut securi feriretur, litteras a senatu missas Q. Fulvius consul, quibus iubebatur parcere, antequam legeret, in sinu posuit et lege agi iussit et supplicium peregit. Cum comitiis apud populum quaereretur cui mandaretur Hispaniarum imperium, nullo id volente suscipere, P. Scipio, P. filius eius qui in Hispania ceciderat, professus est se iturum, et suffragio populi consensuque omnium missus Novam Carthaginem expugnavit, cum haberet annos XXIV videreturque divina stirpe creatus, quia et ipse, postquam togam acceperat, cotidie in Capitolio erat, et in cubiculo matris eius anguis saepe videbatur. Res praeterea gestas in Sicilia continet et amicitiam cum Aetolis iunctam bellumque gestum adversus Acarnanas et Philippum, Macedoniae regem.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXVI

Hannibal pitched his camp on the bank of the Anio at the third milestone from the city of Rome. In person with two thousand horsemen he rode up even to the Porta Capena,[1] to examine the lie of the city. And when for three days the entire army on each side had gone out into battle-line, a storm broke off the combat; for when they had returned to camp, at once there was a clear sky. Capua was taken by Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius, the consuls. The leading men of the Capuans took their own lives by poison. When the senators of Capua had been bound to stakes, to be beheaded, Quintus Fulvius, the consul, on receiving a letter from the senate in which he was bidden to spare them, put the letter in his bosom before reading it and ordered that the law be complied with, and carried out the penalty. When at the comitia in the presence of the people the question was raised, to whom should the command of the Spanish provinces be entrusted, and no one was willing to undertake it, Publius Scipio, son of that Publius who had fallen in Spain, declared that he would go; and having been sent by vote of the people and by general agreement, he stormed New Carthage, being twenty-four years old and seeming to have sprung from a divine race, because he was himself daily on the Capitol, from the time he had assumed the toga, and because in his mother's chamber a serpent used often to be seen. In addition this book contains events in Sicily and the establishment of friendship with the Aetolians and the war waged against the Acarnanians and Philip, King of Macedonia.

[1] An error for Collina; cf. x. 3.

BOOK XXVII

LIBER XXVII

A.U.C. 544

I. Hic status rerum in Hispania erat. In Italia consul Marcellus Salapia per proditionem recepta 2 Marmoreas et Meles de Samnitibus vi cepit. Ad tria milia militum ibi Hannibalis, quae praesidii causa relicta erant, oppressa: praeda—et aliquantum eius fuit—militi concessa. Tritici quoque ducenta quadraginta milia modium et centum 3 decem milia hordei inventa. Ceterum nequaquam inde tantum gaudium fuit quanta clades intra paucos 4 dies accepta est haud procul Herdonea urbe. Castra ibi Cn. Fulvius proconsul habebat spe recipiendae Herdoneae, quae post Cannensem cladem ab Romanis defecerat, nec loco satis tuto posita nec prae- 5 sidiis firmata. Neglegentiam insitam ingenio ducis augebat spes ea, quod labare iis adversus Poenum fidem senserat, postquam Salapia amissa excessisse 6 iis locis in Bruttios Hannibalem auditum est. Ea omnia ab Herdonea per occultos nuntios delata Hannibali simul curam sociae retinendae urbis et spem fecere incautum hostem adgrediendi. Exercitu

[1] Two unknown towns where Hannibal had important supply bases. For Salapia, in Apulia, northwest of Cannae, cf. XXVI. xxxviii. 6 ff. and note. Its garrison consisted of 500 Numidians: l.c. § 11.

[2] In Apulia, 30 miles west of Cannae; XXV. xxi. 1; xxii. 14.

BOOK XXVII

I. Such was the state of affairs in Spain. In Italy the consul Marcellus, having regained possession of Salapia by betrayal, took Marmoreae and Meles [1] from the Samnites by force. About three thousand of Hannibal's soldiers, who had been left as a garrison, were overpowered there. The booty—and there was much of it—was turned over to the soldiers. In addition two hundred and forty thousand pecks of wheat and a hundred and ten thousand pecks of barley were found. But the rejoicing in consequence by no means balanced the great loss suffered within a few days not far from the city of Herdonea.[2] There Gnaeus Fulvius, the proconsul, was encamped, in the hope of regaining Herdonea, which had deserted the Romans after the disaster at Cannae; but his camp was pitched in a position neither quite safe nor strongly held. Carelessness, ingrained in the character of the general, was increased by that hope, inasmuch as he had learned that their loyalty was weakening and turning against the Carthaginian, ever since they had heard that, after the loss of Salapia, Hannibal had withdrawn from that region into the land of the Bruttii. The report of all this to Hannibal from Herdonea by secret messengers made him concerned to retain an allied city and at the same time gave him the hope of attacking the enemy unawares. With an army unencumbered B.C. 210

A.U.C. 544

expedito, ita ut famam prope praeveniret, magnis itineribus ad Herdoneam contendit et, quo plus terroris hosti obiceret, acie instructa accessit. 7 Par audacia Romanus, consilio et viribus impar, 8 copiis raptim eductis conflixit. Quinta legio et sinistra ala acriter pugnam inierunt: ceterum Hannibal signo equitibus dato ut, cum pedestres acies occupassent praesenti certamine oculos animosque, circumvecti pars castra hostium, pars terga trepi- 9 dantium[1] invaderent, ipse Cn. Fulvi similitudinem nominis, quia Cn. Fulvium praetorem biennio ante in isdem devicerat locis, increpans, similem eventum 10 pugnae fore adfirmabat. Neque ea spes vana fuit; nam cum comminus acie et peditum certamine multi 11 cecidissent Romanorum, starent tamen ordines signaque, equestris tumultus a tergo, simul a castris[2] clamor hostilis auditus sextam ante[3] legionem, quae in secunda acie posita prior ab Numidis turbata est, quintam deinde atque eos qui ad prima signa 12 erant avertit. Pars in fugam effusi, pars in medio caesi, ubi et ipse Cn. Fulvius cum undecim tribunis 13 militum cecidit. Romanorum sociorumque quot caesa in eo proelio milia sint, quis pro certo adfirmet, cum tredecim milia alibi,[4] alibi[5] haud plus quam

[1] trepidantium Gronovius: oppidantium P(3): oppugnantium AN Aldus: pugnantium JK Froben: necopinantium Sauppe.

[2] a castris A^sN^sJK: acris P(3).

[3] ante P(3)JK Froben 2 (after legionem AN Aldus): deleted by J. H. Voss, Conway.

[4] alibi P(3)AN Aldus, Froben (after cum JKC^4).

[5] alibi AN Aldus, Froben: om. PJK.

---

[1] For this formation (legion and auxiliaries in the same line) see Vol. VI. p. 422, note; cf. ii. 6; xii. 14; xiv. 3; xlii. 2.

by baggage he hastened by forced marches to Her- B.C. 210 donea, so that he almost outstripped reports of his coming; and to strike more alarm into the enemy, he approached the city in battle-array. The Roman, who was his equal in boldness but not in strategy and in forces, hastily led out his troops and engaged. The fifth legion and the left ala [1] went into battle with spirit. But Hannibal gave the order to his cavalry, that when the infantry lines should have concentrated the eyes and attention of the enemy upon the immediate conflict, they should turn the flanks and attack, some of them the enemy's camp, some the rear of the wavering troops. And he himself, scornfully alluding to the similarity in the name of Gnaeus Fulvius, since he had defeated a praetor Gnaeus Fulvius two years before in the same region, asserted that the outcome of the battle would be similar. Nor was that hope groundless. For when many of the Romans had fallen in the close contact of the lines during the infantry battle, while the ranks and standards nevertheless held their ground, the wild charge of the cavalry was heard in the rear, and at the same time the shouts of the enemy from the camp. This routed first the sixth legion, which was posted in the second line and was the first to be thrown into disorder by the Numidians; and then it routed the fifth legion and the men who were with the front-line standards. Some scattered in flight, some were slain in the centre of the battle, where Gnaeus Fulvius also fell together with eleven tribunes of the soldiers. How many thousand Romans and allies were slain in that battle who could state with certainty, inasmuch as in one source I find thirteen thousand, in another not more septem inveniam? Castris praedaque victor potitur.

A.U.C. 544

14 Herdoneam, quia et defecturam fuisse ad Romanos comperit nec mansuram in fide, si inde abscessisset, multitudine omni Metapontum ac Thurios traducta incendit; occidit principes qui cum Fulvio conloquia 15 occulta habuisse comperti sunt. Romani qui ex tanta clade evaserant diversis itineribus semermes ad Marcellum consulem in Samnium perfugerunt.

II. Marcellus nihil admodum tanta clade territus litteras Romam ad senatum de duce atque exercitu ad
2 Herdoneam amisso scribit: ceterum eundem se, qui post Cannensem pugnam ferocem victoria Hannibalem contudisset,[1] ire adversus eum, brevem illi laetitiam
3 qua exsultet[2] facturum. Et Romae quidem cum luctus ingens ex praeterito, tum timor in futurum
4 erat: consul ex Samnio in Lucanos transgressus ad Numistronem in conspectu Hannibalis loco plano, 5 cum Poenus collem teneret, posuit castra. Addidit et aliam fidentis speciem, quod prior in aciem eduxit; nec detractavit Hannibal, ut signa portis efferri vidit. Ita tamen aciem instruxerunt ut Poenus dextrum cornu in collem erigeret, Romani
6 sinistrum ad oppidum adplicarent. Ab Romanis

[1] contudisset $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben, Conway: contuderit JK Madvig.

[2] exsultet $P(1)NJK$: exsultaret conj. Conway.

[1] There is reason to believe that Livy's authorities had duplicated the defeat of a Fulvius (with identity of place and suspiciously similar circumstances), and that this is the real event, while that in XXV. xxi. is the doublet, due to confusion between Gnaeus Fulvius Centumalus, consul in 211 B.C., and Gnaeus Fulvius Flaccus, praetor in 212 B.C. But the praetor must have suffered a shameful defeat somewhere; for the detailed account of his trial in XXVI. ii. 7 ff. and iii. for cowardice and neglect of duty could hardly be invented. Cf.

than seven? The camp and booty fell to the victor. B.C. 210
As for Herdonea, in view of his information that it would have revolted to the Romans and would not remain loyal to him if he should withdraw, he removed the whole population to Metapontum and Thurii and set fire to the city. He put to death the leading men who, he was informed, had had secret conversations with Fulvius. The Romans who had made their escape from so disastrous a battle, by different roads and half-armed sought refuge with the consul Marcellus in Samnium.[1]

II. Marcellus, who was not particularly alarmed by so serious a defeat, wrote a letter to the senate at Rome in regard to the loss of general and army at Herdonea. He said that nevertheless, being the same man who had frustrated Hannibal, after the battle of Cannae elated by that victory, he was marching against him to cut short his joy and exultation. At Rome, to be sure, there was not only great sorrow owing to what had happened, but also great fear for the future. The consul, however, crossing over from Samnium into Lucania, pitched camp near Numistro,[2] in sight of Hannibal on level ground, while the Carthaginian held a hill. He added the further appearance of confidence in being the first to lead out into battle-line. And Hannibal did not refuse, when he saw the standards borne out of the gates. Nevertheless they drew up their lines so that the Carthaginian made his right wing reach up the hill, while the Romans rested their left wing on the town.

De Sanctis, Storia dei Romani III. 2. 300, 459 f.; Cambridge Ancient History VIII. 81; Mommsen, Staatsrecht II³. 320 f.

[2] In the extreme north of Lucania, southwest of Venusia, at a distance of ca. 25 miles.

A.U.C. 544

prima legio et dextra ala, ab Hannibale Hispani milites et funditores Baliares, elephanti quoque commisso iam certamine in proelium acti; diu 7 pugna neutro inclinata stetit. Ab hora tertia cum ad noctem pugnam extendissent, fessaeque pugnando primae acies essent,[1] primae legioni tertia, dextrae alae sinistra subiit, et apud hostis integri a fessis 8 pugnam accepere. Novum atque atrox proelium ex iam segni repente exarsit, recentibus animis corporibusque; sed[2] nox incerta victoria diremit 9 pugnantis. Postero die Romani ab sole orto in multum diei stetere in acie; ubi nemo hostium adversus prodiit, spolia per otium legere et congestos 10 in unum locum cremavere suos. Nocte insequenti Hannibal silentio movit castra et in Apuliam abiit. Marcellus, ubi lux fugam hostium aperuit, sauciis cum praesidio modico Numistrone relictis praepositoque iis L. Furio Purpurione tribuno militum, vestigiis institit sequi. Ad Venusiam adeptus eum 11 est. Ibi per dies aliquot, cum ab stationibus procursaretur, mixta equitum peditumque tumultuosa magis proelia quam[3] magna, et ferme omnia Romanis 12 secunda fuere. Inde per Apuliam ducti exercitus sine ullo memorando certamine, cum Hannibal nocte

[1] The sentence Ab hora tertia . . . primae acies essent precedes Ab Romanis, § 6, in $P(1)JK$ Aldus, Froben: transferred to this position by Heusinger, Conway. An early copyist seems at first to have overlooked the sentence Ab Romanis . . . stetit. Hence the confused order of time. If the MS. order is retained, one may begin a new sentence with Ut (supplied by Madvig before primae, § 7).

[2] sed A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: ex P: et $P^{2?}(1)N$.

[3] quam, with this word begins a lacuna in $P(1)N$, extending to (not through) quia, iii. 7. Apparently P omitted a whole page of the copy before him; supplied for us by A^sN^sJKx.

On the Roman side the first legion and right ala, on B.C. 210
Hannibal's side the Spanish soldiers and Balearic slingers were engaged; and the elephants also were driven into battle after the conflict had begun. For a long time the battle hung in the balance, not inclining in either direction. After they had prolonged the battle from the third hour to nightfall and the front lines were exhausted by fighting, the third legion relieved the first, the left ala relieved the right, and among the enemy fresh troops took over the battle from the weary. A new battle and fierce suddenly flamed out of a conflict now grown spiritless, for the combatants were now fresh in spirit and in body. But night parted them with victory undecided. On the next day the Romans stood in line from sunrise until late in the day. When none of the enemy came out against them, they gathered spoils at their leisure, carried corpses of their men into one place and burned them. On the following night Hannibal broke camp silently and marched away into Apulia. Marcellus, when day disclosed the flight of the enemy, left the wounded at Numistro with a small garrison, placed Lucius Furius Purpurio, a tribune of the soldiers, in command of them, and made haste to follow on Hannibal's heels. Near Venusia [1] he overtook him. There for a number of days, while charges were made by outposts, there were mixed cavalry and infantry engagements, rather skirmishes than important battles, and nearly all of them favourable to the Romans. Thence the armies were led through Apulia without any notable conflict, since Hannibal

[1] In Apulia, near the borders of Samnium, to which it is sometimes assigned; cf. XXII. xlix. 14; liv. 1 ff.

A.U.C. 544

signa moveret, locum insidiis quaerens, Marcellus nisi certa luce et explorato ante non sequeretur.

III. Capuae interim Flaccus dum bonis principum vendendis, agro qui publicatus erat locando—locavit autem omnem frumento—tempus terit, ne deesset materia in Campanos saeviendi, novum in occulto gliscens per indicium protractum est facinus. Milites aedificiis emotos, simul ut cum agro tecta urbis fruenda locarentur, simul metuens ne suum quoque exercitum sicut Hannibalis nimia urbis amoenitas emolliret, in portis murisque sibimet ipsos tecta militer coegerat aedificare. Erant autem pleraque ex cratibus ac tabulis facta, alia harundine texta, stramento intecta omnia,[1] velut de industria alimentis[2] ignis. Haec noctis una hora omnia ut[3] incenderent, centum septuaginta Campani principibus Blossiis fratribus coniuraverant. Indicio eius rei ex familia Blossiorum facto, portis repente iussu proconsulis clausis, cum ad arma signo dato milites concurrissent, comprehensi omnes qui in noxa erant, et quaestione acriter habita damnati necatique;

[1] omnia Rhenanus: omne $SpA^{s}N^{s}JKx$ Conway: omnibus z Aldus, Froben.

[2] alimentis $Sp^{2}N^{s}JKx$ Aldus, Froben: alimentum A^{s} Conway.

[3] ut Madvig: om. $A^{s}N^{s}JKx$.

---

[1] Lands and buildings belonging to the Capuans had been added to the ager publicus of the Roman people (XXVI. xvi. 8), and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, consul in 212 B.C., as conqueror is leasing lands and houses. His duties were later taken over by the censors, who normally had that task; cf. xi. 8.

would set his standards in motion by night, seeking B.C. 210 positions for ambuscades, while Marcellus did not follow except in broad daylight and after reconnoitring.

III. At Capua meantime, while Flaccus was spending his time in selling the property of leading men, in leasing lands that had been confiscated[1]—and he leased them all in return for grain—a fresh crime fomented in secret was brought to light by informers, that he might not lack occasion for harsh treatment of the Capuans. The soldiers had been removed from dwellings, in order that houses in the city might be leased together with the land, and because Flaccus at the same time feared that the great charms of the city might weaken his army also, as they had Hannibal's. Accordingly he had compelled them to build their own shelters soldier-fashion at the gates and along the walls. Furthermore most of these were made of wickerwork and planks, others of reeds interwoven, all of them thatched with straw, as though these materials were deliberately intended to feed the flames. A hundred and seventy Capuans,[2] under the lead of the brothers Blossii, had conspired to set fire to all of these huts at the same hour of the night. Information in regard to this was given by slaves of the Blossii, and the gates were suddenly closed by order of the proconsul. The soldiers having rushed to arms at a given signal, all who were involved in the crime were arrested, and after a rigorous inquiry were condemned and put to death. The informers received

[2] Evidently the rigorous measures against the Capuans (XXVI. xxxiv. 7) had not yet been carried out, for the Blossii were still in possession of their slaves; § 5.

A.U.C. 541

6 indicibus libertas et aeris dena milia data. Nucerinos et Acerranos, querentes ubi habitarent non esse, Acerris ex parte incensis, Nuceria deleta, Romam
7 Fulvius ad senatum misit. Acerranis permissum ut aedificarent quae incensa erant: Nucerini Atellam, quia[1] id maluerant, Atellanis Calatiam migrare iussis, traducti.
8 Inter multas magnasque res, quae nunc secundae, nunc adversae occupabant cogitationes hominum, ne
9 Tarentinae quidem arcis excidit memoria. M. Ogulnius et P. Aquilius in Etruriam legati ad frumentum coemendum quod Tarentum portaretur profecti, et mille milites de exercitu urbano, par numerus Romanorum sociorumque, eodem in praesidium cum frumento missi.

IV. Iam aestas in exitu erat, comitiorumque consularium instabat tempus; sed litterae Marcelli negantis e re publica esse vestigium abscedi ab Hannibale, cui cedenti certamenque abnuenti gravis
2 ipse instaret, curam[2] iniecerant ne aut consulem tum maxime res agentem a bello avocarent, aut in 3 annum consules deessent. Optimum visum est, quamquam extra Italiam esset, Valerium potius
4 consulem ex Sicilia revocari. Ad eum litterae iussu

[1] quia, here P(1)N resume; cf. p. 208, note 3.
[2] curam P(1)N Aldus, Froben: patribus curam A[s]JK Conway.

---

[1] For the destruction of these cities cf. XXIII. xv. 6 and xvii. 7.
[2] Atella and Calatia, nearest towns (south and southeast) to Capua, had revolted from the Romans after Cannae; XXII. lxi. 11. Recovered five years later; XXVI. xvi. 5.

their freedom and ten thousand asses each. As for B.C. 210 the men of Nuceria and Acerrae, who complained that they had no dwelling-place, since Acerrae had been partly burned and Nuceria destroyed,[1] Fulvius sent them to the senate at Rome. The Acerrans were permitted to build what had been burned; the Nucerians, having so elected, were conducted to Atella, while the Atellans were ordered to migrate to Calatia.[2]

Among the many important events which were engaging men's attention, as being now favourable and now unfavourable, the citadel of Tarentum[3] also was not forgotten. Marcus Ogulnius and Publius Aquilius set out for Etruria as commissioners to buy up grain to be shipped to Tarentum. And a thousand soldiers from the army at the city, equally divided between Romans and allies, were sent with the grain to the same place on garrison duty.

IV. Already the summer was at an end and the time for the consular election at hand. But a letter from Marcellus, stating that it was against the public interest for him to move a step away from Hannibal, since he was himself pressing him hard as he retired and refused an engagement, had inspired concern, for fear they must call the consul away from the war at the moment when he was actively engaged, or else should be without consuls for the next year. It seemed best instead to recall the consul Valerius from Sicily, even though he was outside of Italy. To Valerius under orders from the senate Lucius

[3] For two years Hannibal had been master of Tarentum, while the Roman garrison was still holding out in the citadel; XXV. ix–xi; xv. 4 f.

A.U.C. 544

senatus ab L. Manlio praetore urbano missae cum litteris consulis M. Marcelli, ut ex iis nosceret quae causa patribus eum potius quam collegam revocandi ex provincia esset.

5 Eo fere tempore legati ab rege Syphace Romam venerunt, quae is [1] prospera proelia cum [2] Cartha-6 giniensibus fecisset memorantes: regem nec inimiciorem ulli populo quam Carthaginiensi nec amiciorem quam Romano esse adfirmabant; misisse eum antea legatos in Hispaniam ad Cn. et P. Cornelios imperatores Romanos; nunc ab ipso velut fonte petere 7 Romanam amicitiam voluisse. Senatus non legatis modo benigne respondit, sed et ipse legatos cum donis ad regem misit, L. Genucium, P. Poetelium, 8 P. Popillium. Dona tulere togam et tunicam purpuream, sellam eburneam, pateram ex quinque 9 pondo auri [3] factam. Protinus et alios Africae regulos iussi adire. Iis quoque quae darentur portata, togae praetextae et terna pondo paterae 10 aureae. Et Alexandream ad Ptolomaeum et Cleopatram reges M. Atilius et M'. Acilius legati, ad commemorandam renovandamque amicitiam missi, dona tulere, regi togam et tunicam purpuream cum sella eburnea, reginae pallam pictam cum amiculo purpureo.

11 Multa ea aestate qua haec facta sunt ex pro-

[1] quae is SpN[s]JK Froben 2: quaeque P(1)N.
[2] cum ANJK: rex cum P(1) Aldus, Froben.
[3] auri P(1)N Aldus: om. SpJK (these having auream after pateram).

---

[1] Cf. XXIV. xlviii. 9.
[2] Like the sella curulis, with tusks for legs. As a present for kings cf. XXX. xv. 11; XXXI. xi. 12; XLII. xiv. 10. For the patera cf. XXVI. xlvii. 7 and note.

Manlius, the city praetor, sent a letter, together with the letter of Marcus Marcellus, the consul, that from these letters Valerius might learn what reason the senators had for recalling him rather than his colleague from his province. B.C. 210

About the same time legates from King Syphax came to Rome, reporting what successes he had had in battle with the Carthaginians. They stated that the king was not more hostile to any people than to the Carthaginian, nor more friendly to any than to the Roman people; that previously he had sent legates to Spain to Gnaeus and Publius Cornelius,[1] the Roman generals; that now he was minded to seek Roman friendship, as it were at the very source. The senate not only replied graciously to the legates, but also sent its legates, Lucius Genucius, Publius Poetelius, Publius Popillius, to the king with gifts. They took with them as gifts a purple toga and tunic, an ivory chair,[2] a golden patera weighing five pounds. They were ordered to go on and visit other princes in Africa. For these also they took with them bordered togas and golden paterae, each of them three pounds in weight, to be presented to them. Also to Alexandria as ambassadors to the monarchs, Ptolemy and Cleopatra,[3] were sent Marcus Atilius and Manius Acilius, to call to mind and revive friendship with them. As gifts they carried for the king a purple toga and tunic, with an ivory chair, for the queen an embroidered palla and a purple cloak.

During the summer in which these events occurred

[3] Arsinoë was her real name, daughter of Ptolemy III, sister and wife of Ptolemy IV.

A.U.C. 544

pinquis urbibus agrisque nuntiata sunt prodigia: Tusculi agnum cum ubere lactenti natum, Iovis aedis culmen fulmine ictum ac prope omni tecto nudatum; 12 isdem ferme diebus Anagniae terram ante portam ictam diem ac noctem sine ullo ignis alimento arsisse, et aves ad compitum Anagninum in luco Dianae 13 nidos in arboribus reliquisse; Tarracinae in mari haud procul portu angues magnitudinis mirae lascivientium 14 piscium modo exsultasse; Tarquiniis porcum cum ore humano genitum, et in agro Capenate ad lucum Feroniae quattuor signa sanguine multo diem ac 15 noctem sudasse. Haec prodigia hostiis maioribus procurata decreto pontificum; et supplicatio diem unum[1] Romae ad omnia pulvinaria, alterum in Capenati agro ad Feroniae lucum indicta.

V. M. Valerius consul litteris excitus, provincia exercituque mandato L. Cincio praetori, M. Valerio Messalla praefecto classis cum parte navium in Africam praedatum simul speculatumque quae populus Carthaginiensis ageret pararetque misso, 2 ipse decem navibus Romam profectus cum prospere pervenisset, senatum extemplo habuit, ubi[2] de suis 3 rebus gestis commemoravit: cum annos prope sexaginta in Sicilia terra marique magnis saepe

[1] unum A'N'JK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)N.
[2] ubi P(1)N Aldus : ibi SpJK Froben 2.

---

[1] At the junction of the Via Latina and the Via Labicana, 40 miles from Rome by the latter.
[2] Cf. XXVI. xi. 8.
[3] Cf. XXIV. x. 13 and note; XXI. lxii. 9; XXII. i. 15; x. 9.

many portents were reported from neighbouring B.C. 210 cities and from the country: that at Tusculum a lamb was born with an udder full of milk, and that the ridge of Jupiter's temple was struck by lightning and stripped of almost all its roofing; that at Anagnia about the same time ground struck by lightning outside the gate burned for a day and a night without any fuel; and that at the crossroads [1] near Anagnia, in the grove of Diana, birds deserted their nests in the trees; that at Tarracina, in the sea not far from the harbour, serpents of remarkable size leaped about after the manner of fish at play; that at Tarquinii a pig was born with a human face; and that in the territory of Capena, at the grove of Feronia,[2] four statues sweated blood profusely for a day and a night. These prodigies were atoned for with full-grown victims by decree of the pontiffs. And prayers were ordered for one day in Rome at all the pulvinaria,[3] and for a second day at the grove of Feronia, in the territory of Capena.

V. Marcus Valerius, the consul, on being summoned by the letter, assigned his province and army to Lucius Cincius,[4] a praetor, and sent Marcus Valerius Messalla, admiral of the fleet, with a part of his ships to Africa, to plunder and at the same time to find out what the Carthaginian state was doing and preparing to do. The consul himself set out for Rome with ten ships, and on his safe arrival he at once held a session of the senate, in which he set forth his own achievements: that for almost sixty years war had been carried on in Sicily by land and sea, often with great losses, but now he had completed

[4] The annalist Cincius Alimentus; XXVI. xxiii. 1; repeatedly mentioned in XXVII.

A.U.C. 544

cladibus bellatum esset, se eam provinciam confecisse. Neminem Carthaginiensem in Sicilia esse; 4 neminem Siculum non esse:[1] qui fugati metu inde afuerint, omnis in urbes, in agros suos reductos arare, 5 serere;[2] desertam recoli terram, tandem[3] frugiferam ipsis cultoribus, populoque Romano pace ac bello 6 fidissimum annonae subsidium. Exim Muttine et si quorum aliorum merita erga populum Romanum erant in senatum introductis, honores omnibus ad ex- 7 solvendam fidem consulis[4] habiti. Muttines etiam civis Romanus factus, rogatione ab tribunis[5] plebis ex auctoritate patrum ad plebem lata.

8 Dum haec Romae geruntur, M. Valerius quinquaginta navibus cum ante lucem ad Africam accessisset, improviso in agrum Uticensem escensionem fecit: 9 eumque late depopulatus multis mortalibus cum alia omnis generis praeda captis ad naves redit atque in[6] Siciliam tramisit, tertio decumo die quam profectus 10 inde erat,[7] Lilybaeum revectus. Ex captivis quaestione habita haec comperta consulique Laevino omnia ordine perscripta, ut sciret quo in statu 11 res Africae[8] essent: quinque milia Numidarum cum Masinissa, Galae filio, acerrimo iuvene, Cartha-

[1] non esse, placed here by Madvig: after afuerint P(1)NJKSp?
[2] serere *N*²*JK Aldus, Froben*: om. P(1)N.
[3] tandem, here P(1)N Aldus: before terram JK Froben 2.
[4] consulis SpJK Froben 2: a consule P(1)N Aldus: consulis a consule conj. Conway.
[5] tribunis x Luchs: abbrev. P(1)NK: tribuno J Eds.
[6] atque in JK Froben 2: et ad P(1)N Aldus.
[7] erat *N*²*JK Froben* 2: om. P(1)N.
[8] res Africae SpJK Froben 2: Africae res P(1)N Aldus.

the conquest of that province. He said that there B.C. 210 was not a Carthaginian in Sicily; that not a Sicilian was absent; that those who had been absent, banished by their fears, had all been brought back to their cities, to their lands, and were ploughing and sowing; that a deserted land was again under cultivation, productive at last for the farmers themselves, and for the Roman people in peace and in war a most dependable source of the grain supply.[1] Then Muttines and any others who had done services to the Roman people were brought into the senate, and honours were bestowed upon them all, in fulfilment of the consul's promise.[2] Muttines was even made a Roman citizen, when in accordance with a decree of the senate a bill had been proposed to the plebs by its tribunes.

While these events were occurring at Rome, Marcus Valerius, having approached the coast of Africa with fifty ships before daybreak, made an unexpected landing on the territory of Utica. And this he ravaged far and wide, captured many persons together with other booty of every description, returned to his ships and crossed over to Sicily, sailing back to Lilybaeum on the 13th day after he had left that port. Upon inquiry made from the captives the following facts were ascertained and written down fully and in order for the consul Laevinus, that he might know what the condition of affairs in Africa was: that five thousand Numidians were at Carthage under Masinissa,[3] son of Gala

[1] As in XXVI. xl. 16.
[2] Muttines' service was the betrayal of Agrigentum; XXVI. xl. 7 ff.
[3] Cf. XXIV. xlix. 1 ff.; XXV. xxxiv. 1 ff.

A.U.C. 544

gine esse, et alios per totam Africam milites mercede conduci qui in Hispaniam ad Hasdrubalem traicerentur, ut is quam maximo exercitu primo quoque tempore in Italiam transgressus iungeret se Hannibali; in eo positam victoriam credere Carthaginienses; classem praeterea ingentem apparari ad Siciliam repetendam, eamque se credere brevi traiecturam. Haec recitata a consule ita movere senatum ut non exspectanda comitia consuli censerent,[1] sed dictatore comitiorum habendorum causa dicto[2] extemplo in provinciam redeundum. Illa disceptatio tenebat, quod consul in Sicilia se M. Valerium Messallam, qui tum classi praeesset, dictatorem dicturum esse aiebat, patres extra Romanum agrum—eum autem Italia[3] terminari—negabant dictatorem dici posse. M. Lucretius tribunus plebis cum de ea re consuleret, ita decrevit senatus, ut consul, priusquam ab urbe discederet, populum rogaret quem dictatorem dici placeret, eumque quem populus iussisset diceret dictatorem: si consul noluisset, praetor populum rogaret; si ne is quidem vellet, tum tribuni ad plebem ferrent. Cum consul se populum rogaturum negasset quod suae potestatis esset, praetoremque vetuisset rogare, tribuni plebem[4] rogarunt, plebesque scivit

[1] censerent P(1)N Aldus: censeret SpJK Froben 2.
[2] dictatore . . . dicto SpJK Froben 2: -rem . . . dici et P(1)N Aldus.
[3] Italia A[1]JK Madvig: in Italia P(1)N Aldus, Froben.
[4] plebem K Conway: pl or plebis P(1)NJ Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] For a tribune presiding in the senate cf. XXII. lxi. 7.
[2] I.e. the comitia centuriata.
[3] Probably meaning the comitia tributa here, as directly contrasted with the centuriata. Livy uses the term plebis concilium in § 18 just below, but in such technicalities he is and a most impetuous young man; and that other B.C. 210 soldiers were being hired everywhere in Africa, to be sent over to Hasdrubal in Spain, so that he should cross over into Italy with the largest possible army as soon as he could and join Hannibal; that upon this the Carthaginians believed that victory depended; furthermore that a very large fleet was being made ready, for the purpose of recovering Sicily; and he believed that fleet would soon make the passage. These statements as read by the consul so swayed the senators that they decided that he must not wait for the elections, but that after appointing a dictator to conduct the elections, the consul must at once return to his province. Debate continued on one point—namely, the consul kept promising to appoint in Sicily Marcus Valerius Messalla, then in command of the fleet, as dictator, while the fathers maintained that a dictator could not be appointed outside of Roman territory, and that this was confined to Italy. When Marcus Lucretius, tribune of the plebs, sought to know its pleasure [1] in the matter, the senate decreed that, before leaving the city, the consul should ask the people [2] whom they preferred to have named dictator, and should name as dictator the man ordered by the people; that if the consul should refuse, the praetor should ask the people; in case of his refusal also, the tribunes should bring the matter before the commons.[3] When the consul refused to submit to the people a question that belonged to his own authority, and forbade the praetor to do so, the tribunes asked the commons very often vague, e.g. in XXV. iii. 13–iv. 9. In 217 B.C., after Trasumennus, the populus had made Fabius Maximus dictator; XXII. viii. 6.

A.U.C. 544

ut Q. Fulvius, qui tum ad Capuam erat, dictator 18 diceretur. Sed quo die id plebis concilium futurum erat, consul clam nocte in Siciliam abiit: destitutique patres litteras ad M. Claudium mittendas censuerunt ut desertae ab conlega rei publicae subveniret dice-19 retque quem populus iussisset dictatorem. Ita a M.
Claudio consule Q. Fulvius dictator dictus, et ex eodem plebis scito ab Q. Fulvio dictatore P. Licinius Crassus pontifex maximus magister equitum dictus.

VI. Dictator postquam Romam venit, C. Sempronium Blaesum legatum, quem ad Capuam habuerat, in Etruriam provinciam ad exercitum misit in locum
C. Calpurni praetoris, quem, ut Capuae exercituique 2 suo praeesset, litteris excivit. Ipse comitia in quem diem primum potuit edixit: quae certamine inter[1] tribunos dictatoremque iniecto perfici non 3 potuerunt. Galeria iuniorum, quae sorte praero-gativa erat, Q. Fulvium et Q. Fabium consules dixerat, eodemque iure vocatae inclinassent, ni se[2] 4 tribuni plebis C. et L. Arrenii interposuissent, qui neque magistratum continuari satis civile esse aiebant, et multo foedioris exempli eum ipsum
5 creari qui comitia haberet; itaque si suum nomen

[1] inter A^{1}JK Aldus, Froben: in P(1)N.
[2] ni se Drakenborch: nisi P(1)N.

---

[1] Marcellus, still in Apulia, did not come to Rome; ii. 12; iv. 1.

[2] For the sors praerogativae and centuria praerogativa cf. XXIV. vii. 12; ix. 3; XXVI. xxii. 13.

and the commons ordained that Quintus Fulvius, B.C. 210 who was then at Capua, should be named dictator. But on the day on which that plebeian assembly was to be held the consul left for Sicily secretly by night. And the fathers, being deserted, voted to send a letter to Marcus Claudius, that he should come to the aid of the state abandoned by his colleague, and should name as dictator whomsoever the people might command. Thus Quintus Fulvius was named dictator by Marcus Claudius,[1] the consul, and in accordance with the same decree of the commons Publius Licinius Crassus, pontifex maximus, was named master of the horse by Quintus Fulvius as dictator.

VI. On coming to Rome the dictator sent Gaius Sempronius Blaesus, his lieutenant, whom he had had at Capua, into Etruria as his province, to be with the army, taking the place of the praetor Gaius Calpurnius, whom he had summoned by letter to take command of Capua and his own army. As for himself, he proclaimed the elections for the earliest possible date. But owing to the conflict which arose between the tribunes and the dictator the election could not be completed. The Galeria century of the younger men, which obtained by lot the right to vote first,[2] had voted for Quintus Fulvius and Quintus Fabius as consuls: and the centuries called in the legal order would have inclined in the same direction, if the tribunes of the plebs, Gaius and Lucius Arrenius, had not intervened. They repeated that to prolong a magistracy was not consistent with the common interest, and also that it was a much more dangerous precedent for the man who was conducting the election to be himself elected. Accord-dictator acciperet, se comitiis intercessuros; si aliorum praeterquam ipsius ratio haberetur, comitiis 6 se moram non facere. Dictator causam comitiorum auctoritate senatus, plebis scito, exemplis tutabatur: 7 namque Cn. Servilio consule, cum C. Flaminius alter consul ad Trasumennum cecidisset, ex auctoritate patrum ad plebem latum, plebemque scivisse [1] ut, quoad bellum in Italia esset, ex iis qui consules fuissent quos et quotiens vellet reficiendi 8 consules populo ius esset; exemplaque [2] in eam rem se habere, vetus L. Postumi Megelli, qui interrex iis comitiis quae ipse habuisset consul cum C. Iunio Bubulco creatus esset; recens Q. Fabii, qui sibi continuari consulatum, nisi id bono publico fieret, 9 profecto numquam sisset.[3] His orationibus cum diu certatum esset, postremo ita inter dictatorem ac tribunos convenit ut eo quod censuisset senatus 10 staretur. Patribus id tempus rei publicae visum est ut per veteres et expertos bellique peritos imperatores res publica gereretur; itaque moram fieri 11 comitiis non placere. Concedentibus tribunis comitia habita; declarati consules Q. Fabius Maximus 12 quintum, Q. Fulvius Flaccus quartum. Praetores inde [4] creati L. Veturius Philo, T. Quinctius Crispinus,

A.U.C. 544

[1] scivisse P(1)N Aldus, Froben: iussisse SpA^{s}N^{s}JK.
[2] exemplaque SpJK Froben 2: exemplumque (or -quae) P(1)N Aldus.
[3] sisset P(3): sivisset CAN^{1} Aldus, Froben.
[4] inde A^{s}JKx: in P: om. P^{2}(1)N Aldus, Froben.

[1] This important act was overlooked by Livy in Book XXII. A plebiscite of 339 B.C., requiring an interval of ten years, was repeatedly disregarded in this period. Cf. VII. xlii; X. xiii. 8.
[2] For the third time, 291 B.C.
[3] 215 B.C.; XXIV. ix. 3 and 9 ff.

ingly, they said, if the dictator admitted his own name, they would veto the election; if other men than himself were considered, they would not delay the election. The dictator defended the procedure in the election by the authority of the senate, by the decree of the commons, by precedents. For, he said, in the consulship of Gnaeus Servilius, when Gaius Flaminius, the other consul, had fallen at Trasumennus, by authority of the fathers it was proposed to the commons, and the commons had ordained that, so long as the war remained in Italy, the people should have the right to re-elect as consuls the men they pleased and as often as they pleased from the number of those who had been consuls.[1] He added that he had precedents for so doing: an old instance, that of Lucius Postumius Megellus, who as interrex had been elected consul [2] with Gaius Iunius Bubulcus at an election which he had himself conducted; and a recent case, that of Quintus Fabius,[3] who surely would never have permitted his consulship to be prolonged unless it were done for the public welfare. After a contest long continued by such speeches, final agreement between the dictator and the tribunes was reached: that they would stand by whatever the senate should decide. To the fathers it seemed a time for the state to have its affairs in the hands of generals mature and experienced and skilled in war; and so they said they did not favour any delaying of the election. Since the tribunes gave way, the election was held. Quintus Fabius Maximus was declared consul for the fifth time, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus for the fourth. Then as praetors the following were elected: Lucius Veturius Philo, Titus Quinctius Crispinus, Gaius Hostilius B.C. 210

A.U.C. 544

C. Hostilius Tubulus, C. Aurunculeius. Magistratibus in annum creatis Q. Fulvius dictatura se abdicavit.

13 Extremo aestatis huius classis Punica navium quadraginta cum praefecto Hamilcare in Sardiniam
14 traiecta, Olbiensem primo, dein,[1] postquam ibi P. Manlius Volso praetor cum exercitu apparuit, circumacta inde ad alterum insulae latus, Caralitanum agrum vastavit, et cum praeda omnis generis in Africam redit.[2]

15 Sacerdotes Romani eo anno mortui aliquot suffectique: C. Servilius pontifex factus in locum T. Otacilii Crassi; Ti. Sempronius Ti. f. Longus augur factus 16 in locum T. Otacilii Crassi;[3] decemvir item sacris faciundis in locum Ti. Sempronii C. f. Longi Ti. Sempronius Ti. f. Longus suffectus. M. Marcius rex sacrorum mortuus est et M. Aemilius Papus maximus curio; neque in eorum locum sacerdotes eo anno suffecti.

17 Et censores hic annus habuit L. Veturium Philonem et P. Licinium Crassum, maximum pontificem. Crassus Licinius nec consul nec praetor ante fuerat quam censor est factus; ex aedilitate gradum ad 18 censuram fecit. Sed hi censores neque senatum legerunt neque quicquam publicae rei egerunt: mors diremit L. Veturi; inde et Licinius censura se

[1] dein P(1)N Froben 2: deinde JK Aldus.
[2] redit P(1)N: rediit $C^1?M^2JK$ Aldus, Froben.
[3] factus . . . Crassi, bracketed by Madvig, while JK Aldus, Froben omit Ti. Sempronius . . . Crassi, three lines in P, found also in (1).

[1] Cagliari, at the south end of the island, originally settled by Phoenicians, as had been Olbia on the northeast coast. Sardinia and Corsica had been taken by the Romans shortly after the First Punic War; XXI. i. 5; Periocha 20.

Tubulus, Gaius Aurunculeius. The magistrates B.C. 210 having been elected for the year, Quintus Fulvius abdicated his dictatorship.

At the end of this summer a Carthaginian fleet of forty ships under command of the prefect Hamilcar crossed over to Sardinia and first laid waste the region of Olbia. Then after Publius Manlius Volso, the praetor, showed himself there with an army, the fleet coasted around from Olbia to the other side of the island, ravaged the territory of Carales[1] and returned with booty of every kind to Africa.

Of the Roman priests a number died that year and successors were appointed. Gaius Servilius was made pontifex in place of Titus Otacilius Crassus; Tiberius Sempronius Longus, son of Tiberius, was made augur in place of Titus Otacilius Crassus. In like manner Tiberius Sempronius Longus, son of Tiberius, was appointed decemvir for the performance of rites in place of Tiberius Sempronius Longus, son of Gaius. Marcus Marcius, rex sacrorum, and Marcus Aemilius Papus, the chief curio,[2] died; and no priests were appointed that year in their places.

And as censors this year had Lucius Veturius Philo and Publius Licinius Crassus, pontifex maximus. Crassus Licinius had been neither consul nor praetor before he became censor; he made but one step from aedileship to censorship. But these censors neither revised the senate list nor did any public business. The death of Veturius dissolved their censorship,[3] consequently Licinius abdicated

[2] Each of the 30 curiae was headed by a curio, and at the head of the curiones was the maximus curio, whose duties were religious; cf. viii. 1–3; III. vii. 6.

[3] The only office that was terminated by the death of a colleague. Cf. XXIV. xliii. 4.

A.U.C. 544

19 abdicavit. Aediles curules L. Veturius et P. Licinius Varus ludos Romanos diem unum instaurarunt. Aediles plebei[1] Q. Catius et L. Porcius Licinus ex multaticio argento signa aenea ad Cereris[2] dedere, et ludos pro temporis eius[3] copia magnifice apparatos[4] fecerunt.

VII. Exitu anni huius C. Laelius legatus Scipionis[5] die quarto et tricensimo quam a Tarracone profectus erat Romam venit; isque cum agmine captivorum ingressus urbem magnum concursum hominum
2 fecit. Postero die in senatum introductus captam Carthaginem, caput Hispaniae, uno die, receptasque aliquot urbes quae defecissent novasque in societatem
3 adscitas exposuit. Ex captivis comperta iis fere congruentia quae in litteris fuerant M. Valerii Messallae. Maxime movit patres Hasdrubalis transitus in Italiam, vix Hannibali atque eius armis
4 obsistentem.[6] Productus et in[7] contionem Laelius eadem edisseruit.[8] Senatus ob res feliciter a

[1] plebei (or -eii) PCR: plebis $M^1BDANJK$ Aldus, Froben.
[2] Cereris A^vJ Aldus, Froben (also K, inserting edem = aedem): cererem N^s: ceteris PCR: ceteros R^2MBDAN.
[3] eius SpA^sJK Froben 2: huius $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[4] magnifice apparatos SpJKx Froben 2: -fici -atus $P(1)N$ Aldus, Conway.
[5] C. Laelius legatus Scipionis om. $P(1)N$, a line supplied from A^sN^sJK.
[6] obsistentem A^{vs} Froben 2: subsistentem $P(1)JK$ Aldus.
[7] et in $P(1)N$: in JK Aldus, Froben.
[8] edisseruit P (aed-): disseruit $P^2(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] He was consul in 206 B.C.; XXVIII. x. 8.

his office. The curule aediles, Lucius Veturius [1] B.C. 210 and Publius Licinius Varus, renewed the Roman Games for one day. The plebeian aediles, Quintus Catius and Lucius Porcius Licinus, out of money paid in fines set up bronze statues at the Temple of Ceres,[2] and they celebrated the games with splendid appointments, considering the resources of the time.

VII. At the end of this year [3] Gaius Laelius, Scipio's lieutenant, came to Rome on the thirty-fourth day after leaving Tarraco. And on entering the city with a train of captives [4] he occasioned a great concourse of people. Introduced into the senate the next day, he set forth the capture of (New) Carthage, chief city of Spain, in a single day, and the recovery of a number of cities that had revolted, and the admission of new cities into alliance. From the captives they ascertained facts which in general agreed with statements previously made in the letter of Marcus Valerius Messalla.[5] What especially stirred the fathers was Hasdrubal's proposed crossing into Italy, which was with difficulty withstanding Hannibal and his arms. On being brought before an assembly also, Laelius discoursed on the same subject. The senate decreed a thanksgiving for [2] This was the temple of the Roman plebeians and headquarters of the plebeian aediles, who conducted these ludi plebeii in November. It was founded 493 B.C.

[3] This late season may be drawn from a different authority, since the capture of New Carthage has been described as taking place in the spring, and 40 days would have been sufficient for the entire voyage. But see De Sanctis l.c. pp. 468 f.; cf. XXVI. li. 2.

[4] About 15 senators of New Carthage, according to XXVI. l.c., in addition to Mago, the commandant; cf. Polybius X. xviii. 1; xix. 8.

[5] Cf. v. 8 and 10–13.

A.U.C. 544

P. Scipione gestas supplicationem[1] in unum diem decrevit; C. Laelium primo quoque tempore cum quibus venerat navibus redire in Hispaniam iussit.— 5 Carthaginis expugnationem in hunc annum contuli multis auctoribus, haud nescius quosdam esse qui 6 anno insequenti captam tradiderint, quod[2] mihi minus simile veri visum est annum integrum Scipionem nihil gerundo in Hispania consumpsisse.

A.U.C. 545

7 Q. Fabio Maximo quintum, Q. Fulvio Flacco quartum consulibus, idibus Martiis, quo die magistratum inierunt, Italia ambobus provincia decreta, regionibus tamen partitum imperium: Fabius ad Tarentum, Fulvius in Lucanis ac Bruttiis rem gereret. 8 M. Claudio prorogatum in annum imperium. Praetores sortiti provincias, C. Hostilius Tubulus urbanam, L. Veturius Philo peregrinam cum Gallia, T. Quinctius Crispinus Capuam, C. Aurunculeius Sardiniam. 9 Exercitus ita per provincias divisi: Fulvio duae legiones quas in Sicilia M. Valerius Laevinus haberet, Q. Fabio, quibus in Etruria C. Calpurnius praefuisset; urbanus[3] exercitus ut in Etruriam succederet; C. 10 Calpurnius eidem praeesset provinciae exercituique;

[1] supplicationem Sp²A⁴N⁴ Froben 2: om. P(1)N: -nes C⁴x Aldus.

[2] quod P(1)N Aldus: sed SpJK Froben 2.

[3] praefuisset; urbanus A⁴N⁴JK: om. P(1)N, one line.

[1] A single quinquereme was mentioned XXVI. li. 2 (see note there). Smaller vessels, not deserving of mention in comparison with the captured five-banker, probably escorted her.

[2] The chronology now accepted is based on Polybius, from whose Book X. it is shown that New Carthage was taken in 209 B.C. Cf. XXVI. xviii. 2, note; De Sanctis ibid. By Livy's reckoning 208 B.C. is the year in which Scipio did nothing, since the historian has anticipated the battle of Baecula also by one year.

one day on account of Publius Scipio's successes. It B.C. 210 ordered Gaius Laelius to return as soon as possible to Spain on the ships[1] with which he had come. —The storming of (New) Carthage I have set in this year on the authority of many writers, though not unaware that there are some who have related its capture in the following year.[2] I have done so because it has seemed to me less probable that Scipio spent a whole year in Spain doing nothing.

Quintus Fabius Maximus being now consul for the B.C. 209
fifth and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus for the fourth time, on the Ides of March, the day of their entry upon office, Italy was assigned to the two as their province; their military authority, however, was geographically divided. Fabius was to command around Tarentum, Fulvius in Lucania and the land of the Bruttii. For Marcus Claudius his command was prolonged for one year. The praetors received their assignments by lot, Gaius Hostilius Tubulus the city praetorship, Lucius Veturius Philo the jurisdiction over foreigners, together with Gaul;[3] Titus Quinctius Crispinus received Capua, Gaius Aurunculeius Sardinia. The armies were distributed among the assignments as follows: to Fulvius the two legions which Marcus Valerius Laevinus had in Sicily, to Quintus Fabius those which Gaius Calpurnius had commanded in Etruria; the army at the city was to take the place of that in Etruria; Gaius Calpurnius was to be in command of that province and its army;

[3] I.e. his duties as a judge are to be taken over by the praetor urbanus, in order to leave the praetor peregrinus free to take the field as a commander; cf. xxii. 3; xxxvi. 11; XXV. iii. 2 and note.

A.U.C. 545

Capuam [1] exercitumque quem Q. Fulvius habuisset 11 T. Quinctius obtineret. C. Hostilius ab C. Laetorio propraetore provinciam exercitumque qui tum Arimini erat acciperet. M. Marcello quibus consul 12 rem gesserat legiones decretae. M. Valerio cum L. Cincio—iis quoque enim prorogatum in Sicilia imperium—Cannensis exercitus datus, eumque supplere ex militibus qui ex legionibus Cn. Fulvi 13 superessent iussi. Conquisitos eos consules in Siciliam miserunt; additaque eadem militiae ignominia [2] sub qua Cannenses militabant quique ex praetoris Cn. Fulvi exercitu ob similis iram fugae missi eo ab
14 senatu fuerant. C. Aurunculeio eaedem in Sardinia [3] legiones quibus P. Manlius Volso eam provinciam 15 obtinuerat decretae. P. Sulpicio eadem legione eademque classe Macedoniam obtinere iusso prorogatum in annum imperium. Triginta quinqueremes ex Sicilia Tarentum ad Q. Fabium consulem mitti 16 iussae; cetera classe placere [4] praedatum in Africam aut ipsum M. Valerium Laevinum traicere, aut mittere [5] seu L. Cincium seu M. Valerium Messallam

[1] exercituique; Capuam Sp²A²N²JK Froben: om. P(1)N, one line.

[2] -dem militiae ignominia om. P(1)N, one line supplied from Sp, as above.

[3] in Sardinia; following these words there was a long gap in S, as we know from Rhenanus, extending up to ix. 14 idem socios.

[4] placere A²N²JK Aldus: om. P(1)N.

[5] Laevinum traicere, aut mittere A²N²JK Aldus: messallam misere P(1)N(A²).

---

[1] An error for Lucius Veturius Philo, who was assigned to Cisalpine Gaul, while Hostilius as city-praetor must remain at Rome.

[2] Cf. i. 7–12.

Titus Quinctius was to be in charge of Capua and the army which Quintus Fulvius had had. Gaius Hostilius[1] was to take over from Gaius Laetorius, the propraetor, his province and the army which was then at Ariminum. To Marcus Marcellus were assigned the legions with which he had carried on operations as consul. To Marcus Valerius and Lucius Cincius—for their command in Sicily was also prolonged—was assigned the army from Cannae, and they were ordered to recruit it from the soldiers who survived from the legions of Gnaeus Fulvius.[2] These were sought out and sent by the consuls into Sicily. And there was added the same humiliation in the service as that under which the men from Cannae were serving, and those from the army of the praetor Gnaeus Fulvius,[3] who had been sent thither by the senate out of anger on account of their similar flight. To Gaius Aurunculeius in Sardinia were assigned the same legions with which Publius Manlius Volso had held that province.[4] Publius Sulpicius was ordered to hold Macedonia with the same legion[5] and the same fleet, and his command was prolonged for one year. Thirty five-bankers were ordered to be sent from Sicily to Quintus Fabius, the consul, at Tarentum. With the rest of his fleet it was the will of the senate, he was informed, that Marcus Valerius Laevinus should either cross over into Africa himself to plunder the country, or should send at his discretion Lucius Cincius or Marcus Valerius B.C. 209

[3] For the defeat of this Fulvius (doubted by recent historians) cf. note on i. 15.

[4] Cf. XXVI. xxviii. 11.

[5] In spite of XXVI. xxviii. 9 he seems to retain one legion, not mentioned, however, below at xxii. 10.

A.U.C. 545

17 vellet.[1] Nec de Hispania quicquam mutatum, nisi quod non in annum Scipioni Silanoque, sed donec revocati ab senatu forent, prorogatum imperium est. Ita provinciae exercituumque in eum annum partita imperia.

VIII. Inter maiorum rerum curas comitia maximi curionis, cum in locum M. Aemili sacerdos crearetur, 2 vetus excitaverunt certamen, patriciis negantibus C. Mamili Atelli, qui unus ex plebe petebat, habendam rationem esse, quia nemo ante eum nisi ex patribus 3 id sacerdotium habuisset. Tribuni appellati ad senatum rem[2] reiecerunt; senatus populi potestatem fecit: ita primus ex plebe creatus maximus curio 4 C. Mamilius Atellus. Et flaminem Dialem invitum inaugurari coegit P. Licinius pontifex maximus C. Valerium Flaccum; decemvirum sacris faciundis creatus in locum Q. Muci Scaevolae demortui C. 5 Laetorius. Causam inaugurari coacti flaminis libens reticuissem, ni ex mala fama in bonam vertisset. Ob adulescentiam neglegentem luxuriosamque C. Flaccus flamen captus a P. Licinio pontifice maximo erat. L. Flacco fratri germano cognatisque aliis ob 6 eadem vitia invisus. Is ut animum eius cura sacrorum et caerimoniarum cepit, ita repente exuit antiquos mores ut nemo tota iuventute haberetur prior nec

[1] vellet $A^{1}N^{1}JK$ Aldus: om. $P(1)N$.
[2] rem Gronovius: om. $P(1)NJK$.

[1] On this Livy's authorities must have differed, for a year later we read that their commands were prolonged for one year; xxii. 7.
[2] Cf. vi. 16 and note.

Messalla. And in regard to Spain no change was made, except that the commands of Scipio and Silanus were prolonged, not for one year, but until they should be recalled by the senate.[1] Thus were the assignments and army commands apportioned for that year. B.C. 209

VIII. In the midst of their attention to more important matters the election of a maximus curio,[2] when they were choosing a priest to succeed Marcus Aemilius, stirred up an old contest. The patricians declared that no regard should be paid to Manilius Atellus, the one plebeian who was a candidate, since no one not a patrician had previously held that priesthood. The tribunes were appealed to, and referred the case back to the senate; the senate gave the people power to decide. Thus as the first plebeian Gaius Manilius Atellus was elected maximus curio. Installation as flamen of Jupiter Gaius Valerius Flaccus, though unwilling, was compelled by Publius Licinius, the pontifex maximus, to accept. Gaius Laetorius was named one of the decemviri for the performance of rites in place of Quintus Mucius Scaevola deceased. The reason for installing a flamen perforce I should gladly have passed over in silence, had not his reputation changed from bad to good. Because of his irresponsible and dissipated youth Gaius Flaccus, who was odious to his own brother, Lucius Flaccus, and other relatives on account of the same vices, had been seized upon as flamen by Publius Licinius, pontifex maximus. As soon as the charge of rites and ceremonies took possession of his mind, Gaius so suddenly put off his old character that no one among all the young men stood higher in the estimation and approval of the leading sena-

A.U.C. 545

probatior primoribus patrum, suis pariter alienisque, 7 esset. Huius famae consensu elatus ad iustam fiduciam sui rem intermissam per multos annos ob indignitatem flaminum priorum repetivit, ut in 8 senatum introiret. Ingressum eum curiam cum P.[1] Licinius praetor inde eduxisset, tribunos plebis appellavit. Flamen vetustum ius sacerdotii repete-bat: datum id cum toga praetexta et sella curuli ei [2] 9 flamonio esse. Praetor non exoletis vetustate annalium exemplis stare ius, sed recentissimae cuiusque consuetudinis usu volebat: nec patrum nec avorum memoria Dialem quemquam id ius 10 usurpasse. Tribuni rem inertia flaminum oblitteratam ipsis, non sacerdotio damno fuisse cum aequom censuissent, ne ipso quidem contra tendente praetore, magno adsensu patrum plebisque flaminem in senatum introduxerunt, omnibus ita existimantibus, magis sanctitate vitae quam sacerdotii iure eam rem flaminem obtinuisse.

11 Consules priusquam in provincias irent, duas urbanas legiones in supplementum quantum opus erat
12 ceteris exercitibus militum scripserunt. Urbanum veterem exercitum Fulvius consul C. Fulvio Flacco legato—frater hic consulis erat—in Etruriam dedit ducendum et legiones quae in Etruria erant Romam 13 deducendas. Et Fabius consul reliquias exercitus

[1] P. Glareanus, Sigonius: L. P(1)N Aldus.
[2] ei Madvig: et P(1)N: est J.

---

[1] As now a member of the senate.

tors, both of his own family and of strangers alike. B.C. 209
By the unanimity of this good report he was raised to a well-founded self-confidence, and claimed what had been in abeyance for many years owing to the unworthiness of former flamens, namely, that he should be admitted to the senate. When he had entered the Senate House, and the praetor, Publius Licinius, had escorted him out of it, he appealed to the tribunes of the plebs. The flamen insistently claimed an ancient right of his priesthood, saying it had been granted to that office of flamen along with the toga praetexta and the sella curulis. The praetor maintained that a right was based, not upon outmoded instances from the annals, but in each case upon very recent practice; and that within the memory neither of their fathers nor grandfathers had any flamen of Jupiter exercised that right. The tribunes expressed the opinion that obsolescence due to the indolence of flamens was justly accounted their own loss, not a loss to the priestly office. Whereupon, without opposition even from the praetor himself, and with the general approval of the senators and of the commons, the tribunes led the flamen into the senate,[1] for it was the opinion of everyone that the flamen had carried his point rather by the uprightness of his life than by virtue of priestly privilege.

The consuls, before leaving for their provinces, enrolled two city legions to supplement the other armies so far as was necessary. The duty of leading the former city army into Etruria the consul Fulvius assigned to Gaius Fulvius Flaccus, his lieutenant—this was the consul's brother—also that of bringing the legions that were in Etruria away to Rome. And Fabius, the consul, ordered his son Quintus

A.U.C. 545

Fulviani conquisitas—fuere autem ad quattuor milia [1] trecenti quadraginta quattuor—Q. Maximum filium ducere in Siciliam ad M. Valerium proconsulem iussit, atque ab eo duas legiones et triginta quin-14 queremes accipere. Nihil eae deductae [2] ex insula legiones minuerunt nec viribus nec specie eius pro-
15 vinciae praesidium; nam cum praeter egregie suppletas duas veteres legiones transfugarum etiam Numidarum equitum peditumque magnam vim haberet, Siculos quoque qui in exercitu Epicydis aut Poenorum fuerant, belli peritos viros, milites scripsit.
16 Ea externa auxilia cum singulis Romanis legionibus adiunxisset, duorum speciem exercituum servavit: altero L. Cincium partem insulae regnum qua [3]
17 Hieronis fuerat tueri iussit; altero ipse ceteram insulam tuebatur, divisam quondam Romani Punicique imperii finibus, classe quoque navium [4] septuaginta partita, ut omni ambitu litorum praesidio [5] orae
18 maritumae essent. Ipse cum Muttinis equitatu provinciam peragrabat, ut viseret agros cultaque ab incultis notaret et perinde dominos laudaret
19 castigaretque. Ita tantum ea cura frumenti provenit ut et Romam mitteret et Catinam conveheret

[1] quattuor milia (∞ ∞ ∞ ∞) PC : om. by rest of (1) : tria milia x Aldus.
[2] deductae A^1 : eductae P(3)JK Aldus : educte A^2N.
[3] regnum qua P(1)N : qua regnum A^1J.
[4] navium C^1x Aldus : om. P(1)NJK.
[5] praesidio C^2JK Aldus : -dia P(1)N.

[1] Cf. vii. 12 f. [2] Cf. vii. 15.

Maximus to search out the remains of the Fulvian army [1]—and they amounted to four thousand three hundred and forty-four—and to conduct them to Sicily to Marcus Valerius, the proconsul: also to receive from him two legions and thirty five-bankers.[2] The withdrawal of those legions from the island did not reduce the garrison of that province at all either in actual strength or in appearance. For Valerius, in addition to the two old legions remarkably well recruited, had a large number of Numidian deserters also, cavalry and infantry; and he enrolled Sicilians likewise who had been in the army of Epicydes [3] or of the Carthaginians, being men trained in warfare. Having attached these foreign auxiliary forces to each of the Roman legions, he preserved the appearance of two armies. With the one he ordered Lucius Cincius to defend that part of the island where had been the kingdom of Hiero: with the other he himself defended the rest of the island, formerly divided by the boundaries between the Roman and the Punic empires.[4] The fleet also of seventy ships was divided, so that they might protect the seacoast around its entire circuit. Valerius himself with Muttines' cavalry roamed about his province, in order to visit the farms and to distinguish between cultivated and uncultivated lands, and to praise or upbraid the owners accordingly. So, owing to this diligence, such a crop of grain was produced that he sent grain to Rome and also transported it to Catina. B.C. 209

[3] A prominent figure in XXIV. and XXV. He fled to Africa in 210 B.C.; XXVI. xl. 11.

[4] A statement for which no explanation has been found, since we do not know of a time when that part of Sicily west of the Syracusan kingdom was divided between Romans and Carthaginians. Did Livy write Romani for Graeci?

A.U.C. 545 unde exercitui qui ad Tarentum aestiva acturus esset posset praeberi.

IX. Ceterum transportati milites in Siciliam—et erant[1] maior pars Latini nominis sociorumque—prope magni motus causa fuere; adeo ex parvis saepe mag- 2 narum momenta rerum pendent. Fremitus enim inter Latinos sociosque in conciliis ortus, decimum annum dilectibus, stipendiis se[2] exhaustos esse; 3 quotannis ferme clade magna pugnare; alios in acie occidi, alios morbo absumi; magis perire sibi civem qui ab Romano miles lectus sit quam qui ab Poeno captus: quippe ab hoste gratis remitti in patriam, ab Romanis extra Italiam in exsilium verius 4 quam in militiam ablegari. Octavum iam ibi annum senescere Cannensem militem, moriturum ante quam Italia hostis, quippe nunc cum maxime 5 florens viribus, excedat. Si veteres milites non redeant in patriam, novi legantur, brevi neminem superfuturum. Itaque, quod propediem res ipsa negatura sit, priusquam ad ultimam solitudinem atque egestatem perveniant,[3] negandum populo 6 Romano esse. Si consentientes in hoc socios videant Romani, profecto de pace cum Carthaginiensibus iungenda cogitaturos; aliter numquam vivo Hannibale sine bello Italiam fore. Haec acta in conciliis.

[1] erant PCR: erat the rest.
[2] se Ruperti: s P; om. P^2(1)JK Aldus.
[3] perveniant PCJK Aldus, Froben: -iat RBDA: -iatur N.

whence it could be supplied to the army which was to B.C. 209 have its summer camp near Tarentum.

IX. But the transfer of soldiers to Sicily—and the most of them were of Latin status or allies—was the cause of an outbreak which might have been serious; so true is it that on small things often depends the course of great events. For complaints began to be heard among Latins and allies in their gatherings:[1] that for now the tenth year they had been exhausted by levies of troops and their pay; that almost every year they fought in a disastrous defeat. Some, they said, were slain in battle, others carried off by disease. The townsman who was enlisted by the Roman was lost to them more completely than a man taken captive by the Carthaginian. For with no demand for a ransom the enemy sent him back to his native town; the Romans transported him out of Italy, really into exile rather than into military service. For the eighth year now the soldiers from Cannae were growing old there, certain to die before the enemy, who at the very moment was in the flower of his strength, departed out of Italy. If the old soldiers should not return to their native places, and fresh soldiers continued to be levied, soon no one would be left. Accordingly what the situation itself would soon refuse, before they should reach the extreme of desolation and poverty, must be refused the Roman people. If the Romans should see the allies unanimous to this effect, surely they would think of making peace with the Carthaginians. Otherwise never, so long as Hannibal lived, would Italy be rid of war. Such were the matters debated in their meetings.

[1] i.e. local meetings.

A.U.C. 545

7 Triginta tum coloniae populi Romani erant; ex iis duodecim, cum omnium legationes Romae essent, negaverunt consulibus esse unde milites pecuniamque darent. Eae fuere Ardea, Nepete, Sutrium, Alba, Carsioli, Sora,[1] Suessa, Circeii, Setia, Cales, 8 Narnia, Interamna. Nova re consules icti cum absterrere eos a tam detestabili consilio vellent, castigando increpandoque plus quam leniter agendo 9 profecturos rati, eos ausos esse consulibus dicere aiebant quod consules ut in senatu pronuntiarent in animum inducere non possent; non enim detrectationem eam munerum militiae, sed apertam defec- 10 tionem a populo Romano esse. Redirent itaque propere in colonias et tamquam integra re, locuti magis quam ausi tantum nefas, cum suis consulerent. Admonerent non Campanos neque Tarentinos esse 11 eos sed Romanos, inde oriundos, inde in colonias atque in agrum bello captum stirpis[2] augendae causa missos. Quae liberi parentibus deberent, ea illos Romanis debere, si ulla pietas, si memoria 12 antiquae patriae esset. Consulerent igitur de integro; nam tum quidem quae temere agitassent, ea prodendi imperii Romani, tradendae Hannibali 13 victoriae esse. Cum alternis haec consules diu iactassent, nihil moti legati neque se quod[3] domum

[1] Sora M^5 Froben 1: eo $P(3)N$: om. CA^sJK Aldus; cf. XXIX. xv. 5, where $P(1)N$ omit this name.
[2] stirpis A^sJK Aldus: urbis $P(1)N$.
[3] quod $P(3)C^3A^sNJK$ Aldus: quis Conway.

[1] Latin colonies sent out by Rome. Their inhabitants did not have the full Roman citizenship but only the Latin. There were at this time but ten colonies of Roman citizens, e.g. Ostia, Minturnae, Sena Gallica and other seaports.

There were at that time thirty colonies of the Roman state.[1] Of these, while delegations from them all were at Rome, twelve informed the consuls that they had no means of furnishing soldiers and money. These were Ardea, Nepete, Sutrium, Alba, Carsioli, Sora, Suessa, Circeii, Setia, Cales, Narnia, Interamna.[2] The consuls, deeply impressed by what was unheard-of, wishing to deter them from so abominable a move, and thinking they should accomplish more by upbraiding and rebuking them than by soft words, told them that they had dared to say to the consuls what the consuls could not bring themselves to utter in the senate. For it was not a refusal of burdens and of military service, but an open revolt from the Roman people. Accordingly they should return to their colonies promptly, and, as though nothing had been settled, since they had spoken of so great a crime, but had not yet ventured to commit it, they should deliberate with their people. Let them remind them that they were not Capuans nor Tarentines, but Romans, sprung from Rome and sent thence into colonies and on land captured in war, to increase their race. All that children owed to their parents they owed, it was said, to the Romans, if there was any filial affection, any memory of their former city. Let them therefore deliberate again; for their present reckless proposal tended to betray the Roman empire, to give over the victory to Hannibal. The consuls by turns kept on for a long time in this strain; but the deputies, still unmoved, said B.C. 209

[2] In a somewhat different order these twelve reappear in XXIX. xv. 5, where Sora is better attested than in our passage. They were established at various dates between 442 and 298 B.C.

A.U.C. 545

renuntiarent habere dixerunt neque senatum suum quod [1] novi consuleret, ubi nec miles qui legeretur, nec pecunia quae daretur in stipendium esset.
14 Cum obstinatos eos viderent consules, rem ad senatum detulerunt, ubi tantus pavor animis hominum est iniectus ut magna pars actum de imperio diceret: [2] idem alias colonias facturas,[3] idem socios; consensisse omnes ad prodendam Hannibali urbem Romanam.

X. Consules hortari et consolari senatum et dicere alias colonias in fide atque officio pristino fore; eas quoque ipsas quae officio decesserint,[4] si legati circa eas colonias mittantur qui castigent, non qui precentur, verecundiam imperii habituras esse.
2 Permissum ab senatu iis cum esset, agerent facerentque [5] ut e re publica ducerent, pertemptatis [6] prius aliarum coloniarum animis citaverunt legatos quaesiveruntque ab iis ecquid milites ex formula paratos
3 haberent. Pro duodeviginti coloniis M. Sextilius Fregellanus respondit et milites paratos ex formula [7]
4 esse, et, si pluribus opus esset, pluris daturos, et quidquid aliud imperaret velletque populus Romanus enixe facturos: ad id sibi neque opes deesse et [8] animum

[1] quod Madvig, Emend.: quid P(1)NJK Aldus, Froben, Madvig, 1872.
[2] diceret P(1)N Aldus: -rent JK.
[3] facturas, here ended the long lacuna in the Spirensis; cf. p. 232, n. 3.
[4] decesserint SpJK Froben 2: -sissent P(1)N Aldus.
[5] facerentque, P(1)N om. facerent.
[6] pertemptatis *Sp*N^s*JK Froben* 2: temptatis P(1)N Aldus.
[7] paratos ex formula $A^s N^s$ also (om. ex) P(1)N: ex formula paratos JK Aldus, Froben.
[8] deesse et Alschefski: -esset or -essent P(3): -esse $CM^2A^sN^sJK$ Aldus, Froben.

that they had nothing to report back home, nor did B.C. 209 their senates have anything new to decide upon, in towns where there were neither soldiers to be enlisted nor money to be furnished for pay. The consuls, finding them unyielding, brought the matter before the senate; and there such terror was inspired in the minds of the members that a great many of them said the empire was at an end; that the same thing would be done by the other colonies, the same by the allies; that they all had conspired to betray the city of Rome to Hannibal.

X. The consuls exhorted and comforted the senate, and said that the rest of the colonies would be loyal and dutiful as formerly; that even the colonies which had abandoned their duty would have respect for the empire, if legates should be sent about among them to upbraid, not to entreat. Permission having been given the consuls by the senate to act and do as they thought to be for the interest of the state, after first sounding the temper of the other colonies, they summoned their legates, and asked them whether they had any soldiers in readiness according to the compact.[1] On behalf of the eighteen colonies Marcus Sextilius, of Fregellae, replied that they had soldiers in readiness according to the compact, and would give more if more were needed, and would exert themselves to do whatever else the Roman people might command and desire. To that end, he said, they did not lack means and had even a surplus of [1] To each of the allies and to every colony a formula was given, i.e. a formal agreement or covenant in which mutual obligations were stated, including what military assistance was to be furnished; cf. XXII. lvii. 10; XXIX. xv. 12.

A.U.C. 545

5 etiam superesse. Consules parum sibi videri praefati pro merito eorum sua voce conlaudari eos,[1] nisi universi patres iis in curia gratias egissent, sequi in 6 senatum eos[2] iusserunt. Senatus quam poterat honoratissimo decreto adlocutus eos[3] mandat consulibus ut ad populum quoque eos producerent, et inter multa alia praeclara quae ipsis maioribusque suis praestitissent recens etiam meritum eorum in rem
7 publicam commemorarent. Ne nunc quidem post tot saecula sileantur fraudenturve laude sua: Signini fuere et Norbani Saticulanique et Fregellani, et Lucerini et Venusini, et Brundisini et Hadriani et 8 Firmani et Ariminenses, et ab altero mari Pontiani et Paestani et Cosani, et mediterranei Beneventani et Aesernini et Spoletini, et Placentini et Cremo-9 nenses. Harum coloniarum subsidio tum imperium populi Romani stetit, iisque gratiae in senatu et 10 apud populum actae. Duodecim aliarum coloniarum quae detractaverunt imperium mentionem fieri patres vetuerunt, neque illos dimitti neque retineri neque appellari a consulibus; ea tacita castigatio maxime ex dignitate populi Romani visa est.
11 Cetera expedientibus quae ad bellum opus erant consulibus, aurum vicensimarium, quod in sanctiore

[1] eos, bracketed by Conway.
[2] eos P(1)N Aldus, Eds.: om. Sp²JK Froben 2.
[3] eos P(1)N Aldus, Froben: om. N²JK.

---

[1] On the coast of Etruria, but a Roman, not an Etruscan town, which still preserves its imposing polygonal walls.

[2] The names show a studied arrangement in pairs or larger groups: Latium and Samnium near the coast, a group of four; Apulia; Adriatic coast; coast and islands of the Tuscan Sea; Samnium and Umbria; Cisalpine Gaul.

spirit. The consuls began by saying that to do the men justice it did not seem enough that they should receive praise from the lips of the consuls only, without having the entire senate first return thanks to them in the Senate House; and then they bade them to follow into the senate. After addressing them in a decree as complimentary as possible, the senate instructed the consuls to bring them before the people also, and along with the many other conspicuous services they had rendered to the senators themselves and their ancestors, to recount their recent service also to the state. Even now, after so many generations, they shall not be passed over in silence or defrauded of their praise. It was the men of Signia and Norba and Saticula and Fregellae, and of Luceria and Venusia, and of Brundisium and Hadria and Firmum and Ariminum, and on the other sea, the men of Pontiae and Paestum and Cosa,[1] and in the interior, the men of Beneventum and Aesernia and Spoletium, and of Placentia and Cremona.[2] With the aid of these colonies at that time the empire of the Roman people stood fast, and thanks were rendered to them in the senate and before the people. Of the other twelve colonies, which refused to obey orders, the senators forbade any mention to be made; their legates should neither be dismissed nor detained nor spoken to by the consuls. That silent rebuke seemed most in keeping with the majesty of the Roman people. B.C. 209

While the consuls were endeavouring to provide everything else needed for the war, it was voted that the gold yielded by the five per cent tax on manumissions, and kept in the more sacred treasury to

A.U.C. 545 aerario ad ultimos casus servabatur,[1] promi placuit.
12 Prompta ad quattuor milia pondo auri. Inde quingena pondo data consulibus et M. Marcello et P. Sulpicio proconsulibus et L. Veturio praetori qui 13 Galliam provinciam erat sortitus, additumque Fabio consuli centum pondo auri praecipuum quod in arcem Tarentinam portaretur; cetero auro[2] usi sunt ad vestimenta praesenti pecunia locanda exercitui qui in Hispania bellum secunda sua fama ducisque gerebat.

XI. Prodigia quoque, priusquam ab urbe consules
2 proficiscerentur, procurari placuit. In Albano monte tacta de caelo erant signum Iovis arborque templo propinqua, et Ostiae[3] lacus,[4] et Capuae murus Fortunaeque aedis, et Sinuessae murus portaque.
3 Haec de caelo tacta: cruentam etiam fluxisse aquam Albanam quidam auctores erant, et Romae intus in cella aedis[5] Fortis Fortunae de capite signum, quod in corona erat, in manum sponte sua prolapsum: et 4 Priverni satis constabat bovem locutum, volturiumque frequenti foro in tabernam devolasse, et Sinuessae

[1] servabatur $P(1)N$ Aldus: -aretur Sp^sNJK Froben 2.
[2] auro A^sN^sJK: om. $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben, Madvig.
[3] Ostiae (hostiae) C^1 Aldus: ostium (or hostium) $P(1)NJK$.
[4] lacus $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: locus $A^s?N^sJK$: lucus Crévier.
[5] aedis $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: om. A^sJK Luchs.

---

[1] In the aerarium sanctius was kept a reserve of gold bars (at this period), stored separately from other funds and to be drawn upon only in some great emergency. This is the first instance of its use. The five per cent tax imposed upon the master who manumitted slaves was the chief source of supply.

[2] The quaestors would have the duty of letting the contracts, in this case for cash, with no resort to credit and a moratorium, as in XXIII. xlvii. 11.

meet extreme emergencies, should be brought out.[1] B.C. 209
About four thousand pounds of gold were brought out. Of this five hundred pounds each were given to the consuls and to Marcus Marcellus and Publius Sulpicius, the proconsuls, and to Lucius Veturius, the praetor who had by lot received Gaul as his province. And for Fabius, the consul, there were added a hundred pounds of gold above the rest, to be conveyed to the citadel of Tarentum. The remainder of the gold they employed in letting contracts[2] in terms of ready money for clothing for the army which was carrying on the war in Spain, with distinction to itself and to its commander.

XI. It was further voted that for prodigies the atonement be made before the consuls should set out from the city. On the Alban Mount a statue of Jupiter and a tree near the temple had been struck by lightning; and at Ostia a basin,[3] and at Capua the city wall and the temple of Fortune, and at Sinuessa the wall and a gate. These were struck by lightning. Also some persons testified that the current of the outlet[4] of the Alban Lake was blood-red, and that at Rome inside the cella of the Temple of Fors Fortuna[5] a small image on a garland fell of itself from the head of the statue into the hand. And at Privernum it was established that an ox spoke, and that in the crowded market-place a vulture flew down upon a shop, and that at Sinuessa

[3] Probably of a public fountain, such as may be seen at street corners in Pompeii; cf. XXXIX. xliv. 5.

[4] The famous emissarium, made in accordance with a response of the Delphic oracle in 396 B.C.; V. xvi. 9.

[5] Outside the city and by the Tiber, probably that at the first milestone of the road later known as Via Portuensis.

A.U.C. 545

natum ambiguo inter marem ac feminam sexu infantem, quos androgynos volgus, ut pleraque, faciliore ad duplicanda verba Graeco sermone, appellat, et lacte pluvisse, et cum elephanti capite puerum natum. Ea prodigia hostiis maioribus procurata, et supplicatio circa omnia pulvinaria, obsecratio[1] in unum diem indicta; et decretum ut C. Hostilius praetor ludos Apollini, sicut iis annis voti factique erant, voveret faceretque.

Per eos dies et censoribus creandis Q. Fulvius consul comitia habuit. Creati censores, ambo qui nondum consules fuerant, M. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Sempronius Tuditanus. Ii[2] censores ut agrum Campanum fruendum locarent ex auctoritate patrum latum ad plebem est plebesque scivit.

Senatus lectionem contentio inter censores de principe legendo tenuit. Semproni lectio erat; ceterum Cornelius morem traditum a patribus sequendum aiebat, ut qui primus censor ex iis qui viverent fuisset, eum principem legerent; is T. Manlius Torquatus erat; Sempronius, cui di sortem legendi dedissent, ei[3] ius liberum eosdem dedisse deos; se id suo arbitrio facturum lecturumque Q. Fabium Maximum, quem tum principem Romanae civitatis esse vel Hannibale iudice victurus esset.

[1] obsecratio $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben : et obsecratio C^1N^1JK.
[2] Ii Drakenborch : duo $Sp^2A^sN^sJK$ Froben 2 : in P : om. $P^2(1)N$ Aldus, Madvig.
[3] ei Sp^2N^sK Froben 2 : et $P(1)N$ Aldus : eis J.

---

[1] Cf. iv. 15 and note.
[2] Cf. XXV. xii. 11 ff.; XXVI. xxiii. 3; and below, xxiii. 5 f.
[3] For the censors chosen in the previous year and the reason for this election cf. vi. 17 f.

a child was born of uncertain sex, as between male B.C. 209 and female—the populace call them hermaphrodites, as it uses many similar terms, since the Greek language is more apt in compounding words—; also that it rained milk there, and that a child was born with the head of an elephant. These prodigies were atoned for with full-grown victims, and prayers were ordered at all the pulvinaria,[1] and entreaties for one day. And it was decreed that Gaius Hostilius, the praetor, should vow and conduct games in honour of Apollo, as they had been vowed and conducted in those years.[2]

About that time Quintus Fulvius, the consul, also held an election for the naming of censors.[3] Marcus Cornelius Cethegus and Publius Sempronius Tuditanus, both of whom had not yet been consuls, were named censors. That these censors should lease lands in the Campanian region was proposed to the commons on the authority of the senate, and the commons so ordered.

The revision of the list of the senate was delayed by a dispute between the censors in regard to the choice of a princeps senatus. The choice belonged to Sempronius; but Cornelius said that they must follow the traditional custom of the senate, namely, to choose as princeps the man who, among the living, had been censor first. That was Titus Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius claimed that if the gods had given a man the choice by lot, they also gave him an unrestricted right; he would make the choice according to his own judgment, and would choose Quintus Fabius Maximus, whom he could prove, even with Hannibal as judge, to be at that time the first citizen of the Roman state. After the war of words had

A.U.C. 545

12 Cum diu certatum verbis esset, concedente conlega lectus a Sempronio princeps in senatum[1] Q. Fabius Maximus consul. Inde alius lectus senatus octo praeteritis, inter quos M. Caecilius Metellus erat, infamis auctor deserendae Italiae post Cannensem 13 cladem. In equestribus quoque notis eadem servata causa, sed erant perpauci quos ea infamia attingeret.
14 Illis omnibus—et multi erant—adempti equi qui Cannensium legionum equites in Sicilia erant. Addiderunt acerbitati etiam tempus, ne praeterita stipendia procederent iis quae[2] equo publico meruerant, sed dena stipendia equis privatis facerent.
15 Magnum praeterea numerum eorum conquisiverunt qui equo merere deberent; atque ex iis qui principio eius belli septemdecim annos nati fuerant neque
16 militaverant omnes aerarios fecerunt. Locaverunt inde reficienda quae circa forum incendio consumpta erant septem tabernas, macellum, atrium regium.

XII. Transactis omnibus quae Romae agenda
2 erant consules ad bellum profecti. Prior Fulvius praegressus Capuam; post paucos dies consecutus Fabius, qui et conlegam coram obtestatus et per litteras Marcellum ut quam acerrimo bello detinerent[3]
3 Hannibalem, dum ipse Tarentum oppugnaret—ea urbe adempta hosti iam undique pulso, nec ubi

[1] senatum Riemann (from an inscr. in honour of Fabius, C.I.L. I. i. p. 288): senatu P(1)NJK Eds.
[2] quae P(3): q; BDN: qui A^1N^2JK Aldus, Froben.
[3] detinerent JK: -eret P(1)N Aldus, Froben.

[1] XXII. liii. 5; XXIV. xliii. 2 f. and note.
[2] Cf. XXIV. xviii. 6 and note.
[3] See XXVI. xxvii. 2 f. and notes. Of the shops there mentioned as destroyed the so-called novae (north side of the Forum) were apparently not rebuilt until 194 B.C.; XXXV. xxiii f.

lasted long, his colleague was giving way, and Sem- B.C. 209
pronius chose Quintus Fabius Maximus, the consul, as princeps senatus. Then the rest of the list of the senate was made up, with eight men ignored, among whom was Marcus Caecilius Metellus, notorious as having advised the desertion of Italy after the disaster at Cannae.[1] In attaching their nota to knights also the same principle was maintained, but very few were the men to whom that notoriety applied. From all of those who, as horsemen belonging to the legions from Cannae, were in Sicily—and there were many of them—their horses were taken away. To this severity the censors added also prolonged service—that the years previously served with horses furnished by the state should not be reckoned, but that they must serve ten years, furnishing their own mounts. Furthermore they sought out a great number of the men who were bound to serve in the cavalry, and reduced to the grade of aerarii[2] all those who at the beginning of the war had been seventeen years old and had not served. They then contracted for the rebuilding of what had been destroyed by fire around the Forum, namely, seven shops, the market, the Atrium Regium.[3]

XII. Having completed everything that was to be done at Rome, the consuls set out for the war. Fulvius went first and led the way to Capua. After a few days he was overtaken by Fabius, who in person implored his colleague and by letter Marcellus also to keep Hannibal occupied by the most spirited fighting while he himself was laying siege to Tarentum. With that city taken from him, he said, the enemy, beaten back on every side, and having no

A.U.C. 545

consisteret nec quod [1] fidum respiceret habenti, ne 4 remorandi [2] quidem causam in Italia fore—, Regium etiam nuntium mittit ad praefectum praesidii quod ab Laevino consule adversus Bruttios ibi locatum 5 erat, octo milia hominum, pars maxima ab Agathyrna, sicut ante dictum est, ex Sicilia traducta, rapto vivere hominum adsuetorum; additi erant Bruttiorum indidem perfugae, et audacia et audendi omnia 6 necessitatibus pares. Hanc manum ad Bruttium primum agrum depopulandum duci iussit, inde ad Cauloniam urbem oppugnandam. Imperata non inpigre solum sed etiam avide exsecuti direptis fugatisque cultoribus agri summa vi urbem oppugnabant.

7 Marcellus et consulis litteris excitus et quia ita [3] induxerat in animum neminem ducem Romanum tam parem Hannibali quam se esse, ubi primum in agris pabuli copia fuit, ex hibernis profectus ad 8 Canusium Hannibali occurrit. Sollicitabat ad de-fectionem Canusinos Poenus; ceterum ut adpro-pinquare Marcellum audivit, castra inde movit.
Aperta erat regio sine ullis ad insidias latebris;
9 itaque in loca saltuosa cedere inde coepit. Marcellus vestigiis instabat castraque castris conferebat, et opere perfecto extemplo in aciem legiones educebat.
Hannibal turmatim per equites peditumque iacula-tores levia certamina serens casum universae pugnae

[1] quod Wesenberg: quid P(1)N Madvig, Conway (cf. ix. 13).
[2] remorandi P(1)N[1] Aldus: remoranti N: morandi SpJK Froben 2.
[3] ita Sp? Froben 2: om. P(1) NJK Aldus.

---

[1] Cf. XXVI. xl. 16 ff.
[2] On the coast 23 miles northeast of Locri.

place where he might make a stand nor any loyal B.C. 209 support to look to, would also find no reason for lingering in Italy. He sent a messenger to Regium also, to the commander of the garrison which had been posted there against the Bruttii by Laevinus, the consul, eight thousand men, for the most part from Agathyrna, as has been said above, who had been brought over from Sicily, being men accustomed to live by plundering.[1] To their number had been added from the same region Bruttian deserters, a match for them in daring and in the urgent needs that compelled them to take any risk. This force Fabius ordered to be led out first for the purpose of ravaging the country of the Bruttians, and then of besieging the city of Caulonia.[2] After carrying out their orders not only with energy but also with zest, robbing and putting to flight the tillers of the soil, they proceeded to assail the city with great violence.

Marcellus, spurred by the consul's letter, and also because he had come to believe that no Roman general was so good a match for Hannibal as himself, set out from winter quarters as soon as there was abundance of pasture in the fields, and encountered Hannibal near Canusium. The Carthaginian was tempting the men of Canusium to revolt; but on hearing of the approach of Marcellus, he moved his camp away. It was an open country, with no concealment for ambuscades; accordingly he began to retire from it into wooded regions. Marcellus kept at his heels and would place camp close to camp, and after completing his fortifications, he would at once lead his legions out into battle-line. Hannibal by his cavalry in single troops and by spearmen on foot kept bringing on slight engagements, but

A.U.C. 545

10 non necessarium ducebat. Tractus est tamen ad id quod vitabat certamen. Nocte praegressum adsequitur locis planis ac patentibus Marcellus; castra inde ponentem pugnando undique in munitores operibus prohibet. Ita signa conlata pugnatumque totis copiis est, cum iam nox instaret, Marte aequo discessum est. Castra exiguo distantia spatio raptim
11 ante noctem permunita. Postero die luce prima Marcellus in aciem copias eduxit; nec Hannibal detractavit certamen, multis verbis adhortatus milites ut memores Trasumenni Cannarumque con-
12 tunderent ferociam hostis: urgere atque instare eum, non iter quietos facere,[1] non castra ponere pati, non respirare aut circumspicere: cotidie simul orientem solem et Romanam aciem in campis videndam esse; si uno proelio haud incruentus abeat, quietius deinde
13 tranquilliusque eum bellaturum. His inritati adhortationibus simulque taedio ferociae hostium cotidie instantium lacessentiumque acriter proelium ineunt.
14 Pugnatum amplius duabus horis est. Cedere inde ab Romanis dextra ala et extraordinarii coepere. Quod ubi Marcellus vidit, duodevicensimam legionem 15 in primam aciem inducit. Dum alii trepidi[2] cedunt, alii segniter subeunt, turbata tota acies est, dein

[1] non iter quietos facere Sp Froben 2: om. P(1)N Aldus, one line.

[2] trepidi P(1)N Aldus: trepide SpJK Froben 2.

---

[1] Of the allies, while the ala filled the rest of the front line; cf. note on i. 8.

[2] Marcellus had still another legion and another ala as a reserve probably.

thought the risk of a general conflict unnecessary. B.C. 209
Nevertheless he was drawn into the conflict which he was trying to avoid. When the enemy had gone ahead by night, Marcellus overtook him in level and open country. Then as Hannibal was pitching camp, the Roman by fighting on all sides against the men engaged in fortifying prevented them from doing so. Thus standards faced standards and it was a battle with all their forces, and when night was now at hand, they separated on even terms. The camps, separated by a very short distance, were hastily fortified before night. The next day Marcellus led out his forces into line at daybreak. And Hannibal did not refuse battle, after he had exhorted his soldiers at length, that, remembering Trasumennus and Cannae, they should crush the over-confidence of the enemy, who was pressing them, Hannibal said, and threatening them, not allowing them to march undisturbed, nor to pitch their camp, nor to take breath and look around them; every day they must at the same moment see the sun rising and in the meadows the Roman battle-line; if he should come out of a single battle not without some losses, the enemy would thereafter carry on the war more calmly and quietly. Inflamed by these exhortations and also weary of the high spirit of a foe who daily pressed upon them and challenged them, they went into battle fiercely. They fought for more than two hours. Then on the side of the Romans the right ala and the élite troops [1] began to give way. Seeing this Marcellus led up the eighteenth legion into the front rank.[2] While the one part in disorder was yielding ground, and the other was slow in coming up, the whole line was confused, then thoroughly routed, and as fear over-

A.U.C. 545

prorsus fusa, et vincente pudorem metu terga
16 dabant. Cecidere in pugna fugaque[1] ad duo milia et septingenti civium sociorumque: in iis[2] quattuor Romani centuriones, duo tribuni militum, M. Licinius 17 et M. Helvius. Signa militaria quattuor de ala prima quae fugit, duo de legione quae cedentibus sociis successerat amissa.

XIII. Marcellus, postquam in castra reditum est, contionem adeo saevam atque acerbam apud milites habuit ut proelio per diem totum infeliciter tolerato
2 tristior iis irati ducis oratio esset. "Dis immortalibus, ut in tali re, laudes gratesque," inquit "ago quod victor hostis cum tanto pavore incidentibus vobis in vallum portasque non ipsa castra est adgressus; deseruissetis profecto eodem terrore castra quo
3 omisistis pugnam. Qui pavor hic, qui terror, quae repente qui et cum quibus pugnaretis oblivio animos cepit? Nempe idem sunt hi hostes quos vincendo et victos sequendo priorem aestatem[3] absumpsistis,
4 quibus dies noctesque fugientibus per hos dies institistis, quos levibus proeliis fatigastis,[4] quos hesterno die nec iter facere nec castra ponere passi
5 estis. Omitto ea quibus gloriari potestis; cuius et ipsius pudere ac paenitere vos oportet referam[5]:

[1] fugaque A^sJK: que $P(3)$: om. AN Aldus, Froben.

[2] in iis $PCR?$: in his $MBDAN$ Aldus, Froben: inter quos fuere A^sJK.

[3] priorem aestatem TaSp? Froben 2 (with in J and K): priore aestate $P(1)N$.

[4] fatigastis $P^2(3)Ta^2$: fatigatis PTa: fugastis ANJK Aldus, Froben.

powered the sense of shame, they fled. In battle B.C. 209 and flight some two thousand seven hundred citizens and allies fell, among them four Roman centurions, two tribunes of the soldiers, Marcus Licinius and Marcus Helvius. Four military standards were lost from the ala which was the first to flee, and two from the legion which had relieved the allies as they gave way.

XIII. Marcellus, after they had returned to camp, made a speech to the soldiers which was so savage and bitter that, although they had borne the battle all day long without success, the angry general's speech was more ferocious to them. "The immortal gods," he said, "have my praises and thanks, so far as one can be grateful now, because the victorious enemy, when you were throwing yourselves in such fright upon the earthwork and the gates, did not attack the camp itself. You would surely have deserted the camp in terror, just as in terror you abandoned the battle. What fright is this, what terror, that have taken possession of your minds, what sudden forgetting who you are and in battle with whom? Of course these are the same enemies in defeating whom, and in pursuing them when defeated, you have spent last summer, the same men whom you have pressed hard in these days, as they were fleeing day and night, whom you have wearied by slight engagements, whom yesterday you did not allow either to march or to pitch camp. I pass over the things of which you can boast. I shall mention something for which you ought also to feel shame

---

[5] referam P(1)NTa Aldus: om. SpN[2]JK Froben 2.

A.U.C. 515

nempe aequis manibus hesterno die diremistis
6 pugnam. Quid haec nox, quid hic dies attulit? Vestrae iis copiae inminutae sunt an illorum auctae? Non equidem mihi cum exercitu meo loqui videor nec cum Romanis militibus: corpora tantum atque
7 arma sunt eadem. An, si eosdem animos habuissetis, terga vestra vidisset hostis? signa alicui manipulo aut cohorti ademisset?[1] Adhuc caesis legionibus Romanis gloriabatur: vos illi hodierno die primum
8 fugati exercitus dedistis decus." Clamor inde ortus ut veniam eius diei daret; ubi vellet deinde experiretur militum suorum animos. "Ego vero experiar," inquit "milites, et vos crastino die in aciem educam, ut victores potius quam victi veniam impetretis quam
9 petitis." Cohortibus quae signa amiserant hordeum dari iussit, centurionesque manipulorum quorum signa amissa fuerant destrictis gladiis discinctos destituit: et ut postero die omnes, pedites equites,[2] 10 armati adessent edixit. Ita contio dimissa fatentium iure ac merito sese increpitos, neque illo die virum quemquam in acie Romana fuisse praeter unum ducem, cui aut morte satisfaciendum aut egregia victoria esset.

11 Postero die armati ornatique[3] ad edictum aderant.

[1] ademisset TaJK: abstulisset P(1)N Aldus, Froben.

[2] pedites equites Ta, Aldus and Froben add -que: equites pedites P(1), NJK add -que.

[3] armati ornatique TaSpK Froben 2: ornati armatique P(1)NJ; ornati Conway (deleting armatique).

---

[1] I.e. the drawn battle of yesterday is something of which you should be ashamed, as well as of your rout to-day, though not to the same degree.

[2] Cohorts of allies had their signa; XXV. xiv. 4. In the legions it was the maniple, not the cohort, which had a standard until Marius' time.

and regret; namely, you broke off the battle B.C. 209 yesterday while it was undecided.[1] What has this night, what has this day brought? Have your troops in that time been reduced, or their forces increased? For my part I do not seem to be speaking with my army nor with Roman soldiers. It is merely your bodies and weapons that are the same. Can it be that, if you had had the same spirit, the enemy would have seen your backs? And would he have taken standards from any maniple or cohort?[2] Till now his boasting was in the slaughter of Roman legions: you have this day given him for the first time the distinction of putting an army to flight." Then they began to shout that he should pardon them for that day, and afterwards, whenever he wished, he should test the spirit of his soldiers. "I will indeed test them, soldiers," said he, "and to-morrow I will lead you out into battle-line, that as victors, rather than as vanquished, you may gain the pardon for which you ask." To the cohorts which had lost their standards he ordered barley to be issued, and as for the centurions of the maniples whose standards had been lost, he made them stand aside with drawn swords and no belts; and he ordered that on the morrow they should all, infantry and cavalry, present themselves under arms. So the assembly was dismissed, as the men confessed that they had been upbraided with good reason and deservedly, and that on that day in the Roman line no one had been a man except the general alone, whom they must satisfy either by dying or by a notable victory.

The next day they presented themselves according to orders armed and equipped. The general

A.U.C. 545

Imperator eos conlaudat pronuntiatque a quibus orta pridie fuga esset cohortesque quae signa amisissent se in primam aciem inducturum: edicere iam sese omnibus pugnandum ac vincendum esse et adnitendum singulis universisque ne prius hesternae fugae quam hodiernae victoriae fama Romam perveniat. Inde cibo corpora firmare iussi, ut, si longior pugna esset, viribus sufficerent. Ubi omnia dicta factaque sunt quibus excitarentur animi militum in aciem procedunt. XIV. Quod ubi Hannibali nuntiatum est, "Cum eo nimirum," inquit "hoste res est qui nec bonam nec malam ferre fortunam possit. Seu vicit, ferociter instat victis: seu victus[1] est, instaurat cum victoribus certamen." Signa inde canere iussit et[2] copias educit. Pugnatum utrimque aliquanto quam pridie acrius est, Poenis ad obtinendum hesternum decus adnitentibus, Romanis ad demendam ignominiam. Sinistra ala ab Romanis et cohortes quae amiserant signa in prima acie pugnabant, et legio duodevicensima[3] ab dextro cornu instructa. L. Cornelius Lentulus et C. Claudius Nero legati cornibus praeerant; Marcellus mediam aciem hortator testisque praesens firmabat. Ab Hannibale Hispani primam obtinebant frontem, et id roboris in omni exercitu erat. Cum anceps diu pugna esset, Hannibal elephantos in primam aciem induci iussit, si quem inicere ea res tumultum ac

[1] seu victus A^1N^1JK Aldus, Froben : om. $P(1)$: P^2 changes victis (above) to victus (1).

[2] et Sp^2N^2JK Froben 2 : om. $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[3] duodevice(n)sima Perizonius : vice(n)sima $P(1)NJK$; cf. xii. 14.

[1] Cf. the words put into Scipio's mouth in XXVI. xli. 12 fin. and into Hannibal's by Horace in Carm. IV. iv. 53–68.

praised them warmly and declared that he would B.C. 209 lead out into the first line the men with whom the flight had begun the day before, and the cohorts which had lost their standards; that now he proclaimed that they must all fight and win, and strive singly and collectively to prevent news of yesterday's flight from reaching Rome before that of to-day's victory. They were then bidden to strengthen themselves by eating, so that, if the battle should be prolonged, they might have sufficient endurance. When everything had been said and done that could arouse the soldiers' spirits, they advanced into line.

XIV. When this was reported to Hannibal, "Of a truth," he said, "we have to deal with an enemy who can bear neither good fortune nor bad. If he has won, he furiously presses the defeated; if on the other hand he has been defeated, he renews the conflict with the victors."[1] Then he ordered the trumpets to sound and led out his forces. On both sides the battle was much fiercer than the day before, the Carthaginians striving to maintain the distinction of yesterday, while the Romans strove to rid themselves of their disgrace. The left ala on the Roman side and the cohorts which had lost their standards were fighting in the first line, and the eighteenth legion was drawn up on the right wing. Lucius Cornelius Lentulus and Gaius Claudius Nero, the lieutenants, commanded the wings. Marcellus in person upheld the centre, to encourage them and as a witness. On Hannibal's side Spanish troops held the front line, and they were the best troops in the entire army. When the battle had long been indecisive Hannibal ordered the elephants to be driven up to the front, in the hope that that move might

A.U.C. 545

7 pavorem posset. Et primo turbarunt signa ordinesque, et partim occulcatis partim dissupatis terrore qui 8 circa erant nudaverant una parte aciem, latiusque fuga manasset, ni C. Decimius Flavus tribunus militum signo arrepto primi hastati manipulum eius signi sequi se iussisset. Duxit ubi maxime tumultum conglobatae beluae faciebant pilaque in eas conici iussit.
9 Haesere omnia tela haud difficili ex propinquo in tanta corpora ictu et tum [1] conferta turba: sed ut non omnes volnerati sunt, ita in quorum tergis infixa stetere pila, ut est genus anceps, in fugam versi
10 etiam integros avertere. Tum iam non unus manipulus, sed pro se quisque miles, qui modo adsequi agmen fugientium elephantorum poterat, pila conicere. Eo magis ruere in suos beluae tantoque maiorem stragem edere quam inter hostes ediderant, quanto acrius pavor consternatam [2] agit quam
11 insidentis magistri imperio regitur.[3] In perturbatam transcursu beluarum aciem signa inferunt Romani pedites et haud magno certamine dissupatos trepi-
12 dantesque avertunt. Tum in fugientes equitatum inmittit Marcellus, nec ante finis sequendi est factus 13 quam in castra paventes conpulsi sunt. Nam super alia quae terrorem trepidationemque facerent,[4] elephanti quoque [5] duo in ipsa porta corruerant,

[1] tum P(3): eum Sp: tam BDANJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] consternatam P(3 *Sp*N^s Froben 2: -tas A^sJ Aldus.
[3] regitur P(1)NSp Froben 2: reguntur A^sJK Aldus.
[4] facerent P(1) Aldus, Froben: fecerant A^sJK.
[5] quoque Gronovius (from a Ms.): que P(1)N: forte A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] Cf. XXVI. v. 15.

bring about confusion and panic. And at first they B.C. 209 did cause disorder among the standards and ranks, and by trampling down some of those who were near, and scattering others in alarm, they had stripped the line of battle at one point, and the flight would have spread further, had not Gaius Decimius Flavus, a tribune of the soldiers, seized a standard from the first maniple of the hastati[1] and ordered the maniple to which it belonged to follow him. He led them to the spot where the brutes massed together were causing confusion and bade them hurl their javelins against them. All the weapons stuck fast, for it was not difficult to hit bodies of such size from a short distance and now packed in a dense mass. But although not all were wounded, still those in whose backs the javelins remained well fixed—so undependable is the species—took to flight and even made the uninjured wheel about. Then no longer a single maniple hurled its javelins, but every soldier for himself, provided he was able to catch up with the column of the fleeing elephants. All the more did the brutes dash among their own men and cause a greater slaughter than they had done among the enemy, in proportion as the frightened beast is urged on more fiercely by terror than when under the control of a driver on its back. Into the line thrown into confusion by the brutes dashing through it the Roman infantry carried their standards and with no great struggle they made the scattered and wavering enemy retreat. Then, as they fled, Marcellus sends his cavalry against them, and pursuit did not end until in alarm they were driven into their camp. For in addition to the other causes of terror and consternation, two elephants had fallen in the very gate, coactique erant milites per fossam vallumque ruere in castra. Ibi maxima hostium caedes facta; caesa 14 ad octo milia hominum, quinque elephanti. Nec Romanis incruenta victoria fuit: mille ferme et septingenti de duabus legionibus et sociorum supra mille et trecentos occisi; volnerati permulti civium 15 sociorumque. Hannibal nocte proxima castra movit: cupientem insequi Marcellum prohibuit multitudo sauciorum. XV. Speculatores qui prosequerentur[1] agmen missi postero die rettulerunt Bruttios Hannibalem petere.

A.U.C. 545

2 Isdem ferme diebus et ad Q. Fulvium consulem Hirpini et Lucani et Volceientes traditis praesidiis Hannibalis quae in urbibus habebant dediderunt sese, clementerque a consule cum verborum tantum castigatione ob errorem praeteritum accepti sunt;[2] 3 et Bruttiis similis spes veniae facta est, cum ab iis Vibius et Paccius fratres, longe nobilissimi gentis eius, eandem quae data Lucanis erat condicionem deditionis petentes venissent.

4 Q. Fabius consul oppidum in Sallentinis Manduriam vi cepit; ibi ad tria milia[3] hominum capta et ceterae praedae aliquantum. Inde Tarentum profectus in

[1] prosequerentur P(1)NJK Aldus: sequerentur Sp Froben 2; per- x.

[2] accepti sunt BDAN: accepti SpéJK Froben 2: acceptis P(3).

[3] tria milia (ɔɔ ɔɔ ɔɔ PC Madvig: quattuor milia $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Conway: om. RMBDAN.

---

[1] According to Plutarch he went to Campania; Marcellus xxvi. 4.

and the soldiers were forced to dash into the camp B.C. 209 over fosse and earthwork. It was there that the greatest slaughter of the enemy occurred. Slain were about eight thousand men and five elephants. And for the Romans also it was not a bloodless victory. About one thousand seven hundred from the two legions, and of the allies more than one thousand three hundred, were killed; wounded were a large number of citizens and allies. Hannibal moved his camp that night; Marcellus was eager to pursue, but the numbers of the wounded prevented him. XV. Scouts sent to pursue the column reported next day that Hannibal was on his way to the land of the Bruttii.[1]

About the same time the Hirpini and Lucani and the men of Volceii[2] surrendered to Quintus Fulvius, the consul, handing over Hannibal's garrisons which they had in their cities, and were kindly received by him with nothing more than an oral reprimand for their past aberrations. The Bruttii[3] also were given to expect a like pardon, upon the arrival from that region of the brothers Vibius and Paccius, easily the noblest of that tribe, to ask for the same terms of surrender as had been given to the Lucanians.

Quintus Fabius, the consul, took the town of Manduria,[4] in the land of the Sallentini, by storm. There about three thousand persons were captured, and other booty in quantity. Then removing to [2] An unimportant city in northern Lucania is unaccountably added, as if its citizens were not Lucanians. Some of their people still sided with Hannibal two years later: li. 13.

[3] For Bruttian towns that had returned to Roman allegiance four years before cf. XXV. i. 2.

[4] About 20 miles southeast of Tarentum.

A.U.C. 545

ipsis faucibus portus posuit castra. Naves quas Laevinus [1] tutandis commeatibus habuerat partim machinationibus onerat apparatuque moenium oppugnandorum. partim tormentis et saxis omnique missilium telorum genere instruit, onerarias quoque, non eas [2] solum quae remis agerentur, ut alii machinas scalasque ad muros ferrent, alii procul ex navibus volnerarent moenium propugnatores. Hae naves ab aperto mari ut [3] urbem adgrederentur instructae parataeque sunt; et erat liberum mare classe Punica, cum Philippus oppugnare Aetolos pararet, Corcyram tramissa. In Bruttiis interim Cauloniae oppugnatores sub adventum [4] Hannibalis, ne opprimerentur, in tumulum a praesenti impetu tutum, ad cetera inopem, concessere.[5]

Fabium Tarentum obsidentem leve dictu momentum ad rem ingentem potiundam adiuvit. Praesidium Bruttiorum datum ab Hannibale Tarentini habebant. Eius praesidii praefectus deperibat amore mulierculae cuius frater in exercitu Fabii consulis erat. Is certior litteris sororis factus de nova consuetudine advenae locupletis atque inter popularis tam honorati, spem nactus per sororem

[1] Laevinus Unger: il. iuius P: il iuius CRM: liuius $M^1BDANJK$ Eds.; cf. vii. 15 f.

[2] quoque, non eas A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

[3] ut C^4N Aldus, Froben, Eds.: om. P(1), and JK (having ut after naves).

[4] adventum JK Aldus, Froben, Madvig: adventu P(1)N Conway.

[5] ad cetera inopem, concessere *Sp*A^sJK Froben 2: sere P (omitting a line): se recepere (or cipe-) P^2(1)N.

[1] And opposite the citadel; XXV. xi. 1.

[2] I.e. the smaller and swifter vessels, contrasted with heavier ships probably anchored at a distance.

Tarentum he pitched camp at the very entrance to B.C. 209
the harbour.[1] Of the ships which Laevinus had had to protect his supplies, the consul loaded some with devices and equipment for attacking city walls, while some of them he fitted out with artillery and stones and every kind of missile weapon. And so also with the merchantmen, not merely those propelled by oars,[2] in order that some crews should carry engines and ladders up to the walls, and others from ships at long range should wound the defenders of the walls. These ships were equipped and made ready to attack the city from the open sea. And the sea was unmolested by the Punic fleet, which had been sent over to Corcyra, since Philip was preparing to attack the Aetolians. In the country of the Bruttii meanwhile the besiegers of Caulonia,[3] to avoid being surprised, just before Hannibal's arrival withdrew to a hill that was safe from immediate attack, but otherwise offered nothing.

While Fabius was besieging Tarentum,[4] a circumstance hardly worth mentioning aided him in attaining his great objective. The Tarentines had a guard of Bruttians, furnished by Hannibal. The commander of that guard[5] was desperately in love with a young woman whose brother was in the army of Fabius, the consul. This brother, informed by a letter from his sister of her new acquaintance with a stranger who was rich and held in such honour by his people, conceived the hope that through his sister her

[3] Cf. xii. 6; xvi. 9.

[4] Of Polybius' narrative of the recovery of Tarentum only an introductory page has survived (X. i.).

[5] Not of the entire garrison, which was commanded by a Carthaginian, Carthalo; xvi. 5.

A.U.C. 545

quolibet inpelli amantem posse, quid speraret ad
11 consulem detulit. Quae cum haud vana cogitatio visa esset, pro perfuga[1] iussus Tarentum transire, ac per sororem praefecto conciliatus, primo occulte temptando animum, dein satis explorata levitate blanditiis muliebribus perpulit eum ad proditionem 12 custodiae loci cui praepositus erat. Ubi et ratio agendae rei et tempus convenit, miles nocte per intervalla stationum clam ex urbe emissus ea quae acta erant quaeque ut agerentur convenerat ad consulem refert.

13 Fabius vigilia prima dato signo iis qui in arce erant quique custodiam portus habebant, ipse circumito portu ab regione urbis in orientem versa
14 occultus consedit. Canere inde tubae simul ab arce simul[2] a portu et ab navibus quae ab[3] aperto mari adpulsae erant, clamorque undique cum ingenti tumultu unde minimum periculi erat de industria
15 ortus. Consul interim silentio continebat suos. Igitur Democrates, qui praefectus antea[4] classis fuerat, forte illo[5] loco praepositus, postquam quieta omnia circa se vidit, alias partes eo tumultu personare 16 ut captae urbis interdum excitaretur clamor, veritus ne inter cunctationem suam consul aliquam vim faceret ac signa inferret, praesidium ad arcem,

[1] perfuga CJK: terfuga PR: profuga Sp. (om. preceding pro): perfuga (om. pro) Rhenanus, Froben 2: transfuga est DAN: tran(s)fuga B^{z} Aldus.
[2] simul P(1)NJK Aldus: et Sp Froben 2.
[3] ab P(3) Aldus: om. ANSpJK Froben 2.
[4] antea Sp?N^{a}JK: om. P(1)N.
[5] illo P(1)N Aldus: illi Sp?A^{a}JK Froben 2, Conway.

[1] On leaving his camp near the bridge-head Fabius must have left troops to guard the camp and harbour entrance.

lover could be swayed in any desired direction, and B.C. 209 informed the consul what he hoped for. Since that seemed no empty idea, he was bidden to go over to Tarentum, as if he were a deserter. And having won the friendship of the commander through his sister, he first guardedly sounded him, then, his lack of character being demonstrated, he used a woman's blandishments to lead him on to betray the defence of a place of which he had been put in command. When the method of carrying out the plan and the time also had been settled, a soldier, sent out of the city secretly by night through intervals between outposts, reported to the consul the steps which had been taken and those which it had been agreed should be taken.

Fabius at the first watch gave the signal to the men in the citadel and to those who were guarding the harbour[1]; and thereupon, making the circuit of the harbour, he established himself in hiding on the eastern side of the city. Then trumpets sounded at the same time from the citadel and from the harbour, and from the ships which had approached from the open sea, and from all sides shouting and great uproar were purposely raised where there was the least danger. The consul meantime kept his men quiet. Accordingly Democrates, who had previously been admiral of the fleet,[2] and chanced to be in command at that point, on seeing everything near him quiet, while other quarters resounded with such an uproar that from time to time shouts arose as in a captured city, feared that, while he himself delayed, the consul might make an assault and bring in his troops. He thereupon led his forces over to [2] Cf. XXVI. xxxix. 6.

A.U.C. 545

unde maxime terribilis accidebat sonus, traducit.
17 Fabius cum et ex temporis spatio et ex silentio ipso, quod, ubi paulo ante strepebant excitantes vocantesque ad arma, inde nulla accidebat vox, deductas custodias sensisset, ferri scalas ad eam partem muri qua Bruttiorum cohortem praesidium agitare[1]
18 proditionis conciliator nuntiaverat iubet. Ea primum captus est murus adiuvantibus recipientibusque Bruttiis, et transcensum in urbem est; inde[2] et[3] proxuma refracta porta, ut frequenti agmine signa 19 inferrentur. Tum clamore sublato sub ortum ferme lucis nullo obvio armato in forum perveniunt, omnesque undique qui ad arcem portumque pugnabant in se converterunt.

XVI. Proelium in aditu fori maiore impetu quam perseverantia commissum est. Non animo, non armis, non arte belli, non vigore ac viribus corporis
2 par Romano Tarentinus erat. Igitur pilis tantum coniectis, prius paene quam consererent manus terga dederunt, dilapsique per nota urbis itinera in 3 suas amicorumque domos. Duo ex ducibus Nico et Democrates fortiter pugnantes cecidere. Philemenus, qui proditionis ad Hannibalem auctor fuerat, cum
4 citato equo ex proelio avectus esset, vacuus[4] paulo post equus errans[5] per urbem cognitus, corpus

[1] agitare P(1)NJ Rhenanus, Froben 2 : cogitare Sp.
[2] inde P(1)N Aldus : deinde SpJK Froben 2.
[3] et C^2DAN Aldus : ex P(3) : om. SpJK Froben 2.
[4] vacuus Aldus, Froben, Eds. : vagus P(1)NJK Conway.
[5] errans P(1)NJK (Aldus, Froben adding -que) : bracketed by Walters, Conway.

---

[1] Probably the Temenitis Gate of XXV. ix. 9 f.

the citadel, from which came the most terrifying noise. Fabius, both from the time elapsed and from the mere silence—since no voice came from the direction where a little while before there was shouting to waken men and call them to arms—was aware that the guards had been removed. Accordingly he ordered ladders to be carried to that part of the wall where the go-between in the betrayal had reported that the cohort of Bruttians was on guard duty. There first the wall was taken, the men being aided and welcomed by the Bruttians, and they climbed over the wall into the city. Then also the nearest gate [1] was broken open, so that a dense column might march in. Thereupon raising a shout they made their way into the market-place at about daybreak, while no armed men encountered them, and they drew against themselves an attack on every side from all the men who were fighting at the citadel and by the harbour. B.C. 209

XVI. They joined battle at the entrance to the market-place with more spirit than persistence. The Tarentine was no match for the Roman in courage, in arms, in the art of war, in bodily energy and strength. Therefore, after merely throwing their javelins, they retreated almost before they came to blows, and slipped away along the familiar streets of the city to their homes and those of friends. Two of their commanders, Nico and Democrates, fell fighting bravely. Philemenus,[2] who was the originator of the betrayal to Hannibal, had ridden away at full speed from the battle; and a little later his riderless horse was recognized wandering about

[2] For Nico and Philemenus cf. XXV. viii. 3 ff.; ix. 8 ff.; XXVI. xxxix. 15.

A.U.C. 545

nusquam[1] inventum est: creditum volgo est in puteum apertum ex equo praecipitasse.[2] Carthalonem autem, praefectum Punici praesidii, cum commemoratione paterni hospitii positis armis venien- 6 tem ad consulem miles obvius obtruncat. Alii alios passim[3] sine discrimine armatos inermis[4] caedunt, Carthaginienses Tarentinosque pariter. Bruttii quoque multi passim[5] interfecti, seu per errorem seu vetere in eos insito odio seu ad proditionis famam, ut vi potius atque armis captum Tarentum 7 videretur, exstinguendam. Tum a caede ad diripiendam urbem discursum. Triginta milia[6] servilium capitum dicuntur capta, argenti vis ingens facti signatique, auri tria milia octoginta[7] pondo, signa et[8] tabulae, prope ut Syracusarum ornamenta 8 aequaverint.[9] Sed maiore animo generis eius praeda abstinuit Fabius quam Marcellus; qui interrogante scriba[10] quid fieri signis vellet ingentis magnitudinis —di sunt, suo quisque habitu in modum pugnantium formati—deos iratos Tarentinis relinqui iussit.

[1] nusquam AJK: nunquam (or num-) P(3)N.
[2] praecipitasse P(3)Spé Froben 2: -cipitatum AN[1]JK Aldus.
[3] passim P(1)NJK: bracketed by Conway.
[4] inermis P(1)N: -que added by A[s]N[s]JK Aldus, Froben.
[5] passim A[s]N[s]JK: om. P(1)A[z]N.
[6] XXX milia JK Aldus, Froben, Luchs: mil(l)ia XXX P(1)N.
[7] tria milia octoginta Madvig, Emend., Conway: LXXXIII millia P(1)N: LXXIIII m. JK.
[8] signa et Alschefski: signata P(1): signa N[s]JK Aldus, Froben: signa ac Weissenborn.
[9] aequaverint P(3) Aldus: -arent Spé[2]A[s]N[s]JK Froben 2: -arint W. Heraeus.
[10] interrogante scriba Drakenborch: -ganti scribae C[z]A[y]N[s]JK Aldus, Froben: -gatis scribae P(1)N: Conway inserts dagger.

[1] Presumably with Fabius, and the tie was inherited. But his protest was in vain.

the city, but his body was nowhere found. It was B.C. 209 generally believed that he had thrown himself from his horse into an open well. Moreover Carthalo, commander of the Punic garrison, mentioning his father's guest-friendship,[1] had laid down his arms and was on his way to the consul, when he was slain by a soldier who met him. Other soldiers slew other men everywhere, whether armed or unarmed, Carthaginians and Tarentines alike. Everywhere Bruttians also were slain, many of them, either by mistake or out of old, inbred hatred of them, or to blot out the report of treachery, that Tarentum might be thought to have been captured rather by force of arms. Then from the slaughter they dispersed to plunder the city. Thirty thousand slaves are said to have been captured, an immense quantity of silver, wrought and coined, of gold three thousand and eighty pounds,[2] statues and paintings, so that they almost rivalled the adornments of Syracuse.[3] But Fabius showed more magnanimity in refraining from plunder of that kind than did Marcellus. When a clerk asked what he wished to have done with statues of colossal size—they are gods in the form of warriors, but each in his own attitude—Fabius ordered that their angry gods be left to the Tarentines.[4]

[2] If the MS. tradition (83,000) could be accepted as conceivable, we should be obliged to explain how Capua, so much more prosperous than Tarentum, could have yielded only 2,070 pounds of gold to the captors; XXVI. xiv. 8.

[3] For statues and paintings removed by Marcellus from Syracuse to Rome cf. XXV. xl. 1 ff.

[4] One colossal statue of Jupiter, attributed to Lysippus, Fabius was unable to remove; Pliny N.H. XXXIV. 40. Another of Hercules he brought to Rome and set up on the Capitol; cf. Plutarch Fabius xxii. 5, making a comparison with Marcellus, but unfavourable to Fabius; cf. Marcellus xxi. 3 f.

A.U.C. 545

9 Murus inde qui urbem ab arce dirimebat dirutus est ac disiectus.

Dum haec[1] aguntur, Hannibal, iis qui Cauloniam 10 obsidebant in deditionem acceptis, audita oppugnatione Tarenti dies noctesque cursim agmine acto, cum festinans ad opem ferendam captam urbem audisset, "Et Romani suum Hannibalem" inquit "habent; eadem qua ceperamus arte Tarentum 11 amisimus." Ne tamen fugientis modo convertisse agmen videretur, quo constiterat[2] loco quinque milia ferme ab urbe posuit castra. Ibi paucos 12 moratus dies Metapontum sese recepit. Inde duos Metapontinos cum litteris principum eius civitatis ad Fabium Tarentum mittit, fidem ab consule accepturos inpunita iis[3] priora fore, si Metapontum 13 cum praesidio Punico prodidissent. Fabius vera quae[4] adferrent esse ratus, diem qua accessurus esset Metapontum constituit litterasque ad principes 14 dedit, quae ad Hannibalem delatae sunt. Enimvero laetus successu fraudis, si ne Fabius quidem dolo invictus fuisset, haud procul Metaponto insidias 15 ponit. Fabio auspicanti, priusquam egrederetur ab Tarento, aves semel atque iterum non addixerunt. Hostia quoque caesa consulenti deos haruspex cavendum a fraude hostili et ab insidiis praedixit.

[1] haec, after this A^1JK Aldus and Froben insert Tarenti, not found in P(1)N.

[2] constiterat $C^2M^2A^1JK$ Aldus: constituerat P(1)N.

[3] iis PR Aldus: his $R^2MBDANK$: hiis J: tis C: om. Sp?N^s Froben 2, Conway.

[4] vera quae CMBDAN Aldus, Froben: veraq. P (-que R); quae (adferrent) vera JK.

Then the wall which separated the city from the citadel was torn down and completely destroyed. B.C. 209

While these things were going on, Hannibal received the surrender of the force besieging Caulonia and, on hearing of the attack upon Tarentum, urged his column rapidly forward day and night. When informed, while hastening to bring aid, that the city had been taken, "The Romans also," he said, "have their Hannibal; by the same art by which we had captured Tarentum we have lost it." Nevertheless, in order not to appear to have reversed his column as if in retreat, he pitched camp just where he had halted, about five miles from the city. After lingering there a few days he withdrew to Metapontum. From there he sent to Fabius at Tarentum two men of Metapontum carrying a letter from the leading men of that city and expecting to receive the consul's promise that their previous acts would go unpunished, if they should betray Metapontum and its Punic garrison. Fabius, assuming their message to be true, appointed a day on which he would come to Metapontum, and gave them a letter addressed to the leading citizens—a letter which was delivered to Hannibal. Pleased indeed at the success of the ruse, if even Fabius was to prove not unconquerable by trickery, Hannibal laid an ambush not far from Metapontum. When Fabius endeavoured to take the auspices before leaving Tarentum, the fowls were again and again unfavourable.[1] And when with the slaughter of a victim also he consulted the gods, the soothsayer declared that he must be on his guard against a ruse of the enemy and against an ambus-

[1] i.e. the sacred fowls refused to eat.

A.U.C. 545

16 Metapontini, postquam ad constitutam [1] non venerat diem, remissi, ut cunctantem hortarentur, ac repente conprehensi, metu gravioris quaestionis detegunt insidias.

XVII. Aestatis eius principio qua haec agebantur, P. Scipio in Hispania cum hiemem totam reconciliandis barbarorum animis partim donis, partim remissione obsidum captivorumque absumpsisset, Edesco ad eum clarus inter duces Hispanos venit. 2 Erant coniunx liberique eius apud Romanos; sed praeter eam causam etiam velut fortuita inclinatio animorum, quae Hispaniam omnem averterat ad 3 Romanum a Punico imperio, traxit eum. Eadem causa Indibili Mandonioque fuit, haud dubie omnis Hispaniae principibus, cum omni popularium manu relicto Hasdrubale secedendi in imminentes castris eius tumulos, unde per continentia iuga tutus 4 receptus ad Romanos esset. Hasdrubal, cum hostium res tantis augescere incrementis cerneret, suas imminui, ac fore ut, nisi audendo aliquid moveret, qua coepissent fluerent,[2] dimicare quam primum 5 statuit. Scipio avidior etiam certaminis erat, cum a[3] spe quam successus rerum augebat, tum quod, priusquam iungerentur hostium exercitus, cum uno dimicare duce exercituque quam simul cum

[1] constitutam JK Aldus, Froben, Luchs: constitutum P(1)N[1] Madvig, Conway.

[2] fluerent P(1)(C?)N Aldus: ruerent SpA[s]N[s]JK Froben 2, Conway.

[3] a Sp? Froben 2: ea P(1)NJK Aldus.

---

[1] On the art of the haruspices and the widespread practice of finding omens in the exta, particularly the liver, cf. Pease's notes on Cicero de Div. I. 16. Cf. below xxvi. 13.

[2] I.e. by torture; cf. iii. 5: XXIII. xxxiv. 7.

cade.[1] The men of Metapontum, when the consul B.C. 209 had not come on the appointed day, were sent back to urge him if he hesitated; and being suddenly seized, in fear of a more relentless inquiry[2] they revealed the plot.

XVII. At the beginning of the summer in which these events were taking place, after Publius Scipio in Spain had spent the entire winter in winning over the support of the barbarians, partly by gifts and partly by restoring their hostages and captives, Edesco, who was eminent among the Spanish chieftains, came to him.[3] His wife and children were in the hands of the Romans; but in addition to this reason he was drawn by that more or less fortuitous trend of feeling which had turned all Spain away from Punic rule to Roman. Indibilis and Mandonius,[4] unquestionably the leading men of all Spain, had the same reason for leaving Hasdrubal, taking with them the entire band of their countrymen and withdrawing to heights which overlooked his camp, and from which there was a safe retreat along continuous ridges to the Romans. Hasdrubal, seeing that the resources of the enemy were increasing by such large accessions, while his own were diminishing and, unless he ventured to do something, they would melt away to the Roman side, as they had begun to do, decided to fight as soon as possible. Scipio was even more eager for battle, both because of confidence which was increasing with his success, and because he preferred to fight with one general and army before the armies of the enemy should unite, rather than with them all at [3] More of Ede(s)co in Polybius X. xxxiv. f.

[4] For these leaders of the Ilergetes cf. XXII. xxi. 2 f.; XXV. xxxiv. 6 f.; XXVI. xlix. 11; Polybius X. xxxv. 6 ff.

A.U.C. 545

6 universis malebat. Ceterum, etiamsi cum pluribus pariter dimicandum foret, arte quadam copias auxerat. Nam cum videret nullum esse navium usum, quia vacua omnis Hispaniae ora classibus Punicis erat,[1] subductis navibus Tarracone navales socios terrestri-
7 bus copiis addidit. Et armorum adfatim erat, et[2] captorum Carthagine[3] et quae post captam eam fecerat tanto opificum numero incluso.[4]
8 Cum iis copiis Scipio veris principio ab Tarracone egressus—iam enim et Laelius redierat ab Roma, sine quo nihil maioris rei motum volebat—ducere
9 ad hostem pergit. Per omnia pacata eunti, ut cuiusque populi fines transiret, prosequentibus excipientibusque sociis, Indibilis et Mandonius cum suis
10 copiis occurrerunt. Indibilis[5] pro utroque locutus haudquaquam ut[6] barbarus stolide incauteve, sed potius cum verecundia ac[7] gravitate, propiorque excusanti transitionem ut necessariam quam glorianti 11 eam velut primam occasionem raptam; scire enim se transfugae nomen exsecrabile veteribus sociis, novis suspectum esse; neque eum se reprehendere morem[8] hominum, si tamen[9] anceps odium causa, non 12 nomen faciat. Merita inde sua in duces Cartha-

[1] Punicis erat A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.
[2] et Alschefski: om. all MSS.
[3] captorum Carthagine A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$, one line.
[4] numero incluso A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$, probably a short line at the end of a paragraph in P's exemplar.
[5] et Mandonius . . . occurrerunt. Indibilis A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$, probably three lines omitted on account of the repeated name.
[6] ut Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)NJK$.
[7] ac Alschefski: et $C^1?$: om. $P(1)NJK$.

once. But even supposing he should have to fight B.C. 209 with several at the same time, he had enlarged his forces by a certain artifice. For, seeing that he was making no use of ships, since the whole coast of Spain was rid of Punic fleets, he beached his vessels at Tarraco and added their crews to the land forces. And arms he had in abundance, both those captured at (New) Carthage and those which after the capture of that city he had caused to be made by impounding a large number of artisans.

With these troops Scipio set out at the beginning of spring from Tarraco and proceeded to lead against the enemy; for by this time Laelius also, without whom he did not wish any important action to be taken, had returned from Rome. As Scipio was passing through an entirely peaceful region, while allies escorted and welcomed him whenever he crossed the boundary of a tribe, Indibilis and Mandonius with their forces met him. Indibilis spoke for them both, not at all boorishly or carelessly, as one might expect of a barbarian, but rather with modesty and dignity, and more like a man who excused their change of sides as necessary than one who bragged that they had, as it were, seized that as the first opportunity. For he was aware, he said, that the word deserter was detested by old allies, suspected by new ones; and he did not blame men for that habit, if only it was the motive, not the word, which produced hatred in both parties. He then recounted their services to the Carthaginian

[8] morem Alz Rhenanus, Froben 2: amorem SpAsNs: nomen P(1)(A?)N Aldus.

[9] tamen SpNs Froben 2, Drakenborch. Eds.: tam P(1)NJK Aldus, Alschefski, Conway.

A.U.C. 545

ginienses commemoravit, avaritiam contra eorum superbiamque et omnis generis iniurias in se atque 13 populares. Itaque corpus dumtaxat suum ad id tempus apud eos fuisse; animum iam pridem ibi esse ubi ius ac fas crederent coli. Ad deos quoque confugere supplices qui nequeant hominum vim atque
14 iniurias pati; se id Scipionem orare, ut transitio sibi nec fraudi apud eum nec honori sit. Quales ex hac[1] die experiundo cognorit, perinde operae eorum pretium faceret.[2]

15 Ita prorsus respondet facturum Romanus, nec pro transfugis habiturum qui non duxerint societatem ratam ubi nec divini quicquam nec humani sanctum
16 esset. Productae deinde in conspectum iis coniuges
17 liberique lacrumantibus gaudio redduntur. Atque eo die in hospitium abducti; postero die foedere accepta fides, dimissique ad copias adducendas. Isdem deinde castris tendebant, donec ducibus iis ad hostem perventum est.

XVIII. Proximus Carthaginiensium exercitus Hasdrubalis prope urbem Baeculam erat. Pro castris
2 equitum stationes habebant. In eas velites antesignanique et qui primi agminis erant advenientes

[1] hac P(1)N Aldus: ea SpA[s]N[s]JK Froben 2.
[2] faceret P(1)N Aldus: faciat SpN[s]JK Froben 2.

---

[1] Not mentioning their attack upon the Romans in XXII. l.c. For their later disloyalties see XXVIII. xxiv. 3; xxxi. 5 ff.; XXIX. i. 19 ff.; Polybius XI. xxix. 3; xxxi. ff.
[2] Polybius gives only an outline; X. xxxvii. fin.

generals,[1] and on the other hand the greed and B.C. 209
haughtiness of the generals and the wrongs of every sort they had done to them and their countrymen. Consequently it was till then merely their body that had been with them; their mind had long since been where they believed justice and right were held in honour. Even to the gods, he said, do those who cannot endure the violence and the wrongs of men flee as suppliants; as for themselves, their prayer to Scipio was that he should not reckon the change of sides either to their detriment or to their credit. According as he should henceforward come to know their worth by testing them, let him in that light estimate the value of their service.[2]

The Roman replied that he would do precisely that, and not regard as deserters men who did not consider an alliance valid in which nothing either divine or human was sacred. Thereupon their wives and children were brought before their eyes and given over to them as they wept for joy. And on that day they were escorted to guest-quarters, while the next day their promise of loyalty was accepted on the basis of a treaty, and they were sent away to bring up their forces. Thereafter they were quartered in the same camp, until with these men as guides the enemy was reached.

XVIII. The nearest army of the Carthaginians, that of Hasdrubal, was close to the city of Baecula.[3] Before the camp they had cavalry outposts. Upon these the light-armed, the vanguard and men at the head of the column, just as they came up after the [3] A short distance north of the river Baetis, not far from Castulo, and in the silver mining region: XXVIII. xiii. 5; Polybius l.c. xxxviii. 7.

A.U.C. 545

ex itinere, priusquam castris locum caperent,[1] adeo contemptim impetum fecerunt ut facile appareret 3 quid utrique parti animorum esset. In castra trepida fuga compulsi equites sunt, signaque Romana portis 4 prope ipsis inlata. Atque illo quidem die inritatis tantum ad certamen animis castra Romani posuerunt. 5 Nocte Hasdrubal in tumulum copias recipit plano campo in summo patentem; fluvius ab tergo, ante circaque velut ripa praeceps oram eius omnem 6 cingebat. Suberat et altera inferior summissa fastigio planities; eam quoque altera crepido haud 7 facilior in ascensum [2] ambibat. In hunc inferiorem campum postero die Hasdrubal, postquam stantem pro castris hostium aciem vidit, equites Numidas leviumque armorum Baliares et Afros demisit.

8 Scipio circumvectus ordines signaque ostendebat hostem, praedamnata spe aequo dimicandi [3] campo captantem tumulos, loci fiducia, non virtutis aut armorum [4] stare in conspectu; sed altiora moenia habuisse Carthaginem, quae transcendisset miles 9 Romanus; nec tumulos nec arcem, ne mare quidem armis obstitisse suis. Ad id fore altitudines quas cepissent hostibus, ut per praecipitia et praerupta salientes fugerent; eam quoque se illis fugam 10 clausurum. Cohortesque duas alteram tenere fauces

[1] caperent N^2JK Aldus, Froben: acciperent $P(1)N$ Conway.

[2] facilior in ascensum $P(1)NJ$ Aldus, Froben (-su K): faciliori adscensu Madvig.

[3] aequo dimicandi JK Froben 2: dimicandi aequo $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[4] aut armorum Sp^2N^2JK Froben 2: armorumque $P(1)N$ Aldus.

march and before choosing a site for a camp, made an B.C. 209 attack with such disdain that it was easy to perceive the spirit of each side. The horsemen were forced into the camp in alarm and flight, and the Roman standards were all but carried inside the very gates. And on that day, indeed, after they had merely provoked each other to battle, the Romans pitched camp; but by night Hasdrubal withdrew his troops to a hill the top of which formed an open, level plain.[1] The river was behind it, while in front and at the sides a steep bank, as it were, encircled its entire margin. Beneath was also a lower level area, gently sloping down. This also was surrounded by another ledge no easier to climb. Down to this lower plain Hasdrubal next day, on seeing the enemy's line standing before his camp, sent down his Numidian cavalry and the light-armed Balearic and African troops.

Scipio, while riding about his ranks and standards, pointed out that the enemy, having given up in advance the hope of fighting on level ground, were hugging the hills and were standing before them in reliance upon position, not upon courage and arms. But (New) Carthage, he said, had possessed higher walls, which the Roman soldier had scaled: and neither hills nor citadel, not even the sea, had withstood his arms. The heights which the enemy had taken would only serve them for purposes of flight, as they leaped over precipices and crags. He would cut them off from such a flight too. And of two cohorts he ordered one to hold the entrance

[1] In Polybius' account Hasdrubal had occupied this stronger position before the first attack of the Romans, two days after their arrival (l.c. xxxviii. 8 f.).

A.U.C. 545

vallis per quam deferretur amnis iubet, alteram viam insidere quae ab urbe per tumuli obliqua in agros ferret. Ipse expeditos qui pridie stationes hostium pepulerant ad levem armaturam infimo stantem 11 supercilio ducit. Per aspreta[1] primum, nihil aliud quam via impediti, iere. Deinde ut sub ictum venerunt, telorum primo omnis generis vis ingens effusa 12 in eos est; ipsi contra saxa quae locus strata passim, omnia ferme missilia, praebet ingerere, non milites solum sed etiam turba calonum inmixta armatis.
13 Ceterum quamquam ascensus difficilis erat, et prope obruebantur telis saxisque, adsuetudine tamen succedendi muros et pertinacia animi subierunt
14 primi. Qui simul cepere aliquid aequi loci ubi firmo consisterent gradu, levem et concursatorem hostem atque intervallo tutum, cum procul missilibus pugna eluditur, instabilem eundem ad comminus conserendas manus, expulerunt loco et cum caede magna in aciem
15 altiori[2] superstantem tumulo inpegere. Inde Scipio iussis adversus mediam evadere aciem victoribus ceteras copias cum Laelio dividit, atque eum parte dextra tumuli circumire, donec mollioris ascensus viam inveniret, iubet; ipse ab laeva, circuitu haud 16 magno, in transversos hostes incurrit. Inde primo

[1] aspreta Sp Froben 2 : aspera P(1)NJK Aldus.
[2] altiori SpJK : altiore P(1)N Aldus.

into the valley through which the river flowed, the B.C. 209 other to block the road leading from the city down the slope of the hill into the country. He himself led the unencumbered men, who the day before had routed the outposts of the enemy, to meet the light-armed standing on the lowest brow of the hill. At first they advanced over rugged ground, hampered only by the footing. Then when they came within range, at first an immense number of missile weapons of every kind was showered upon them. In return they hurled stones which the place affords, strewn broadcast and almost all of them of a size to be thrown, and not only did the soldiers do so, but also the mass of camp-servants mingling with the armed men.

But although the ascent was difficult and they were almost overwhelmed by missile weapons and stones, still, thanks to their practice in scaling walls and to their persistence, they were the first to reach the top. As soon as they had taken some level ground where they could get a firm footing, they dislodged the light-armed enemy—such troops are accustomed to skirmishing and, so long as they avoid the battle by hurling their missiles from afar, are protected by distance, but are unsteady in the face of hand-to-hand conflict—and with great slaughter they drove them against the battle-line standing on the higher level of the hill. Then Scipio ordered his victorious troops to go up facing the centre of the line, divided the rest of his forces with Laelius, and bade him circle round the right side of the hill, until he found a way less difficult of ascent. He himself on the left, after a moderate circuit, charged into the flank of the enemy. In consequence the line was at first turbata acies est, dum ad circumsonantem undique clamorem flectere cornua et obvertere ordines 17 volunt. Hoc tumultu et Laelius subiit, et dum pedem referunt, ne ab tergo volnerarentur, laxata prima acies locusque ad evadendum et mediis datus

A.U.C. 545

18 est, qui per tam iniquum locum stantibus integris ordinibus elephantisque ante signa locatis numquam
19 evasissent. Cum ab omni parte caedes fieret, Scipio, qui laevo cornu in dextrum incucurrerat,[1] 20 maxime in nuda latera hostium pugnabat; et iam ne fugae quidem patebat locus; nam et stationes utrimque Romanae dextra laevaque insederant vias, et porta [2] castrorum ducis principumque fuga clausa erat,[3] addita trepidatione elephantorum, quos territos aeque atque hostes timebant. Caesa igitur ad octo milia hominum.

XIX. Hasdrubal, iam antequam dimicaret pecunia rapta elephantisque praemissis, quam plurumos poterat de fuga excipiens praeter Tagum flumen ad
2 Pyrenaeum tendit. Scipio castris hostium potitus, cum praeter libera capita omnem praedam militibus concessisset, in recensendis captivis decem milia

[1] incucurrerat P(3)j: incurrerat ANJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] porta P(3)N: portam MJK Aldus, Froben: -tas A.
[3] clausa erat P(3)N: clauserat RMBDANJK Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] His original intention was to cross the Pyrenees about this time on his way to Italy; Polybius X. xxxix. 7 f.; cf. above, v. 12.

[2] By this route (vaguely indicated, as in Polybius l.c. § 8) Hasdrubal avoided any possibility of Roman opposition while following the upper valleys of the Tagus and the Ebro. The only indication which we have of his passage over into Gaul thrown into disorder, while the men tried to wheel B.C. 209 and make their ranks face the uproar resounding on every side. In the midst of this disorder Laelius also reached the top; and the front line of the enemy, as the men gave way and were afraid of being wounded from the rear, lost its solidity, and room was given even for the Romans in the centre to mount to the top. These men would never have done so over such unfavourable ground if the ranks had stood unbroken with the elephants placed in front of the standards. While on all sides the slaughter was in progress, Scipio, who with the left wing had charged into the enemy's right wing, was fighting chiefly against the exposed flank of the enemy. And no longer was space left open even for flight; for both on the right and on the left Roman outposts had blocked the roads, and the gate of the camp was obstructed by the flight of the general and chief officers, while in addition there was the panic of the elephants, of which, when terrified, they were as much afraid as of the enemy. Accordingly about eight thousand men were slain.

XIX. Hasdrubal, who even before the battle had hastily gathered up his money and had sent elephants in advance,[1] picking up as many men as possible in the course of their flight, directed his march along the river Tagus towards the Pyrenees.[2] Scipio took possession of the enemy's camp, and after giving up to the soldiers all the booty except free persons, in listing the captives found ten thousand foot-soldiers is in Appian Hisp. 28, who says Hasdrubal crossed near the northern ocean, i.e. the Atlantic. The time was really the autumn of 208 B.C., and in the following spring he crossed the Alps; cf. note on xx. 8.

A.U.C. 545

peditum duo milia equitum invenit. Ex iis [1] Hispanos sine pretio omnes domum dimisit, Afros vendere
3 quaestorem iussit. Circumfusa inde multitudo Hispanorum et ante deditorum et pridie captorum regem
4 eum ingenti consensu appellavit. Tum Scipio silentio per praeconem facto sibi maximum nomen imperatoris esse dixit, quo se milites sui appellassent; regium nomen alibi magnum, Romae intolerabile [2] esse.
5 Regalem animum in se esse, si id in hominis ingenio amplissimum ducerent, tacite [3] iudicarent; vocis
6 usurpatione abstinerent. Sensere etiam barbari magnitudinem animi, cuius miraculo nominis alii mortales stuperent, id ex tam alto [4] fastigio aspernantis.
7 Dona inde regulis principibusque Hispanorum divisa, et ex magna copia captorum equorum trecen-
8 tos quos vellet eligere Indibilem iussit. Cum Afros venderet iussu imperatoris quaestor, puerum adultum inter eos forma insigni cum audisset regii generis
9 esse, ad Scipionem misit. Quem cum percunctaretur Scipio quis et cuias et cur id aetatis in castris fuisset, Numidam esse [5] ait, Massivam populares vocare; orbum a patre relictum, apud maternum avum

[1] iis J Aldus, Froben: his K Conway: om. P(1)N.
[2] intolerabile P(1)NJK Aldus: intolerandum Sp Froben 2.
[3] tacite(-tae) P(1)N Aldus, Froben: taciti $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Conway.
[4] alto $A^{s}JK$ Aldus, Froben: magno P(1)N.
[5] esse P(1)N: esse se $N^{s}JK$: se esse A^{y} Aldus, Froben.

and two thousand horsemen. Of these he sent all B.C. 209
the Spaniards to their homes without ransom; the Africans he ordered the quaestor to sell. Then the crowd of Spaniards, both those previously surrendered and those captured the day before, flocked round him and with great unanimity hailed him as king. Thereupon Scipio, after silence had been secured by a herald, said that his highest title was that of general-in-command; with that his soldiers had addressed him:[1] the title of a king, elsewhere in high honour, was not to be endured at Rome. As for his having the spirit of a king, if they thought that was the noblest thing in the nature of man, let it be their silent verdict; from the use of the word let them refrain.[2] Even the barbarians appreciated the magnanimity of a man who from so lofty a height scorned a title by whose fascination the rest of mortals were dazed.

Then gifts were apportioned to the princes and chieftains of the Spaniards, and out of the large number of captured horses he ordered Indibilis to select three hundred of his own choosing. While the quaestor at the general's command was selling the Africans, and had heard that a well-grown boy of conspicuous beauty among them was of royal race, he sent him to Scipio. When Scipio asked him who he was and from what region, and why at that age he was in the camp, he said he was a Numidian; that his people called him Massiva; that, left an orphan by his father, he had been brought up in the house of [1] This (though not mentioned by Livy as such) is the earliest known instance of a commander being saluted as imperator by his troops.

[2] Cf. Polybius l.c. xl. 5.

A.U.C. 545

Galam, regem Numidarum, eductum,[1] cum avunculo Masinissa, qui nuper cum equitatu subsidio Carthaginiensibus venisset, in Hispaniam traiecisse; prohibitum propter aetatem a Masinissa numquam ante proelium inisse; eo die quo pugnatum cum Romanis esset, inscio avunculo, clam armis equoque sumpto in aciem exisse; ibi prolapso equo effusum in praeceps captum ab Romanis esse. Scipio cum adservari Numidam iussisset, quae pro tribunali agenda erant peragit; inde cum se in praetorium recepisset, vocatum eum interrogat velletne ad Masinissam reverti. Cum effusis gaudio lacrimis cupere vero diceret, tum puero anulum aureum, tunicam lato clavo cum Hispano sagulo et aurea fibula equumque ornatum donat, iussisque prosequi quoad vellet equitibus dimisit.

XX. De bello inde consilium habitum. Et auctoribus quibusdam ut confestim Hasdrubalem consequeretur, anceps id ratus, ne Mago atque alter [2] Hasdrubal cum eo iungerent copias, praesidio tantum ad insidendum Pyrenaeum misso ipse reliquum aestatis recipiendis in fidem Hispaniae populis absumpsit.

Paucis post proelium factum ad Baeculam diebus, cum Scipio rediens iam Tarraconem saltu Castulo-

[1] eductum BDAN: edictum P(3): educatum M^2A^sJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] alter N^sJK Luchs: om. P(1)N Aldus, Froben: cf. § 5.

---

[1] For the two Hasdrubals and Mago cf. also XXVI. xx. 6; XXV. xxxii. 3–8.

[2] Meaning obviously the road near the Mediterranean. At the pass (Le Perthus, ca. 940 feet) it was about 12 miles back from a rugged coast. Scipio was criticized for allowing Has-his maternal grandfather Gala, king of the Numi- B.C. 209

dians; that with his uncle Masinissa, who had recently come with his cavalry to the assistance of the Carthaginians, he had crossed over into Spain; forbidden by Masinissa on account of his age, he had never before gone into battle. On the day they had fought with the Romans, without his uncle's knowledge, he said, he had secretly taken arms and a horse and gone out into the battle-line; there, thrown headforemost by a fall of his horse, he had been captured by the Romans. Scipio, after ordering that the Numidian should be guarded, completed such duties as he had to perform from the platform; and then, having returned to headquarters, summoned him and asked whether he would like to return to Masinissa. When he shed tears of joy and said that he was indeed eager to do so, Scipio thereupon presented the boy with a gold ring, a tunic with a broad stripe, and a Spanish cloak, a golden brooch and a horse with his harness. And ordering horsemen to escort him as far as he desired, Scipio sent him away.

XX. Then a council was held on the conduct of the war. And when some advised him to overtake Hasdrubal at once, Scipio thought that a dangerous course, for fear lest Mago and the other Hasdrubal[1] should join forces with him. He therefore merely sent a force to occupy the Pyrenees,[2] and himself spent the remainder of the summer in receiving the submission of the peoples of Spain.

A few days after the battle at Baecula, when Scipio, now on his way back to Tarraco, had emerged drubal to escape from Spain. But only a much larger army could have closed the other passes, few as they are.

A.U.C. 545

nensi excessisset, Hasdrubal Gisgonis filius et Mago imperatores ex ulteriore Hispania ad Hasdrubalem venere, serum post male gestam rem auxilium, consilio in cetera exsequenda [1] belli haud parum
4 opportuni. Ibi conferentibus quid in cuiusque provinciae [2] regione animorum Hispanis esset, unus Hasdrubal Gisgonis ultimam Hispaniae oram, quae ad Oceanum et Gades vergit, ignaram adhuc Romanorum esse eoque Carthaginiensibus satis fidam
5 censebat; inter Hasdrubalem alterum et Magonem constabat beneficiis Scipionis occupatos omnium animos publice privatimque esse, nec transitionibus finem ante fore quam omnes Hispani milites aut in ultima Hispaniae amoti aut traducti in Galliam
6 forent. Itaque etiam si senatus Carthaginiensium non censuisset, eundum tamen Hasdrubali fuisse in Italiam, ubi belli caput rerumque [3] summa esset, simul ut Hispanos omnes procul ab nomine Scipionis
7 ex Hispania abduceret. Exercitum eius cum transitionibus tum adverso proelio imminutum Hispanis repleri militibus, et Magonem, Hasdrubali Gisgonis filio tradito exercitu, ipsum cum grandi pecunia ad conducenda mercede auxilia in Baliares traicere;
8 Hasdrubalem Gisgonis cum exercitu penitus in Lusitaniam abire, nec cum Romano manus conserere; Masinissae ex omni equitatu quod roboris esset, tria milia equitum expleri, eumque vagum per

[1] ex(s)equenda $P(1)NJK$: -sequendi Madvig.

[2] provinciae $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben, Johnson : provincia ac Riemann (et Madvig) : Conway would delete.

[3] rerumque A^1N^1JK : rerum $P(1)N$: et rerum C^2 Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] The brother of Mago. [2] Cf. v. 12.

from the forest of Castulo, Hasdrubal, the son of B.C. 209 Gisgo, and Mago, the generals, came from farther Spain to Hasdrubal, bringing belated aid after the defeat, but not inopportunely for a council on the prosecution of the rest of the war. There, as they were exchanging information concerning the spirit of the Spaniards in the territory assigned to each of them, Hasdrubal, the son of Gisgo, was alone of the opinion that the most remote part of Spain, which extends toward the Ocean and Gades, was still unacquainted with the Romans and in consequence sufficiently loyal to the Carthaginians. The other Hasdrubal[1] and Mago agreed that, both as states and as individuals, all men were prepossessed owing to the favours of Scipio; and there would be no end to desertions until all the Spanish soldiers had been either segregated in the farthest part of Spain, or led over into Gaul. And so, they said, even if the Carthaginian senate had not decreed it,[2] Hasdrubal would still have been obliged to proceed into Italy, where was the focus of the war and the main issue, with this purpose also, in order that he might lead all the Spanish troops out of Spain, far removed from the fame of Scipio. They proposed that his army, depleted both by desertions and by defeat, should be recruited with Spanish soldiers; and further, that Mago, after turning over his army to Hasdrubal, son of Gisgo, should himself cross to the Balearic Isles with a large sum of money, to hire mercenary auxiliaries; that Hasdrubal, son of Gisgo, should retire with his army into the interior of Lusitania and not engage in battle with the Roman; that for Masinissa there should be a full complement of three thousand horsemen, the pick of all the cavalry, and citeriorem Hispaniam sociis opem ferre, hostium oppida atque agros populari. His decretis ad exsequenda quae statuerant duces[1] digressi. Haec eo anno in Hispania acta.

A.U.C. 545

9 Romae fama Scipionis in dies crescere. Fabio Tarentum captum astu[2] magis quam virtute gloriae
10 tamen esse. Fulvi senescere fama, Marcellus etiam adverso rumore esse, superquam quod primo male pugnaverat, quia vagante per Italiam Hannibale media aestate Venusiam in tecta milites abduxisset.
11 Inimicus erat ei C. Publicius Bibulus tribunus plebis. Is iam a prima pugna, quae adversa fuerat, adsiduis contionibus infamem invisumque plebei Claudium
12 fecerat, et iam de imperio abrogando eius agebat, cum tamen necessarii Claudi obtinuerunt ut relicto Venusiae legato Marcellus Romam veniret[3] ad purganda ea quae inimici obicerent,[4] nec de imperio 13 eius abrogando absente ipso ageretur. Forte sub idem tempus et Marcellus ad deprecandam ignominiam et Q. Fulvius consul comitiorum causa Romam venit.

XXI. Actum de imperio Marcelli in circo Flaminio est ingenti concursu plebisque et omnium ordinum;

[1] duces $A^{z}N^{s}JK$ Aldus, Froben : om. $P(1)N$ Madvig.

[2] astu $SpA^{s}N^{s}JK$ Froben 2 : om. P^{3} : ingenio AN Aldus : fraude C^{4}.

[3] veniret $SpJK$ Froben 2 : rediret $P^{1}(1)N$ Aldus, Madvig, Conway.

[4] obicerent $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Aldus, Froben : decernerent $P(1)N$: deferrent M. Müller.

---

[1] Here again we correct Livy's chronology by Polybius Book X. in which the battle of Baecula falls in 208 B.C., leaving the winter and early spring only for Hasdrubal's stay in Gaul; cf. vii. 5 note. Livy has him remain a whole year among the Gauls, and makes no attempt to explain a delay so incredible.

that, roaming about over hither Spain, he should lend B.C. 209 aid to allies and devastate towns and farms of the enemy. Having thus ordered, the generals separated, to carry out the measures decided upon. Such were the events in Spain that year.[1]

At Rome Scipio's fame was growing from day to day; Fabius, although Tarentum had been taken by ruse rather than by courage, nevertheless gained glory thereby: Fulvius' celebrity was declining: Marcellus was even in bad repute, not only because he had at first been defeated, but also because, while Hannibal was wandering about Italy, he had drawn off his troops to their billets at Venusia in midsummer. He had a personal enemy, Gaius Publicius Bibulus, tribune of the plebs. This man, beginning with the first battle, which had been unsuccessful, by continually haranguing had defamed Claudius to the common people and made them hate him, and by this time he was arguing for the abrogation of his command, when the relatives of Claudius nevertheless carried their point that Marcellus should leave a lieutenant at Venusia and come to Rome, to clear himself of the charges which his enemies were making, and that the abrogation of his command should not be discussed while he himself was absent. By chance Marcellus came to Rome to avert disgrace, about the same time that Quintus Fulvius, the consul, arrived to conduct the elections.

XXI. The argument in regard to Marcellus' command was staged in the Flaminian Circus,[2] before a great assemblage of the commons and of all classes,

[2] For the use of the Flaminian Circus at times for assemblies see Cicero pro Sestio 33; ad Att. I. xiv. 1. Plutarch in Marcellus xxvii. is following Livy, as often.

A.U.C. 545

2 accusavitque [1] tribunus plebis non Marcellum modo, sed omnem nobilitatem: fraude eorum et cunctatione fieri ut Hannibal decimum iam annum Italiam provinciam habeat, diutius ibi quam Carthagine vixerit. 3 Habere fructum imperii prorogati Marcello populum Romanum: bis caesum exercitum eius aestiva 4 Venusiae sub tectis agere. Hanc tribuni orationem ita obruit Marcellus commemoratione rerum suarum ut non rogatio solum de imperio eius abrogando antiquaretur, sed postero die consulem eum ingenti 5 consensu centuriae omnes crearent. Additur conlega T. Quinctius Crispinus, qui tum praetor erat. Postero die praetores creati P. Licinius Crassus Dives pontifex maximus, P. Licinius Varus, Sex. Iulius Caesar, Q. Claudius.[2]

6 Comitiorum ipsorum diebus sollicita civitas de Etruriae defectione fuit. Principium eius rei ab Arretinis fieri C. Calpurnius scripserat, qui eam 7 provinciam pro praetore obtinebat. Itaque [3] confestim eo missus Marcellus consul designatus, qui rem inspiceret ac, si digna videretur, exercitu accito bellum ex Apulia in Etruriam transferret. Eo 8 metu conpressi Etrusci quieverunt. Tarentinorum legatis pacem petentibus cum libertate ac legibus suis responsum ab senatu est ut redirent, cum Fabius consul Romam venisset.

9 Ludi et Romani et plebei eo anno in [4] singulos

[1] -que $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: om. Sp Froben 2, Conway.

[2] Claudius $P(1)NJK$: Claudius Flamen Froben 2 (Flaminius x Aldus); cf. p. 300, n. 5.

[3] Itaque Aldus, Froben: aque PRM: atque $N(3)$: ita JK.

[4] in $P^{x}(3)R^{x}NJK$ Aldus: sin PR: om. Froben 2, Riemann, Luchs.

And the tribune of the plebs accused not Marcellus merely, but the entire nobility. It was due to their dishonesty and delaying, he said, that Hannibal had Italy as his province for now the tenth year, and had lived longer there than at Carthage. The Roman people had this fruit from the continuation of Marcellus' command, namely, that his army, twice cut to pieces, had its summer quarters at Venusia in billets! This speech of the tribune was so completely refuted by Marcellus' statement of his achievements that not only was the bill to abrogate his command rejected, but on the following day all the centuries with great unanimity elected him consul. Joined with him as colleague was Titus Quinctius Crispinus, who at the time was praetor. On the following day Publius Licinius Crassus Dives, pontifex maximus, Publius Licinius Varus, Sextus Iulius Caesar and Quintus Claudius were elected praetors. B.C. 209

Precisely on these election days the state was concerned in regard to a revolt in Etruria. First steps in that direction were reported in a letter of Gaius Calpurnius, propraetor in charge of the assignment, as being taken by the men of Arretium. Accordingly Marcellus, the consul-elect, was at once sent thither to look into the matter and, if he thought it important enough, to send for an army and shift the war from Apulia to Etruria. The Etruscans, restrained by the fear of that move, kept quiet. When legates of the Tarentines sued for peace with freedom and their own laws, the senate answered that they should return when Fabius, the consul, came to Rome.

The Roman Games and the Plebeian Games were repeated that year for one day in each case. The

A.U.C. 545 dies instaurati. Aediles curules fuere L. Cornelius Caudinus et Ser. Sulpicius Galba, plebei C. Servilius et Q. Caecilius Metellus.[1] Servilium negabant iure aut tribunum plebis fuisse aut aedilem esse, quod patrem eius, quem triumvirum agrarium occisum a Boiis circa Mutinam esse opinio per novem[2] annos fuerat, vivere atque in hostium potestate esse satis constabat.

A.U.C. 546 XXII. Undecimo anno Punici belli consulatum inierunt M. Marcellus quintum—ut numeretur consulatus quem vitio creatus non gessit—et T. Quinctius Crispinus. Utrisque consulibus[3] Italia decreta provincia est et duo consulum prioris anni exercitus—tertius Venusiae tum erat, cui Marcellus praefuerat—ita ut ex tribus eligerent duo quos vellent, tertius ei traderetur cui Tarentum et Sallentini provincia evenisset. Ceterae provinciae ita divisae: praetoribus P. Licinio Varo urbana, P. Licinio[4] Crasso pontifici maximo peregrina et quo senatus censuisset, Sex. Iulio Caesari Sicilia, Q. Claudio[5] Tarentum. Prorogatum in annum imperium[6] est Q. Fulvio

[1] et Q. Caecilius Metellus A[1]N[1]JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N, one line.

[2] novem C Conway: nexem P(3): decem ANJK Aldus, Froben.

[3] Utrisque consulibus P(1)N Aldus: utrique consulum Sp[2]JK Froben 2.

[4] Varo . . . Licinio: an omitted line in P(1)N: supplied by A[1]N[1]JK Aldus, Froben.

[5] Claudio, P(3) Froben 2 add Flamini: M[2]ANJK Aldus add Flaminio; cf. p. 298, n. 2.

[6] in annum imperium JK Luchs: imperium in annum P(1)N Aldus, Froben.

curule aediles were Lucius Cornelius Caudinus and B.C. 209
Servius Sulpicius Galba, the plebeian aediles being Gaius Servilius and Quintus Caecilius Metellus. It was said that legally Servilius had not been tribune of the plebs, nor was he now legally aedile, because his father, of whom it had been believed for nine years that he was slain as one of the three land-commissioners by the Boii near Mutina, was alive, it was now established, and in the hands of the enemy.[1]

XXII. In the eleventh year of the Punic War the B.C. 208 consuls entering office were Marcellus, for the fifth time—to include the consulship which he had not held on account of a defective election [2]—and Titus Quinctius Crispinus. Italy was assigned as their province to both consuls, also the two armies of the consuls of the previous year. A third, hitherto commanded by Marcellus, was then at Venusia. The decree ordered that of the three they should choose two of their own selection, and that the third be given to the general whose assignment should be Tarentum and the Sallentini. The rest of the assignments were distributed as follows: for the praetors, jurisdiction in the city to Publius Licinius Varus, that involving strangers to Publius Licinius Crassus, pontifex maximus, with a command wherever the senate should decide; Sicily to Sextus Iulius Caesar and Tarentum to Quintus Claudius. Continued for one year was the command of Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, [1] Cf. XXI. xxv. 3. So long as a patrician father lived and had not sanctioned a son's transfer to a plebeian gens, the son's election to plebeian offices was accounted void; cf. XXX. xix. 9; Mommsen, Staatsrecht I³. 487 and note.

[2] Cf. XXIII. xxxi. 13.

A.U.C. 546

Flacco, ut provinciam Capuam, quae T. Quincti praetoris fuerat, cum una legione obtineret. Prorogatum et C. Hostilio Tubulo est, ut pro praetore in Etruriam ad duas legiones succederet C. Calpurnio. Prorogatum et L. Veturio Philoni est, ut pro praetore Galliam eandem provinciam cum isdem duabus legionibus obtineret quibus praetor obtinuisset. Quod in L. Veturio, idem in C. Aurunculeio decretum ab senatu, latumque de prorogando imperio ad populum est, qui praetor Sardiniam provinciam cum duabus legionibus obtinuerat. Additae ei ad praesidium provinciae quinquaginta longae[1] naves quas P. Scipio ex Hispania misisset. Et P. Scipioni et M. Silano suae Hispaniae suique exercitus in annum decreti. Scipio ex octoginta navibus quas aut secum ex Italia adductas aut captas Carthagine habebat quinquaginta in Sardiniam tramittere iussus, quia fama erat magnum navalem apparatum eo anno Carthagine esse, ducentis navibus omnem oram Italiae Siciliaeque ac[2] Sardiniae inpleturos. Et in Sicilia ita divisa res est: Sex. Caesari exercitus Cannensis datus est; M. Valerius Laevinus—ei quoque enim prorogatum imperium est—classem quae ad Siciliam erat navium septuaginta obtineret; adderet eo triginta naves quae ad Tarentum priore anno fuerant; cum ea centum navium classe, si videretur ei, praedatum in Africam traiceret. Et

[1] longae N[s]JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.
[2] -que ac Sp?JK Froben 2: -que (after Sardiniae) P(3)N Aldus.

---

[1] Polybius makes his entire fleet number 53 ships (18 captured); X. xvii. 13.

who with one legion was to be in charge of Capua as his assignment, formerly held by Titus Quinctius, a praetor. Continued also was the command of Gaius Hostilius Tubulus, who was to succeed Gaius Calpurnius as propraetor for Etruria, at the head of two legions. Continued also was the command of Lucius Veturius Philo, to hold Gaul as propraetor—the same assignment with the same two legions with which he had held it as praetor. The measure adopted in the case of Lucius Veturius was likewise decreed by the senate in that of Gaius Aurunculeius, and the bill to continue his command was brought before the people. As praetor he had had Sardinia for his province with two legions. In addition he was given for the defence of the province the fifty warships which Publius Scipio had sent from Spain. And to Publius Scipio and Marcus Silanus were decreed for one year their own provinces in Spain and their own armies. Scipio was ordered to send over to Sardinia fifty of the eighty [1] ships which he had either brought with him from Italy or captured at (New) Carthage. This was owing to the report that at Carthage there were great naval preparations that year, and that with two hundred ships the Carthaginians would cover the whole coast of Italy, also of Sicily and Sardinia. In Sicily, moreover, the apportionment was as follows: the army from Cannae was given to Sextus Caesar; Marcus Valerius Laevinus—for his command also was continued—to have the fleet of seventy vessels then in Sicilian waters. To that he should add thirty ships which had been at Tarentum the previous year. With that fleet of a hundred ships he was, if he saw fit, to cross over to Africa, to ravage the country. Likewise Publius B.C. 208

A.U.C. 546

P. Sulpicio, ut eadem classe Macedoniam Graeciamque provinciam haberet, prorogatum in annum imperium est. De duabus quae ad urbem Romam 11 fuerant legionibus nihil mutatum. Supplementum quo opus esset ut [1] scriberent consulibus [2] permissum. Una et viginti legionibus eo anno defensum imperium 12 Romanum est. Et P. Licinio Varo praetori urbano negotium datum ut naves longas triginta veteres reficeret quae Ostiae erant et viginti novas naves sociis navalibus conpleret, ut quinquaginta navium classe oram maris [3] vicinam urbi Romanae tueri
13 posset. C. Calpurnius vetitus ab Arretio movere exercitum, nisi cum successor venisset; idem et Tubulo imperatum, ut inde praecipue caveret ne qua nova consilia orerentur.[4]

XXIII. Praetores in provincias profecti; consules religio tenebat, quod prodigiis aliquot nuntiatis non 2 facile litabant. Et [5] ex Campania nuntiata erant, Capuae duas aedes, Fortunae et Martis, et sepulcra aliquot de caelo tacta, Cumis—adeo minimis etiam rebus prava religio inserit deos—mures in aede Iovis aurum rosisse. Casini [6] examen apium ingens in 3 foro consedisse; et Ostiae murum portamque de

[1] ut N^2JK Aldus, Froben : om. $P(1)N$.
[2] consulibus N^2JK : consules $P(1)N$.
[3] maris A^2N^2JK : magis $P(1)N$.
[4] orerentur Luchs, 1879 : orirentur N^2JK Aldus, Froben : caperentur $P(1)N$ Luchs, 1888.
[5] Et $P(1)N$: om. JK Aldus, Froben.
[6] Casini $P(1)N^2J$: Casilini K.

---

[1] He must have had troops as well; but the legion of vii. 15 is not expressly mentioned.

Sulpicius' command was continued for one year, B.C. 208 and he was to have Macedonia and Greece as his province with the same fleet as before.[1] In regard to the two legions that had been at the city of Rome no change was made. Permission was given to the consuls to recruit additional numbers, to be assigned to meet any need. It was with twenty-one legions that the Roman empire was defended that year. In addition, Publius Licinius Varus, the city praetor, was given the task of repairing the thirty old warships which were at Ostia and of manning twenty new ships with crews, so that with a fleet of fifty ships he might defend the seacoast near the city of Rome.[2] Gaius Calpurnius was forbidden to move his army away from Arretium before the arrival of his successor. The same order was given to Tubulus also, to be particularly on his guard there against the outbreak of any sedition.

XXIII. The praetors set out for their assignments. The consuls were detained by religious scruples, because, when a number of portents were reported, they did not easily obtain favourable sacrifices. From Campania had come reports that at Capua two temples, those of Fortune and of Mars, and a number of tombs were struck by lightning; that at Cumae mice had gnawed the gold in the temple of Jupiter—so true is it that superstition brings the gods into the smallest circumstances. At Casinum it was said that a great swarm of bees had settled in the forum.[3] It was also reported that at Ostia the wall and a gate

[2] Thus even the city praetor has an emergency command.

[3] Cf. XXIV. x. 11 (Rome, Forum); XXI. xlvi. 2 (in camp, over the headquarters). Casinum was not in Campania, but on the way thither (Via Latina).

B.C. caelo tactam. Caere vulturium volasse in aedem
4 Iovis, Volsiniis sanguine lacum manasse. Horum prodigiorum causa diem unum supplicatio fuit. Per dies aliquot hostiae maiores sine litatione caesae, diuque non impetrata pax deum. In capita consulum re publica incolumi exitiabilis prodigiorum eventus vertit.

5 Ludi Apollinares Q. Fulvio Ap. Claudio consulibus a P.[1] Cornelio Sulla praetore urbano primum facti erant: inde omnes deinceps praetores urbani fecerant; sed in unum annum vovebant dieque incerta[2]
6 faciebant. Eo anno pestilentia gravis incidit in[3] urbem agrosque, quae tamen magis in longos morbos
7 quam in perniciabiles[4] evasit. Eius pestilentiae causa et supplicatum per compita tota urbe est, et P. Licinius Varus praetor urbanus legem ferre ad populum iussus ut ii ludi in perpetuum in statam diem voverentur. Ipse primus ita vovit, fecitque ante diem tertium nonas[5] Quinctiles. Is dies deinde sollemnis servatus.

XXIV. De Arretinis et fama in dies gravior et cura crescere patribus. Itaque C. Hostilio scriptum

[1] Claudio consulibus a P. x Aldus, Froben 2: om. P(1)NJK, a line following Ap.
[2] incerta JK Froben 2: incerto P(1)N Aldus.
[3] in P(1)N: per Sp Froben 2.
[4] perniciabiles(-is) CBDA Madvig, Luchs: -iales N[a]JK Aldus, Froben 2: permitiales Sp Conway: -abilis PRM.
[5] nonas P(1) NSp[2]JK: idus Merkel.

---

[1] The Lake of Bolsena.
[2] I.e. 212 B.C.
[3] A decree of the senate in 211 B.C. (XXVI. xxiii. 3) seems not to have been carried out.
[4] A slip, as Livy himself in giving the time of the festival in XXXVII. lv. 4 reckons from the Ides, not from the Nones.

of the city had been struck by lightning, that at Caere B.C. 208 a vulture had flown into the temple of Jupiter, that at Volsinii the lake[1] was stained with blood. On account of these prodigies prayers were offered for one day. For several days full-grown victims were slain without a favourable result, and for a long time the peace of the gods was not secured. It was upon the heads of the consuls that dire consequences of the portents descended, while the state remained unharmed.

The Games of Apollo had been observed for the first time in the consulship of Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius,[2] under the direction of Publius Cornelius Sulla, the city praetor. From that time all the successive city praetors had conducted them. But they vowed them for a single year and did not conduct them on a fixed date. That year a serious epidemic fell upon the city and the countryside, occasioning maladies, however, that were rather lingering than fatal. On account of that epidemic prayers were offered at the street corners throughout the city; and in addition Publius Licinius Varus, the city praetor, was ordered to propose to the people a bill that those games should be vowed in perpetuity for a fixed date.[3] He himself was the first to vow them in those terms, and he conducted them on the fifth[4] of Quinctilis.[5] Thenceforward that day was kept as a regular holiday.

XXIV. As regards the Arretines, reports grew more serious every day, and the anxiety of the senators was increased. Accordingly Gaius Hostilius

Thus the corrected date is the 13th of the month by our reckoning. The extended festival of later times covered the days from the 6th through the 13th.

[5] July in Caesar's calendar.

A.U.C. 546

est ne differret obsides ab Arretinis accipere, et cui traderet Romam deducendos C. Terentius Varro cum imperio missus. Qui ut venit, extemplo Hostilius legionem unam, quae ante urbem castra habebat, signa in urbem ferre iussit praesidiaque locis idoneis disposuit: tum in forum [1] citatis senatoribus obsides imperavit. Cum senatus biduum ad considerandum [2] peteret, aut ipsos extemplo dare aut se postero die senatorum omnes liberos sumpturum edixit. Inde portas custodire iussi tribuni [3] militum praefectique [4] socium et centuriones,[5] ne quis nocte urbe exiret. Id segnius neglegentiusque factum; septem principes senatus, priusquam custodiae in portis locarentur, ante noctem cum liberis evaserunt. Postero die luce prima, cum senatus in forum citari coeptus esset, desiderati, bonaque eorum venierunt. A ceteris senatoribus centum viginti obsides, liberi ipsorum, accepti traditique C. Terentio Romam deducendi. Is omnia suspectiora quam ante fuerant in senatu fecit. Itaque tamquam imminente Etrusco tumultu, legionem unam, alteram ex urbanis, Arretium ducere iussus ipse C. Terentius, eamque habere in praesidio urbis; C. Hostilium cum cetero exercitu placet [6] totam provinciam peragrare et cavere ne qua occasio

[1] forum Duker: foro $P(1)NJK$ Aldus.
[2] considerandum, after this $P(1)N$ Aldus have tempus (after peteret JK Froben 2; om. Duker).
[3] iussi tribuni Gronovius: iussit tribuni $P(3)N^{1/2}$ (tribunos $Sp^2A^{y/2}JK$ Froben 2; -nis M^2BDAN Aldus).
[4] praefectique $P(3)N^{1/2}$ (-tosque Sp^2 etc., as above: -tisque M^2 etc., as above).
[5] centuriones $P(3)A^{y/2}JKSp^2$ Froben 2: -ibus M^2BDAN.
[6] placet $P(1)N$: -uit $A^{y/2}N^{1/2}JK$.

received written orders not to postpone taking hostages from the Arretines, and Gaius Terentius Varro was sent with military authority, that Hostilius might turn them over to him to be escorted to Rome. Upon Varro's arrival Hostilius at once ordered the one legion which was encamped before the city to advance into the city, and he posted his forces in suitable positions. Then, summoning the senate to the forum, he demanded hostages of them. When the senate asked for two days to consider, he ordered that they themselves furnish them forthwith, or else on the next day, he declared, he would take all the children of the senators. Thereupon the tribunes of the soldiers and prefects of allies and centurions were bidden to guard the gates, that no one might leave the city in the night. This was done slowly and with carelessness. Seven leading members of the senate, before guards could be posted at the gates, escaped before nightfall with their children. Next day at dawn they were missed when the senators began to be summoned to the forum, and their property was sold. From the rest of the senators a hundred and twenty hostages, their own children, were taken and handed over to Gaius Terentius Varro to be escorted to Rome. Varro in the senate represented everything as causing more apprehension than before. And so, just as if an outbreak in Etruria were imminent, Gaius Terentius himself was ordered to lead a single legion, one or the other of the city legions, to Arretium and to keep that legion as the garrison of the town. As for Gaius Hostilius, it was decided that with the rest of the army he should scour the whole province and see to it that no opportunity was given to those eager

B.C. 208

A.U.C. 546

8 novare cupientibus res daretur. C. Terentius ut Arretium cum legione venit, claves portarum cum magistratus poposcisset, negantibus iis comparere, fraude amotas magis ratus quam neglegentia intercidisse, ipse alias claves omnibus portis imposuit, cavitque cum cura[1] ut omnia in potestate sua essent; 9 Hostilium intentius monuit ut in eo spem non moturos quicquam Etruscos poneret, si ne quid movere possent[2] praecavisset.

XXV. De Tarentinis inde magna contentione in senatu actum coram Fabio, defendente ipso quos ceperat armis, aliis infensis et plerisque aequantibus 2 eos Campanorum noxae poenaeque. Senatus consultum in sententiam M'. Acili factum est ut oppidum praesidio custodiretur, Tarentinique omnes intra moenia continerentur, res integra postea referretur, 3 cum tranquillior status Italiae esset. Et de M. Livio praefecto arcis Tarentinae haud minore certamine actum est, aliis senatus consulto notantibus praefectum, quod eius socordia Tarentum proditum hosti 4 esset, aliis praemia decernentibus, quod per quinquennium arcem tutatus esset, maximeque unius 5 eius opera receptum Tarentum foret, mediis ad censores, non ad senatum notionem de eo pertinere dicentibus; cuius sententiae et Fabius fuit. Adiecit

[1] cum cura P(1)N Aldus: om. SpJK Froben 2.

[2] movere possent A[1]JK Aldus, Froben: moveri posset P(1)N (omitting prae- with the next word).

---

[1] As at Capua, the citizens were to be treated as political prisoners; XXVI. xxvii. 12.

[2] Livius had been drinking, according to Polybius VIII. xxvii.

for a revolution. Upon the arrival of Gaius Teren- B.C. 208 tius at Arretium with his legion, when he demanded of the magistrates the keys of the gates, and they said they were not to be found, thinking they were removed by stealth and not really missing through carelessness, he himself provided other keys for all the gates, and took great pains to have everything under his own control. He very earnestly warned Hostilius to rest his hope that the Etruscans would not make any move upon one thing—that he had first made it impossible for them to do so.

XXV. Then in regard to the Tarentines there was very heated discussion in the senate in the presence of Fabius, who himself defended the men whom he had captured by force, whereas others were hostile and many put them upon the same level of guilt and punishment as the Capuans. A decree of the senate was adopted on motion of Manius Acilius, that the town should be guarded by a garrison and all the Tarentines confined within the walls;[1] that, with no action now, the case should be brought up later, when the condition of Italy was more peaceful. Also in regard to Marcus Livius, commandant of the citadel of Tarentum, there was no less heated discussion. For some were proposing to brand the commandant by a decree of the senate, because by his lack of spirit Tarentum had been betrayed to the enemy,[2] and others proposed to vote him rewards, because he had defended the citadel for five years, and it was thanks to him more than to anyone else that Tarentum had been recovered. And those who took a middle course were claiming that a verdict in his case belonged to the censors, not to the senate. Of this mind was Fabius also. He added, however, tamen fateri se opera Livi Tarentum receptum, quod amici eius volgo in senatu iactassent; neque enim recipiundum fuisse, nisi amissum foret.

A.U.C. 546

6 Consulum [1] alter T. Quinctius Crispinus ad exercitum quem Q. Fulvius Flaccus habuerat cum sup-
7 plemento in Lucanos est profectus. Marcellum aliae atque aliae obiectae animo religiones tenebant, in quibus quod, cum bello Gallico ad Clastidium aedem Honori et Virtuti vovisset, dedicatio eius a pontifici-
8 bus impediebatur, quod negabant unam cellam amplius quam uni deo [2] recte dedicari, quia, si de caelo tacta aut prodigii aliquid in ea factum esset,
9 difficilis procuratio foret, quod utri deo res divina fieret, sciri non posset; neque enim duobus nisi certis deis rite una hostia fieri. Ita addita Virtutis aedes adproperato opere; neque tamen ab ipso aedes eae
10 dedicatae sunt. Tum demum ad exercitum quem priore anno Venusiae reliquerat cum supplemento proficiscitur.

11 Locros in Bruttiis Crispinus oppugnare conatus, quia magnam famam attulisse Fabio Tarentum rebatur,[3] omne genus tormentorum machinarumque ex Sicilia arcessierat; et naves indidem accitae erant

[1] Consulum P(1)N Aldus, Froben: consul JK.
[2] amplius quam uni deo SpA[2]N[2]JK Froben 2: duobus P(1)N Aldus: duobus diis Weissenborn.
[3] rebatur PCR: ferebatur R1NJK Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Cicero Cato Maior 11, Certe, nam nisi tu amisisses, numquam recepissem; de Oratore, II. 273; Plutarch, Fabius xxiii. 3.
[2] 222 B.C., in his first consulship.
[3] Doubtless those specified in the books of the pontiffs as divinities who might be so paired together. Cf. Valerius Maximus I. i. 8.

his admission that the recovery of Tarentum was due B.C. 208 to Livius, as his friends had repeatedly declared in the senate; for it would not have had to be recovered unless it had been lost.[1]

Of the consuls one, Titus Quinctius Crispinus, set out for Lucania with additional recruits to join the army which Quintus Fulvius Flaccus had had. Marcellus was detained by religious scruples one after another, as they were impressed upon his mind. One of them was that, although he had vowed at Clastidium, in the Gallic War,[2] a temple to Honour and Valour, the dedication of the temple was being blocked by the pontiffs. These said that one cella was not properly dedicated to more than a single divinity, since, if it should be struck by lightning, or some portent should occur in it, expiation would be difficult, because it could not be known to which god sacrifice should be offered; for, with the exception of certain deities,[3] sacrifice of a single victim to two gods was not proper. Accordingly a temple of Valour was added, its construction being hastened. Even so the temples were not dedicated by Marcellus in person.[4] Then at last he set out with additional recruits to join the army which he had left at Venusia the previous year.

Crispinus attempted to besiege Locri[5] in the land of the Bruttii, because he thought that Tarentum had brought great repute to Fabius: and he had requisitioned artillery and machines of every kind from Sicily. And from the same quarter ships also [4] For these temples outside the Porta Capena and their dedication by his son, see Vol. VI. p. 494. note; Cicero de Nat. Deor. II. 61; in Verr. IV. 121; Val. Max. l.c.

[5] Cf. XXIV. i.–iii.

A.U.C. 546

quae vergentem ad mare partem urbis oppugnarent.
12 Ea omissa oppugnatio est, quia Lacinium Hannibal admoverat copias, et conlegam eduxisse iam a Venusia exercitum fama erat, cui coniungi volebat.
13 Itaque in Apuliam ex Bruttiis reditum, et inter Venusiam Bantiamque minus trium milium passuum 14 intervallo consules binis castris consederunt.[1] In eandem regionem et Hannibal rediit[2] averso ab Locris bello. Ibi consules ambo ingenio feroces prope cotidie in aciem exire[3] haud dubia spe, si duobus exercitibus consularibus iunctis commisisset sese hostis, debellari posse.

XXVI. Hannibal quia cum Marcello bis priore anno congressus vicerat victusque erat, ut, cum eodem si dimicandum foret, nec spem nec metum ex vano habere,[4] ita duobus consulibus haudquaquam
2 sese parem futurum credebat.[5] Itaque totus in suas
3 artes versus insidiis locum quaerebat. Levia tamen proelia inter bina castra vario eventu fiebant; quibus cum extrahi aestatem posse consules crederent, nihilo minus oppugnari Locros posse rati, L. Cincio ut ex
4 Sicilia Locros cum classe traiceret scribunt. Et ut ab terra quoque oppugnari moenia possent, ab Tarento partem exercitus qui[6] in praesidio erat duci

[1] consederunt $A^{1?}JK$ Madvig: -rant $P(3)M^5N$ Aldus, Froben, Conway: -siderant R^1MBD.

[2] rediit $P(3\ B^1N$: redit JK.

[3] in aciem exire x Gronovius: inacieheare P: milites in aciem excire (-ciere) A^2JK Aldus, Froben (exire N^2): in acte heare $CRMBD$: in acie stare Weissenborn.

[4] habere Harant, Riemann, Conway (in note): haberet $P(1)NJK$ Eds., Johnson: habebat Gronovius.

[5] credebat $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: censebat A^2N^2JK Conway.

[6] qui x Sigonius: quae $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben: qui ibi Weissenborn.

had been sent for, to attack the part of the city B.C. 208 facing the sea. That siege was given up, because Hannibal had brought up his forces to Lacinium,[1] and the consul wished to unite with his colleague, who, it was reported, had already led his army away from Venusia. And so he returned from the land of the Bruttii into Apulia, and the consuls established themselves between Venusia and Bantia in two camps less than three miles apart. Hannibal also, now that the war had been diverted from Locri, returned into the same region. There both consuls, who were by nature high-spirited, went out into battle-line almost daily, with no uncertain hope that, if the enemy should risk a battle with two united consular armies, the war could be finished.

XXVI. Hannibal, since in his two encounters with Marcellus in the previous year he had been both victor and vanquished, believed indeed that, if he should have to fight with the same general, he would find neither hope nor fear unfounded; nevertheless he believed that he would be by no means a match for the two consuls. Accordingly, devoting himself exclusively to his own arts, he was in search of a place for an ambush. Slight engagements, however, were taking place in the space between the two camps with varying results. The consuls, believing that the whole summer could be spent in that way, and yet thinking it possible to besiege Locri, wrote to Lucius Cincius to cross over from Sicily with his fleet to Locri. And, to make an attack upon the walls possible from the landward side also, they ordered that a part of the force which was serving as a garrison

[1] For promontory and temple cf. Vol. VI. p. 182, note; XXXVI. xlii. 2.

A.U.C. 546

5 eo iusserunt. Ea ita futura per quosdam Thurinos conperta Hannibali cum essent, mittit ad insidendam ab Tarento viam. Ibi sub tumulo Peteliae tria 6 milia equitum, duo peditum in occulto locata; in quae inexplorato euntes Romani cum incidissent, ad duo milia armatorum caesa, mille et quingenti ferme vivi capti, alii dissupati fuga per agros saltusque Tarentum rediere.

7 Tumulus erat silvestris inter Punica et Romana castra, ab neutris primo occupatus, quia Romani qualis pars eius quae vergeret ad[1] hostium castra esset ignorabant, Hannibal insidiis quam castris 8 aptiorem eum crediderat. Itaque nocte ad id missas aliquot Numidarum turmas medio in saltu condiderat, quorum interdiu nemo ab statione movebatur, ne aut 9 arma aut ipsi procul conspicerentur. Fremebant volgo in castris Romanis occupandum eum tumulum esse et castello firmandum, ne, si occupatus ab Hannibale foret, velut in cervicibus haberent hostem. 10 Movit ea res Marcellum, et conlegae "Quin imus" inquit "ipsi cum equitibus paucis exploratum? Subiecta res oculis nostris[2] certius dabit consilium." 11 Adsentienti[3] Crispino, cum equitibus ducentis

[1] ad P(1)N Aldus: in JK Froben 2.
[2] nostris P(1)N Aldus: om. JKSp Froben 2, Conway.
[3] Adsentienti Luchs, Conway: -ente *Sp*²*JK Froben* 2: consentienti P(1)N Aldus. Cf. adsentienti in abl. abs. XXXVI. xxxii. 9.

[1] The town crowned a hill 1,100 feet high, and could be reduced only by starvation in 216 B.C.; cf. XXIII. xx. 4 ff.; xxx. 1 ff.

should be brought from Tarentum to Locri. Hanni- B.C. 208
bal, being informed by some men of Thurii that this was about to be done, sent men to lie in wait along the road from Tarentum. There, beneath the hill of Petelia,[1] three thousand horsemen and two thousand foot were posted in hiding. When the Romans, as they advanced without reconnoitring, encountered this force, about two thousand of their armed men were slain, about fifteen hundred taken alive. The rest, scattering in flight over the farms and through the woods, returned to Tarentum.

Between the Carthaginian and the Roman camps [2] there was a wooded hill, at first not occupied by either army, because the Romans did not know what was the character of that side of it which faced the enemy's camp, and Hannibal had believed it better suited to an ambuscade than to a camp. And so, sending by night a number of squadrons of the Numidians for that purpose, he had concealed them in the middle of the wood. And during the day none of them would stir from his post, for fear lest either their arms or the men themselves should be seen from a distance. In the Roman camp[3] there was a general outcry that the hill must be occupied and defended by a fort, in order that they might not have the enemy, as it were, upon their necks, if the hill should be occupied by Hannibal. That roused Marcellus, and he said to his colleague, "Why not go ourselves with a few horsemen to reconnoitre? Seeing the situation before our eyes will give us a surer judgment." As Crispinus assented, they set out with two

[2] For the scene we revert to the region of Venusia; cf. xxv. 13; xxviii. 5; Plutarch, Marcellus xxix. 1.

[3] Evidently that of Marcellus.

A.U.C. 516

viginti. ex quibus quadraginta Fregellani, ceteri 12 Etrusci erant, proficiscuntur: secuti tribuni militum M. Marcellus consulis filius et A. Manlius, simul et duo praefecti socium L. Arrenius et M'. Aulius.
13 Immolasse eo die quidam prodidere memoriae [1] consulem Marcellum, et prima hostia caesa iocur sine
14 capite inventum, in secunda omnia conparuisse quae adsolent, auctum etiam visum in capite; nec id sane haruspici placuisse quod secundum trunca et turpia exta nimis laeta apparuissent. XXVII. Ceterum consulem Marcellum tanta cupiditas tenebat dimicandi cum Hannibale ut numquam satis castra
2 castris conlata diceret.[2] Tum quoque vallo egrediens signum dedit ut ad locum miles esset paratus, ut, si collis in quem speculatum irent placuisset, vasa colligerent ac[3] sequerentur.
3 Exiguum campi ante castra erat: inde in collem aperta undique et conspecta ferebat via. Numidis speculator, nequaquam in spem tantae rei positus, sed si quos vagos pabuli aut lignorum causa longius a castris progressos possent excipere, signum dat ut pariter ab suis quisque latebris [4] exorerentur.
4 Non ante apparuere quibus obviis ab iugo ipso consurgendum erat quam circumiere qui ab tergo intercluderent viam. Tum undique omnes exorti, et

[1] memoriae. JK Froben 2 have it before prodidere.
[2] diceret SpA[s]JK Froben 2: crederet P(1)N Aldus.
[3] ac JK Aldus, Froben: et P(3)N.
[4] ab (or a) suis quisque latebris A[s]N[s]JK Aldus, Froben: ab utrisque lateribus P(1)N.

[1] Polybius' briefer account makes their escort two troops of cavalry, about 30 light-armed infantry and the lictors (who would be 24 in number); X. xxxii. 2.
[2] So Plutarch also, at greater length; Marcellus xxix. 5.

hundred and twenty horsemen, of whom forty were B.C. 208 from Fregellae, the rest Etruscans.[1] The tribunes of the soldiers, Marcus Marcellus, son of the consul, and Aulus Manlius, followed them, along with two prefects of the allies, Lucius Arrenius and Manius Aulius. Some have related that the consul Marcellus offered a sacrifice that day, and that when the first victim was slain, the liver was found headless; that in the second everything usually found was present; that the head seemed even enlarged; also that the soothsayer had not been at all pleased that, after organs defective and deformed, others had appeared which were more than promising.[2] XXVII. But such eagerness to fight with Hannibal possessed the consul Marcellus that he said the camps were never close enough together. At this time also, as he came out from the earthwork, he gave the command that the soldiers should be ready and in place, so that, in case the hill which they were on their way to reconnoitre proved satisfactory, they might gather up their baggage and follow.

There was only a small level space before the camps; then a road open and visible from every side led up the hill. As for the Numidians, a scout who had been posted not at all in the hope of so important a result, but in case they might be able to capture any men who, in wandering about in search of fodder or firewood, had gone too far from camp, gave the signal to spring up, all of them at the same time, from their different hiding-places. Those who had to rise up from the hillside itself facing the enemy did not show themselves before those who were to cut off the road in the rear turned the enemy's flanks. Then they all sprang up from every side and, raising a

A.U.C. 546

5 clamore sublato impetum fecere. Cum in ea valle consules essent ut neque evadere possent [1] in iugum occupatum ab hoste nec receptum ab tergo circumventi haberent, extrahi tamen diutius certamen potuisset, ni coepta ab Etruscis fuga pavorem ceteris
6 iniecisset. Non tamen omisere pugnam deserti ab Etruscis Fregellani, donec integri consules hortando
7 ipsique ex parte pugnando rem sustinebant; sed postquam volneratos ambo consules, Marcellum etiam transfixum lancea prolabentem ex equo moribundum videre, tum et ipsi—perpauci autem supererant—cum Crispino consule duobus iaculis icto et Marcello
8 adolescente saucio et ipso effugerunt. Interfectus A. Manlius tribunus militum, et ex duobus praefectis socium M'. Aulius occisus, L. Arrenius captus; et lictores consulum quinque vivi in hostium potestatem venerunt, ceteri aut interfecti aut cum consule effu-
9 gerunt. Equitum [2] tres et quadraginta aut in proelio aut in fuga ceciderunt, duodeviginti vivi capti.
10 Tumultuatum in [3] castris fuerat, ut consulibus irent subsidio, cum consulem et filium alterius consulis saucios exiguasque infelicis expeditionis reliquias
11 ad castra venientes cernunt. Mors Marcelli cum alioqui miserabilis fuit, tum quod nec pro aetate—iam enim maior sexaginta annis erat—neque pro veteris prudentia ducis tam inprovide se conlegamque et prope totam rem publicam in praeceps dederat.

[1] evadere possent P(1)N Aldus: evaderent SpJK Froben 2.
[2] Equitum P(1)N Aldus: equites Sp?A[1]N[1]?J Froben 2.
[3] in. SpN[1]JK Froben 2, Conway add et before in.

---

[1] Polybius enlarges upon Marcellus' indefensible temerity and contrasts Hannibal's prudent care of his personal safety; X. xxxii. f.; cf. Plutarch Pelopidas and Marcellus iii. 3 f.

shout, they attacked. Although the consuls were in such a depression that they neither could make their way up on to the ridge occupied by the enemy, nor had any retreat open, being enclosed in the rear, still the combat might possibly have been prolonged, had not flight begun by the Etruscans inspired alarm in the others. Nevertheless the men of Fregellae, deserted by the Etruscans, did not give up the battle, so long as the consuls unwounded withstood the attack, encouraging their men and themselves taking part in the fight. But after they saw both consuls wounded, Marcellus even pierced by a lance and slipping, a dying man, from his horse, then they likewise—now only a very few were left—fled with Crispinus, the consul, who had been struck by two javelins, and Marcellus the younger, also wounded. Slain was Aulus Manlius, tribune of the soldiers, and of the two prefects of the allies Manius Aulius was killed, Lucius Arrenius captured. And five of the consuls' lictors came alive into the hands of the enemy; the rest were either slain or they escaped with the consul. Of the horse forty-three fell either in battle or in flight, eighteen were captured alive. In the camps there had been an uproar, a clamour that they should go to the relief of the consuls, when now they saw the consul and the son of the other consul both wounded, and the little remnant of the unlucky enterprise coming towards the camps. Marcellus' death was pitiable both for other reasons and also because it was neither consistent with his age—for he was now more than sixty years old—nor with his foresight as a veteran commander, that with such imprudence he had carried himself and his colleague and almost the entire state over the brink.[1] B.C. 208

A.U.C. 546

12 Multos circa unam rem ambitus fecerim, si quae de Marcelli morte variant auctores omnia exsequi
13 velim. Ut omittam alios, Coelius triplicem gestae rei commemorationem [1] ordine [2] edit: unam traditam fama, alteram scriptam in [3] laudatione fili, qui rei gestae interfuerit, tertiam quam ipse pro inquisita 14 ac sibi conperta adfert. Ceterum ita fama variat ut tamen plerique loci speculandi causa castris egressum, omnes insidiis circumventum tradant.

XXVIII. Hannibal magnum terrorem hostibus morte consulis unius, volnere alterius iniectum esse ratus, ne cui deesset occasioni, castra in tumulum in quo pugnatum erat extemplo transfert. Ibi inven-
2 tum Marcelli corpus sepelit. Crispinus et morte conlegae et suo volnere territus, silentio insequentis noctis profectus, quos proxumos nanctus est montes,
3 in iis loco alto et tuto undique castra posuit. Ibi duo duces sagaciter moti sunt, alter ad inferendam,
4 alter ad cavendam [4] fraudem. Anulis [5] Marcelli simul cum corpore Hannibal potitus erat. Eius signi errore ne qui [6] dolus necteretur a Poeno metuens, Crispinus circa civitates proximas miserat nuntios occisum conlegam esse anulisque eius hostem

[1] commemorationem Conway conj.: om. MSS.
[2] ordine Conway conj.: ordinem $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben: seriem J. Perizonius: rationem Weissenborn: memoriam Luchs.
[3] in N^1: om. the rest.
[4] alter ad cavendam A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$, one line.
[5] Anulis $P(3)A^sN$: anulo A^5JK Aldus, Froben.
[6] qui Sp Froben 2, Conway: quis A^sJK: cui $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[1] Cf. Cicero Cato Maior 75; Val. Max. V. i. Ext. 6. For different accounts see Plutarch Marcellus xxx. 2 ff., with incorrect citation of his authorities.

I should be very discursive in regard to a single B.C. 208 event, if I should aim to rehearse all the statements in which authorities differ concerning the death of Marcellus. Not to mention others, Coelius furnishes successively a threefold relation of what happened: one the traditional account, a second set down in the eulogy pronounced by the son, who was present, Coelius says, when it happened, a third which he himself contributes as investigated and established by him. But the divergent reports fall within this range, that most authorities relate that he left the camp to reconnoitre a position, while all say that he was overwhelmed by an ambush.

XXVIII. Hannibal, thinking that great terror had been inspired in the enemy by the death of one consul and the wounding of the other, not to miss any opportunity, at once removed his camp to the hill on which they had fought. There Marcellus' body was found and buried.[1] Crispinus, alarmed both by the death of his colleague and by his own wound, set out in the silence of the following night and in the first mountains which he reached pitched camp on a high place that was also safe on every side. There the two generals set their wits to work, the one to employ, the other to guard against, a ruse. Marcellus' ring [2] had come into the hands of Hannibal along with the body. Fearing some trickery might be contrived by the Carthaginian through a fraudulent use of that seal, Crispinus had sent word around to the nearest city-states that his colleague had been slain and the enemy was in possession of his ring;

[2] Livy's probably unique use of the plural where only a single seal ring can be meant has never been satisfactorily explained.

A.U.C. 546

potitum: ne quibus litteris crederent nomine Marcelli compositis. Paulo ante hic nuntius consulis Salapiam venerat quam litterae ab Hannibale allatae sunt Marcelli nomine compositae, se nocte quae diem illum secutura esset Salapiam venturum: parati milites essent qui in praesidio erant, si quo opera eorum opus esset. Sensere Salapitani fraudem, et ab ira non defectionis modo sed etiam equitum interfectorum rati occasionem supplicii peti, remisso retro nuntio—perfuga autem Romanus erat—ut[1] sine arbitro milites quae vellent agerent, oppidanos per muros urbisque opportuna loca in stationibus disponunt; custodias vigiliasque in eam noctem intentius instruunt; circa portam qua venturum hostem rebantur quod roboris in praesidio erat opponunt. Hannibal quarta vigilia ferme ad urbem accessit. Primi agminis erant perfugae Romanorum et arma Romana habebant. Ii, ubi ad portam est ventum, Latine omnes loquentes excitant vigiles aperireque[2] portam iubent: consulem adesse. Vigiles velut ad vocem eorum excitati tumultuari, trepidare, moliri portam. Cataracta[3] clausa erat: eam partim vectibus levant, partim funibus subducunt in tantum altitudinis ut subire

[1] erat ut A^1N^sJK Aldus, Froben: erat C^4: om. $P(1)N$.
[2] aperireque JK: aperirique $C^{4?}M^2BDAN$ Aldus: aperique PCR^1M.
[3] cataracta, $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben add deiecta (om. JKx Conway).

[1] Cf. XXVI. xxxviii. 6, note; and for the betrayal of its garrison of Numidian cavalry, ibid. §§ 11–13.

that they should not trust any letters written in the B.C. 208 name of Marcellus. This message of the consul had come to Salapia [1] a little before a letter from Hannibal written in Marcellus' name arrived, saying that he would come to Salapia in the night following that day; that the soldiers on garrison duty should be ready, in case he should have any need of their services. The men of Salapia were aware of the deception, and thinking that Hannibal, out of anger not only because of their revolt, but also for the slaughter of his cavalry, was seeking an excuse for punishing them, they sent back the messenger—he was, in fact, a Roman deserter—that the soldiers might do what they wished unobserved. And they posted men of the town along the walls and at favourable positions in the city in detachments on guard duty. For that night they established guard-lines and sentries with more than usual care. Around the gate by which they thought the enemy would come they drew up the best men in the garrison. Hannibal approached the city about the fourth watch. At the head of the column were the Roman deserters, and they had Roman arms. When they came up to the gate, all of them, speaking Latin, called out to the sentinels and bade them open the gate. The consul, they said, was coming. The sentries, pretending to have been awakened by their outcry, were in a turmoil, excited and labouring to open the gate. The portcullis [2] had been closed. Some of them raise it with levers, some hoist it with ropes, just high enough for men to pass

[2] Constructed of stout timbers strengthened with iron, as described in Aeneas Tacticus xxxix. 3 f. (about 150 years earlier); cf. Vegetius IV. iv.: Appian B. C. IV. 78. The vertical grooves are often found in remains of city gates.

A.U.C. 546

11 recti[1] possent. Vixdum satis patebat iter, cum perfugae certatim ruunt per portam; et cum sescenti[2] ferme intrassent, remisso fune quo suspensa
12 erat cataracta magno sonitu cecidit. Salapitani alii perfugas neglegenter ex itinere suspensa umeris, ut inter pacatos, gerentis arma invadunt, alii e turribus[3] portae murisque saxis, sudibus, pilis 13 absterrent hostem. Ita inde Hannibal suamet ipse fraude captus abiit, profectusque ad Locrorum solvendam obsidionem, quam urbem[4] L. Cincius summa vi, operibus tormentorumque omni genere ex
14 Sicilia advecto oppugnabat.[5] Magoni iam haud ferme fidenti retenturum defensurumque se urbem, 15 prima spes morte nuntiata Marcelli adfulsit. Secutus inde nuntius Hannibalem Numidarum equitatu praemisso ipsum, quantum adcelerare posset, cum 16 peditum agmine sequi. Itaque ubi primum Numidas edito e speculis signo adventare sensit, et ipse patefacta repente porta ferox in hostes erumpit. Et primo magis quia inproviso id fecerat quam quod 17 par viribus esset, anceps certamen erat; deinde ut supervenere Numidae, tantus pavor Romanis est iniectus ut passim ad mare ac naves fugerent relictis operibus machinisque quibus muros quatiebant. Ita adventu Hannibalis soluta Locrorum obsidio est.

[1] recti A¹JK Aldus, Froben : recte P(1)N.

[2] sescenti A¹JK Aldus : d c N² : d C : de P(3)R²N.

[3] e turribus SpA¹JK Froben, Conway : et turribus N² : e turri eius C Aldus : et turri eius P(3)N.

[4] quam urbem Wesenberg, Luchs : quam P(1)NA¹JK : qua cingebat urbem Johnson.

[5] oppugnabat A¹JK : oppugnas P : -pugnans Johnson : -pugnasset P²(1)N.

[1] This is the Mago responsible for the death of Gracchus in 212 B.C.; cf. XXV. xvi.

under it upright. Hardly had the way been quite B.C. 208 cleared, when the deserters vied with each other in dashing through the gate. And when about six hundred had entered and the rope by which it was held up had been let go, the portcullis fell with a great crash. Some of the Salapians attack the deserters, who fresh from their march were carrying arms carelessly slung from their shoulders, as if among peaceable people; others from towers of the gate and from the walls frighten off the enemy with stones, poles and javelins. Thus Hannibal, having been ensnared by his own ruse, went away. And he set out to raise the siege of Locri, a city which Lucius Cincius was besieging with great violence by means of siege-works and with every sort of artillery brought from Sicily. For Mago,[1] who no longer was confident that he would hold and defend the city, the first ray of hope came with the news of Marcellus' death. Then followed the news that Hannibal had sent the Numidian cavalry in advance and was himself following with the infantry column, making all possible speed. Accordingly, as soon as Mago knew from signals given from watch-towers that the Numidians were approaching, he also suddenly opens a gate and sallies out confidently against the enemy. And at first it was a doubtful conflict, rather because his action had been unexpected than because he was a match in forces. Then when the Numidians came up, such terror was inspired among the Romans that they fled pell-mell to the sea and the ships, leaving siege-works and engines with which they were battering the walls. Thus by Hannibal's coming the siege of Locri was raised.

A.U.C. 546

XXIX. Crispinus postquam in Bruttios profectum Hannibalem sensit, exercitum cui conlega praefuerat M. Marcellum tribunum militum Venusiam abducere
2 iussit; ipse cum legionibus suis Capuam profectus, vix lecticae agitationem prae gravitate volnerum patiens, Romam litteras de morte conlegae scripsit,
3 quantoque ipse in discrimine esset: se comitiorum causa non posse Romam venire, quia nec viae laborem passurus videretur et de Tarento sollicitus esset, ne ex Bruttiis Hannibal eo converteret agmen; legatos opus esse ad se mitti, viros prudentes cum quibus
4 quae vellet de re publica loqueretur. Hae litterae recitatae magnum et luctum morte alterius consulis et metum de altero fecerunt. Itaque et Q. Fabium filium ad exercitum Venusiam miserunt, et ad consulem tres legati missi, Sex. Iulius Caesar, L. Licinius Pollio, L. Cincius Alimentus, cum paucis
5 ante diebus ex Sicilia redisset. Hi nuntiare consuli iussi ut, si ad comitia ipse [1] venire Romam non posset, dictatorem in agro Romano diceret comitiorum
6 causa; si consul Tarentum profectus esset, Q. Claudium praetorem placere in eam regionem inde abducere legiones in qua plurimas sociorum urbes tueri posset.
7 Eadem aestate M. Valerius cum classe centum

[1] ipse N²JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

---

[1] Valerius Laevinus (xxii. 9), not Valerius Messalla (vii. 16).

XXIX. Crispinus, on learning that Hannibal had B.C. 208 set out for the country of the Bruttii, ordered Marcus Marcellus, tribune of the soldiers, to lead away to Venusia the army which his colleague had commanded. He himself set out with his legions for Capua, although on account of his serious wounds he was barely able to endure the motion of his litter. And he sent to Rome a letter in regard to the death of his colleague, stating also in what danger he was himself; that he was unable to come to Rome for the elections, because it seemed that he would not be able to endure the strain of the journey, also because he was concerned about Tarentum, lest Hannibal, leaving the land of the Bruttii, should head his column in that direction. It was necessary, he wrote, that envoys be sent to him, men of foresight with whom he might say what he wished to say about the state. The reading of this letter caused at the same time great grief for the death of one consul and great fear in regard to the other. Accordingly they sent Quintus Fabius the son to the army at Venusia, and also three legates were sent to the consul, namely, Sextus Iulius Caesar, Lucius Licinius Pollio and Lucius Cincius Alimentus, the last named having returned from Sicily a few days before. These men were bidden to report to the consul that, if he could not come himself to Rome for the elections, on Roman territory he should name a dictator for the purpose of the elections: that if the consul should go to Tarentum, it was the will of the senate that Quintus Claudius, the practor, should lead his legions away to a region in which he could defend the greatest number of cities of the allies.

The same summer Marcus Valerius [1] crossed over

A.U.C. 546

navium ex Sicilia in Africam tramisit, et ad Clupeam urbem escensione facta agrum late nullo ferme obvio armato vastavit.[1] Inde ad naves raptim praedatores recepti, quia repente fama accidit classem Punicam 8 adventare. Octoginta erant et tres naves. Cum his haud procul Clupea prospere pugnat Romanus. Duodeviginti[2] navibus captis, fugatis aliis, cum magna terrestri navalique praeda Lilybaeum rediit.
9 Eadem aestate et Philippus implorantibus Achaeis auxilium tulit, quos et Machanidas tyrannus Lacedaemoniorum finitimo bello urebat, et Aetoli, navibus per fretum quod Naupactum et Patras interfluit—Rhion incolae vocant—exercitu traiecto, depopulati
10 erant. Attalum quoque regem Asiae, quia Aetoli summum gentis suae magistratum ad eum proximo[3] concilio detulerant,[4] fama erat in Europam traiecturum. XXX. Ob haec Philippo in Graeciam descendenti ad Lamiam urbem Aetoli duce Pyrrhia, 2 qui praetor in eum annum cum absente Attalo creatus erat, occurrerunt. Habebant et ab Attalo auxilia secum et mille[5] ferme ex Romana classe a P. Sulpicio missos. Adversus hunc ducem atque

[1] vastavit $P(1)N$ Aldus: -abat JK Froben 2.

[2] Duodeviginti Conway: decem et octo Eds.: X et VIII $P(1)N$. Cf. p. 186, crit. note 6.

[3] proximo, $P(3)A^1N$ add anno (om. A^vJK Aldus, Froben, Luchs): proximo annuo Weissenborn: proximi anni Conway conj.

[4] detulerant JK Aldus, Froben: -erunt $P(1)N$.

[5] mille (∞) PCA^1N^1JK: om. RMBDAN.

---

[1] So named (= Ἀσπίς, shield) from the shape of the hill; south of Cape Bon (Promuntorium Mercurii) and east of Carthage (85 miles): Strabo XVII. iii. 16.

[2] In this passage Livy departs from strict chronology by summarizing under 208 B.C. events also in Macedonia and from Sicily to Africa with a fleet of a hundred ships, B.C. 208 and making a landing at the city of Clupea,[1] he ravaged the country far and wide, meeting hardly any armed men. Then the foragers were hurriedly brought back to the ships, because suddenly came the report that a Carthaginian fleet was approaching. There were eighty-three ships. With these the Roman fought with success not far from Clupea. After capturing eighteen ships and putting the rest to flight, he returned to Lilybaeum with a great quantity of booty from the land and from the ships.

The same summer[2] Philip, in response to their appeal, lent aid to the Achaeans, whom Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedaemon, was harassing with a war on their border, while the Aetolians also, sending their army on ships across the strait—the inhabitants call it Rhion—which flows between Naupactus and Patrae, had devastated their country. Furthermore Attalus, King of Asia, it was reported, was about to cross over into Europe, since the Aetolians had at their last council conferred upon him the highest magistracy of their nation. XXX. Consequently, as Philip was coming down into Greece, the Aetolians encountered him at the city of Lamia, their general being Pyrrhias, who along with the absent Attalus had been elected praetor[3] for that year. They had with them auxiliary troops from Attalus and also about a thousand men sent by Publius Sulpicius from the Roman fleet. Against this general and these forces

Greece which belong to the previous year, but had been passed over. Thus the Nemean Games (xxx. f.) occurred in 209 B.C.

[3] I.e. στρατηγός. Attalus I (241–197 B.C.) had the same title as an honour merely.

A.U.C. 546

has copias Philippus bis prospero eventu pugnavit; mille[1] admodum hostium utraque pugna occidit. 3 Inde cum Aetoli metu compulsi Lamiae urbis moenibus tenerent sese, Philippus ad Phalara exercitum reduxit.[2] In Maliaco sinu is locus est, quondam frequenter habitatus propter egregium portum tutasque circa stationes et aliam opportunitatem maritu- 4 mam terrestremque. Eo legati ab rege Aegypti Ptolomaeo Rhodiisque et Atheniensibus et Chiis venerunt ad dirimendum inter Philippum atque Aetolos bellum. Adhibitus ab Aetolis et ex finitimis 5 pacificator Amynander rex Athamanum. Omnium autem non tanta pro Aetolis cura erat, ferociori quam pro ingeniis Graecorum gente, quam ne Philippus regnumque eius rebus Graeciae,[3] grave libertati 6 futurum, immisceretur. De pace dilata consultatio est in concilium Achaeorum, concilioque ei et[4] locus et dies certa indicta: interim triginta dierum indutiae 7 impetratae. Profectus inde rex per Thessaliam Boeotiamque Chalcidem Euboeae venit, ut Attalum, quem classe Euboeam petiturum audierat, portibus 8 et litorum adpulsu arceret. Inde praesidio relicto adversus Attalum, si forte interim traiecisset, profectus ipse cum paucis equitum levisque[5] armaturae 9 Argos venit. Ibi curatione Heraeorum Nemeorumque

[1] mille (≃ PC: om. RMBDAN: milites N^{1}: multos $A^{1}JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[2] reduxit $A^{1}JK$ Aldus, Froben: duxit $P(1)A^{2}N$.

[3] rebus Graeciae, JK Aldus, Froben have this after futurum.

[4] -que ei et N^{1} Aldus, Froben: -que ei $A^{1}J^{1}K$: et $P(1)(A^{2})$ $A^{1}N$.

[5] -que $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: om. SpJK.

[1] On the north shore of the Gulf. Phalara was the port of Lamia.

[2] I.e. from Phalara.

Philip fought twice with success. In each battle he B.C. 208 slew fully a thousand of the enemy. Then, while the Aetolians, constrained by fear, remained inside the walls of the city of Lamia, Philip led his army back to Phalara. The place is on the Maliac Gulf,[1] and was formerly populous on account of its remarkable harbour and safe roadsteads on this side and that and other advantages from the sea and the land. To that place came ambassadors from Ptolemy, King of Egypt, and from the Rhodians and Athenians and Chians, in order to bring to an end the war between Philip and the Aetolians. A peacemaker from their neighbours also was brought in by the Aetolians, Amynander, King of the Athamanians. For all of them, however, it was not so much solicitude for the Aetolians, a race more warlike than comports with the character of Greeks, as it was the fear lest Philip and his kingdom might become involved in the affairs of Greece and become a menace to freedom. As for the peace, consideration was postponed until the council of the Achaeans, and for that council a place and also a fixed date were appointed. Meantime a truce for thirty days was obtained. Setting out from thence [2] King Philip came by way of Thessaly and Boeotia to Chalcis in Euboea, in order that he might prevent Attalus, who, he had heard, was about to make for Euboea with a fleet, from using the harbours and from landing on the shore. And then, leaving a garrison against Attalus, in case he should cross over in the meantime, he set out himself with a few horsemen and light-armed and came to Argos. There the direction of the games in honour of Hera and of the Nemean Games [3] was conferred upon him by vote of [3] Celebrated in the 2nd and 4th year of each Olympiad; cf. pp. 330–331, note 2.

A.U.C. 546

suffragiis populi ad eum delata, quia se Macedonum reges ex ea civitate oriundos referunt,[1] Heraeis peractis ab ipso ludicro extemplo Aegium profectus est ad indictum multo ante sociorum concilium. Ibi de Aetolico finiendo bello actum, ne causa aut Romanis aut Attalo intrandi Graeciam esset. Sed ea omnia vixdum indutiarum tempore circumacto Aetoli turbavere, postquam et Attalum Aeginam venisse et Romanam classem stare ad Naupactum audivere. Vocati enim in concilium Achaeorum, in quo et eae legationes erant quae ad Phalara egerant de pace, primum questi sunt quaedam parva contra fidem conventionis tempore indutiarum facta: postremo negarunt dirimi bellum posse, nisi Messeniis Achaei Pylum redderent, Romanis restitueretur Atintania, Scerdilaedo et Pleurato Ardiaei. Enimvero indignum ratus Philippus victos victori sibi ultro condiciones ferre, ne antea quidem se aut de pace audisse aut indutias pepigisse dixit spem ullam habentem quieturos Aetolos, sed ut [2] omnes socios testes haberet se pacis, illos belli causam quaesisse. Ita infecta pace concilium dimisit quattuor milibus armatorum relictis ad praesidium Achaeorum et quinque longis navibus acceptis, quas si adiecisset missae nuper ad se classi Carthaginiensium et ex Bithynia ab rege Prusia venientibus

[1] referunt $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben : ferunt Perizonius.
[2] ut $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben : uti A^1N^2JK.

---

[1] Attalus purchased the island three years before this from the Aetolians; these had acquired it under a treaty made with the Romans, who had taken forcible possession; Polybius XXII. viii. 10.

[2] Cf. XXVI. xxiv. 9.

the people, because the kings of the Macedonians B.C. 208 claim that they sprang from that city. When the Heraea were over, immediately after the games he left for Aegium and the long since appointed council of his allies. There they discussed the termination of the Aetolian war, that neither the Romans nor Attalus might have reason to enter Greece. But all such plans, though the time of the truce had scarcely elapsed, were thrown into confusion by the Aetolians, when they heard that Attalus had reached Aegina[1] and also that a Roman fleet was lying at Naupactus. For on being called into the council of the Achaeans, in which were also present the embassies which at Phalara had spoken on behalf of peace, they at first complained of certain small breaches of the agreement committed during the truce. Finally they asserted that the war could not be brought to an end unless the Achaeans should restore Pylus to the Messenians, and Atintania should be returned to the Romans, and the Ardiaei to Scerdilaedus and Pleuratus.[2] Philip, who thought it a perfect outrage for the vanquished actually to offer terms to him, the victor, said that on the former occasion also it was not with any hope that the Aetolians would keep quiet that he had either listened to pleas for peace or agreed to a truce, but in order to have all the allies witnesses that he had sought a ground for peace, the Aetolians a ground for war. So, with peace unachieved, he dismissed the council, leaving four thousand armed men to protect the Achaeans and receiving five warships from them. He had decided that, if he should add these to the Carthaginian fleet lately sent to him and to the ships that were coming from Bithynia from King Prusias, he would attack the

A.U.C. 546 navibus, statuerat navali proelio lacessere Romanos 17 iam diu in regione ea potentes maris. Ipse ab eo concilio Argos regressus; iam enim Nemeorum adpetebat tempus, quae celebrari[1] volebat praesentia sua.

XXXI. Occupato rege apparatu ludorum et per dies festos licentius quam inter belli tempora remittente animum P. Sulpicius ab Naupacto profectus classem appulit inter Sicyonem et Corinthum, agrumque nobilissimae[2] fertilitatis effuse vastavit.
2 Fama eius rei Philippum ab ludis excivit; raptimque cum equitatu profectus, iussis subsequi peditibus, palatos passim per agros gravesque praeda, ut qui nihil tale metuerent, adortus Romanos compulit
3 ad[3] naves. Classis Romana haudquaquam laeta praeda Naupactum redit. Philippo ludorum quoque qui reliqui erant celebritatem quantaecumque, de Romanis tamen, victoriae partae fama auxerat,
4 laetitiaque ingenti celebrati festi dies, eo magis etiam quod populariter dempto capitis insigni purpuraque atque alio regio habitu aequaverat ceteris se in speciem, quo nihil gratius est civitatibus
5 liberis; praebuissetque haud dubiam eo facto spem libertatis, nisi omnia intoleranda libidine foeda ac deformia[4] effecisset. Vagabatur enim[5] cum uno aut
6 altero comite per maritas domos dies noctesque, et summittendo se in privatum fastigium quo minus conspectus, eo solutior erat, et libertatem, cum aliis

[1] celebrari $A^{s}N^{2}$?JK Aldus, Froben : -are $P(1)N$.
[2] agrumque nobilissimae $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Aldus, Froben : om. $P(1)N$, one line.
[3] ad Sp?$N^{s}JK$ Froben 2 : in $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[4] deformia $CM^{1}N^{s}$: deformi $P(3)NJK$.
[5] enim $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben : autem $N^{s}JK$ Conway.

Romans, who had long commanded the sea in that region, in a naval battle. As for himself, he returned from that council to Argos; for the time of the Nemean Games was at hand, and he wished them to be more festive because of his presence. B.C. 208

XXXI. While the king was engaged in preparing for the games and relaxing during the festal days with more freedom than in war-times, Publius Sulpicius sailing from Naupactus put in with his fleet between Sicyon and Corinth and ravaged a region of the most noted fertility far and wide. The report of this called Philip away from the games; and setting out in haste with the cavalry, after ordering the infantry to follow, he attacked the Romans, who, fearing nothing of the kind, were widely scattered over the country and loaded down with their plunder, and drove them to their ships. The Roman fleet, not at all happy over its plunder, returned to Naupactus. For Philip the remainder of the games also had gained in festivity from the news of a victory, unimportant as it might be, but still over the Romans. And the festival was observed with immense rejoicing, all the more because, to be popular, he had removed his diadem and purple and other regal attire, and in appearance had put himself on the same plane as the others, than which nothing is more acceptable to free states. And by doing so he would have offered them no uncertain hope of freedom, had he not degraded and debased everything by his insufferable lust. For with one or two companions he would roam day and night round the homes of married couples, and lowering himself to the level of a private citizen, the less he was observed the more unrestrained was he, and liberty, of which vanam ostendisset, totam in suam licentiam verterat.

A.U.C. 546

7 Neque enim omnia emebat aut eblandiebatur, sed vim etiam [1] flagitiis adhibebat, periculosumque et viris et parentibus erat moram incommoda severi-
8 tate libidini regiae fecisse. Uni etiam principi Achaeorum Arato adempta uxor nomine Polyeratia ac spe regiarum nuptiarum in Macedoniam asportata fuerat.
9 Per haec flagitia sollemni Nemeorum peracto paucisque additis diebus, Dymas est profectus ad praesidium Aetolorum, quod ab Eleis adcitum accep-
10 tumque in urbem erat, eiciendum. Cycliadas—penes eum summa imperii erat—Achaeique ad Dymas regi occurrere, et Eleorum accensi odio, quod a ceteris Achaeis dissentirent, et infensi Aetolis, quos Romanum quoque adversus se movisse bellum 11 credebant. Profecti ab Dymis coniuncto exercitu transeunt Larisum amnem, qui Eleum agrum ab [2] Dymaeo dirimit. XXXII. Primum diem quo fines hostium ingressi sunt populando absumpserunt; postero die acie instructa ad urbem accesserunt praemissis equitibus qui obequitando portis [3] promptum ad excursiones genus lacesserent Aetolorum.
2 Ignorabant Sulpicium cum quindecim navibus ab Naupacto Cyllenen traiecisse et expositis in terram quattuor milibus armatorum silentio noctis, ne con-

[1] etiam $A^{s}?N^{s}JK$ Froben 2 : om. $P(1)N$.
[2] ab $A^{s}N^{s}JK$, as in line above : a $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[3] portis $A^{s}N^{s}JK$: om. $P(1)N$.

he had made but an empty show to others, for his purpose he turned wholly to licence. For he did not obtain everything by purchase or cajoling, but even employed force to gain his shameful ends. And it was dangerous for both husbands and parents if they had delayed the royal lust by disobliging strictness. Even from one of the leading men of the Achaeans, Aratus, his wife, named Polycratia, had been taken away and carried off into Macedonia with the prospect of a royal marriage. B.C. 208

After the festival of the Nemea had been completed in the midst of such shameful conduct, and he had added a few more days, he set out for Dymae, in order to expel the Aetolian garrison which had been summoned by the Eleans and admitted to their city.[1] Cycliadas, who held the chief command, and the Achaeans met the king near Dymae, being not only inflamed with hatred of the Eleans because they were at odds with the rest of the Achaeans, but also hostile to the Aetolians, who, they believed, had stirred the Romans likewise to a war against them. Setting forth from Dymae and uniting their armies, they crossed the river Larisus, which separates the Elean territory from that of Dymae. XXXII. The first day on which they entered the territory of the enemy they spent in devastation. On the next day, drawing up a battle-line, they approached the city, after sending the cavalry in advance; it was to ride up to the gates and provoke the Aetolians, a race of men alert for sallies. They did not know that Sulpicius with fifteen ships had crossed over from Naupactus to Cyllene, and landing four thousand armed men had entered Elis in the dead of night, so that the column

[1] The city of Elis, not Dymae, which was in Achaia.

A.U.C. 546

3 spici agmen posset, intrasse Elim. Itaque inprovisa res ingentem iniecit terrorem, postquam inter Aetolos 4 Eleosque Romana signa atque arma cognovere. Et primo recipere suos voluerat rex; deinde [1] contracto iam inter Aetolos et Tralles—Illyriorum id est genus —certamine cum urgeri videret suos, et ipse rex 5 cum equitatu in cohortem Romanam incurrit. Ibi equus pilo traiectus cum prolapsum super [2] caput regem effudisset, atrox pugna utrimque accensa est, et ab Romanis impetu in regem facto et protegentibus 6 regiis. Insignis et ipsius pugna fuit, cum pedes inter equites coactus esset proelium inire. Dein cum iam impar certamen esset, caderentque circa eum multi et volnerarentur, raptus ab suis atque alteri equo 7 iniectus fugit.[3] Eo die castra quinque milia passuum ab urbe Eleorum posuit. Postero die ad propin-quum Eleorum castellum [4]—Pyrgum vocant—copias omnes [5] eduxit, quo agrestium multitudinem cum pecoribus metu populationum compulsam audierat.
8 Eam inconditam inermemque multitudinem primo statim terrore adveniens cepit; compensaveratque ea praeda quod ignominiae ad Elim acceptum fuerat.
9 Dividenti praedam captivosque—fuere autem quat-tuor milia hominum, pecorum [6] omnis generis ad

[1] deinde P(1)N Aldus, dein JK Froben 2.
[2] super Madvig: per P(1)NSp Froben 2: in A[s]?JK Aldus.
[3] fugit P(1)NJK: fuit Sp.
[4] castellum, P(3) omit the three preceding words (a line) supplied by A[s]JK, Aldus, Froben.

should not be seen. Consequently the surprise B.C. 208 inspired great alarm, when they had recognized Roman standards and arms among the Aetolians and Eleans. And at first the king had wished to recall his men; then, on seeing his own men hard pressed by the battle already begun between the Aetolians and the Tralles, an Illyrian race, the king also with his cavalry charged a Roman cohort. There his horse was run through by a javelin and threw the king sprawling over his head, whereupon a fierce battle was kindled on both sides, as the Romans made an attack upon the king and at the same time the king's guards tried to protect him. Conspicuous was his own fighting also, although he had been forced to go into battle on foot among horsemen. Then, when the combat was now one-sided and many were falling and being wounded around him, he was seized by his men, was lifted upon another horse, and fled. On that day he pitched camp five miles from the city of Elis. The next day he led out all his troops to a neighbouring fortress of the Eleans—they call it Pyrgus—into which he had heard that a great number of rustics, together with their flocks, had been driven by the fear of being robbed. That unorganized and unarmed multitude he at once captured in the first panic as he came up. And by that booty he had made good the disgrace he had suffered at Elis. As he was dividing the booty and the captives—there were in fact four thousand persons and about twenty thousand cattle of every viginti milia—nuntius ex Macedonia venit Aëropum quendam corrupto arcis praesidiique praefecto Lychnidum cepisse, tenere et Dassaretiorum quosdam vicos et Dardanos etiam concire. Omisso igitur Achaico atque Aetolico[1] bello, relictis tamen duobus milibus et quingentis omnis generis armatorum cum Menippo et Polyphanta ducibus ad praesidium sociorum, profectus ab Dymis per Achaiam Boeotiamque et Euboeam decumis castris Demetriadem in Thessaliam pervenit.

[5] copias omnes $P(3)$: omnes copias AN (also A^sN^sJK Aldus, Froben, but after die above).

[6] pecorum JK (-rumque Aldus, Froben): pecoris $P(1)N$: pecorisque N^s Conway.

A.U.C. 546

XXXIII. Ibi alii maiorem adferentes tumultum nuntii occurrunt: Dardanos in Macedoniam effusos Orestidem iam tenere ac descendisse in Argestaeum campum, famamque inter barbaros celebrem esse Philippum occisum. Expeditione ea qua cum populatoribus agri ad Sicyonem pugnavit in arborem inlatus impetu equi ad eminentem ramum cornu alterum galeae praefregit; id inventum ab Aetolo quodam perlatumque in Aetoliam ad Scerdilaedum, cui notum erat insigne galeae, famam interfecti regis[2] volgavit. Post profectionem ex Achaia regis Sulpicius Aeginam classe profectus cum Attalo sese coniunxit. Achaei cum Aetolis Eleisque haud procul Messene prosperam pugnam fecerunt. Attalus rex et P. Sulpicius Aeginae hibernarunt.

[1] atque Aetolico A^1N^1JK: om. $P(1)N$.

[2] regis $P(1)N$ Aldus: philippi SpA^1JK Froben 2: philippi regis N^1.

---

[1] Now Ochrida, at the north-east end of the lake of the same name (between Albania and Jugoslavia), on the main road from the Adriatic to Thessalonica (later the Via Egnatia). South of the lake and bordering on Macedonia were the Dassaretii, an important Illyrian tribe in a mountain country. North-east of the lake were the Illyrian Dardani.

[2] The commercial centre of Thessaly, in Magnesia, at the north end of the Gulf of Pagasae, and strongly fortified.

kind—came the news from Macedonia that one B.C. 208
Aëropus by bribing the commander of the citadel and garrison had captured Lychnidus,[1] was holding some villages of the Dassaretii and also stirring up the Dardani. Consequently the king, dropping the Achaean and Aetolian war, but still leaving twenty-five hundred armed men of every sort with Menippus and Polyphantas as commanders to defend his allies, setting out from Dymae, made his way through Achaia and Boeotia and Euboea in ten day's marches to Demetrias[2] in Thessaly.

XXXIII. There other messengers met him, bringing news of a greater inroad: that the Dardanians pouring into Macedonia were already holding Orestis[3] and had come down into the Argestaean Plain; and that it was currently reported among the barbarians that Philip had been slain. On that raid in which he fought near Sicyon[4] with men who were ravaging the country, he was dashed against a tree by his charging horse, and broke off one of the two horns of his helmet against a projecting branch. It was found by a certain Aetolian and carried into Aetolia to Scerdilaedus, who was acquainted with the ornament of the helmet, and this spread abroad the report that the king had been slain. After the departure of the king from Achaia, Sulpicius went with his fleet to Aegina[5] and joined Attalus. The Achaeans fought a successful engagement with the Aetolians and Eleans not far from Messene. King Attalus and Publius Sulpicius spent the winter at Aegina.

[3] A region of Macedonia east of the Dassaretii and in the upper basin of the river Haliacmon.

[4] Cf. xxxi. 1 f.

[5] Cf. xxx. 11 and note.

A.U.C. 546

6 Exitu huius anni T. Quinctius[1] consul, dictatore comitiorum ludorumque faciendorum causa dicto T. Manlio Torquato, ex volnere moritur; alii Tarenti, 7 alii in Campania mortuum tradunt. Ita,[2] quod nullo ante bello acciderat, duo consules sine memorando proelio interfecti velut orbam rem publicam reliquerant. Dictator Manlius magistrum equitum 8 C. Servilium—tum aedilis curulis erat—dixit. Senatus quo die primum est habitus ludos magnos facere dictatorem iussit, quos M. Aemilius praetor urbanus C. Flaminio, Cn. Servilio consulibus fecerat et in quinquennium voverat. Tum dictator et fecit ludos 9 et in insequens[3] lustrum vovit. Ceterum cum duo consulares exercitus tam prope hostem sine ducibus essent, omnibus aliis omissis una praecipua cura patres populumque incessit consules primo quoque tempore creandi, et ut[4] eos crearent potissimum 10 quorum virtus satis tuta a fraude Punica esset: cum toto eo bello damnosa praepropera ac fervida ingenia imperatorum fuissent,[5] tum eo ipso anno consules nimia cupiditate conserendi cum hoste manum in 11 necopinatam fraudem lapsos esse; ceterum deos immortales, miseritos nominis Romani, pepercisse innoxiis exercitibus, temeritatem consulum ipsorum capitibus damnasse.

XXXIV. Cum circumspicerent patres quosnam consules facerent, longe ante alios eminebat C.

[1] Quinctius, A¹JK add Crispinus.
[2] Ita Weissenborn: id P(1)NJK Aldus, Froben: ita, id Riemann: et, id Madvig.
[3] insequens P(1)N Aldus: sequens JK Froben 2.
[4] et ut JK Froben 2: ut P(1)N Aldus: et *N*¹.
[5] fuissent P(1)NJK: fuisse Sp? Froben 2.

[1] Votive games, vowed in 217 B.C.; XXII. ix. 10; x. 7.

At the end of this year Titus Quinctius, the consul, B.C. 208 after naming Titus Manlius Torquatus dictator for the purpose of holding elections and games, died of his wound. Some relate that he died at Tarentum, others in Campania. So two consuls—and this had happened in no previous war—losing their lives without a notable battle, had left the state as it were bereft. The dictator Manlius named Gaius Servilius, then a curule aedile, as master of the horse. The senate on the first day on which it sat ordered the dictator to conduct the great games[1] which Marcus Aemilius, the city praetor, had conducted in the consulship of Gaius Flaminius and Gnaeus Servilius and had vowed for the fifth year thereafter.[2] At this time the dictator conducted the games and also vowed them for the succeeding lustrum. But inasmuch as two consular armies were so near the enemy without their commanders, the senate and the people, neglecting everything else, were possessed by one particular concern—to elect consuls at the first possible moment, and to elect especially men whose courage was quite safe against the Carthaginian wiles. Not only throughout that war, they said, had the over-hasty, fiery temperament of the generals proved ruinous, but in that very year the consuls in their excessive eagerness to engage with the enemy had fallen unawares into a trap. But, they added, the immortal gods, taking pity upon the Roman people, had spared the innocent armies, and had punished the rashness of the consuls by the loss of their own lives.

XXXIV. While the fathers were casting about to see whom they should make consuls, pre-eminent

[2] But the vow had not been fulfilled.

A.U.C. 546

2 Claudius Nero. Ei[1] conlega quaerebatur: et virum quidem eum egregium ducebant, sed promptiorem acrioremque quam tempora belli postularent aut 3 hostis Hannibal: temperandum acre ingenium eius[2] moderato et prudenti viro adiuncto conlega censebant. M. Livius erat, multis ante annis ex consulatu 4 populi iudicio damnatus, quam ignominiam adeo aegre tulerat ut rus migrarit[3] et per multos annos 5 et urbe et omni coetu careret[4] hominum. Octavo ferme post damnationem anno M. Claudius Marcellus et M. Valerius Laevinus consules redduxerant eum in urbem; sed erat veste obsoleta capilloque et barba promissa, prae se ferens in voltu habituque 6 insignem memoriam ignominiae acceptae. L. Veturius et P. Licinius censores eum tonderi et squalorem deponere et in senatum venire fungique aliis 7 publicis muneribus coegerunt. Sed tum quoque aut verbo adsentiebatur aut pedibus in sententiam ibat, donec cognati hominis eum causa M. Livii Macati, cum fama[5] eius ageretur, stantem coegit in senatu 8 sententiam dicere. Tunc ex tanto intervallo auditus convertit ora hominum in se, causamque sermonibus praebuit,[6] indigno iniuriam a populo factam, magno-

[1] Ei A[1]N[1]JK Aldus, Froben: et P(3)N: set B.

[2] eius P(1)N (before ingenium JK Froben 2): om. Conway.

[3] migrarit Ta[2]x Froben 2, : Conway: -aret P(1)NJK Aldus: -arent Ta.

[4] careret P(1)N Aldus, Conway: caruerit TaSpJK.

[5] fama P(3)A[1]?N[1]: de fama A[1]JK Aldus, Froben: in fama AN.

[6] praebuit TaA[1]N[1]JK: om. P(1)N.

[1] Following his consulship, for the year 219 B.C. with Aemilius Paulus, he was charged with taking too large a share in the spoils of a war against the Illyrians, for which they were granted triumphs; Frontinus IV. i. 45; ex invidia

above all the rest was Gaius Claudius Nero: their B.C. 208 quest was for his colleague. And they considered Nero a remarkable man, to be sure, but more hasty and violent than the war situation and Hannibal as enemy demanded. They thought his violent nature must be tempered by giving him as his colleague a man of moderation and foresight. There was Marcus Livius,[1] who many years before, after his consulship, had been condemned by verdict of the people, and had been so indignant at that disgrace that he removed to the country and for many years absented himself from the city and also from every gathering of men. About seven years after his condemnation Marcus Claudius Marcellus and Marcus Valerius Laevinus, the consuls, had brought him back into the city. But he wore old clothing and long hair and beard, revealing outwardly in countenance and garb a vivid memory of the disgrace he had incurred. Lucius Veturius and Publius Licinius, the censors, compelled him to shave and lay aside his neglected appearance and to come into the senate and perform other public duties. Even then, however, he would either assent in a word or go over to the side of the mover, until the case of his relative, Marcus Livius Macatus,[2] whose reputation was involved, obliged him to stand up and deliver his opinion in the senate. When he was heard at that time after so long an interval, he attracted men's attention to himself and gave occasion for their saying that the people had wronged a man who did not deserve it, and that it had been a great loss that peculatus reus. Aurelius Victor (?) I. i; cf. XXIX. xxxvii. Livius was fined according to Suetonius Tiberius iii.

[2] Cf. xxv. 3 ff.

A.U.C. 546

que id damno fuisse quod tam gravi bello nec opera 9 nec consilio talis viri usa res publica esset: C. Neroni neque Q. Fabium neque M. Valerium Laevinum dari conlegam[1] posse, quia duos patricios 10 creari non liceret; eandem causam in T. Manlio esse, praeterquam quod recusasset delatum consulatum recusaturusque esset; egregium par consulum fore, si M. Livium C. Claudio conlegam adiunxissent.
11 Nec populus mentionem eius rei ortam a patribus
12 est aspernatus. Unus eam rem in civitate is cui deferebatur honos abnuebat, levitatem civitatis accusans: sordidati rei non miseritos candidam togam invito offerre; eodem honores poenasque
13 congeri. Si virum bonum[2] ducerent, quid ita pro malo ac noxio damnassent? [3] Si noxium comperissent, quid ita male credito priore consulatu 14 alterum crederent? Haec taliaque arguentem et querentem castigabant patres, et M. Furium memorantes revocatum de exsilio patriam pulsam sede sua restituisse—ut parentium saevitiam, sic patriae patiendo ac ferendo leniendam esse—15 adnisi omnes cum C. Claudio M. Livium consulem fecerunt.

XXXV. Post diem tertium eius diei praetorum comitia habita. Praetores creati L. Porcius Licinus,

[1] conlegam JK: -gas P(1)NTa Aldus, Froben.
[2] virum bonum Ta?: bonum virum A[1]N[1]JK Aldus, Froben: bonum P(3)N.
[3] malo ac noxio damnassent TaA[1]N[1]JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N (these om. si following).

---

[1] On Camillus and his restoration of Rome see V. li. 1 f.; VII. i. 9 Plutarch Camillus xxx. 1.

in so serious a war the state had not availed itself of B.C. 208
the services and the advice of such a man; that neither Quintus Fabius nor Marcus Valerius Laevinus could be given to Gaius Nero as his colleague, because it was not lawful to elect two patricians; that the same reason applied to Titus Manlius, in addition to the fact that he had refused and would refuse the offer of a consulship. An extraordinary pair of consuls it would be, if they should link Marcus Livius with Gaius Claudius as his colleague. And mention of the matter, beginning with the fathers, was not frowned upon by the people. The only one in the state who rejected it, accusing the citizens of inconsistency, was the man to whom the office was tendered. He said that, having shown no pity toward a defendant in mourning, they were offering the whitened toga to a reluctant man; honours and penalties were being heaped upon the same person. If they thought him a good man, why then had they condemned him as a bad man and a criminal? If they had found him a criminal, why then, after unfortunately entrusting a former consulship, were they now entrusting a second to him? When he made use of these and similar arguments and complaints, the fathers would rebuke him, and by reminding him that Marcus Furius,[1] on being recalled from exile, had restored his native city when driven from her place—that, as in the case of parents, so the harshness of one's native city must be appeased by suffering and bearing it—through the united efforts of them all, they elected Marcus Livius consul with Gaius Claudius.

XXXV. On the third day after that the election of praetors took place. Elected praetors were

A.U.C. 546

C. Mamilius, C. et A. Hostilii Catones. Comitiis perfectis ludisque factis dictator et magister equitum magistratu abierunt. C. Terentius Varro in Etruriam pro praetore missus, ut ex ea provincia C. Hostilius Tarentum ad eum exercitum iret quem T. Quinctius consul habuerat; et L.[1] Manlius trans mare legatus iret viseretque quae res ibi gererentur; simul quod Olympiae ludicrum ea aestate futurum erat, quod maximo coetu Graeciae[2] celebraretur, ut, si tuto per hostem posset, adiret id concilium, ut qui Siculi bello ibi profugi aut Tarentini cives relegati ab Hannibale essent, domos redirent scirentque sua omnia iis quae ante bellum habuissent reddere populum Romanum.

Quia periculosissimus annus inminere videbatur, neque consules in re publica erant, in consules designatos omnes versi, quam primum eos sortiri provincias et praesciscere quam quisque eorum provinciam, quem hostem haberet, volebant. De reconciliatione etiam gratiae eorum in senatu actum est principio facto a Q. Fabio Maximo. Inimicitiae autem nobiles inter eos erant et acerbiores eas indignioresque Livio sua calamitas fecerat quod spretum se in ea fortuna credebat. Itaque is magis inplacabilis erat et nihil opus esse reconciliatione aiebat:

[1] Quinctius consul habuerat; et L. $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$, one line.
[2] Graeciae $A^{s}N^{s}JK$: om. $P(1)N$.

---

[1] Cf. iv. 4; 1. 8; XXVI. xxiii. 1.

Lucius Porcius Licinus, Gaius Mamilius, Gaius Hostilius Cato and Aulus Hostilius Cato. After completing the elections and holding the games, the dictator and master of the horse abdicated office. Gaius Terentius Varro was sent into Etruria as propraetor, with the understanding that Gaius Hostilius should go from that province to Tarentum, to the army which Titus Quinctius, the consul, had had. It was decreed also that Lucius Manlius[1] should cross the sea as an emissary and ascertain what was going on there; at the same time, inasmuch as the Olympic Festival was to be held that summer—and, as they said, it was observed by a great multitude of Greeks—if he could be safe from the enemy, he should go to that gathering, so that such Sicilians as were there as refugees on account of the war, or citizens of Tarentum banished by Hannibal, might return and know that the Roman people was restoring to them all the possessions which they had held before the war. B.C. 208

Inasmuch as a very dangerous year seemed impending, and the state had no consuls, everyone turned to the consuls-elect and wished that as soon as possible they should cast lots for their provinces and settle in advance what province and what enemy each of them was to have. Also a reconciliation between them was discussed in the senate, Quintus Fabius Maximus taking the initiative. Now between them was a well-known enmity, and for Livius his own downfall had embittered that enmity and made it more intolerable, because he believed that in that misfortune he had been treated with contempt. And so he was the more deaf to entreaty, and kept saying they had no need to be reconciled; that in acrius et intentius omnia gesturos timentes ne crescendi ex se inimico conlegae potestas fieret. 9 Vicit tamen auctoritas senatus ut positis simultatibus communi animo consilioque administrarent rem 10 publicam. Provinciae iis non permixtae regionibus, sicut superioribus annis, sed diversae extremis Italiae finibus, alteri adversus Hannibalem Bruttii et Lucani, alteri Gallia adversus [1] Hasdrubalem, quem iam Alpibus adpropinquare fama erat, decreta. 11 Exercitum e duobus qui in Gallia quique in Etruria esset, addito urbano, eligeret quem mallet, qui 12 Galliam esset sortitus. Cui Bruttii provincia evenisset, novis legionibus urbanis scriptis, utrius 13 mallet consulum prioris anni exercitum sumeret; relictum a consule exercitum Q. Fulvius proconsul ac- 14 ciperet, eique in annum imperium esset. Et C. Hostilio, cui pro Etruria Tarentum mutaverant provinciam, pro Tarento Capuam mutaverunt; legio una data est,[2] cui Fulvius proximo anno praefuerat.

A.U.C. 546

XXXVI. De Hasdrubalis adventu in Italiam cura in dies crescebat. Massiliensium primum legati nun- 2 tiaverant [3] eum in Galliam transgressum, erectosque

[1] adversus P(1)N Aldus, Froben : contra JK.
[2] est P(1)N Aldus : om. Sp?JK Froben 2.
[3] nuntiaverant JK Aldus, Froben : -erunt P(1)N.

every act each would show more spirit and alertness B.C. 208 for fear an unfriendly colleague might have the opportunity to gain at his expense. Nevertheless by the authority of the senate they were prevailed upon to lay aside their quarrels and to carry on the government with a common spirit and policy. The provinces assigned to them were not locally indistinguishable, as in the preceding years, but separated by the whole length of Italy. To the one was assigned the land of the Bruttii and Lucania facing Hannibal, to the other Gaul facing Hasdrubal, who was reported to be already nearing the Alps. Whichever of them should receive Gaul in the allotment was to choose the army he preferred out of the two that were in Gaul and in Etruria and the one at the city. The consul to whom the land of the Bruttii should fall as his province was to enrol new legions for the city and take, at his own discretion, the army of one or the other of the consuls of the previous year. As for the army which was not taken by a consul, Quintus Fulvius, the proconsul, was to take it, and his command was to be for one year. And for Gaius Hostilius, for whom they had made a change of provinces, Tarentum in place of Etruria, they made a change of Capua instead of Tarentum. One legion was assigned to him, that which in the previous year Fulvius had commanded.

XXXVI. In regard to Hasdrubal's coming to Italy anxiety was daily increasing. First, ambassadors from Massilia [1] had announced that he had passed over into Gaul, and that the Gauls were aroused by [1] Livy, whose chronology gives Hasdrubal a whole year in Gaul, does not speak of Scipio's couriers sent to Rome; Zonaras IX. viii. 7.

A.U.C. 546

adventu eius, quia magnum pondus auri attulisse diceretur ad mercede auxilia conducenda. Gallorum 3 animos. Missi deinde cum iis legati ab Roma Sex. Antistius et M. Raecius ad rem inspiciendam rettulerant misisse se [1] cum Massiliensibus ducibus qui per hospites eorum principes Gallorum omnia
4 explorata referrent; pro comperto habere Hasdrubalem ingenti iam coacto exercitu proximo vere Alpes traiecturum, nec tum eum quicquam aliud morari nisi quod clausae hieme Alpes essent.
5 In locum M. Marcelli P. Aelius Paetus augur creatus inauguratusque; et Cn. Cornelius Dolabella rex sacrorum inauguratus est in locum M. Marcii, 6 qui biennio ante mortuus erat. Hoc eodem anno et lustrum conditum est a censoribus P. Sempronio Tudi-
7 tano et M. Cornelio Cethego. Censa civium capita centum triginta septem milia centum octo, minor ali-
8 quanto numerus quam qui ante bellum fuerat. Eo anno primum, ex quo Hannibal in Italiam venisset, comitium tectum esse memoriae proditum est, et ludos Romanos semel instauratos ab aedilibus curuli-
9 bus Q. Metello et C. Servilio. Et plebeis ludis [2]

[1] se PCAN Aldus : om. RMBDJK.

[2] plebeis ludis P(1)NJK Aldus, Froben : plebei ludi (with instaurati) A^z Wesenberg.

---

[1] His route from the western Pyrenees across Gaul is thought by some to have been a northerly one, as possibly indicated by mention of the Arverni at xxxix. 6; see p. 288, n. 2, but also p. 366, n. 2. Highly improbable is Jullian's theory (based upon a questionable interpretation of Silius Italicus XV. 494) that Hasdrubal wintered at Iliberris (Elne), hardly 15 miles from the eastern pass guarded by Scipio's detachment. More can be said for the historic low-level route Tolosa–Carcaso–Narbo, and then on the trail of Hannibal at least until the Rhone was reached. Cf. Jullian, Histoire de la Gaule I. 496; De Sanctis l.c. 483.

his coming,[1] because he was said to have brought a B.C. 208 great amount of gold in order to hire mercenaries. After that, Sextus Antistius and Marcus Raecius, who were sent with them from Rome as ambassadors to look into the matter, had reported that with Massilians as guides they had sent men to ascertain all the facts through leading Gauls who were guest-friends of their guides, and to report: that they had established that Hasdrubal with a huge army already concentrated would cross the Alps the next spring, and that at that time nothing else was detaining him than that the Alps were closed by the winter.

In place of Marcus Marcellus as augur Publius Aelius Paetus was elected and installed: and Gnaeus Cornelius Dolabella was installed as rex sacrorum in place of Marcus Marcius, who had died two years before. Also in the same year the lustration was completed[2] by the censors, Publius Sempronius Tuditanus and Marcus Cornelius Cethegus. Enrolled in the census were 137,108 citizens, a considerably smaller number than it had been before the war.[3] In that year for the first time since Hannibal had invaded Italy it is recorded that the Comitium was covered,[4] and that the Roman Games were repeated for one day by the curule aediles, Quintus Metellus and Gaius Servilius. And at the

[2] The usual phrase in describing the formal rite of purification with which the work of the censors came to an end; cf. I. xliv. 2, etc.

[3] Ten years before, in the censorship of Flaminius and Aemilius Papus, the number of citizens had been over 270,000, almost twice as many; Periocha XX.

[4] I.e. with awnings to protect the spectators at gladiatorial shows. For the same purpose Caesar covered the entire Forum; Pliny N.H. XIX. 23.

A.U.C. 546 biduum instauratum a C. Mamilio et M. Caecilio Metello aedilibus plebis; et tria signa ad Cereris eidem dederunt; et Iovis epulum fuit ludorum causa.

A.U.C. 547 10 Consulatum inde ineunt C. Claudius Nero et M. Livius iterum; qui quia iam[1] designati provincias 11 sortiti erant, praetores sortiri iusserunt. C. Hostilio urbana[2] evenit; addita et peregrina, ut tres in provincias exire possent: A. Hostilio Sardinia, C. 12 Mamilio Sicilia, L. Porcio Gallia evenit. Summa legionum trium et viginti ita per provincias divisa: binae consulum essent, quattuor Hispania haberet, binas tres praetores, in Sicilia et Sardinia et Gallia, 13 duas C. Terentius in Etruria, duas Q. Fulvius in Bruttiis, duas Q. Claudius[3] circa Tarentum et Sallentinos, unam C. Hostilius Tubulus Capuae; 14 duae urbanae ut scriberentur. Primis quattuor legionibus populus tribunos creavit; in ceteras consules miserunt.

XXXVII. Priusquam consules proficiscerentur, novendiale sacrum fuit, quia Veis de caelo lapidaverat. 2 Sub unius prodigii, ut fit, mentionem alia quoque nuntiata. Minturnis aedem Iovis et lucum Maricae, 3 item Atellae murum et portam de caelo tacta;[4] Min-

[1] iam x Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

[2] urbana, *before this N*²*JK Aldus Froben have* iurisdictio (om. P(1)N); cf. XXVIII. x. 9; XXIX. xiii. 2.

[3] in Bruttiis duas Q. Claudius *A*¹*N*²*JK Aldus, Froben*: om. P(1)N, one line.

[4] tacta P(3)N?: tactam CDN?JK Aldus, Froben; cf. xxiii. 3.

---

[1] As in XXV. ii. 10; XXIX. xxxviii. 8; XXX. xxxix. 8.

[2] Cf. Vol. VI. p. 346, n. 3, and 501, note.

[3] I.e. the legions to be assigned to the consuls.

[4] Cf. note on XXVI. xxiii. 6.

Plebeian Games there was a repetition for two days by order of Gaius Mamilius and Marcus Caecilius Metellus, plebeian aediles. And they likewise gave three statues at the Temple of Ceres. There was also a banquet for Jupiter on account of the festival.[1] B.C. 208

Thereupon Gaius Claudius Nero and Marcus Livius entered upon their consulship, the latter for the second time. Because as consuls-elect they had already cast lots for their provinces, they ordered the praetors to cast lots. To Gaius Hostilius fell the city praetorship; the foreign praetorship also was assigned to him, to enable three praetors to go out to provinces.[2] Sardinia fell to Aulus Hostilius, Sicily to Gaius Mamilius, Gaul to Lucius Porcius. The total of the legions was twenty-three, divided as follows among the provinces: the consuls were each to have two legions, Spain four, each of three praetors was to have two, in Sicily and Sardinia and Gaul, Gaius Terentius to have two in Etruria, Quintus Fulvius two in the land of the Bruttii, Quintus Claudius two in the vicinity of Tarentum and the Sallentini, Gaius Hostilius Tubulus one at Capua. Two city legions were to be enrolled. For the first four legions[3] the people elected the tribunes, to the rest of the legions tribunes were sent by the consuls. B.C. 207

XXXVII. Before the consuls set out there were nine days of rites,[4] because stones had rained from the sky at Veii. Following mention of one prodigy, as usual, others also were reported: that at Minturnae the Temple of Jupiter and the grove of Marica,[5] also at Atella the city wall and a gate had been struck by [5] A goddess especially honoured here at the mouth of the Liris. There was a temple as well; Plutarch Marius xxxix. 4; xl. 1.

A.U.C. 547

turnenses, terribilius quod esset, adiciebant sanguinis rivum in porta fluxisse; et Capuae lupus nocte 4 portam ingressus vigilem laniaverat. Haec procurata hostiis maioribus prodigia, et supplicatio diem unum fuit ex decreto pontificum. Inde iterum novendiale instauratum, quod in Armilustro lapidibus 5 visum pluere. Liberatas religione mentes turbavit rursus nuntiatum Frusinone natum infantem esse[1] quadrimo parem, nec magnitudine tam mirandum quam quod is quoque, ut Sinuessae biennio ante, 6 incertus mas an femina esset natus erat. Id vero haruspices ex Etruria adciti foedum ac turpe prodigium dicere: extorrem agro Romano, procul terrae contactu, alto mergendum. Vivum in arcam condi- 7 dere provectumque in mare proiecerunt. Decrevere item pontifices ut virgines ter novenae per urbem euntes carmen canerent. Id cum in Iovis Statoris aede discerent conditum ab Livio poeta carmen, tacta de caelo aedis[2] in Aventino Iunonis Reginae; 8 prodigiumque id ad matronas pertinere haruspices cum respondissent donoque divam placandam esse, 9 aedilium curulium edicto in Capitolium convocatae quibus in urbe Romana intraque decimum lapidem ab urbe domicilia essent, ipsae inter se quinque et

[1] infantem esse P(1)N: esse infantem JK Conway.
[2] aedis P(1)N: -des JK.

---

[1] An open space on the Aventine (near S. Sabina) where the purification of arms took place at an annual festival in October.

[2] Cf. xi. 4 f.

[3] In expiation of a similar portent seven years later a chorus of 27 maidens rendered a hymn. Livius Andronicus being dead, the poet was one Licinius Tegula; XXXI. xii.

lightning. To make it more terrible, the men of Min- B.C. 207 turnae added that there had been a river of blood in the gate. And at Capua a wolf had entered a gate at night and mangled a sentry. These prodigies were atoned for with full-grown victims, and a single day of prayer was observed by decree of the pontiffs. Then again the nine days of rites were repeated, because in the Armilustrum [1] it seemed to rain stones. Relieved of their religious scruples, men were troubled again by the report that at Frusino there had been born a child as large as a four-year-old, and not so much a wonder for size as because, just as at Sinuessa two years before,[2] it was uncertain whether male or female. In fact the soothsayers summoned from Etruria said it was a terrible and loathsome portent: it must be removed from Roman territory, far from contact with earth, and drowned in the sea. They put it alive into a chest, carried it out to sea and threw it overboard. The pontiffs likewise decreed that thrice nine maidens should sing a hymn as they marched through the city.[3] While they were in the Temple of Jupiter Stator, learning that hymn, composed by Livius the poet, the Temple of Juno the Queen on the Aventine was struck by lightning. That this portent concerned the matrons was the opinion given by the soothsayers, and that the goddess must be appeased by a gift: whereupon the matrons domiciled in the city of Rome or within ten miles of it were summoned by an edict of the curule aediles to the Capitol. And from their own number they themselves chose twenty-five, to whom they 9 f. Two other cases of this choral expiation of an androgynus are reported from lost books of Livy by Julius Obsequens 34 and 36.

A.U.C. 547

viginti delegerunt ad quas ex dotibus stipem conferrent. Inde donum pelvis aurea facta lataque in Aventinum, pureque et caste [1] a matronis sacrificatum.

Confestim ad aliud sacrificium eidem divae ab decemviris edicta dies, cuius ordo talis fuit: ab aede Apollinis boves feminae albae duae porta Carmentali in urbem ductae; post eas duo signa cupressea Iunonis Reginae portabantur; tum septem et viginti virgines, longam indutae vestem, carmen in Iunonem Reginam canentes ibant, illa tempestate forsitan laudabile rudibus ingeniis, nunc abhorrens et inconditum, si referatur. Virginum ordinem sequebantur decemviri coronati laurea praetextatique. A porta Iugario vico in forum venere. In foro pompa constitit, et per manus reste data virgines sonum vocis pulsu pedum modulantes incesserunt. Inde vico Tusco Velabroque per Bovarium forum in clivum Publicium atque aedem Iunonis Reginae perrectum. Ibi duae hostiae ab decemviris immolatae et simulacra cupressea in aedem inlata.

XXXVIII. Deis rite placatis dilectum consules habebant acrius intentiusque quam prioribus annis quisquam meminerat habitum; nam et belli terror duplicatus novi hostis in Italiam adventu, et minus

[1] pureque et caste SpJK Froben 2: pure casteque P(3)N Aldus.

---

[1] In the Campus Martius, between the gate and the Flaminian Circus; the only Apollo temple at Rome until the time of Augustus.

[2] As the first known lyric by the very first poet writing at Rome the historian might have told his readers more about it. For the honour paid to Andronicus at the time v. Festus 446 L.

should bring a contribution from their dowries. B.C. 207
Out of that a golden basin was made as a gift and carried to the Aventine, and the matrons after due purification offered sacrifice.

At once a day was appointed by the decemvirs for another sacrifice to the same goddess; and the order of procedure was as follows: from the Temple of Apollo[1] two white cows were led through the Porta Carmentalis into the city; behind them were carried two statues of Juno the Queen in cypress wood. Then the seven and twenty maidens in long robes marched, singing their hymn in honour of Juno the Queen, a song which to the untrained minds of that time may have deserved praise, but now, if repeated, would be repellent and uncouth.[2] Behind the company of maidens followed the decemvirs wearing laurel garlands and purple-bordered togas. From the gate they proceeded along the Vicus Iugarius into the Forum. In the Forum the procession halted, and passing a rope from hand to hand the maidens advanced, accompanying the sound of the voice by beating time with their feet. Then by way of the Vicus Tuscus and the Velabrum, through the Forum Boarium they made their way to the Clivus Publicius[3] and the Temple of Juno the Queen. There the two victims were sacrificed by the decemvirs and the cypress statues borne into the temple.

XXXVIII. After due appeasement of the gods the consuls conducted the levy more vigorously and more strictly than anyone remembered its conduct in previous years. For the terror of the war was doubled by the coming of a new enemy into Italy,

[3] Cf. XXVI. x. 6 and note.

A.U.C. 547

3 iuventutis erat unde scriberent milites. Itaque colonos etiam maritimos, qui sacrosanctam vacationem dicebantur habere, dare milites cogebant. Quibus recusantibus edixere in diem certam ut quo quisque iure vacationem haberet ad senatum deferret.
4 Ea die ad senatum hi populi venerunt: Ostiensis Alsiensis Antias Anxurnas Minturnensis Sinuessanus, 5 et ab supero mari Senensis. Cum vacationes suas quisque populus recitaret, nullius, cum in Italia hostis esset, praeter Antiatem Ostiensemque vacatio observata est; et earum coloniarum iuniores iure iurando adacti supra dies triginta non pernoctaturos se[1] extra moenia coloniae suae, donec hostis in Italia esset.
6 Cum omnes censerent primo quoque tempore consulibus eundum ad bellum—nam et Hasdrubali occurrendum esse descendenti ab Alpibus, ne Gallos Cisalpinos neve Etruriam erectam in spem rerum
7 novarum sollicitaret, et Hannibalem suo proprio occupandum bello, ne emergere ex Bruttiis atque obviam ire fratri posset—Livius cunctabatur, parum
8 fidens suarum provinciarum exercitibus; conlegam ex duobus consularibus egregiis exercitibus et tertio, cui Q. Claudius Tarenti praeesset, electionem habere; intuleratque mentionem de volonibus re-
9 vocandis ad signa. Senatus liberam potestatem

[1] se, after this Sp?JK Froben 2, Eds. have esse, om. by P(1)N Aldus, Conway.

---

[1] I.e. Adriatic; cf. Vol. VI., p. 131 and note.
[2] I.e. as represented by its legates. Each delegation probably produced its formula (cf. p. 245, n. 1).
[3] No mention of this possibility is made at xxxv. 12 nor at xl. 14. This Claudius had two legions; xxxvi. 13.

and also there were fewer young men from whom to enlist soldiers. Accordingly they compelled even the men of the seaboard colonies, who, it was said, had an exemption that could not be touched, to furnish soldiers. When they refused, the consuls named a date for them to report to the senate on what basis each state had exemption. On that day these came before the senate: Ostia, Alsium, Antium, Anxur, Minturnae, Sinuessa, and from the Upper[1] Sea, Sena. Although each state[2] read the evidence of its exemption, in no case except Antium and Ostia was exemption respected so long as the enemy was in Italy; and in the case of these colonies the younger men were made to swear that they would not pass the night outside the walls of their colony for more than thirty days, so long as the enemy was in Italy. B.C. 207

All the senators were indeed of the opinion that the consuls must take the field at the earliest possible moment. For they felt that Hasdrubal must be met as he came down from the Alps, to prevent his stirring up the Cisalpine Gauls or Etruria, which was already aroused to the hope of rebellion, and likewise that Hannibal must be kept busy with a war of his own, that he might not be able to leave the country of the Bruttii and go to meet his brother. Nevertheless Livius was hesitating, having small confidence in the armies of his provinces, while his colleague, he thought, had his choice between two excellent consular armies and a third army,[3] which Quintus Claudius commanded at Tarentum. Livius had also mentioned a proposal to recall the slave-volunteers[4] to their standards. The senate gave the consulibus fecit et supplendi unde vellent et eligendi de omnibus exercitibus quos vellent, permutandique et [1] ex provinciis quo [2] e re publica censerent esse traducendi.[3] Ea [4] omnia cum summa concordia consulum acta. Volones in undevicensimam et vicensimam legiones scripti. Magni roboris auxilia ex Hispania quoque a P. Scipione M. Livio missa quidam ad id bellum auctores sunt, octo milia Hispanorum Gallorumque et [5] duo milia de legione militum, equitum mille octingentos [6] mixtos Numidas Hispanosque; M. Lucretium has copias navibus advexisse; [7] et sagittariorum funditorumque ad tria milia ex Sicilia C. Mamilium misisse.

[1] Cf. Vol. VI. p. 108, note; XXV. xx. 4; xxii. 3.

A.U.C. 547

XXXIX. Auxerunt Romae tumultum litterae ex Gallia allatae ab L. Porcio praetore: Hasdrubalem movisse ex hibernis et iam Alpes transire; octo milia Ligurum conscripta armataque coniūnctura se transgresso in Italiam esse, nisi mitteretur in Ligures qui eos bello occuparet; se cum invalido exercitu quoad tutum putaret progressurum. Hae litterae consules raptim confecto dilectu maturius quam constituerant exire in provincias coegerunt ea mente ut uterque hostem in sua provincia contineret neque coniungi aut conferre in unum vires pateretur. Plurimum in eam rem adiuvit opinio Hannibalis,

[1] et Aldus, Madvig: om. P(1)NJK Conway.
[2] quo Madvig: quos P(3)NJK Aldus, Conway.
[3] traducendi P(1)NJK: -cendos Conway.
[4] Ea $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Aldus: om. P(1)N.
[5] et P(1)N Aldus, Froben: ad Sp?$N^{s}JK$.
[6] octingentos Sp?x Aldus, Froben 2: om. P(1)N.
[7] advexisse Sp?$N^{s}JK$: adduxisse P(1)N Aldus.

consuls unlimited power both to supplement from B.C. 207 any source they pleased, and to choose out of all the armies men whom they preferred, and to exchange them, and to transfer them from their provinces whithersoever they thought to the advantage of the state. All of this was done with the greatest harmony on the part of the consuls. The slave-volunteers were enrolled in the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Auxiliary forces of great strength, according to some of the authorities for this war, were sent from Spain as well to Marcus Livius by Publius Scipio, namely, eight thousand Spaniards and Gauls and two thousand legionary soldiers, one thousand eight hundred cavalry, partly Numidians, partly Spanish. They report that Marcus Lucretius brought these troops by sea; and that about three thousand archers and slingers were sent from Sicily by Gaius Mamilius.

XXXIX. At Rome the confusion was increased by the receipt of a letter from Gaul written by Lucius Porcius, the praetor, reporting that Hasdrubal had left his winter quarters and was already crossing the Alps; that eight thousand Ligurians, enrolled and armed, would join him after he had crossed into Italy, unless some one should be sent into Liguria to forestall them by a war; that he would himself advance, so far as he thought safe, with an army that was not strong. This letter constrained the consuls to complete the levy in haste and to leave for their provinces earlier than they had planned, with this intention, that each of them should keep an enemy in his province, and not allow them to come together and combine their armies in one. Of the greatest assistance in that direction was Hannibal's miscalcu-quod, etsi ea aestate transiturum in Italiam fratrem crediderat, recordando quae ipse in transitu nunc Rhodani, nunc Alpium cum hominibus locisque pugnando per quinque menses exhausisset, haudquaquam tam facilem maturumque transitum exspectabat; ea tardius movendi ex hibernis causa fuit. 6 Ceterum Hasdrubali et sua et aliorum spe omnia celeriora atque expeditiora fuere. Non enim receperunt modo Arverni eum deinceps[1]que aliae Gallicae atque Alpinae gentes, sed etiam secutae 7 sunt ad bellum. Et cum per munita pleraque transitu fratris, quae antea invia fuerant, ducebat, tum etiam duodecim annorum adsuetudine perviis Alpibus factis inter mitiora iam transibant[2] homi- 8 num ingenia. Invisitati namque antea alienigenis nec videre ipsi advenam in sua terra adsueti, omni generi humano insociabiles erant. Et primo ignari quo Poenus pergeret suas rupes suaque castella et pecorum hominumque praedam peti crediderant; 9 fama deinde Punici belli, quo duodecimum annum Italia urebatur, satis edocuerat viam tantum Alpes

A.U.C. 547

[1] aliae P(1)N Aldus, Froben: om. SpJK.
[2] transibant P(1)N Conway: -ibat JK Aldus, Froben, Madvig.

---

[1] So a fragment of Polybius, XI. i. 1; in two months (i.e. from the time he left winter quarters) according to Appian Hann. 32.

[2] As to Hasdrubal's route across Gaul, we may not safely argue from the mention of this powerful tribe (really a wide-spreading confederacy) that he passed north of the Cevennes, through the home-country of the Arverni. Cf. Jullian, Histoire de la Gaule, I, 496, note 4.

[3] Appian accepted, with Livy, the same route as had been followed by Hannibal. That route brought Hannibal down into the land of the Taurini, according to Livy, XXI. xxxviii. 5 ff.

lation. He had believed, indeed, that his brother B.C. 207 would come over into Italy that summer: but when he recalled what he had himself endured during five months, in crossing first the Rhone, and then the Alps, in conflicts with men and the nature of the country, he looked forward to a crossing by no means so easy and so soon accomplished. This accounted for his slowness in leaving winter quarters. But for Hasdrubal everything moved more quickly and more easily than had been expected by himself and others.[1] For not only did the Arverni,[2] and then in turn other Gallic and Alpine tribes, receive him, but they even followed him to war. And not merely was he leading an army through country for the most part made passable by his brother's crossing,[3] although previously trackless, but, thanks to the opening up of the Alps by twelve years of habitual use,[4] they were also crossing through tribes now less savagely disposed. For previously, being never seen by strange peoples and unaccustomed themselves to see a stranger in their own land, they were unfriendly to the human race in general. And at first, not knowing whither the Carthaginian was bound, they had believed that their own rocks and fastnesses and booty in cattle and men were the objects of attack. Then reports of the Punic war, with which Italy had been aflame for ~~eleven~~ 15 years, had made it quite plain to them that the Alps were Hence the inference that the pass was either Mont-Genèvre or Mont-Cenis. Varro had placed Hasdrubal's pass farther north than that of Hannibal; cf. Servius on Aeneid X. 13; De Sanctis l.c. pp. 65 f., 561.

[4] By whom Livy omits to state; certainly not by armies comparable to Hasdrubal's.

A.U.C. 547

esse; duas praevalidas urbes, magno inter se maris terrarumque spatio discretas, de imperio et opibus certare.

10 Hae causae aperuerant Alpes Hasdrubali. Ceterum
11 quod celeritate itineris profectum erat, id mora ad Placentiam, dum frustra obsidet magis quam oppug-
12 nat, corrupit. Crediderat campestris oppidi facilem expugnationem esse, et nobilitas coloniae induxerat eum, magnum se excidio eius urbis terrorem
13 ceteris ratum iniecturum. Non ipse se [1] solum ea oppugnatione [2] impediit, sed Hannibalem post famam transitus eius tanto spe sua celeriorem iam moventem 14 ex hibernis continuerat, quippe reputantem non solum quam lenta urbium oppugnatio esset, sed etiam quam ipse frustra eandem illam coloniam ab Trebia victor regressus temptasset.

XL. Consules diversis itineribus profecti ab urbe velut in duo pariter bella distenderant curas hominum, simul recordantium, quas primus adventus
2 Hannibalis intulisset Italiae clades, simul cum illa angeret cura, quos tam propitios urbi atque imperio fore deos ut eodem tempore utrobique res publica prospere gereretur? Adhuc adversa secundis pen-
3 sando rem ad id tempus extractam esse. Cum in Italia ad Trasumennum et Cannas praecipitasset Romana res, prospera bella in Hispania prolapsam 4 eam erexisse; postea, cum in Hispania alia super

[1] ipse se Sp²N¹JK Froben 2: ipse PRM: ipsum CBDAN Aldus, Madvig.

[2] oppugnatione Sp²K (imp- N¹J): oppugnatio P(1)N Madvig.

---

[1] No such siege of Placentia was mentioned in XXI. lvii., lix., but only an unsuccessful attack upon its port.

merely a route; that two very powerful cities, B.C. 207 separated from each other by a wide expanse of sea and land, were contending for empire and supremacy.

These were the reasons which had opened the Alps for Hasdrubal. But what had been gained by the rapidity of his march he lost by delaying before Placentia, in a futile blockade rather than a siege. He had believed that the storming of a town in the plain was easy, and the reputation of the colony had led him on, thinking that by the destruction of that city he would inspire great alarm in the others. Not only did he hinder himself by that siege, but he had kept back Hannibal, who was just preparing to leave winter quarters, on hearing so much sooner than he had expected news of his brother's crossing. For Hannibal recalled not only how slow was the besieging of cities, but also how vainly he had himself attempted to take that same colony, upon returning as a victor from the Trebia.[1]

XL. The setting out of the consuls from the city in opposite directions, as though for two wars at the same time, had drawn men's anxious thoughts both ways, while they not only remembered what disasters the first coming of Hannibal had brought into Italy, but also were tormented by this anxiety: what gods were to be so kindly disposed to the city and the empire that the state should meet with success at the same time in both quarters? It was with a balancing of defeats so far by victories, they thought, that matters had dragged on up to that time. When in Italy at Trasumennus and Cannae the Roman state had gone down to defeat, victorious campaigns in Spain had saved her from falling. Later, when in Spain one disaster after another had aliam clades duobus egregiis ducibus amissis duos exercitus ex parte delesset, multa secunda in Italia Siciliaque gesta quassatam rem publicam excepisse; et ipsum intervallum loci, quod in ultimis terrarum oris alterum bellum gereretur, spatium dedisse ad respirandum. Nunc duo bella in Italiam accepta, duo celeberrimi nominis duces circumstare urbem Romanam, et unum in locum totam periculi molem, omne onus incubuisse. Qui eorum prior vicisset, intra paucos dies castra [1] cum altero iuncturum. Terrebat et proximus annus lugubris duorum consulum funeribus. His anxii curis homines digredientes in provincias consules prosecuti sunt. Memoriae proditum est plenum adhuc irae in civis M. Livium ad bellum proficiscentem monenti Q. Fabio ne, priusquam genus hostium cognosset, temere manum consereret, respondisse, ubi primum hostium agmen conspexisset, pugnaturum. Cum quaereretur quae causa festinandi esset, "Aut ex hoste egregiam gloriam" inquit "aut ex civibus victis gaudium meritum certe, etsi non honestum, capiam."

Priusquam Claudius consul in provinciam perveniret,[2] per extremum finem agri [3] . . . ducentem in Sallentinos exercitum Hannibalem expeditis cohortibus adortus C. Hostilius Tubulus incomposito

[1] paucos dies castra A^1N^1JK : om. $P(1)N$, one line.
[2] perveniret SpJK Froben 2 : veniret $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[3] agri, followed in P^1JK by larinatis, impossible on account of the distance of Larinum : Madvig (Emend.) conj. Tarentini; also Uriatis (later), adopted by Riemann : laritanis $P(3)$: -tani BAN.

partially destroyed two armies with the loss of two B.C. 207 extraordinary generals, many successes in Italy and Sicily had supported the tottering state. And the very distance, they said, in that one of the wars was fought in the remotest part of the world, had given time to recover breath. But now two wars had been admitted into Italy, two generals of the greatest celebrity were encircling the city of Rome, and upon one spot the whole mass, the entire weight of the danger had settled. Whichever of them was the first to win a victory would within a few days unite his camp with the other's. Alarm was caused also by the preceding year, saddened by the death of two consuls. Troubled by such anxieties men escorted the consuls as they parted, leaving for their provinces. It is related that when Marcus Livius, still filled with resentment toward his fellow-citizens, was setting out for the war, and Quintus Fabius warned him not to engage the enemy rashly, before he had come to know their character, he replied that he would fight when he first caught sight of the enemy's column. When the question was asked what reason he had for haste, he said, "I shall win either great fame from the enemy, or from my defeated fellow-citizens a joy that surely is earned, even if not to my credit."

Before Claudius, the consul, reached his province, as Hannibal was leading his army along the very border of the territory of . . .[1] into the country of the Sallentini, Gaius Hostilius Tubulus with cohorts unencumbered by baggage attacked him and caused

[1] Some town not far from Tarentum; cf. § 12. Uria (chief town of the Sallentini), suggested by Madvig, was on the Via Appia, halfway between Tarentum and Brundisium. Cf. Strabo VI. iii. 6 f.

A.U.C. 547
11 agmini terribilem tumultum intulit: ad quattuor milia hominum occidit, novem signa militaria cepit. Moverat ex hibernis ad famam hostis Q. Claudius, qui per urbes agri Sallentini castra disposita habebat.
12 Itaque ne cum duobus exercitibus simul confligeret, Hannibal nocte castra ex agro Tarentino movit atque
13 in Bruttios concessit. Claudius in Sallentinos agmen convertit, Hostilius Capuam petens obvius[1] ad
14 Venusiam fuit[2] consuli Claudio. Ibi ex utroque exercitu electa peditum quadraginta milia, duo milia[3] et quingenti equites, quibus consul adversus Hannibalem rem gereret: reliquas copias Hostilius Capuam ducere iussus, ut Q. Fulvio proconsuli traderet.

XLI. Hannibal undique contracto exercitu, quem in hibernis aut in praesidiis agri Bruttii habuerat, in Lucanos ad Grumentum venit spe recipiendi oppida
2 quae per metum ad Romanos defecissent. Eodem a Venusia consul Romanus exploratis itineribus contendit, et mille fere et quingentos passus castra ab hoste
3 locat.[4] Grumenti moenibus prope iniunctum videbatur Poenorum vallum; quingenti passus intererant.
4 Castra Punica ac Romana interiacebat campus; colles imminebant nudi sinistro lateri Carthaginiensium, dextro Romanorum, neutris suspecti, quod nihil

[1] obvius $P(1)N$: obviam JK.
[2] fuit $P(1)N$: fit N^sJK Aldus, Froben.
[3] duo milia x Aldus, Froben: duo d N^s: duo A^cJK: om. (also quingenti, i.e. D) $P(1)(A?)N$.
[4] ab hoste (urbe J) locat JK Aldus, Froben: locat ab hoste $P(3)N$.

[1] I.e. the winter stations among which his two legions were dispersed; xxxvi. 13. Note that Quintus Claudius is different from the consul Gaius Claudius Nero of section 13.
[2] But in xl. 10 Hannibal had already taken the field. This statement is evidently from a different source.

terrible confusion in the straggling column. He B.C. 207 slew about four thousand men and captured nine military standards. On hearing of the approach of the enemy, Quintus Claudius, who had his camps[1] established near the various cities of the Sallentine territory, had left his winter quarters. Accordingly, not to engage two armies at the same time, Hannibal moved his camp out of the region of Tarentum by night and retired into the country of the Bruttii.[2] Claudius turned his column into the territory of the Sallentini, while Hostilius on his way to Capua met the consul Claudius near Venusia. There forty thousand infantry and twenty-five hundred horsemen were selected from both their armies, that with them the consul might campaign against Hannibal. As for the rest of the forces, Hostilius was ordered to lead them to Capua, to be handed over to Quintus Fulvius, the proconsul.

XLI. Hannibal, after concentrating the army which he had kept in winter quarters or garrisons in the land of the Bruttii, came to Grumentum[3] in Lucania, in the hope of recovering the towns which out of fear had gone over to the Romans. The Roman consul hastened from Venusia to the same place, reconnoitring as he advanced, and pitched camp about fifteen hundred paces from the enemy. The Carthaginians' earthwork seemed almost in contact with the walls of Grumentum; the distance was only five hundred paces. Between the Punic camp and the Roman lay a plain. Bare hills overhung the left flank of the Carthaginians and the right flank of the Romans, without arousing suspi-

[3] An important town in the interior, with a large territory; cf. XXIII. xxxvii. 10.

A.U.C. 547

5 silvae neque ad insidias latebrarum habebant. In medio campo ab stationibus procursantes certamina haud satis digna dictu serebant. Id modo Romanum quaerere apparebat, ne abire hostem pateretur: Hannibal inde evadere cupiens totis viribus in aciem
6 descendebat. Tum consul ingenio hostis usus, quo minus in tam apertis collibus timeri insidiae poterant, quinque cohortes additis quinque manipulis nocte iugum superare et in aversis collibus[1] considere
7 iubet. Tempus exsurgendi ex insidiis et adgrediendi hostem Ti. Claudium Asellum tribunum militum et P. Claudium praefectum socium edocet, 8 quos cum iis mittebat. Ipse luce prima copias omnes peditum equitumque in aciem eduxit. Paulo post et ab Hannibale signum pugnae propositum est, clamorque in castris ad arma discurrentium est sublatus. Inde eques pedesque certatim portis ruere ac
9 palati per campum properare ad hostes. Quos ubi effusos consul videt, tribuno militum tertiae legionis C. Aurunculeio imperat ut equites legionis quanto 10 maximo impetu possit in hostem emittat: ita pecorum modo incompositos toto passim se campo[2] fudisse ut sterni obterique, priusquam instruantur, possint.

XLII. Nondum Hannibal e castris exierat cum pugnantium clamorem audivit. Itaque excitus tu-

[1] collibus P(1)N; vallibus A[c]N[c]JK Aldus, Froben.
[2] se campo P(1)NJK Aldus: campo se Froben 2.

cions for either army, because they had no woods nor B.C. 207 any hiding-places for an ambush. In the plain between them charges starting from outposts brought on engagements not important enough to be mentioned. It was evident that the Roman general's only object was not to allow the enemy to get away. But Hannibal in his eagerness to make his way out of the place would go down into battle-line with all his forces. Then the consul, using the enemy's talent, all the more readily that on such exposed hills ambuscades could not be feared, commanded five cohorts, with five maniples in addition, to cross over the ridge in the night, and to post themselves on the farther side of the hills. As to the time for them to rise from ambush and attack the enemy he instructed Tiberius Claudius Asellus, tribune of the soldiers, and Publius Claudius, prefect of the allies, officers whom he was sending with them. At daybreak he himself led out all his forces, infantry and cavalry, into battle-line. A little later the signal for battle was set up by Hannibal also, and a shout was raised in the camp as the men rushed in all directions to get their arms. Then cavalry and infantry in rivalry dashed out of the gates and, scattering over the plain, made haste to reach the enemy. On seeing their disorder, the consul ordered Gaius Aurunculeius, tribune of the soldiers of the third legion, to send out the cavalry of the legion with all possible momentum against the enemy, saying that they had scattered so widely, like sheep, in disorder over the whole plain that they could be routed and crushed before they were drawn up in line.

XLII. Not yet had Hannibal left the camp when he heard the shouting of the combatants. Accord-multu raptim ad hostem copias agit. Iam primos occupaverat equestris[1] terror; peditum etiam prima legio et dextra ala proelium inibat. Incompositi hostes, ut quemque aut pediti aut equiti casus obtulit, ita conserunt manus. Crescit pugna subsidiis et procurrentium ad certamen numero augetur; pugnantisque—quod nisi in vetere exercitu et duci veteri[2] haud facile est—inter tumultum ac terrorem instruxisset Hannibal, ni cohortium ac manipulorum decurrentium[3] per colles clamor ab tergo auditus metum ne intercluderentur a castris iniecisset. Inde pavor incussus et fuga passim fieri coepta est. Minorque caedes fuit, quia propinquitas castrorum breviorem fugam perculsis fecit. Equites enim tergo inhaerebant: in transversa latera invaserant cohortes secundis collibus via nuda ac facili decurrentes. Tamen supra octo milia hominum occisa, supra septingentos[4] capti; signa militaria novem adempta; elephanti etiam, quorum nullus usus in repentina ac tumultuaria pugna fuerat, quattuor occisi, duo capti. Circa quingentos Romanorum sociorumque victores ceciderunt.

U.C. 547

Postero die Poenus quievit; Romanus in aciem copiis eductis,[5] postquam neminem signa contra efferre vidit, spolia legi caesorum hostium et suorum

[1] equestris A^1N^sJK Froben 2: eques $P(3)R^1$: equites RC^1 Aldus: equester Salmasius, Madvig.

[2] duci veteri $P(1)N$ Aldus, Madvig: duce vetere A^1N^sJK Froben 2: duce veteri N^s, Conway.

[3] decurrentium $C^1A^1N^sJK$: decursū (or -um) $P(1)N$: decursu Madvig.

[4] septingentos z Eds.: -ti PK Conway, who brackets supra: some MSS. have LXX.

[5] eductis Sp^2A^sJK Froben 2: ductis $P(1)N$.

ingly, being summoned by the uproar, he rapidly B.C. 207 moved his troops up to the enemy. Already the foremost had been seized with the panic caused by the cavalry. Of the Roman infantry also the first legion and the right ala [1] were coming into battle. In disorder the enemy engaged, just as chance brought a man face to face with either a foot-soldier or a horseman. The battle was enlarged by the reserves and increased by the numbers of men rushing into the fray. And while his men were actually fighting, in spite of the uproar and the panic, Hannibal would have drawn them up—a thing not easy except in a veteran army and for a veteran commander—if from the rear the sound of the shouting cohorts and maniples, as they dashed down the hillsides, had not inspired the fear of being cut off from the camp. Thereupon they were panic-stricken and flight began on all sides. And the slaughter was less only because the nearness of the camp shortened flight for the routed. For the cavalry clung close to their rear; on the flank the cohorts, charging down the slope of the hills by an open, easy road, had attacked them. However, more than eight thousand men were slain, more than seven hundred captured; nine military standards were taken. Of the elephants also, of which no use had been made in a battle sudden and disorderly, four were slain, two captured. About five hundred Romans and allies fell although victorious.

On the next day the Carthaginian remained inactive. The Roman led his forces out into line, and on seeing that no standards were coming out against him, ordered the spoils of the fallen enemies to be gathered and the bodies of his own men to be

[1] Cf. i. 7 and note.

A.U.C. 547

9 corpora conlata in unum sepeliri iussit. Inde insequentibus continuis [1] diebus aliquot ita institit portis
10 ut prope inferre signa videretur, donec Hannibal tertia vigilia crebris ignibus tabernaculisque, quae pars castrorum ad hostes vergebat, et Numidis paucis qui in vallo portisque se ostenderent relictis, profec-
11 tus Apuliam petere intendit. Ubi inluxit, successit vallo Romana acies, et Numidae ex composito paulisper in portis se valloque ostentavere, frustratique aliquamdiu hostes citatis equis agmen suorum adse-
12 quuntur. Consul ubi silentium in castris et ne paucos quidem qui prima luce obambulaverant parte ulla cernebat, duobus equitibus speculatum in castra praemissis, postquam satis tuta omnia esse exploratum
13 est, inferri signa iussit; tantumque ibi moratus, dum milites ad praedam discurrunt, receptui deinde
14 cecinit multoque ante noctem copias reduxit. Postero die prima luce [2] profectus, magnis itineribus famam et vestigia agminis sequens haud procul
15 Venusia hostem adsequitur. Ibi quoque tumultuaria pugna fuit; supra duo milia Poenorum caesa. Inde nocturnis montanisque itineribus Poenus, ne locum 16 pugnandi daret, Metapontum petiit. Hanno inde—is enim praesidio eius loci praefuerat—in Bruttios cum paucis ad exercitum novum comparandum missus; Hannibal copiis eius ad suas additis Venusiam retro quibus venerat itineribus repetit,[3] atque

[1] continuis $P(1)N$ (after diebus JK): Conway would bracket.
[2] prima luce $P(1)N$: luce prima JK.
[3] repetit JK Aldus, Froben: repetiit $P(1)N$.

---

[1] His only object apparently was to reinforce his army.

brought together and buried. Then for several B.C. 207 days in succession he came up so close to the gates that he almost seemed to be advancing into the camp, until at the third watch Hannibal set out, leaving numerous fires and tents in that part of the camp which faced the enemy, also a few Numidians to show themselves on the earthwork and at the gates; and he pushed on toward Apulia. When day dawned, the Roman line came up to the earthwork, and the Numidians showed themselves a while, as arranged, at the gates and on the wall. And after deceiving the enemy for some time, riding at full speed they overtook their own column. The consul, perceiving the stillness in the camp and not seeing anywhere even the few men who at daybreak had been strolling about, sent two horsemen in advance into the camp to reconnoitre. Then, once it had been ascertained that everything was quite safe, he ordered an advance into the camp. And after lingering there only long enough for the soldiers to scatter for plunder, he then sounded the recall, and long before nightfall led his troops back. Setting out at dawn on the next day, in forced marches he followed reports of the enemy's column and its tracks and overtook them not far from Venusia. There also there was a disorderly battle; over two thousand Carthaginians were slain. Then, marching by night and in the mountains, to give no opportunity for battle, the Carthaginian made for Metapontum.[1] Thereupon Hanno, who had commanded the garrison of that place, was sent with a few men into the land of the Bruttii to muster a fresh army. Hannibal added Hanno's troops to his own, returned to Venusia by the same route by which he

A.U.C. 547 17 inde Canusium procedit. Numquam Nero vestigiis hostis abstiterat et Q. Fulvium, cum Metapontum ipse proficisceretur, in Lucanos, ne regio ea sine praesidio esset, arcessierat.

XLIII. Inter haec ab Hasdrubale, postquam a Placentiae obsidione abscessit, quattuor Galli equites, duo Numidae cum litteris missi ad Hannibalem, cum per medios hostes totam ferme longitudinem Italiae 2 emensi essent, dum Metapontum cedentem Hannibalem sequuntur, incertis itineribus Tarentum delati, a vagis per agros pabulatoribus Romanis ad Q. Clau- 3 dium propraetorem deducuntur. Eum primo incertis inplicantes responsis, ut metus tormentorum admotus fateri vera coegit, edocuerunt litteras se ab Hasdru- 4 bale ad Hannibalem ferre. Cum iis litteris, sicut erant, signatis L. Verginio tribuno militum ducendi 5 ad Claudium consulem traduntur; duae simul turmae Samnitium praesidii causa missae. Qui ubi ad consulem pervenerunt, litteraeque lectae per interpretem sunt, et ex captivis percunctatio facta, 6 tum Claudius non id tempus esse rei publicae ratus quo consiliis ordinariis provinciae suae quisque finibus per exercitus suos cum hoste destinato ab senatu 7 bellum gereret—audendum ac novandum [1] aliquid inprovisum, inopinatum, quod coeptum non minorem apud cives quam hostes terrorem faceret, perpetra-

[1] ac novandum $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Froben : om. $P(1)N$.

---

[1] Later evidently to the camp near Canusium to face Hannibal, though Livy does not mention it; cf. p. 384, n. 1.

[2] I.e. Gaius Claudius Nero.

[3] For the present emergency, however, traditional methods had been set aside and the senate had given the consuls carte blanche; xxxviii. 9.

had come, and proceeded thence to Canusium. Nero B.C. 207 had never left the enemy's heels and, when setting out himself for Metapontum, he had summoned Quintus Fulvius into Lucania,[1] in order that that region should not be without troops.

XLIII. Meanwhile Hasdrubal, after abandoning the siege of Placentia, sent four Gallic horsemen and two Numidians with a letter to Hannibal. When they had already traversed nearly the whole length of Italy through the midst of the enemy, in following Hannibal as he withdrew to Metapontum they came by roads of which they were uncertain to Tarentum and were brought by Roman foragers who roamed about the country to Quintus Claudius, the propraetor. At first they tried to confuse him by vague answers, but when the fear of torture was brought to bear and compelled them to admit the truth, they informed him that they were carrying a letter from Hasdrubal to Hannibal. Together with the letter, still sealed as it was, they were turned over to Lucius Verginius, tribune of the soldiers, to be conducted to Claudius, the consul.[2] At the same time two troops of Samnites were sent as an escort. When they had reached the consul, and the letter had been read by an interpreter and the captives questioned, Claudius thereupon judged that the situation of the state was not such that they should carry on the war by routine methods, each consul within the bounds of his own province, operating with his own armies against an enemy prescribed by the senate.[3] Rather must he venture to improvise something unforeseen, unexpected, something which in the beginning would cause no less alarm among citizens than among enemies, but if accomplished would convert tum in magnam laetitiam ex magno metu verteret—

A.U.C. 517

8 litteris Hasdrubalis Romam ad senatum missis simul et ipse patres conscriptos, quid pararet,[1] edocet: ut,[2] cum in Umbria se occursurum Hasdrubal fratri scribat, 9 legionem a Capua Romam arcessant, dilectum Romae habeant, exercitum urbanum ad Narniam hosti
10 opponant. Haec senatu[3] scripta. Praemissi item per agrum Larinatem Marrucinum Frentanum Praetutianum, qua exercitum ducturus erat, ut omnes ex agris urbibusque commeatus paratos militi ad vescendum in viam deferrent, equos iumentaque alia
11 producerent, ut vehiculorum fessis copia esset. Ipse de toto exercitu civium sociorumque quod roboris erat delegit, sex milia peditum, mille equites; pronuntiat occupare se in Lucanis proximam urbem Punicumque in ea praesidium velle; ut ad iter parati 12 omnes essent. Profectus nocte flexit in Picenum.

Et consul quidem quantis maximis itineribus poterat ad conlegam ducebat, relicto Q. Catio legato qui castris praeesset. XLIV. Romae haud minus terroris ac tumultus erat quam fuerat quadriennio[4]

[1] pararet P(1)N Aldus: paret SpJK Froben 2.
[2] ut P(1)N Aldus, Froben: monet ut A^sN^sJK Conway: et ut Duker, Madvig.
[3] senatu PCR^z: -tui $P^3(3)C^1NJK$.
[4] quadriennio Glareanus, Conway: biennio P(1)NJK Eds.

---

[1] Meaning that part of Umbria which lies east of the Apennines along the Adriatic between the Rubico and the Aesis rivers, i.e. the Ager Gallicus. He expected Hannibal to follow the coast until they met.

great fear into great rejoicing. Sending Has- B.C. 207 drubal's letter to the senate at Rome, he likewise informed the conscript fathers what he was himself intending to do. In view of Hasdrubal's writing to his brother that he would meet him in Umbria,[1] the consul advised the senate to summon a legion from Capua to Rome, to conduct a levy at Rome, to confront the enemy at Narnia[2] with the city troops. In such terms he wrote to the senate. He sent also messengers in advance through the regions of Larinum, of the Marrucini, the Frentani, the Praetutii, along the line of his proposed march, that they should all carry from the farms and the cities provisions, ready for the soldiers to eat, down to the road, and should bring out horses and mules as well, that the weary might have no lack of vehicles. As for himself, out of the whole army he chose the best soldiers, citizens and allies, six thousand infantry, a thousand cavalry. He announced that he intended to seize the nearest city in Lucania and its Carthaginian garrison: that they must all be ready for the march. Setting out at night, he changed his direction to that of Picenum.[3]

While the consul by marches forced to the limit was leading his army towards his colleague, having left Quintus Catius, his lieutenant, to command the camp, (XLIV.) at Rome there was no less panic and confusion than there had been four years before,[4] when

[2] Here were two legions, from which no doubt various detachments had been sent up the Via Flaminia, even as far as the pass, we must presume (cf. p. 407, n. 1), about 25 miles from the Adriatic.

[3] The distance to be traversed (Canusium to Sena Gallica) was nearly 250 miles.

[4] Cf. XXVI. ix. 6 ff., x.

A.U.C. 547

ante, cum castra Punica obiecta Romanis moenibus portisque fuerant. Neque satis constabat animis tam audax iter consulis laudarent vituperarentne; apparebat, quo nihil iniquius est, ex eventu famam 2 habiturum: castra prope Hannibalem hostem relicta sine duce, cum exercitu cui detractum foret omne quod roboris, quod floris fuerit; et consulem in Lucanos ostendisse iter, cum Picenum et Galliam 3 peteret, castra relinquentem nulla alia re tutiora quam errore hostis, qui ducem inde atque exercitus 4 partem abesse [1] ignoraret. Quid futurum, si id palam fiat, et aut insequi Neronem cum sex milibus armatorum profectum Hannibal toto exercitu velit aut castra invadere praedae relicta, sine viribus, sine 5 imperio, sine auspicio? Veteres eius belli clades, duo consules proximo anno interfecti terrebant; et ea omnia accidisse, cum unus imperator, unus exercitus hostium in Italia esset; nunc duo bella Punica facta, duos ingentes exercitus, duos prope 6 Hannibales in Italia esse. Quippe et Hasdrubalem patre eodem Hamilcare genitum, aeque inpigrum ducem, per tot annos in Hispania Romano exercitatum bello, gemina victoria insignem, duobus exercitibus cum clarissimis ducibus deletis. Nam itineris 7 quidem celeritate ex Hispania et concitatis ad arma Gallicis gentibus multo magis quam Hannibalem

[1] abesse $P^{2}(3)M^{1?}N$ Aldus: abisse $Sp^{?}N^{s}JK$ Froben 2: abesset PRM.

---

[1] As a matter of fact the Roman forces left behind near Canusium probably numbered 30,000, including the legions commanded by one of the most capable generals, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, a proconsul. And as a reserve there were two more legions near Tarentum.

a Carthaginian camp had been pitched before the B.C. 207 Roman walls and gates. Nor was it quite clear to men's minds whether they should praise or blame so bold a march on the part of the consul. It was plain that it would be praised or blamed according to the outcome, than which nothing is more unjust. They said that the camp had been left near an enemy who was Hannibal, without a general, with an army from which had been detached all its strength, all its flower. And the consul had indicated a march into Lucania, whereas he was heading for Picenum and Gaul, leaving a camp that was defended by nothing else than the deception of the enemy, who was unaware that the general and a part of his army were not there. What was to happen, if that became known and Hannibal should wish either with his whole army to pursue Nero, who had set out with only six thousand armed men, or else to attack the camp, abandoned to plunder, without proper forces, without its high command, without the auspices?[1] The earlier disasters in that war, the death of two consuls in the preceding year, were still terrifying. And they said that all those misfortunes had befallen them when the enemy had but a single general, a single army, in Italy. At present it had become two Punic wars, two mighty armies, two Hannibals, so to speak, in Italy. For Hasdrubal also was a son of the same father, Hamilcar, and an equally strenuous commander, trained for so many years in Spain by a war with Romans, famous too for a double victory, the destruction of two armies and generals of great distinction. Certainly of the swiftness of his march from Spain, and of having aroused the Gallic tribes to war he could boast far more than Hannibal him-

A.U.C. 547

8 ipsum gloriari posse; quippe in iis locis hunc coegisse exercitum quibus ille maiorem partem militum fame ac frigore, quae miserrima mortis genera sint,
9 amisisset. Adiciebant etiam periti rerum Hispaniae haud cum ignoto eum [1] duce C. Nerone congressurum, sed quem in saltu impedito deprensus forte haud secus quam pueruni conscribendis fallacibus condi-
10 cionibus pacis frustratus elusisset. Omnia maiora etiam vero praesidia hostium, minora sua, metu interprete semper in deteriora inclinato, ducebant.

XLV. Nero postquam iam [2] tantum intervalli ab hoste fecerat, ut detegi consilium satis tutum esset,
2 paucis milites alloquitur. Negat ullius consilium imperatoris in speciem audacius, re ipsa tutius fuisse quam suum: ad certam eos se victoriam ducere;
3 quippe ad quod bellum collega non ante quam ad satietatem ipsius peditum atque equitum datae ab senatu copiae fuissent, maiores instructioresque quam si adversus ipsum Hannibalem iret, profectus sit, eo ipsi si [3] quantumcumque virium momentum addiderint,
4 rem omnem inclinaturos. Auditum modo in acie—nam ne ante audiatur daturum operam—alterum consulem et alterum exercitum advenisse haud
5 dubiam victoriam facturum. Famam bellum conficere, et parva momenta in spem metumque impellere animos; gloriae quidem ex re bene gesta partae

[1] eum Crévier: cum PCR: eo N^{1}?JK: om. C^{2}MBDAN Aldus, Froben, Johnson.

[2] iam $A^{1}N^{1}JK$ Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)A^{2}N$.

[3] eo ipsi si Madvig: eos ipsos ANJK Conway: eo ipsos $P(3)N^{1}$ Aldus, Froben.

[1] Cf. XXVI. xvii. 5 ff.

self. For he had gathered an army in the very region in which Hannibal had lost the larger part of his forces by hunger and cold, the most pitiable forms of death. Furthermore, men acquainted with events in Spain repeatedly added that he would encounter in Gaius Nero no unknown general, but one whom he, when himself surprised, as it happened, in a difficult pass, had baulked and baffled like a child by the pretence of drawing up terms of peace.[1] They reckoned all the enemy's forces even larger, their own less, than they were, since fear is an interpreter always inclined to the worse side. B.C. 207

XLV. Nero, now that he had already made his distance from the enemy such that it was quite safe to reveal his plan, briefly addressed his soldiers. He said that no plan of any general had been in appearance more reckless, but in fact safer, than his. He was leading them to certain victory. For inasmuch as his colleague had set out for the war only when infantry and cavalry forces had been furnished by the senate to his own satisfaction—larger forces and better equipped than if he were marching even against Hannibal—if they should themselves with their troops add ever so small a makeweight, they would change the whole situation. The mere report along the battle-line—for he would see to it that they did not hear sooner—that a second consul and a second army had arrived would put their victory beyond a doubt. Hearsay,[2] he said, decides a war and slight influences move men in the direction of hope and fear. Of the glory at least to be derived from success they

[2] I.e. reports, even unfounded, crystallized into prevailing impressions or popular opinion, and so determining morale. So e.g. Seneca Epist. xiii. 8; cf. XXXIV. xii. 4.

A.U.C. 547

6 fructum prope omnem ipsos laturos; semper quod postremum adiectum sit, id rem totam videri traxisse. Cernere ipsos quo concursu, qua admiratione, quo favore hominum iter suum celebretur.

7 Et hercule per instructa omnia ordinibus virorum mulierumque undique ex agris effusorum, inter vota ac[1] preces et laudes ibant. Illos praesidia rei publicae, vindices urbis Romanae imperiique appellabant: in illorum armis dextrisque suam liberorumque 8 suorum salutem ac libertatem repositam esse. Deos omnes deasque precabantur ut illis faustum iter, felix pugna, matura ex hostibus victoria esset, damnarenturque ipsi votorum quae pro iis suscepissent, ut, 9 quem ad modum nunc solliciti prosequerentur eos, ita paucos post dies laeti ovantibus victoria obviam irent. 10 Invitare inde pro se quisque et offerre et fatigare precibus ut quae ipsis iumentisque usui essent ab se potissimum sumerent; benigne omnia cumulata 11 dare. Modestia certare milites, ne quid ultra usum necessarium sumerent; nihil morari, nec abire[2] ab signis nec[3] subsistere[4] nisi[5] cibum capientes; diem ac noctem ire; vix quod satis ad naturale desiderium 12 corporum esset, quieti dare. Et ad collegam praemissi erant qui nuntiarent adventum percunctarenturque clam an palam, interdiu an noctu venire sese

[1] ac Sp?JK Froben 2: et P(1)N Aldus, Madvig.

[2] abire Weissenborn: discedere (or abs-) Madvig: om. MSS., Conway.

[3] nec P(1)N: om. N²JK Froben, Conway.

[4] subsistere P(1)NJK Aldus: absistere Froben 2, Gronovius, Conway.

[5] nisi Madvig: om. MSS., Conway.

---

[1] The scene recalls one more briefly pictured in XXVI. ix. 5.

would themselves reap almost the whole benefit. B.C. 207
Always what was the last to be added is felt to have brought with it the whole issue. They themselves could see by what throngs of people, by what admiration, by what approval, their march was acclaimed.

And in fact they were marching everywhere between lines of men and women who had poured out from the farms on every side, and amidst their vows and prayers and words of praise. Defenders of the state men called them, champions of the city of Rome and of the empire. In their weapons and their right hands, they said, were placed their own safety and freedom, and those of their children. They kept imploring all the gods and goddesses that the soldiers might have a successful march, a favourable battle, a prompt victory over the enemy, and that they might themselves be obliged to pay the vows they had made on their behalf; that, just as they were now anxiously escorting them, so after a few days they might with rejoicing go to meet them in the exultation of victory. Then they vied with each other in invitations and offers and in importuning them to take from them in preference to others whatever would serve the men themselves and their beasts; they heaped everything upon them generously.[1] The soldiers competed in self-restraint, not to take more than they needed. There was no loitering, no straggling, no halt except while taking food; they marched day and night; they gave to rest hardly enough time for the needs of their bodies. And men had been sent in advance by Nero to his colleague, to announce their coming and to inquire whether he wished them to come secretly or openly, u.c. 547 vellet, isdem an aliis considere castris. Nocte clam ingredi melius [1] visum est.

XLVI. Tessera per castra ab Livio consule data erat ut tribunus tribunum, centurio centurionem, 2 eques equitem, pedes peditem acciperet: neque enim dilatari castra opus esse, ne hostis adventum alterius consulis sentiret; et coartatio plurium in angusto tendentium facilior futura erat, quod Claudianus exercitus nihil ferme [2] praeter arma secum 3 in expeditionem tulerat. Ceterum in ipso itinere auctum voluntariis agmen erat, offerentibus ultro sese et veteribus militibus perfunctis iam militia et iuvenibus, quos certatim nomina dantes, si quorum corporis species roburque virium aptum militiae 4 videbatur, conscripserat. Ad Senam castra alterius consulis erant, et quingentos ferme inde [3] passus Hasdrubal aberat. Itaque cum iam adpropinquaret, tectus montibus substitit Nero, ne ante noctem castra 5 ingrederetur. Silentio ingressi, ab sui quisque ordinis hominibus in tentoria abducti cum summa omnium laetitia hospitaliter excipiuntur. Postero

[1] melius P(1)NJK Aldus: om. Spx Froben 2, Conway.
[2] ferme SpN²JK Froben 2: fere PCA[1] Aldus: ferre RMBDAN.
[3] inde P(1)N (before ferme Sp²JK Aldus, Froben): om. Conway.

---

[1] I.e. by Livius.
[2] With the countersign (on a wooden tablet) were sent out orders for the night; VII. xxxv. 1; IX. xxxii. 4. Cf. Polybius VI. xxxiv. 7 ff.
[3] Livius' army was very much larger than Nero's 7,000 plus the volunteers who had joined them on the march.

by day or by night, to establish themselves in the same B.C. 207 camp or in another. It was thought best[1] that they should enter by night in secret.

XLVI. Orders[2] had been sent by Livius, the consul, throughout the camp that tribune should receive tribune, centurion centurion, horseman horseman, foot-soldier foot-soldier;[3] for to enlarge the camp was not to the purpose, he said, lest the enemy should know of the arrival of the other consul. And to crowd in larger numbers of men in cramped quarters was to prove easier, because Claudius' army had brought with it on its expedition hardly anything besides its arms. But in the very course of the march the column had been enlarged by volunteers: for not only did old soldiers who had already completed their service offer themselves of their own motion, but also young men who had vied with each other in giving in their names and whom Claudius had enrolled whenever their physical appearance and solid strength seemed suitable for military service. The other consul's camp was near Sena,[4] and about five hundred paces away was Hasdrubal. Accordingly, as he was now approaching, Nero came to a halt under cover of the hills, in order not to enter the camp before night. Silently they entered, each man being led to his tent by one of the same rank, and they were hospitably welcomed with great [4] Modern Senigallia (or Sinigaglia), directly on the sea, but with no harbour. 15 miles beyond (north-west) was the mouth of the river Metaurus, and at Fanum, less than two miles farther on, the Via Flaminia, coming from Ariminum, turned inland up the valley of the river and went on its way over the Apennines. No sufficient reason has been given for disputing Livy's statement that the camps were near Sena, as do some of the critics.

A.U.C. 547

die consilium habitum, cui et L. Porcius Licinus 6 praetor adfuit. Castra iuncta consulum castris habebat, et ante adventum eorum per loca alta ducendo exercitum, cum modo insideret angustos saltus, ut transitum clauderet, modo ab latere aut ab tergo carperet agmen, ludificatus hostem omnibus
7 artibus belli fuerat; is tum in consilio aderat. Multorum eo inclinant [1] sententiae ut, dum fessum via ac vigiliis reficeret militem Nero, simul et ad noscendum hostem paucos sibi sumeret dies, tempus pugnae [2]
8 differretur. Nero non suadere modo, sed summa ope orare institit ne consilium suum, quod tutum celeritas
9 fecisset, temerarium morando facerent; errore, qui non diuturnus futurus esset, velut torpentem Hannibalem nec castra sua sine duce relicta adgredi nec ad sequendum se iter intendisse. Antequam se moveat, deleri exercitum Hasdrubalis posse redirique [3] 10 in Apuliam. Qui prolatando spatium hosti det, eum et illa castra prodere Hannibali et aperire in Galliam iter, ut per otium ubi velit Hasdrubali coniungatur.
11 Extemplo signum dandum et exeundum in aciem abutendumque errore hostium absentium praesentiumque, dum neque illi sciant cum paucioribus nec
12 hi cum pluribus et validioribus rem esse. Consilio

[1] inclinant P(1)NJK Conway: -abant x Aldus, Froben, Eds.

[2] pugnae P(1)N Aldus, Eds.: pugnandi Sp?N²JK Conway.

[3] -que, before this P(1)N om. two lines (exercitum . . . rediri) found (with redireque) in A¹N¹JK; corrected by Gronovius.

---

[1] But he had been unable appreciably to retard Hasdrubal's southward march.

general rejoicing. On the next day a council of war B.C. 207 was held, at which Lucius Porcius Licinus, the praetor, was present. His camp adjoined that of the consuls, and before their arrival he had baffled the enemy by all the arts of war, leading his army on high ground, while at one time he would occupy a narrow pass, to block their way, at another would make sudden attacks upon the column from the flank or the rear.[1] And now he was present at the council. The opinions of many inclined in the direction of postponing the time for battle, until Nero should refresh his troops, worn by the march and lack of sleep, and at the same time should take a few days to acquaint himself with the enemy. But Nero began not merely to urge, but by all means also to implore them not to make his plan, which rapid movement had made safe, a reckless plan by delaying. It was by a deception which would not last long, he said, that Hannibal, as though dazed, was not attacking his camp, left without its commander, and had not set his army in motion to pursue him; that before Hannibal should bestir himself, they could destroy Hasdrubal's army and return to Apulia. Whoever by delaying gave the enemy time, was betraying the distant camp to Hannibal, at the same time opening the way into Gaul, so that unmolested he might join Hasdrubal whenever he pleased. At once, he said, the signal must be given and they must go out into battle-line and take advantage of the deception of their enemies, both the distant and those near at hand, while the one army was unaware that it had to do with smaller numbers, and the other that it had to deal with larger and stronger forces. Dismissing the council they raised dimisso signum pugnae proponitur, confestimque in aciem procedunt.

A.U.C. 547

XLVII. Iam hostes ante castra instructi stabant. Moram pugnae attulit quod Hasdrubal, provectus ante signa cum paucis equitibus, scuta vetera hostium notavit, quae ante non viderat, et strigosiores equos; 2 multitudo quoque maior solita visa est. Suspicatus enim id quod erat, receptui propere cecinit ac misit ad flumen unde aquabantur, ubi et excipi aliqui possent et notari oculis, si qui forte adustioris coloris 3 ut ex recenti via essent; simul circumvehi procul castra iubet specularique num auctum aliqua parte sit vallum, et ut attendant semel bisne signum canat 4 in castris. Ea cum ordine omnia relata[1] essent, castra nihil aucta errorem faciebant; bina erant, sicut ante adventum consulis alterius fuerant, una M. Livi, altera L. Porci; neutris quicquam quo 5 latius tenderetur ad munimenta adiectum. Illud veterem ducem adsuetumque Romano hosti movit quod semel in praetoriis castris signum, bis in consularibus referebant cecinisse. Duos profecto consules esse,[2] et quonam modo alter ab Hannibale 6 abscessisset cura angebat. Minime id quod erat suspicari poterat, tantae rei frustratione Hannibalem elusum, ut ubi dux, ubi exercitus esset cum quo

[1] omnia relata A[1]J Aldus, Froben: relata omnia N[1]K Conway: P(1)N om. relata.

[2] Duos profecto consules esse A[1]N[2]JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N, one line.

---

[1] Cf. Zonaras IX. ix. 8. At supper-time the trumpets regularly sounded outside the general's tent as a signal to post the guards for the night; so Polybius XIV. iii. 6.

the signal for battle and forthwith went out into B.C. 207 battle-line.

XLVII. Already the enemy were standing in line before the camp. Delay in beginning the battle was due to Hasdrubal, in that, riding out in front of the standards with a few horsemen, he observed among the enemy old shields which he had not seen before and very lean horses; and he thought the numbers also larger than was usual. For, suspecting what had happened, he promptly sounded the recall and sent men to the river from which the Romans were drawing water, that some Romans might be captured there and scanned to see whether any chanced to be more sunburned, as though from a recent march. At the same time he ordered men to ride round the camps at a distance, and to notice whether the earthworks had been somewhere enlarged, and to mark whether the trumpet sounded once in the camp or twice.[1] All this having been duly reported, the fact that the camps had not been enlarged deceived him. There were two of them, as there had been before the coming of the second consul, one that of Marcus Livius, the other that of Lucius Porcius. In neither case had anything been added to the fortifications to give ampler space for the tents. The one thing that impressed an experienced general and one accustomed to a Roman enemy was their report that the trumpet had sounded once in the praetor's camp, twice in the consul's. There surely were two consuls, he thought, and sadly concerned he was how the one had got away from Hannibal. Least of all could he suspect the fact—that Hannibal had been baffled and baulked to such an extent that he did not know where the

A.U.C. 547

7 castra conlata[1] habuerit[2] ignoraret; profecto haud mediocri clade absterritum insequi non ausum; magno opere vereri ne perditis rebus serum ipse auxilium venisset Romanisque eadem iam fortuna in 8 Italia quae in Hispania esset. Interdum litteras suas ad eum non pervenisse credere, interceptisque iis consulem ad sese opprimendum adcelerasse. His anxius curis, exstinctis ignibus, vigilia prima dato signo ut taciti vasa colligerent, signa ferri iussit.
9 In trepidatione et nocturno tumultu duces parum intente adservati, alter in destinatis iam ante animo latebris subsedit, alter per vada nota Metaurum flumen tranavit. Ita desertum ab ducibus agmen primo per agros palatur, fessique aliquot somno ac vigiliis sternunt corpora passim atque infrequentia 10 relinquunt signa. Hasdrubal, dum lux viam ostenderet, ripa fluminis[3] signa ferri iubet, et per tortuosi amnis sinus flexusque cum errorem[4] volvens haud multum processisset, substitit,[5] ubi prima lux transi-

[1] conlata P(1)N Aldus, Froben: coniuncta A[s]?J Conway: iuncta K.

[2] habuerit P(1)N Aldus, Conway: haberet SpJK Froben 2, Luchs.

[3] ripa fluminis A[s]NsJK Aldus: om. P(1)N.

[4] errorem P(3)(C[2]): errore C[x]?DANSp?JK Aldus: orbem Weissenborn conj.: errore iter re- Riemann: iter errore re- M. Müller.

[5] substitit Sartorius, Madvig: om. MSS., Weissenborn, Conway.

---

[1] The right (south) bank must be meant. Had Hasdrubal been on the left bank the treachery of his guides would have been of no consequence. For he would simply have followed the Flaminian Way. Livy represents them as vainly seeking for a road; therefore they were on the south side of the Metaurus. Polybius' narrative at this point has not been preserved. It resumes with the battle formation (XI. i. 2).

general, where the army was with which his camp B.C. 207 was formerly in contact. Surely he had been deterred by no common disaster, and had not dared to pursue. Hasdrubal greatly feared that after all was lost he had himself come too late to assist, and that the Romans would have the same good fortune in Italy as in Spain. At times he believed his own letter had not reached Hannibal, and that the consul, upon intercepting it, had made haste, in order to overpower him. Troubled by these anxieties, he had the fires put out and orders given at the first watch that they should pack up their baggage in silence, and then he commanded the standards to advance. In the excitement and confusion of the night the guides were not closely watched, and one of them settled himself in a hiding-place he had previously determined upon, while the other swam across the river Metaurus, using a shallow place known to him. So the column, deserted by its guides, wandered at first about the country, and a considerable number, overcome by drowsiness and lack of sleep, threw themselves down anywhere and left few men with the standards. Hasdrubal ordered the standard-bearers to move along the bank of the river,[1] until daylight should disclose a road. And having made little progress, while describing blind circles along the bends and curves of the twisting stream he halted, intending to cross the river as

Cf. Frontinus I. i. 9; Zonaras IX. ix. 7–12; Appian Hann. 52; Valerius Max. VII. iv. 4; Kromayer and Veith, Antike Schlachtfelder III. 1. esp. 456 ff. and maps; De Sanctis, Storia dei Romani III. 2. 491 ff. and 562 ff., but he places the battle on the left bank and the camps at the mouth of the river, instead of near Sena. The left bank is preferred by the Cambridge Ancient History also (VIII. 94 f.).

U.C. 647 11 tum opportunum ostendisset, transiturus.[1] Sed cum quantum a mari abscedebat, tanto altioribus coercentibus amnem ripis non inveniret vada, diem terendo spatium dedit ad insequendum sese hosti.

XLVIII. Nero primum cum omni equitatu advenit, Porcius deinde adsecutus cum levi armatura. 2 Qui cum fessum agmen carperent ab omni parte incursarentque, et iam omisso itinere quod fugae simile erat, castra metari Poenus in tumulo super 3 fluminis ripam vellet, advenit Livius peditum omnibus copiis non itineris modo, sed ad conserendum 4 extemplo proelium instructis armatisque. Sed ubi omnes copias coniunxerunt directaque[2] acies est, Claudius dextro in cornu, Livius ab sinistro pugnam 5 instruit; media acies praetori tuenda data. Hasdrubal omissa munitione castrorum postquam pugnandum vidit, in prima acie ante signa elephantos locat[3]; circa eos laevo in cornu adversus Claudium Gallos opponit, haud tantum iis fidens quantum ab hoste 6 timeri eos credebat; ipse dextrum cornu adversus M. Livium sibi atque Hispanis—et ibi maxime in 7 vetere milite spem habebat—sumpsit; Ligures in medio post elephantos positi. Sed longior quam latior acies erat; Gallos prominens collis tegebat. 8 Ea frons quam Hispani tenebant cum sinistro Romanorum cornu concurrit: dextra omnis acies

[1] transiturus, Sp?A[s]N[s]JKz Conway, M. Müller add erat (om. by P(1)N Madvig).

[2] directaque R[2]MBDAJK Madvig, Conway: derectaque PCRN.

[3] locat SpJK Froben 2, Luchs: conlocat P(1)N Aldus.

---

[1] So Polybius XI. i. 5, who makes no mention of Porcius.

[2] 10 in number and in the centre, Polybius § 3; 15 according to Appian Hann. 52.

soon as daylight should show a favourable crossing. B.C. 207
But inasmuch as the farther he marched away from the sea the higher were the banks that confined the stream, and hence he could not find a ford, by wasting the day he gave the enemy time to overtake him.

XLVIII. First Nero with all the cavalry arrived, then Porcius with the light-armed caught up with them. And while they made skirmishing attacks from every side and charged the weary column, and the Carthaginian, now abandoning a march which resembled a flight, was aiming to lay out a camp on the hill above the bank of the river, came Livius with all the infantry forces, not in marching order, but formed and armed to begin the battle at once. But after they had combined all their troops and the line had been drawn up, Claudius on the right wing,[1] Livius on the left, prepared for battle, while the command of the centre was assigned to the praetor. Hasdrubal, on seeing that he must fight, ceased fortifying his camp and placed his elephants in the front line before the standards. Flanking the elephants,[2] on the left wing he placed the Gauls facing Claudius—not so much that he trusted them, as that he believed the enemy was afraid of them. The right wing facing Marcus Livius he took for himself and his Spanish troops, and above all he rested his hopes on these veteran soldiers.[3] The Ligurians were placed in the centre behind the elephants. But the battle-line was deep rather than widely extended. A projecting hill shielded the Gauls. That part of the front which the Spaniards held clashed with the left wing of the Romans, whose [3] Polybius puts Hasdrubal in the centre, but makes him attack the Roman left wing; §§ 3–5.

B.C. 207 extra proelium eminens cessabat; collis oppositus arcebat ne aut a fronte aut ab latere adgrederentur.
9 Inter Livium Hasdrubalemque ingens contractum certamen erat, atroxque caedes utrimque edebatur.
10 Ibi duces ambo, ibi pars maior peditum equitumque Romanorum, ibi Hispani, vetus miles peritusque Romanae pugnae, et Ligures, durum in armis genus. Eodem versi elephanti, qui primo impetu turbaverant
11 antesignanos et iam signa moverant loco; deinde crescente certamine et clamore inpotentius iam regi et inter duas acies versari, velut incerti quorum essent, haud dissimiliter navibus sine gubernaculo
12 vagis. Claudius "Quid ergo praecipiti cursu tam longum iter emensi sumus?" clamitans militibus, cum in adversum collem frustra signa erigere conatus
13 esset, postquam ea regione penetrari ad hostem non videbat posse, cohortes aliquot subductas e dextro cornu, ubi stationem magis segnem quam pugnam
14 futuram cernebat, post aciem circumducit et non hostibus modo sed etiam suis inopinantibus in dextrum [1] hostium latus incurrit: tantaque celeritas fuit ut, cum ostendissent se ab latere, mox in terga
15 iam pugnarent. Ita ex omnibus partibus, ab fronte, ab latere, ab tergo, trucidantur Hispani Liguresque,

[1] dextrum Glareanus, Eds.: sistrum PRM: sinistrum P1NJK Aldus, Froben, Conway (who assumes omission of a line, evectus in dextrum, following this).

---

[1] Since Livius outranks Nero, he is here thought of as commander-in-chief.

[2] I.e. hastati and principes, after which came the standards.

whole right wing extended beyond the fighting and had nothing to do. The hill facing them prevented them from attacking either in front or on the flank. B.C. 207

Between Livius and Hasdrubal a mighty battle had begun, and a savage slaughter on both sides was in progress. There both generals[1] were engaged, there the greater part of the Roman infantry and cavalry, there the Spanish troops, the old soldiers, acquainted also with the Roman mode of fighting, and the Ligurians, a hardy race of warriors. To the same place came the elephants, which had thrown the front lines[2] into confusion by their first charge and had by this time forced the standards back. Then as the conflict and the shouting increased, they were no longer under control and roamed about between the two battle-lines,[3] as though uncertain to whom they belonged, not unlike ships drifting without their steering-oars. Claudius shouted to his soldiers, "Why then have we covered so long a march at headlong speed?" and endeavoured without success to lead his line up the hill. Thereupon, after discovering that they could not get to the enemy in that direction, he drew off a number of cohorts from the right wing, where he saw that they would be standing idly by instead of fighting. He led them round behind the battle-line,[4] and to the surprise not only of the enemy, but also of his own troops, charged into the enemy's right flank. And such was his speed that, soon after showing themselves on the flank, they were already attacking the rear. Thus from all sides, front, flank, rear, the Spaniards and Ligurians

[3] Polybius stresses the confusion caused in both armies by the elephants; § 9.

[4] I.e. of the Romans; cf. Polybius §§ 7, 10 f.

A.U.C. 547

16 et ad Gallos iam caedes pervenerat. Ibi minimum certaminis fuit; nam et pars magna ab signis aberant, nocte dilapsi stratique somno passim per agros, et qui aderant, itinere ac vigiliis fessi, intolerantissima 17 laboris corpora, vix arma umeris gestabant;[1] et iam diei medium erat, sitisque et calor hiantes caedendos capiendosque adfatim praebebat.

XLIX. Elephanti plures ab ipsis rectoribus quam ab hoste interfecti. Fabrile scalprum cum malleo habebant; id, ubi saevire beluae ac ruere in suos coeperant, magister inter aures positum, ipso in articulo quo[2] iungitur capiti cervix, quanto maximo
2 poterat ictu adigebat. Ea celerrima via mortis in tantae molis belua inventa erat, ubi regendi spem vicissent,[3] primusque id Hasdrubal instituerat, dux cum saepe alias memorabilis, tum illa praecipue
3 pugna. Ille pugnantes hortando pariterque obeundo pericula sustinuit; ille fessos abnuentesque taedio et labore nunc precando nunc castigando accendit; ille fugientes revocavit omissamque pugnam aliquot
4 locis restituit; postremo, cum haud dubie fortuna hostium esset, ne superstes tanto exercitui suum nomen secuto esset, concitato equo se in cohortem

[1] gestabant $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.: gerebant SpJK Froben 2, Conway.

[2] ipso in articulo quo $P(1)$ Eds.: same om. quo N: ipsa in compage qua $N^{s}JK$ Aldus, Froben, Conway.

[3] regendi spem vicissent $Sp^{2}A^{s}N^{v}JK$ Froben 2, Johnson (with vi vicissent N^{s} Conway): regendis pervicissent $P(1)(A^{2})N$: regentis sprevissent Weissenborn (with regentis imperium M. Müller).

[1] Indians, id. XI. i. 12 (six elephants killed, four captured).

were slain, and the slaughter had now reached the B.C. 207
Gauls. At that point there was the least fighting; for a large proportion of them were not with the standards, having slipped away in the night and lying asleep scattered over the fields. And further, those who were present, being exhausted by marching and lack of sleep, lusty, but utterly lacking in endurance, could scarcely carry their arms on their shoulders. And now it was midday, and thirst and heat exposed the gasping men to unlimited slaughter or capture.

XLIX. More of the elephants were slain by their own drivers[1] than by the enemy. These used to have a carpenter's chisel and a mallet. When the beasts began to grow wild and to dash into their own men, the keeper would place the chisel between the ears, precisely at the joint which connects the neck with the head, and would drive it in with all possible force. That had been found to be the quickest means of death[2] in a brute of such size, when they got beyond the hope of control. And the first man to introduce the practice had been Hasdrubal, a general who was often notable at other times, but pre-eminently in that battle. It was he that by encouraging them and sharing the same dangers sustained his men in battle; he that fired them, now by entreating, now by upbraiding, the exhausted and those who because of weariness and over-exertion were giving up; he that recalled those who tried to flee and at not a few points revived the battle they were abandoning. Finally, when fortune unquestionably was on the enemy's side, in order not to survive so large an army that had followed his fame, he spurred his horse and [2] This discovery is not mentioned by Polybius.

A.U.C. 547

Romanam inmisit. Ibi, ut patre Hamilcare et Hannibale fratre dignum erat, pugnans cecidit.

5 Numquam eo bello una acie tantum hostium interfectum est, redditaque aequa Cannensi clades vel 6 ducis vel exercitus interitu videbatur. Quinquaginta sex [1] milia hostium occisa, capta quinque milia et quadringenti; magna praeda alia cum omnis generis, 7 tum auri etiam argentique. Civium etiam Romanorum qui capti apud hostes erant supra quattuor milia [2] capitum recepta. Id solacii fuit pro amissis eo proelio militibus. Nam haudquaquam incruenta victoria fuit: octo ferme milia Romanorum socio- 8 rumque occisa; adeoque etiam victores sanguinis caedisque ceperat satias [3] ut postero die, cum esset nuntiatum Livio consuli Gallos Cisalpinos Liguresque, qui aut proelio non adfuissent aut inter caedem effugissent, uno agmine abire sine certo duce, sine signis, sine ordine ullo aut imperio; posse,[4] si una 9 equitum ala mittatur, omnes deleri: "Quin [5] supersint" inquit [6] "aliqui nuntii et hostium cladis et nostrae virtutis."

[1] sex P(1)N Aldus, Froben, Eds.: septem A[1]JK Conway.
[2] quattuor milia A[1]JK Aldus, Froben: tria milia (in numerals PC) Madvig: corrupted into XXX or $\overline{\text{XXX}}$ in other MSS.
[3] satias Sp Froben 2 (cf. XXV. xxiii. 16): satietas P(3)NJK Aldus.
[4] posse P(1)N Aldus, Froben: after mittatur A[1]?N[1]?JK.
[5] deleri: Quin Gronovius, Eds., Conway: delerique (or qui) P(1)(A[2])N: deleri A[1]N[1]JKz Johnson.
[6] inquit A[1]N[1]JK: om. P(1)N.

---

[1] Polybius pays a high tribute to Hasdrubal as a general and as a man; XI. ii.

charged into a Roman cohort. There, in a manner worthy of his father Hamilcar and of Hannibal his brother, he fell fighting.[1] B.C. 207

Never in a single battle of that war were so many of the enemy slain, and a disaster equal to that of Cannae, whether in the loss of the general or that of an army, seemed to have been inflicted in return. Fifty-six thousand[2] of the enemy were slain, fifty-four hundred captured. Great was the rest of the booty, both of every kind and of gold and silver as well. In addition, Roman citizens—over four thousand of them—who as captives were in the hands of the enemy were recovered. This was some compensation for the soldiers lost in the battle. For the victory was by no means bloodless. About eight thousand Romans and allies were slain, and to such an extent were even the victors sated with bloodshed and slaughter that on the next day, when word was brought to Livius, the consul, that the Cisalpine Gauls and Ligurians, who either had not been present in the battle, or had escaped in the midst of the carnage, were moving away in one column, with no trustworthy guide, no standards, no formation or high command, that they all could be wiped out, if a single regiment of cavalry should be sent, the consul said, "No! let there be some survivors, to carry the news both of the enemy's disaster and of our valour."[3]

[2] Livy's high figures for the losses on both sides (cf. § 7) must be contrasted with those of the Greek historian—10,000 and 2,000 respectively; ch. iii. 3.

[3] Livy omits mention of a temple to Iuventas vowed on this day by Livius. It was dedicated in 191 B.C.; XXXVI. xxxvi. 5 f. The date of the battle was 23rd June; Ovid Fasti VI. 769 f.

A.U.C. 547

L. Nero ea nocte quae secuta est pugnam profectus in Apuliam [1] citatiore quam inde venerat agmine die sexto ad stativa sua atque ad [2] hostem pervenit. 2 Iter eius frequentia minore, quia nemo [3] praecesserat nuntius, laetitia vero tanta vix ut compotes mentium 3 prae gaudio essent celebratum est. Nam Romae neuter animi habitus satis dici enarrarique potest, nec quo incerta expectatione eventus civitas fuerat, 4 nec quo victoriae famam accepit. Numquam per omnis dies, ex quo Claudium consulem profectum fama attulit, ab orto sole ad occidentem aut senator quisquam a curia atque ab magistratibus abscessit aut 5 populus e [4] foro. Matronae, quia nihil in ipsis opis erat, in preces obtestationesque versae, per omnia delubra vagae suppliciis votisque fatigare [5] deos. 6 Tam sollicitae ac suspensae civitati fama incerta primo accidit duos Narnienses equites in castra quae in faucibus Umbriae opposita erant venisse ex 7 proelio nuntiantes caesos hostes. Et primo magis auribus quam animis id acceptum erat, ut maius laetiusque quam quod mente capere aut satis credere possent; et ipsa celeritas fidem impediebat, quod 8 biduo ante pugnatum dicebatur. Litterae deinde ab L. Manlio Acidino missae ex castris adferuntur 9 de Narniensium equitum adventu. Hae litterae per

[1] profectus in Apuliam Rossbach, Conway: om. P(1)NJK, one line: profectus Sartorius, Eds.: regressus Madvig.
[2] ad N^1JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.
[3] quia nemo P(1)N Aldus, Eds.: nemo enim Sp^2JK Froben 2, Conway.
[4] e P(1)N Aldus, Froben 2: om. Sp^2JK.
[5] fatigare P(1)N Aldus: -avere Sp^2N^1JK Froben 2.

L. Nero on the night following the battle set out B.C. 207 for Apulia, and with a column moving more rapidly than when he had come from that region, reached his permanent camp and the enemy on the sixth day. His march was attended by smaller throngs, because no messenger had come in advance, but by rejoicing so great that people were almost beside themselves for joy. At Rome, of course, neither state of feeling can be sufficiently described and set forth, neither that in which the city had waited in suspense for the outcome, nor that in which it heard news of the victory. Not once in all the days since it was first reported that Claudius, the consul, had set out did a senator leave the Senate House and the magistrates from sunrise to sunset, nor did the people leave the Forum. The matrons, being in themselves unable to help, resorted to prayers and supplications, and wandering from one to another of all the temples, importuned the gods with entreaties and vows. While the city was in a state of such anxiety and suspense, came first a vague rumour that two horsemen of Narnia, coming from the battle, had reached the camp which had been placed to guard the gateway of Umbria,[1] reporting that the enemy had been cut to pieces. And at first men had heard it, rather than taken it in, as something too great and too joyous for them to grasp and quite believe. And the promptness was in itself an obstacle to belief, in that the battle was said to have been fought but two days before. Then came a letter sent by Lucius Manlius Acidinus from the camp in regard to the arrival of the Narnian horsemen. This letter, carried through the forum ad tribunal praetoris latae senatum curia[1] exciverunt: tantoque certamine ac tumultu populi ad fores curiae concursum est ut adire nuntius non posset, sed traheretur a percunctantibus vociferantibusque ut in rostris prius quam in senatu litterae recitarentur. Tandem summoti et coerciti a magistratibus, dispensarique laetitia inter inpotentes eius animos potuit. In senatu primum, deinde in contione litterae recitatae sunt; et pro cuiusque ingenio aliis iam certum gaudium, aliis nulla ante futura fides erat quam legatos consulumve litteras audissent.

[1] The pass of Furlo, Intercisa of the Itineraries; cf. xliii. 9.

A.U.C. 547

LI. Ipsos deinde adpropinquare legatos adlatum est. Tunc enim vero omnis aetas currere obvii,[2] primus quisque oculis auribusque haurire tantum gaudium cupientes. Ad Mulvium usque pontem continens agmen pervenit. Legati—erant L. Veturius Philo, P. Licinius Varus, Q. Caecilius Metellus —circumfusi omnis generis hominum frequentia in forum pervenerunt, cum alii ipsos, alii comites eorum quae acta essent[3] percunctarentur. Et ut quisque audierat exercitum hostium imperatoremque occisum, legiones Romanas incolumes, salvos consules esse, extemplo aliis porro impertiebant gaudium suum. Cum aegre in curiam perventum esset,[4] multo aegrius summota turba, ne patribus misceretur, litterae in senatu recitatae sunt. Inde traducti in

[1] curia P(1)N Aldus, Froben: in curiam $N^{a}JK$.
[2] obvii P(1)(A?)N Aldus: obviam Sp?$A^{a}JK$ Froben 2.
[3] essent P(1)N Aldus: sint Sp?JK Froben 2.
[4] perventum esset P(1)N Aldus: -venissent Sp?JK Froben 2.

[1] Until Gaius Hostilius could make his way to the Curia there could be no session of the senate.

Forum to the tribunal of the praetor,[1] brought the B.C. 207 senate out of the Curia. And with such rivalry and disorder did the people rush up to the doors of the Curia that the messenger could not get near, but was jostled by men asking questions and shouting that the letter should be read from the Rostra before the reading in the senate. Finally the rioters were pushed aside and restrained by magistrates, and the joy could be progressively imparted to men unable to contain it. In the senate first, then in the assembly, was the letter read. And, according to each man's temperament, some felt a delight already well founded, others would have no assurance until they should hear the emissaries or a letter from the consuls.

LI. Next came word that the emissaries themselves were approaching. Then in truth all ages ran to meet them, each one eager to be the first to take in with eyes and ears a joy so great. An unbroken column reached all the way to the Mulvian Bridge. The emissaries, who were Lucius Veturius Philo, Publius Licinius Varus and Quintus Caecilius Metellus, beset by a crowd of men of every class made their way into the Forum, while some were questioning the emissaries themselves, some their companions, as to what had happened. And whenever a man heard that the army of the enemy and their general had been slain, that the Roman legions were intact, the consuls safe, forthwith he would pass his delight on to others. After they had made their way with difficulty into the Senate House and with much more difficulty the crowd had been pushed aside, so as not to mingle with the senators, the letter was read in the senate. Then the emissaries were led over into the 6 contionem legati. L. Veturius litteris recitatis, ipse planius omnia quae acta erant exposuit cum ingenti adsensu. postremo etiam clamore universae 7 contionis, cum vix gaudium animis caperent. Discursum inde ab aliis circa templa deum, ut grates agerent, ab aliis domos, ut coniugibus liberisque tam 8 laetum nuntium impertirent. Senatus quod M. Livius et C. Claudius consules incolumi exercitu ducem hostium legionesque occidissent, supplicationem in triduum decrevit. Eam supplicationem C. Hostilius praetor pro contione [1] edixit, celebra- 9 taque a viris feminisque est. Omnia [2] templa per totum triduum aequalem turbam habuere, cum matronae amplissima veste cum liberis, perinde ac si debellatum foret, omni solutae metu deis immortali- 10 bus grates agerent. Statum quoque civitatis ea victoria movit, ut iam [3] inde haud secus quam in pace res inter se contrahere vendendo, emendo, mutuum dando [4] argentum creditumque [5] solvendo auderent.

A.U.C. 547

11 C. Claudius consul cum in castra redisset, caput Hasdrubalis, quod servatum cum cura attulerat, proici ante hostium stationes, captivosque Afros vinctos ut erant ostendi, duos etiam ex iis solutos ire ad Hannibalem et expromere quae acta essent iussit.

[1] pro contione A^1JK Aldus : om. $P(1)N$.
[2] Omnia $P(1)N$ Aldus : omniaque N^2JK Froben 2.
[3] victoria movit ut iam A^1N^2JK Aldus : victoriam $P(1)N$.
[4] emendo, mutuum dando A^1N^2JK Aldus : om. $P(1)N$, one line.
[5] creditumque $Sp A^2J$ Froben 2 : creditum $P(1)NK$ Aldus.

[1] I.e. across the Comitium to the Rostra.
[2] And the once dreaded Hannibal seemed no longer to be in Italy (Polybius XI. iii. 6).

assembly.[1] Lucius Veturius, after the reading of the letter, himself set forth more clearly everything that had been done, with great approval and finally even shouting from the entire assembly, since they were barely able to contain their joy. Then some hastened to one temple of the gods after another to return thanks, others to their homes, to share news so joyous with wives and children. The senate decreed that, whereas Marcus Livius and Gaius Claudius, the consuls, with their army safe, had slain the general and legions of the enemy, there should be a thanksgiving for three days. This thanksgiving was proclaimed before an assembly by Gaius Hostilius, the praetor, and observed by men and women. All the temples were uniformly crowded for all three days, while the matrons in their richest garments, together with their children, being relieved of every fear, just as if the war were already finished,[2] returned thanks to the immortal gods. Even the financial situation of the state was changed by that victory, so that from that time on, just as if in peace, they ventured to carry on business with one another, selling and buying, lending money and repaying loans. B.C. 207

Gaius Claudius, the consul, having returned to his camp, ordered the head of Hasdrubal, which he had kept with care and brought with him, to be thrown in front of the enemy's outposts,[3] and that captured Africans should be displayed, as they were, in chains; furthermore that two of them, released from bonds, should go to Hannibal and relate to him what

[3] For parallel examples v. Pais' list in Guerre Punique[2] II. 452. Contrast in Hannibal's favour xxviii. 1 fin. and XXV. xvii. 4–7.

A.U.C. 547

12 Hannibal, tanto simul publico familiarique ictus luctu, agnoscere se fortunam Carthaginis fertur dixisse;
13 castrisque inde motis, ut omnia auxilia quae diffusa latius tueri non poterat in extremum Italiae angulum Bruttios contraheret, et Metapontinos, civitatem universam, excitos sedibus suis, et Lucanorum qui suae dicionis erant in Bruttium agrum traduxit.

had happened. Hannibal, under the blow of so great B.C. 207 a sorrow, at once public and intimate, is reported to have said that he recognized the destiny of Carthage. And moving his camp away, with the intention to concentrate in the extreme corner of Italy, the land of the Bruttii, all the forces which he was unable to defend if widely scattered, he removed the whole body of citizens of Metapontum, whom he had summoned to leave their homes,[1] and such Lucanians also as were subject to him, into the Bruttian country.

[1] As Metapontum was close to the border of Apulia and dangerously near Tarentum; cf. XXV. xv. 6.

LIBRI XXVII PERIOCHA

Cn. Fulvius proconsul cum exercitu ab Hannibale ad Herdoneam caesus est. Meliore eventu ab Claudio Marcello consule adversus eundem ad Numistronem pugnatum est. Inde Hannibal nocte recessit; Marcellus insecutus est et subinde cedentem pressit, donec conflĭgeret. Priore pugna Hannibal superior, sequenti Marcellus. Fabius Maximus pater consul Tarentinos per proditionem recepit. Claudius Marcellus T. Quinctius Crispinus consules, speculandi causa progressi e castris, insidiis ab Hannibale circumventi sunt. Marcellus occisus, Crispinus fugit. Lustrum a censoribus conditum est. Censa sunt civium capita C̄XXXVII CVIII; ex quo numero apparuit quantum hominum tot proeliorum adversa fortuna populo Romano abstulisset. In Hispania ad Baeculam Scipio cum Hasdrubale et Hamilcare conflixit et vicit. Inter alia captum regalem puerum eximiae formae ad avunculum Masinissam cum donis dimisit. Hasdrubal, qui cum exercitu novo Alpes transcenderat, ut se Hannibali iungeret, cum milibus hominum LVI caesus est, capta V̄CCCC M. Livi consulis ductu, sed non minore opera Claudi Neronis consulis, qui, cum Hannibali oppositus esset, relictis castris ita ut hostem falleret, cum electa manu profectus Hasdrubalem circumvenerat. Res praeterea feliciter a P. Scipione in Hispania et a P. Sulpicio praetore adversus Philippum et Achaeos gestas continet.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXVII

Gnaeus Fulvius, the proconsul, was slain with his army by Hannibal near Herdonea. With a happier outcome a battle was fought by Claudius Marcellus, the consul, against the same commander near Numistro. Hannibal thereupon withdrew by night. Marcellus pursued him and repeatedly bore heavily on him as he retreated, until he engaged. In the first battle Hannibal was the winner, Marcellus in the second. Fabius Maximus the father, as consul, recovered Tarentum by treachery. Claudius Marcellus and Titus Quinctius Crispinus, the consuls, having advanced from the camp to reconnoitre, were overpowered by Hannibal in an ambush. Marcellus was slain, Crispinus escaped. The ceremony of purification was completed by the censors. Listed in the census were 137,108 citizens, from which number it was evident how many men the unfavourable fortune of so many battles had carried off from the Roman people. In Spain Scipio engaged with Hasdrubal and Hamilcar [1] near Baecula and was victorious. A boy of royal birth and remarkable beauty, who had been captured with the rest of the spoils, was sent away to his maternal uncle Masinissa by Scipio with gifts. Hasdrubal, who with a fresh army had crossed the Alps to unite with Hannibal, was slain with 56,000 men, and 5,400 were captured, under the command of Marcus Livius, the consul, but with no smaller share borne by Claudius Nero, the consul, who, after being assigned to confront Hannibal, had left his camp in such a way as to escape the enemy's notice, had set out with a picked force and overpowered Hasdrubal. The book contains in addition the operations successfully carried on by Publius Scipio in Spain and by Publius Sulpicius, the praetor, against Philip and the Achaeans.

[1] An obvious error.

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

IN FOURTEEN VOLUMES

VIII

BOOKS XXVIII—XXX

TRANSLATED BY

FRANK GARDNER MOORE

PROFESSOR EMERITUS IN COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

503529

30.1.50

LONDON

WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

MCMXLIX

CONTENTS

	PAGE
TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE	v
THE MANUSCRIPTS	vii
BOOK XXVIII	2
SUMMARY OF BOOK XXVIII	200
BOOK XXIX	206
SUMMARY OF BOOK XXIX	360
BOOK XXX	366
SUMMARY OF BOOK XXX	540
APPENDIX: THE ZAMA PROBLEM	543
INDEX OF NAMES	555

MAPS—

1.	NORTH ITALY	At end
2.	CENTRAL ITALY	,,
3.	LATIUM AND CAMPANIA	,,
4.	SOUTH ITALY AND SICILY	,,
5.	GREECE AND MACEDONIA	,,
6.	CENTRAL GREECE	,,
7.	SPAIN	,,
8.	AFRICA AND NUMIDIA	,,
9.	UTICA AND CARTHAGE	,,

T. LIVI

AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XXVIII

A.U.C. 547

I. Cum transitu Hasdrubalis, quantum in Italiam [1] declinaverat belli, tantum levatae Hispaniae viderentur, renatum ibi subito par priori bellum est. Hispanias ea tempestate sic habebant Romani Poenique: Hasdrubal Gisgonis filius ad Oceanum penitus Gadesque concesserat; nostri maris ora omnisque ferme Hispania qua in orientem vergit Scipionis ac Romanae dicionis erat. Novus imperator Hanno in locum Barcini Hasdrubalis novo cum exercitu ex Africa transgressus Magonique iunctus, cum in Celtiberia, quae media inter duo maria est, brevi magnum hominum numerum armasset, Scipio adversus eum M. Silanum cum decem haud amplius [2] milibus militum, equitibus quingentis misit. Silanus quantis maximis potuit

[1] Italiam JK Froben 2 : italia P(1)N Aldus.
[2] haud amplius Conway : haud plus Gronovius, Eds. : iliauoplus P : seu plus (preceded by milia) P^2(1)N om. A^1N^2 Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Hasdrubal's attempt to aid his brother Hannibal by a second invasion of Italy had ended in disaster at the Metaurus; XXVII. xlvii. ff. The narrative now reverts to Spain, where a third brother, Mago, was in command of an army.

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XXVIII

I. While the passage of Hasdrubal,[1] by shifting B.C. 207 the war to Italy, was felt to have lightened in proportion the burden for Spain, suddenly a war as dangerous as the former broke out again in that country. Spanish territory was at that time occupied by Romans and Carthaginians as follows: Hasdrubal son of Gisgo had retired all the way to the Ocean and Gades; the coast of Our Sea and nearly all of Spain facing eastward were under Scipio and Roman rule; a new commander, Hanno,[2] as successor to Hasdrubal Barca had crossed over from Africa with a new army, and uniting with Mago, had promptly armed men in large numbers in Celtiberia, which lies directly between the two seas. Whereupon Scipio sent Marcus Silanus[3] with not more than ten thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry against Hanno. Silanus made his marches as long

[2] When a second descent upon Italy was first planned nine years earlier, Hasdrubal had urged the authorities at Carthage to send out another army with a general to take his place in Spain; XXIII. xxvii. 12. A new commander has now arrived, but this Hanno is soon captured and sent to Rome; ii. 11; iv. 4.

[3] Cf. XXVI. xix. 10; XXVII. vii. 17; xxii. 7.

A.U.C. 547

itineribus—inpediebant autem et asperitates viarum et angustiae saltibus crebris, ut pleraque Hispaniae sunt, inclusae—, tamen non solum nuntios sed etiam famam adventus sui praegressus, ducibus indidem ex 7 Celtiberia transfugis ad hostem pervenit. Eisdem auctoribus conpertum est, cum decem circiter milia ab hoste abessent, bina castra circa viam qua irent esse; laeva Celtiberos, novum exercitum, supra novem milia hominum, dextra Punica tenere castra.
8 Ea stationibus, vigiliis, omni iusta militari custodia tuta et firma esse; illa altera soluta neglectaque, ut barbarorum et tironum et minus timentium, quod in sua terra essent.
9 Ea prius adgredienda ratus Silanus signa quam maxime ad laevam iubebat ferri, necunde ab stationibus Punicis conspiceretur; ipse praemissis speculatoribus citato agmine ad hostem pergit. II. Tria milia ferme aberat cum hauddum quisquam hostium senserat; confragosa loca et obsiti virgultis tegebant [1]
2 colles. Ibi in cava valle atque ob id occulta considere militem et cibum capere iubet. Interim [2] speculatores transfugarum dicta adfirmantes vene-
3 runt; tum sarcinis in medium coniectis arma Romani capiunt acieque iusta in pugnam vadunt. Mille passuum aberant cum a bhoste conspecti sunt trepidarique repente coeptum; et Mago ex castris citato

[1] tegebant Kreyssig, Eds.: tenebant A^2N^2JK Aldus: tenebat $P(1)N$.
[2] interim A^1N^1JK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.

as possible, being hampered, however, both by rough B.C. 207 roads and narrow passes frequently hemmed in by wooded mountains, as is usual in Spain. Nevertheless he outstripped not only messengers reporting his approach but even rumours of it, and guided by deserters from the same Celtiberia he made his way to the enemy. From the same informants it was learned, when they were about ten miles from the enemy, that there were two camps, one on each side of the road along which they were moving; that, on the left lay the Celtiberians, a new army, over nine thousand men, on the right the Carthaginian camp; that this was strongly defended by outposts, sentries and all the protection usual in the field, while the other camp was lax and carelessly guarded, as belonging to barbarians who were raw recruits and less afraid because they were in their own country.

Silanus, thinking this camp must be attacked first, ordered the standards to move as far to the left as possible, for fear he might be seen from somewhere by the Carthaginian outposts. He sent scouts in advance and himself proceeded towards the enemy with a swiftly moving column. II. He was some three miles away when not one of the enemy had yet noticed them; a rugged terrain and brush-covered hills kept them concealed. There in a deep valley that was consequently unseen he bade his soldiers sit down and take food. Meantime came the scouts confirming the deserters' reports. Then the Romans piled their light baggage in the centre, took up their arms and advanced to fight in regular line of battle. They were a mile away when they were seen by the enemy, who suddenly began to show alarm. Mago too, leaving his equo ad primum clamorem et tumultum advehitur.

A.U.C. 547

4 Erant in Celtiberorum exercitu quattuor milia scutata et ducenti equites; hanc iustam legionem—et id ferme roboris erat—in prima acie locat; ceteros,
5 levem armaturam, in subsidiis posuit. Cum ita instructos educeret e castris, vixdum in egressos vallo
6 eos [1] Romani pila coniecerunt. Subsidunt Hispani adversus emissa tela ab hoste, inde ad mittenda ipsi consurgunt; quae cum Romani conferti, ut solent, densatis excepissent scutis, tum pes cum pede con-
7 latus et gladiis geri res coepta est. Ceterum asperitas locorum et Celtiberis, quibus in proelio concursare mos est, velocitatem inutilem faciebat, et haud iniqua
8 eadem erat Romanis stabili pugnae adsuetis, nisi quod angustiae et internata virgulta ordines dirimebant et singuli binique velut cum paribus conse-
9 rere pugnam cogebantur. Quod ad fugam impedimento hostibus erat, id ad [2] caedem eos velut vinctos
10 praebebat. Et iam ferme omnibus scutatis Celtiberorum interfectis levis armatura et Carthaginienses qui ex alteris castris subsidio venerant, perculsi cae-
11 debantur. Duo haud amplius milia peditum et equitatus omnis vix inito proelio cum Magone effugerunt; Hanno, alter imperator, cum eis qui postremi iam profligato proelio advenerant vivus 12 capitur. Magonem fugientem equitatus ferme omnis et quod veterum peditum erat secuti, decimo die in camp at the first shouting and uproar, rode up at a gallop. In the army of the Celtiberians there were four thousand men with long shields and two hundred horsemen. This complete legion—and they were the best of his troops—was placed in the front line. The rest, the light-armed, he posted as reserves. While he was leading the men in that order out of their camp and they had scarcely got beyond the rampart, the Romans hurled their javelins at them. The Spaniards squatted down to meet the enemy's volley; then they in turn rose to hurl their weapons. After the Romans in dense array, as usual, had received these on their shields held close together, men fought at close quarters and began to use swords. But the roughness of the ground made nimbleness of no use to the Celtiberians, whose custom it is to be skirmishers in battle, and at the same time it was not unfavourable for the Romans, accustomed to a static order of battle, except that restricted spaces and intervening thickets broke up their ranks, and they were forced to engage now singly, now in couples, as though with men paired against them. Whatever hampered the flight of the enemy exposed them to slaughter, as if they were fettered. And now that nearly all the Celtiberian heavy infantry had been slain, the light-armed and the Carthaginians who had come to their aid from the other camp were being routed and cut down. Not more than two thousand infantry and all the cavalry escaped with Mago almost at the beginning of the battle. Hanno, the second in command, was captured alive with those who had been the last to arrive when the battle was nearly over. Almost all the cavalry and such old soldiers as there were in the infantry B.C. 207

[1] eos $P(1)N$: in eos $M^1A^2N^1JK$: om. Aldus, Froben, Conway.

[2] id ad $P(1)NJK$: om. Sp : et ad Rhenanus.

A.U.C. 547

Gaditanam provinciam ad Hasdrubalem pervenerunt; Celtiberi, novus miles, in proximas dilapsi silvas inde domos diffugerunt.

13 Peropportuna victoria nequaquam tantum iam conflatum bellum, quanta [1] futuri materia belli, si licuisset iis Celtiberorum gente excita et alios ad 14 arma sollicitare populos, oppressa erat. Itaque conlaudato benigne Silano Scipio spem debellandi, si nihil eam ipse cunctando moratus esset, nactus, ad id quod reliquum belli erat in ultimam Hispaniam 15 adversus Hasdrubalem pergit. Poenus cum castra tum [2] forte in Baetica ad sociorum animos continendos in fide haberet, signis repente sublatis fugae magis quam itineris modo penitus ad Oceanum et Gades 16 ducit. Ceterum, quoad continuisset exercitum,[3] propositum bello se fore ratus, antequam freto Gades traiceret,[3] exercitum omnem passim in civitates divisit, ut et muris se ipsi et armis muros tutarentur.

III. Scipio, ubi animadvertit dissipatum passim bellum, et circumferre ad singulas urbes arma diutini 2 magis quam magni esse operis, retro vertit iter. Ne tamen hostibus eam relinqueret regionem, L. Scipio-

[1] quanta A'JK Aldus, Froben : quantum P(1)N.
[2] tum P(1, except D)N Aldus : sua SpA'N'JK Froben 2 : om. D.
[3] exercitum . . . traiceret P(1)NxJK : om. Sp, four lines.

[1] The son of Gisgo, mentioned just above, i. 2; cf. iii. 3.

followed Mago in flight and on the tenth day reached B. C. 207
Hasdrubal[1] in the region of Gades. The newly recruited Celtiberians slipped away into the neighbouring forests and thence scattered to their homes.

This very timely victory had made a sudden end, not so much indeed of the war already in progress, as of the resources for some subsequent war, had it been possible for the Carthaginians, after calling out the Celtiberian nation, to entice other tribes also to take up arms. Accordingly Scipio praised Silanus in generous terms and cherished the hope of ending the war if only he should not retard the fulfilment by his own delaying. Aiming to finish what remained of the war he proceeded into the farthest part of Spain against Hasdrubal. The Carthaginian, in order to ensure the loyalty of his allies, had his camp at that time, as it happened, in Baetica.[2] Nevertheless he suddenly took up his standards and with the appearance of a flight rather than of a march led his men all the way to the Ocean and Gades. But before taking ship along the strait to Gades, thinking he would be the object of attack so long as he kept his army together, he scattered his entire force among the cities in every direction, that they might defend themselves by walls and at the same time defend walled cities by their arms.

III. Scipio, observing that the field of operations was widely extended, and that to attack the cities one after another would be a protracted task, if not a great one, turned back. Not to leave the region, however, to the enemy, he sent his brother Lucius

[2] Here not the later (Augustan) province of that name, but a vague term for the southernmost part of Spain, including Gades and most of the valley of the Baetis (Guadalquivir).

A.U.C. 547

nem fratrem cum decem milibus peditum, mille [1] equitum ad oppugnandam opulentissimam in iis locis urbem—Orongin barbari appellabant—mittit. Sita in Maesessum finibus est, Bastetanae [2] gentis; ager frugifer; argentum etiam incolae fodiunt. Ea arx fuerat [3] Hasdrubali ad excursiones circa mediterraneos populos faciendas. Scipio castris prope urbem positis, priusquam circumvallaret urbem, misit ad portas qui ex propinquo alloquio animos temptarent suaderentque ut amicitiam potius quam vim experirentur Romanorum. Ubi nihil pacati respondebatur, fossa duplicique vallo circumdata urbe [4] in tres partes exercitum dividit, ut una semper pars quietis interim duabus oppugnaret. Prima pars cum adorta oppugnare est,[5] atrox sane et anceps proelium fuit: non subire, non scalas ferre ad muros prae incidentibus telis facile erat; etiam qui erexerant ad murum scalas, alii furcis ad id ipsum factis detrudebantur, in alios lupi superne ferrei iniecti, ut in periculo essent ne suspensi in murum extraherentur. Quod ubi animadvertit Scipio nimia paucitate suorum exaequatum certamen esse, et iam eo superare hostem quod ex muro pugnaret, duabus simul partibus, prima recepta, urbem est adgressus. Quae res tantum

[1] mille A'JK : om. P(1)N.
[2] Bastetanae Weissenborn (from Zonaras IX. viii. 8): Hispanae P(3)N Conway.
[3] fuerat P(1)N Aldus : fuit SpJK Froben 2.
[4] urbe P(1)N Aldus, Froben : urbem (with circumdat) SpN'JK.
[5] est P(1)NJK : esset Riemann : Conway would prefer adorta esset, rejecting oppugnare.

[1] Probably the same as Auringis (or Aurinx) in Andalusia; XXIV. xlii. 5.

Scipio with ten thousand infantry and a thousand B.C. 207 cavalry to besiege the wealthiest city in that country —Orongis [1] the barbarians called it. It is situated in the territory of the Maesesses,[2] a Bastetanian tribe. Its land is fruitful; the inhabitants mine silver also. That city had been a stronghold for Hasdrubal in making raids among the tribes of the interior. Scipio pitched his camp near the city and before investing it sent men up to the gates to sound the inhabitants by speaking to them from a short distance, urging them to test the friendship of the Romans rather than their power. When no peaceable replies were forthcoming, he surrounded the city with a trench and a double earthwork and divided his army into three parts, so that one third should always be attacking while two thirds in the meantime were resting. When the first third essayed an attack there was, to be sure, a fierce battle and indecisive. It was not easy to come near the walls for the shower of missiles, nor to bring up ladders. Some who had succeeded in raising their ladders against the walls were pushed down by forks made for that very purpose, others had iron grappling-hooks lowered upon them from above, so that they were in danger of being caught up and dragged to the top of the wall. When Scipio noted that owing to the greatly inferior number of his men the struggle was evenly balanced, and that the enemy had an advantage already in fighting from the wall, he attacked the city with two thirds of his men at the same time, having recalled the first third. This

[2] Mention of silver mining places this lesser tribe in the mountains, while the Bastetani proper occupied the south coast.

A.U.C. 547

pavoris iniecit fessis iam cum primis pugnando, ut et oppidani moenia repentina fuga desererent, et Punicum praesidium metu ne prodita urbs esset relictis stationibus in unum [1] se colligeret.

10 Timor inde oppidanos incessit ne, si hostis urbem intrasset, sine discrimine Poenus an Hispanus esset 11 obvii passim caederentur; itaque [2] patefacta repente porta frequentes ex oppido sese eiecerunt, scuta prae se tenentes, ne tela procul conicerentur, dextras nudas ostentantes, ut gladios abiecisse appareret.
12 Id utrum parum ex intervallo sit conspectum an dolus aliquis suspectus fuerit incompertum est; impetus hostilis in transfugas factus, nec secus quam adversa acies caesi; eademque porta signa infesta
13 urbi inlata. Et aliis partibus securibus dolabrisque caedebantur et refringebantur [3] portae, et ut quisque intraverat eques, ad forum occupandum—ita enim
14 praeceptum erat—citato equo pergebat. Additum erat et triariorum equiti praesidium; legionarii ceteras partis urbis pervadunt. Direptione et caede obviorum, nisi qui armis se tuebantur, abstinuerunt.
15 Carthaginienses omnes in custodiam dati sunt, oppidanorum quoque trecenti [4] ferme qui clauserant portas; ceteris traditum oppidum, suae redditae
16 res. Cecidere in urbis eius oppugnatione hostium

[1] unum $P(1)N$: unum locum SpA^1J (and with locum at the end K).

[2] itaque A^1N^2(altern.): adque P: atque $(1)N$.

[3] et refringebantur A^1JK Aldus, Froben, Johnson: after portae N^2 Conway: om. $P(1)N$, one line.

[4] quoque trecenti $A^{1?}N^1JK$: con P (for CCC): om. $P^2(1)N$.

[1] The seasoned infantry, here on special duty, not in the formal battle line with its ordines (as in XXVI. xlvi. 7). Cf. VIII. viii. 9ff.; x. 5; Polybius VI. xxi. 7ff.

inspired so much alarm among men already spent in fighting with the first to attack them that the townsmen in sudden flight abandoned the walls and for fear the city had been betrayed the Carthaginian garrison also left their posts and gathered in one place. B.C. 207

Then the men of the town were possessed by the fear that, if the enemy should enter the city, those whom they happened to meet anywhere would be slain with no distinction between Carthaginian and Spaniard. Accordingly they suddenly opened a gate and dashed out of the town in large numbers, holding their shields in front of them for fear weapons might be hurled at long range, but displaying their right hands empty, so that it should be clear that they had thrown away their swords. Whether this was not seen owing to distance, or whether some ruse was suspected, has not been ascertained. The Romans, making an attack upon the deserters, cut them down like an opposing battle-line; and by the same gate hostile units entered the city. Elsewhere also gates were being hewed to pieces and broken open with hatchets and pickaxes, while a cavalryman on entering would ride ahead at full speed to seize the forum; for such were their orders. A detachment of triarii[1] also had been assigned to support the cavalry. The legionaries made their way through the other quarters of the city. They refrained from plundering and from slaying those they met, except when men defended themselves with arms. The Carthaginians were all put under guard, also about three hundred of the citizens who had closed the gates. The town was handed over to the rest and their property restored. About two thousand of the duo milia ferme, Romanorum haud amplius[1] nonaginta.

A.U.C. 547

IV. Laeta et ipsis qui rem gessere urbis eius expugnatio fuit et imperatori ceteroque exercitui; et speciosum adventum suum ingentem turbam captivo-
2 rum prae se agentes fecerunt. Scipio conlaudato fratre cum quanto poterat verborum honore Carthagini ab se captae captam ab eo Orongin aequasset,
3 quia et hiems instabat, ut nec temptare Gades nec disiectum passim per provinciam exercitum Hasdrubalis consectari posset, in citeriorem Hispaniam
4 omnes suas copias reduxit;[2] dimissisque in hiberna legionibus, L. Scipione fratre Romam misso et Hannone hostium imperatore ceterisque nobilibus captivis ipse Tarraconem concessit.

5 Eodem anno classis Romana cum M. Valerio Laevino proconsule ex Sicilia in Africam transmissa in Uticensi Carthaginiensique agro late populationes fecit. Extremis finibus Carthaginiensium circa ipsa
6 moenia Uticae praedae actae sunt. Repetentibus Siciliam classis Punica—septuaginta erant longae naves—occurrit; septemdecim[3] naves ex iis captae sunt, quattuor in alto mersae, cetera fusa ac fugata
7 classis. Terra marique victor Romanus cum magna omnis generis praeda Lilybaeum repetit. Tuto[4] inde mari pulsis hostium navibus magni conmeatus frumenti Romam subvecti.

[1] amplius P(3)M[1]N Aldus: plus Sp?JK Froben 2.

[2] omnes (or -nis) suas copias reduxit P[1] or P2NJK Aldus (sua P: redixit D): recipit exercitum Spx Froben 2.

[3] septemdecim, P has decem et septem and so (or numerals) the rest: cf. Vol. VII, p. 186, crit. note 6.

[4] Tuto P(1)N Aldus: toto SpN1JK Froben 2.

---

[1] See p. 3, n. 2.

enemy were slain in the siege of the city, of the Romans not more than ninety. B.C. 207

IV. The storming of that city brought joy not only to those who took part in the exploit but also to the commander-in-chief and the rest of his army; and the troops made their approach an impressive sight, as they drove before them a great crowd of captives. Scipio warmly praised his brother, with the highest possible compliment placing his capture of Orongis on the same level as his own capture of (New) Carthage. Thereupon, and because winter was at hand, so that he was unable either to attack Gades or to follow up Hasdrubal's army, widely scattered throughout the province, he led all his forces back into Hither Spain. After sending the legions away to their winter quarters and his brother Lucius Scipio to Rome, and with him Hanno,[1] a general of the enemy, and the rest of the noble captives, he himself retired to Tarraco.

The same year a Roman fleet under Marcus Valerius Laevinus, the proconsul, was sent over from Sicily to Africa, and in the territory of Utica and Carthage they ravaged the country far and wide. Along the edge of the Carthaginian territory, close to the very walls of Utica, booty was carried off. On their return voyage to Sicily a Carthaginian fleet of seventy warships encountered them. Seventeen of these were captured, four sunk at sea, the rest of the fleet routed and put to flight. Victorious on land and sea, the Romans returned with ample plunder of every kind to Lilybaeum. Thereafter, as the sea was safe in consequence of the discomfiture of the enemy's ships, great supplies of grain were brought to Rome.

A.U.C. 547

V. Principio aestatis eius qua haec sunt gesta P. Sulpicius proconsul et Attalus rex cum Aeginae, sicut ante dictum est, hibernassent, Lemnum inde classe iuncta—Romanae quinque et viginti quinqueremes, regiae quinque et triginta [1]—transmiserunt. 2 Et Philippus ut, seu terra seu mari obviam eundum hosti foret, paratus ad omnes conatus esset, ipse Demetriadem ad mare descendit, Larisam diem ad 3 conveniendum exercitui edixit. Undique ab sociis legationes Demetriadem ad famam regis convenerunt. 4 Sustulerant enim animos Aetoli cum ab Romana societate tum post Attali adventum, finitimosque 5 depopulabantur. Nec Acarnanes solum Boeotique et qui Euboeam incolunt in magno metu erant, sed Achaei quoque, quos super Aetolicum bellum Machanidas etiam Lacedaemonius tyrannus haud procul 6 Argivorum fine positis castris terrebat. Hi omnes suis quisque urbibus quae pericula terra marique portenderentur [2] memorantes auxilia regem orabant. 7 Ne ex regno quidem ipsius tranquillae nuntiabantur res: et Scerdilaedum Pleuratumque motos esse, et Thracum maxime Maedos, si quod longinquum bellum regem occupasset, proxima Macedoniae in-

[1] triginta, after this Ussing inserted erant (Madvig after quinqueremes).

[2] portenderentur Sp?A¹J Froben 2: -bantur P(1)N Aldus.

[1] Since Roman progress in Greece had been slow Livy is summarizing events of 208 and 207 B.C. in that theatre under the latter year. Cf. XXVII. xxix. 9 ff. (Vol. VII. p. 330, n. 2). Polybius is the source (X. xli. f.) for the events which follow.

[2] I.e. XXVII. xxxiii. 5.

V. At the beginning of the summer in which these events took place[1] Publius Sulpicius, the proconsul, and King Attalus, after wintering at Aegina, as has been stated above,[2] sailed across to Lemnus with their combined fleets, twenty-five Roman and thirty-five royal quinqueremes. And Philip, to be prepared for every effort of the enemy, whether he must be met on land or on sea, came down himself to the sea at Demetrias[3] and appointed a day for the army to assemble at Larisa. From his allies all around deputations gathered at Demetrias on the first report of the king's coming. For the Aetolians in consequence of their alliance with the Romans, and particularly after the arrival of Attalus, had been emboldened and were laying waste their neighbours' lands. And not only were the Acarnanians and Boeotians and the inhabitants of Euboea greatly alarmed but also the Achaeans, who in addition to the Aetolian war were further terrified by Machanidas,[4] tyrant of Sparta, who had pitched his camp not far from the Argive frontier. All these delegations stated the dangers impending by land and sea for their several cities and were imploring the aid of the king. Even from his own kingdom the report was of no peaceful conditions: that Scerdilaedus and Pleuratus had taken the field; also that of the Thracians the Maedi[5] in particular were ready to invade the nearest part of Macedonia if some distant war should B.C. 207

[3] At the north end of the Sinus Pagasaeus (Demetriacus in § 18), it was the chief trade centre of Thessaly; cf. Vol. VII. p. 342, n. 2.

[4] Cf. XXVII. xxix. 9; below, vii. 17.

[5] Between Thrace and Paeonia, in the upper valley of the Strymon and eastward; XXVI. xxv. 6, 8.

A.U.C. 547

8 cursuros. Boeoti quidem et interiores Graeciae populi Thermopylarum saltum,[1] ubi angustae fauces coartant iter, fossa valloque intercludi ab Aetolis nuntiabant, ne transitum ad sociorum urbes tuendas Philippo darent.

9 Vel segnem ducem tot excitare tumultus circumfusi poterant. Legationes dimittit pollicitus, prout tem-
10 pus ac res sineret, omnibus laturum se auxilium. In praesentia quae maxime urgebat res, Peparethum praesidium urbi mittit, unde allatum erat Attalum ab Lemno classe transmissa omnem circum urbem
11 agrum depopulatum. Polyphantam cum modica manu in Boeotiam, Menippum item quendam ex regiis ducibus cum mille peltatis[2]—pelta caetrae
12 haud dissimilis est—Chalcidem mittit; additi quingenti[3] Agrianum, ut omnes insulae partes tueri posset. Ipse Scotussam est profectus, eodemque ab
13 Larisa Macedonum copias traduci iussit. Eo nuntiatum est concilium Aetolis Heracleam indictum regemque Attalum ad consultandum de summa belli
14 venturum. Hunc conventum ut turbaret subito
15 adventu,[4] magnis itineribus Heracleam duxit. Et

[1] saltum JK : saltus P(1)N Aldus, Froben.

[2] peltatis P(1)NJK Weissenborn, Conway : peltastis Jac. Gronovius, Eds.

[3] quingenti (or d) $P A^1 N^2 JK$: om. $P^2(1)N$.

[4] hunc conventum . . . adventu $A^1 N^1 JK$ Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)N, two lines.

---

[1] Cf. vii. 3; Strabo IX. iv. 12 ff.

[2] Of the same name as the island, and destroyed by Philip; XXXI. xxviii. 6.

[3] Paeonian auxiliaries (archers) of the Macedonians; XXXIII. xviii. 9; Thucydides II. 96; Polybius II. lxv; X. xlii. 3; Strabo VII. fr. 36 f.

engage the king's attention. In fact the Boeotians and inland Greek states reported that the pass of Thermopylae,[1] where a narrow entrance hems in the road, was being closed with a ditch and an earthwork by the Aetolians, that it might not allow Philip a passage in order to defend the cities of his allies. B.C. 207

Even a general lacking in spirit might have been aroused by so many alarms from all sides. Philip sent the deputations away with a promise that he would lend aid to them all as time and circumstances might permit. As the urgency of the moment required, he sent to Peparēthus a garrison for the city,[2] from which had come the news that Attalus, sending his fleet over from Lemnus, had ravaged all the country round the city. Philip sent Polyphantas with a force of moderate size into Boeotia; also one of his own generals, Menippus, to Chalcis with a thousand peltasts, whose shield is not unlike the caetra. Five hundred of the Agrianes[3] were added, to enable Menippus to protect all parts of the island. The king himself set out for Scotussa and ordered that the Macedonian troops should march across from Larisa to the same place. There the report reached him that a council had been appointed for the Aetolians at Heraclēa,[4] and that King Attalus would attend for a consultation on the issues of the war. To break up this gathering by his sudden arrival Philip led his men by forced marches to Heraclēa. He arrived indeed after the [4] Above Thermopylae, to the west of the pass and commanding the road to it; XXXVI. xvi. 4 f.; xxii. 1, 4 f.; Thuc. III. 92; Strabo IX. iv. 13; Polybius X. xlii. 4. From Scotussa, in eastern Thessaly, to Thermopylae the distance was about 50 Roman miles; cf. vii. 3.

A.U.C. 547

concilio quidem dimisso [1] venit; segetibus tamen, quae iam [2] prope maturitatem erant, maxime in sinu Aenianum evastatis Scotussam copias reduxit. Ibi exercitu omni relicto, cum cohorte regia Demetriadem 16 sese recipit.[3] Inde ut ad omnes hostium motus posset occurrere, in Phocidem atque Euboeam et Peparethum mittit qui loca alta eligerent unde editi
17 ignes apparerent; ipse in Tisaeo—mons est in altitudinem ingentem cacuminis editi—speculam posuit, ut ignibus procul sublatis signum, ubi quid molirentur hostes, momento temporis acciperet.
18 Romanus imperator et Attalus rex a Peparetho Nicaeam traiecerunt; inde classem in Euboeam ad urbem Oreum tramittunt, quae ab Demetriaco sinu Chalcidem et Euripum petenti ad laevam prima 19 urbium Euboeae posita est. Ita inter Attalum ac Sulpicium convenit, ut Romani a mari, regii a terra oppugnarent. VI. Quadriduo post quam adpulsa classis est, urbem adgressi sunt. Id tempus occultis cum Platore, qui a Philippo praepositus urbi erat, 2 conloquiis absumptum est. Duas arces urbs habet, unam imminentem mari, altera urbis media [4] est. Cuniculo inde via ad mare ducit, quam a mari turris

[1] dimisso, followed by iam in $P(1)NJK$ Eds.: Conway rejects iam.
[2] iam A^1N^1JK Eds.: om. $P(1)N$.
[3] recipit Sp?K Froben 2: recepit $P(1)NJ$ Aldus, Conway.
[4] media $P(3)$: medio AN Aldus Froben.

[1] I.e. the Sinus Maliacus (XXVII. xxx. 3), for the Aenianes lay to the west of that gulf.
[2] Plainly visible from Demetrias across the gulf. The height of the mountain is 2112 ft. Cf. Polybius X. xlii. 7.
[3] For signalling by fires cf. XXIX. vi. 8, 10. Polybius has an excursus of several pages on the subject, including improvements he had himself made; l.c. xliii–xlvii. The Romans council had been dismissed; but he destroyed crops B.C. 207 which were now almost ripe, especially along the Gulf of the Aenianes,[1] and led his troops back to Scotussa. There he left the whole army and with his cohort of guards returned to Demetrias. From there, in order that he might meet every movement of his enemies, he sent men into Phocis and Euboea and to Peparethus, to select heights from which signal fires might be visible. For himself he placed a watch-tower on Mount Tisaeus,[2] whose peak rises to a great height, so that by fires [3] on distant heights he might in an instant receive a message as to where his enemies were active.

The Roman commander and King Attalus crossed from Peparēthus to Nicaea.[4] From there they sailed over to Euboea in their fleet and to the city of Oreum,[5] which is the first of the cities of Euboea situated on the left as one coming from the Gulf of Demetrias steers towards Chalcis and the Euripus. Between Attalus and Sulpicius it was agreed that the Romans should attack from the sea, the king's forces from the land. VI. In four days after the fleet came in they attacked the city. That time was spent in secret conversations with Plator, who had been put in command of the city by Philip. The place has two citadels, one overhanging the sea; the other is in the centre of the city. From it a road leads down to the sea through a tunnel, and at seem to have made no use of so elaborate a system; cf. Riepl, Das Nachrichtenwesen des Altertums 61 f., 74 ff., 91 ff.

[4] A stronghold of the Eastern Locrians and a seaport 2½ miles east of Thermopylae; XXXII. xxxii. 9; xxxv. 2; Polybius X. xlii. 4; XVIII. vii. 8; Strabo IX. iv. 13.

[5] Cf. XXXI. xlvi. 6 ff.; Strabo X. i. 3 ff. Earlier it had been called Histiaea.

a.u.c. 547

quinque tabulatorum, egregium propugnaculum, 3 claudebat. Ibi primo atrocissimum contractum est certamen, et turre instructa omni genere telorum, et tormentis machinisque ad oppugnandam eam ex 4 navibus expositis. Cum omnium animos oculosque id certamen avertisset, porta maritumae arcis Plator Romanos accepit, momentoque arx occupata est. Oppidani pulsi inde in mediam urbem ad alteram 5 tendere arcem; et ibi positi erant qui fores portae obicerent. Ita exclusi in medio caeduntur capi- 6 unturque. Macedonum praesidium conglobatum sub arcis muro stetit nec fuga effuse petita, nec 7 pertinaciter proelio inito.[1] Eos Plator venia ab Sulpicio impetrata in naves impositos ad Demetrium Phthiotidis exposuit, ipse ad Attalum se recepit.

8 Sulpicius tam facili ad Oreum successu elatus Chalcidem inde protinus victrici classe petit, ubi haud- 9 quaquam ad spem eventus respondit. Ex patenti utrimque coactum in angustias mare speciem intuenti primo gemini portus in ora duo versi praebuerit;[2] 10 sed haud facile alia infestior classi statio est. Nam et venti ab utriusque terrae praealtis montibus subiti ac procellosi se[3] deiciunt, et fretum ipsum Euripi non septiens die, sicut fama fert, temporibus statis

[1] proelio inito Sp?JK Froben 2: proelium initium P(3), corrected to initum $P^{z}C^{z}M^{1}B^{2}AN$.

[2] praebuerit Sp?A^{t}N^{t}J Froben 2: -buere P(1)N: -buit K Aldus.

[3] se Gronovius, Eds.: om. P(1)NJK Conway.

the seaward end a tower having five stories, a B.C. 207 remarkable defensive work, used to close the road. There at first a very fierce engagement began, for the tower was provided with missiles of every kind, while artillery also and engines had been landed from the ships for an attack upon it. When that conflict had diverted the attention and the eyes of all, Plator admitted the Romans through a gate in the citadel by the sea, and in an instant the citadel was seized. The citizens being repulsed hastened to the heart of the city and the other citadel; and men had been posted there to close the gates. Being thus shut out they were surrounded and slain or captured. The Macedonian garrison stood in a mass under the wall of the citadel, having neither taken to flight in disorder nor gone into battle with determination. Plator, having gained permission from Sulpicius, embarked his men and landed them at Demetrium [1] in Phthiotis, while he himself joined Attalus.

Sulpicius, inspired by a success so easily won at Oreum, sailed thence with his victorious fleet directly to Chalcis, where the result by no means matched his expectation. The sea, which from a wide expanse on both sides is narrowed into a strait, might give one at first sight the appearance of a double harbour facing two entrances. But hardly any other anchorage is more dangerous for a fleet. For sudden, squally winds blow down from very high mountains on either shore, and also the Euripus strait itself does not reverse its direction seven times a day at [1] Two and a half miles from Thebae Phthiotides and named from a temple of Demeter. It was known also as Pyrasus; Strabo IX. v. 14.

A.U.C. 547

reciprocat, sed temere in modum venti nunc huc nunc illuc verso mari, velut monte praecipiti devolutus torrens rapitur. Ita nec nocte nec die quies 11 navibus datur. Cum classem tam infesta statio accepit, tum et oppidum alia parte clausum mari, alia ab terra egregie munitum praesidioque valido firmatum et praecipue fide praefectorum principumque, quae fluxa et vana apud Oreum fuerat, 12 stabile atque inexpugnabile fuit. Id prudenter, ut in temere suscepta re, Romanus fecit quod circumspectis difficultatibus, ne frustra tempus tereret, celeriter abstitit incepto classemque inde ad Cynum Locridis—emporium id est urbis Opuntiorum[1] mille passuum a mari sitae—traiecit.

VII. Philippum et ignes ab Oreo editi monuerant, sed serius Platoris fraude ex specula elati; et inpari maritumis[2] viribus haud facilis erat in insulam classi
2 accessus; ita re[3] per cunctationem omissa, ad Chalcidis auxilium, ubi signum accepit, impigre est motus. Nam et ipsa Chalcis quamquam eiusdem insulae urbs est, tamen adeo arto interscinditur freto ut ponte continenti iungatur terraque aditum faciliorem quam
3 mari habeat. Igitur[4] Philippus ab Demetriade

[1] urbis Opuntiorum, this order indicated by $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.; reversed in $A^{a}JKx$ Froben 2.

[2] maritumis, before this $A^{a}N^{a}$Aldus, Conway have tum (om. $SpJK$ Froben 2, but possibly preserved in tumvis, which $P(3)$ have in place of maritumis.

[3] re $A^{a}JK$ Aldus, Conway: res Sp? Froben 2: om. $P(1)N$.

[4] Igitur $P(1)NJK$: Rediit igitur M. Müller.

[1] This is the statement of Strabo l.c. ii. 8 and Pliny N.H. II. 219. Regularity is stressed by Cicero N.D. III. 24, without giving the number of times daily. But the irregularity was proverbial; Plato Phaedo 90 C. In actual fact the real tides are perfectly regular, with four changes daily, while in fixed times,[1] as report has it, but with a current that B.C. 207 like the wind changes irregularly, now this way, now that, it races along as a torrent dashes down from a steep mountain. Thus neither by night nor by day are ships given rest. Not only was the anchorage into which the fleet came so dangerous, but in addition the town was strong and impregnable, being protected on one side by the sea, on the other side, towards the land, extraordinarily fortified and secured by a strong garrison and in particular by the loyalty of its commanders and leading citizens, a quality which at Oreum had been uncertain and delusive. It was wise on the part of the Roman, considering his rash undertaking, that after surveying the difficulties, in order not to waste time for nothing, he promptly gave up the attempt and with his fleet crossed over to Cynus in Locris, the mart of the city of Opus, which is situated a mile from the sea.[2]

VII. Philip had been warned also by fire-signals from Oreum, but through the treachery of Plator they were set too late on the watch-tower. Also, since he was no match in naval strength, approach to the island by a fleet was not easy. He let slip that project by delaying, and, on receiving the signal accordingly, set out with spirit to bring aid to Chalcis. For although Chalcis is likewise a city of the same island, still it is separated by a strait so narrow that the city is linked to the mainland by a bridge, and approach by land is easier than by sea. Accordingly Philip a strait so narrow very marked irregularities are due to secondary causes, chiefly winds.

[2] Nearly two miles from the sea according to Strabo IX. iv. 2, and less than eight east of its port, Cynus. Opus was the chief city of the Eastern (Opuntian) Locrians.

A.U.C. 547

Scotussam, inde de tertia vigilia profectus,[1] deiecto praesidio fusisque Aetolis qui saltum Thermopylarum insidebant, cum trepidos hostis Heracleam compulisset, ipse uno die Phocidis Elatiam milia amplius 4 sexaginta contendit. Eodem ferme die ab Attalo rege Opuntiorum urbs capta diripiebatur. Concesserat eam regi praedam Sulpicius, quia Oreum paucos ante dies ab Romano milite, expertibus regiis, 5 direptum fuerat. Cum [2] Romana classis Oreum sese recepisset,[3] Attalus ignarus adventus Philippi pecu- 6 niis a principibus exigendis terebat tempus, adeoque improvisa res fuit ut, nisi Cretensium quidam forte pabulatum ab urbe longius progressi agmen hostium 7 procul conspexissent, opprimi potuerit. Attalus inermis atque incompositus cursu effuso mare ac naves petit, et molientibus ab terra naves Philippus supervenit [4] tumultumque etiam ex terra nauticis 8 praebuit. Inde Opuntem rediit, deos hominesque accusans quod tantae rei fortunam ex oculis prope 9 raptam amisisset. Opuntii quoque ab eadem ira increpiti quod, cum trahere obsidionem in adventum suum potuissent, viso statim hoste prope in voluntariam deditionem concessissent.

[1] ab Demetriade . . . profectus, placed here by Madvig and many eds.; in P(1)NJK Aldus these words follow deiecto . . . insidebant cum; i.e. P om. four lines and inserted them later.

[2] Cum P(3)NA[1]Aldus: om. SpJK Froben 2.

[3] recepisset A[1]N[1]CM[1] Aldus: se cepisset P(3)N: receperat et SpA[1]JK Froben 2.

[4] supervenit P(1)N Aldus: advenit SpJK Froben 2.

hastened from Demetrias to Scotussa, whence he set B.C. 207 out in the third watch, dislodged the garrison and routed the Aetolians occupying the pass of Thermopylae. Then after driving the enemy in alarm into Heraclēa, he himself in a single day covered a distance of more than sixty miles to Elatīa [1] in Phocis. On about the same day the captured city of Opus was being sacked by King Attalus. Its booty had been given up to the king by Sulpicius because Oreum [2] had been sacked by Roman soldiers a few days before, while the king's troops had no share in it. When the Roman fleet had returned to Oreum, Attalus, unaware of the coming of Philip, was spending his time in exacting money from leading citizens. And so unexpected was the attack that if some of the Cretans, who happened to have gone a long distance from the city to forage, had not caught sight of the enemy's column in the distance, the king could have been overpowered. Attalus' men, being unarmed and in disorder, rushed pell-mell to the sea and their ships; and as they were struggling to cast off, Philip came upon them and from the shore caused further confusion among the sailors. Then he returned to Opus, accusing gods and men because he had lost so great an opportunity, snatched away almost before his eyes. The men of Opus also were no less angrily upbraided because, although they could have dragged out the siege until his coming, at the first sight of the enemy they had almost willingly surrendered.

[1] The largest city of Phocis, commanding roads from the north coast and Thermopylae; Strabo IX. iii. 2, 15.

[2] The name is always masculine in our Greek sources.

A.U.C. 547

Compositis circa Opuntem rebus Thronium[1] est
10 profectus. Et Attalus primo Oreum se recepit[2]; inde, cum fama accidisset Prusian Bithyniae regem in fines regni sui transgressum, omissis Romanis rebus
11 atque Aetolico bello in Asiam traiecit. Et Sulpicius Aeginam classem recepit,[3] unde initio veris profectus erat. Haud maiore certamine quam Opuntem 12 Attalus ceperat, Philippus Thronium cepit. Incolebant urbem eam profugi ab Thebis Phthioticis; urbe sua capta a Philippo cum in fidem Aetolorum perfugissent,[4] sedem iis Aetoli eam dederant urbis vastae ac desertae priore eiusdem Philippi bello.
13 Tum ab Thronio, sicut paulo[5] ante dictum est, recepto profectus Tithronion et Drumias, Doridis parva atque ignobilia oppida, cepit. Inde Elatiam, iussis ibi se opperiri Ptolomaei Rhodiorumque legatis, 14 venit. Ubi cum de finiendo Aetolico bello ageretur— adfuerant enim legati nuper Heracleae concilio Romanorum Aetolorumque—. nuntius adfertur Machanidam Olympiorum sollemne ludicrum parantes Eleos
15 adgredi statuisse. Praevertendum id ratus legatis cum

[1] Thronium Glareanus. Eds.: Toronen (or -em) $P(1)N$ Luchs, Conway, and similarly in §§ 11 and 13, requiring us to believe that Livy was wrong in his geography.

[2] se recepit N^sJK Aldus, Froben, Conway: est profectus $P(1)N$: om. Gronovius, Madvig.

[3] recepit $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: recipit SpN^s Froben 2.

[4] perfugissent $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: -venissent SpA^sN^s (altern.) JK.

[5] paulo N^sJK: om. $P(1)N$. For recepto the MSS. have -cepta to agree with Torone, and the fem. was retained by Alschefski and Madvig with Thronio.

[1] More than two miles from the sea (Strabo IX. iv. 4), this ancient town was high-perched at the west end of Mt. Cnemis. Hence the Locrians of this region were called Epicnemidian.

Having settled matters in the neighbourhood of B.C. 207
Opus, he went to Thronium.[1] Attalus also retired at first to Oreum; and then, when the report reached him that Prusias, King of Bithynia, had crossed into territory belonging to his kingdom, he sailed over to Asia, forsaking the Roman cause and the Aetolian war. And Sulpicius withdrew with his fleet to Aegina, from which he had set out at the beginning of the spring. Philip captured Thronium with no greater struggle than Attalus had in capturing Opus. The inhabitants of the former were refugees from Thebes[2] in Phthiotis. When their city was taken by Philip they had sought refuge in the protection of the Aetolians, whereupon the Aetolians had given them an abiding-place in that city, desolated and abandoned in a previous war with the same Philip. Then setting out from Thronium, which he had recovered, as has just been said, he captured Tithronion and Drumiae, small and unimportant towns in Doris. Then he came to Elatīa, having bidden the envoys of Ptolemy and of the Rhodians[3] to wait for him there. While they were there discussing how to end the Aetolian war—for the envoys had recently been present at the council of the Romans and Aetolians at Heraclēa[4]—came the news that Machanidas had decided to attack the Eleans, who were making ready to celebrate the Olympic Games.[5] Thinking he must make that his first task, the king

[2] A very ancient and important city of Achaia Phthiotis, on a ridge above its port, Pyrasus, two miles away on the Sinus Pagasaeus; Strabo IX. v. 14.

[3] Cf. XXVII. xxx. 4.

[4] Cf. v. 13 f.

[5] I.e. those of the year 208 B.C.; cf. XXVII. xxxv. 3.

A.U.C. 547

benigno responso dimissis—se neque causam eius belli fuisse nec moram, si modo aequa et honesta con-
16 dicione liceat. paci facturum—cum expedito agmine profectus per Boeotiam Megara atque inde Corinthum descendit, unde commeatibus sumptis Phliunta
17 Pheneumque petit. Et iam cum Heraeam venisset, audito Machanidam fama adventus sui territum refugisse Lacedaemonem, Aegium se ad concilium Achaeorum recepit, simul classem Punicam, ut mari quoque aliquid posset,[1] accitam, ibi ratus se inventu-
18 rum. Paucis ante diebus inde Oxeas [2] traiecerant Poeni; inde portus Acarnanum petierant, cum ab Oreo profectum Attalum Romanosque audissent, veriti ne ad [3] se iretur et intra Rhium—fauces eae sunt Corinthii sinus—opprimerentur.

VIII. Philippus maerebat quidem et angebatur, cum ad omnia ipse raptim isset, nulli tamen se rei in tempore occurrisse, et rapientem omnia ex oculis
2 elusisse celeritatem suam fortunam. In concilio autem dissimulans aegritudinem elato animo disseruit,

[1] posset JK Aldus, Froben: possit $P(1)N$.
[2] Oxeas Crévier (cf. Strabo X. ii. 19): uaeas $P(3)N$: ut eas A: phoceas $A^{1}JK$.
[3] ad $P(1)N$: in JK Aldus, Froben, Conway.

---

[1] Phlius lay south-west of Corinth; Pheneus farther west, near a lake of the same name, at the foot of Mt. Cyllene in north-eastern Arcadia.

[2] In western Arcadia, on the river Alpheus and the road to Olympia. It still belonged to the Macedonian king. Cf. Pausanias VIII. xxvi.

[3] The Oxeae were small western islands off the mouth of the Achelous and opposite Cephallenia. They formed the sent away the envoys with a friendly answer: that B.C. 207 he had not been the cause of this war, and would not delay making peace, provided it was possible to do so on fair and honourable terms. Setting out with a light column he came down through Boeotia to Megara and then to Corinth, from which he took on supplies and marched to Phlīus and Phenĕus.[1] And when he had already reached Heraea,[2] he heard that Machanidas, alarmed by the report of his coming, had fled back to Sparta. Thereupon the king went to Aegium for the council of the Achaeans, at the same time thinking that there he would find the Carthaginian fleet which he had summoned that he might be able to accomplish something by sea as well. A few days earlier the Carthaginians had crossed over to the Oxēae,[3] and then had made for the Acarnanian ports, on hearing that Attalus and the Romans had set sail from Oreum. They were afraid they might be pursued and overpowered inside of Rhium,[4] the narrows, that is, of the Gulf of Corinth.

VIII. Philip was sorry indeed and vexed that, although he had himself made rapid marches in every direction, nevertheless he had not met a single situation at the right moment, and that fortune had mocked his speed by whisking everything out of his sight. In the council, however, concealing his vexation, he made a proud speech, calling gods and men southernmost group of the Echinades archipelago. Cf. Strabo VIII. iii. 26 fin.; X. ii. 19.

[4] Properly the Headland on the south side of the strait, and its counterpart, Antirrhium, on the Aetolian side, marking the entrance to the Gulf of Corinth; Thuc. II. 86; Strabo VIII. ii. 3; Pausanias VII. xxii. 10 (Frazer). Also at times of the strait itself; so Livy here and in XXVII. xxix. 9.

A.U.C. 547

testatus deos hominesque se nullo loco nec tempore[1] defuisse quin, ubi hostium arma concrepuissent, eo 3 quanta maxima posset celeritate tenderet; sed vix[2] rationem iniri posse utrum a se audacius an fugacius ab hostibus geratur bellum. Sic ab Opunte Attalum, sic Sulpicium ab Chalcide, sic eis ipsis diebus Machani- 4 dam e manibus suis elapsum. Sed non semper felicem esse fugam, nec pro difficili id bellum habendum in quo, si modo congressus cum hostibus[3] sis, viceris. 5 Quod primum esset, confessionem se hostium habere nequaquam pares esse sibi[4]; brevi et victoriam haud dubiam habiturum, nec meliore eventu eos secum quam spe pugnaturos.

6 Laeti regem socii audierunt. Reddidit inde Achaeis Heraeam et Triphuliam, Alipheram autem Megalopolitis, quod suorum fuisse finium satis probabant, 7 restituit. Inde navibus acceptis ab Achaeis—erant autem tres quadriremes et biremes totidem— 8 Anticyram traiecit. Inde quinqueremibus septem et lembis viginti amplius, quos, ut adiungeret Carthaginiensium classi, miserat in Corinthium sinum, pro-

[1] nullo . . . tempore Gronovius, Madvig, Conway: nullo . . . tempori $P(1)N$: nulli . . . tempori A^1K Luchs (with tempore J).

[2] vix $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben: haud Rhenanus, from id of SpN^e(altern.).

[3] hostibus $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.: hoste $SpJK$ Froben 2, Conway.

[4] sibi $P(1)N$: eos $SpJK$ Froben 2: eos sibi x Aldus.

to witness that at no place or time had he failed to B.C. 207 hasten with all possible speed to any place where the din of enemies' arms had been heard. But it could scarcely be made out, he said, whether his audacity in carrying on the war was the greater, or his enemies' eagerness to run away. So from Opus Attalus had slipped out of his hands, so had Sulpicius from Chalcis, so in those very days had Machanidas. But not always was flight successful, nor must that be accounted a difficult war in which you are the victor if you have merely made contact with the enemy. What was of most significance, he said, he had the confession of his enemies that they were by no means his equals. Soon he would likewise have no uncertain victory, and they would fight against him with a result no better than they had hoped.

The allies rejoiced when they listened to the king. Thereupon he delivered Heraea and Triphylia[1] to the Achaeans, but restored Aliphēra[2] to Megalopolis, because the citizens of the latter gave sufficient proofs that it had belonged to their territory. Then on receiving ships—they were three quadriremes and as many biremes—from the Achaeans, he sailed over to Anticyra.[3] From there he set sail with seven quinqueremes and more than twenty light vessels previously sent by him into the Gulf of Corinth to be added to the Carthaginian fleet, and made a landing at [1] Not actually given back to Achaia until 198 B.C.; XXXII. v. 4. Cf. Strabo VIII. iii. 3. For Heraea cf. p. 30, n. 2. Triphylia lay south of the Alphēus, and reached the sea on the west.

[2] In Arcadia, near the border of Triphylia; XXXII. l.c.; Pausanias VIII. xxvi. 5–7.

[3] The Locrian Anticyra, near the entrance to the Gulf; cf. Vol. VII. p. 100, n.

A.U.C. 547

fectus ad Eruthras Aetolorum, quae prope Eupalium
9 sunt, escensionem fecit. Haud fefellit Aetolos; nam hominum quod aut in agris aut in propinquis castellis Potidaniae atque Apolloniae fuit in silvas montesque
10 refugit; pecora, quae inter festinationem abigi nequierant, sunt direpta et in naves conpulsa. Cum iis ceteraque praeda Nicia praetore Achaeorum Aegium misso, cum Corinthum petisset, pedestris
11 inde copias per Boeotiam terra duci iussit. Ipse ab Cenchreis praeter terram Atticam [1] super Sunium navigans inter medias prope hostium classes Chalci-
12 dem pervenit. Inde conlaudata fide ac virtute, quod neque timor nec spes flexisset eorum animos, hortatusque in posterum ut eadem constantia permanerent in societate, si suam quam Oritanorum atque [2]
13 Opuntiorum fortunam mallent, ab Chalcide Oreum navigat, principumque iis qui fugere capta urbe quam se Romanis tradere maluerant summa rerum et custodia urbis permissa, ipse Demetriadem ab Euboea, unde primum [3] ad opem ferendam sociis
14 profectus erat, traiecit. Cassandreae deinde centum navium longarum carinis positis contractaque ad effectum eius operis multitudine fabrorum navalium, quia res in Graecia tranquillas et profectio Attali fecerat et in tempore laborantibus sociis latum ab se

[1] terram Atticam $P(1)N$ Aldus: atticen SpJ(-em) Froben 2.
[2] in posterum . . . atque $A^{1}N^{1}JK$ Eds.: om. $P(1)N$, four or five lines.
[3] primum $P(1)N$ Aldus: primo Sp?JK Froben 2.

[1] A seaport of the Ozolian Locrians, on the north shore of the Gulf, but at this time belonging to the Aetolians. Inland and to the north lay Eupalium.
[2] Mentioned by Thucydides III. 96; along the upper course of the Daphnus river, north-west of Anticyra and Erythrae.

Erythrae,[1] in Aetolia and near Eupalium. He did B.C. 207 not surprise the Aetolians, for all the men who were either on the farms or in the nearest strongholds, Potidania [2] and Apollonia, fled into the forests and the mountains. Sheep and goats which in their haste could not be driven away were seized and loaded on the ships. With these and the rest of the booty Nicias, chief magistrate of the Achaeans, was sent to Aegium; and when the king had reached Corinth, he ordered his land forces to march from there overland across Boeotia. He himself sailing from Cenchreae along the coast of Attica round Sunium, almost through the midst of enemy fleets, came to Chalcis. Then, after praising their loyalty and courage, in that neither fear nor hope had swayed their spirit, and encouraging them to remain his allies with the same steadfastness for the future, if they preferred their own lot to that of the men of Oreum and Opus, he sailed from Chalcis to Oreum. Then entrusting the government and defence of the city to leading citizens who had preferred to flee after the capture of the city rather than to surrender to the Romans, he himself crossed over from Euboea to Demetrias, from which he had first set out to bring aid to his allies. At Cassandrīa [3] he then laid down the keels of a hundred war-ships and brought together a great number of ship-carpenters to complete the task. Having done so, inasmuch as peaceful conditions had been produced in Greece both by the departure of Attalus and by the timely aid which he

Not far away was a similar stronghold, Apollonia, not to be confused with any of the better-known Apollonias.

[3] On the Chalcidic Peninsula; formerly called Potidaea, but rebuilt by Cassander (founder of Thessalonica also) in 316 B.C. Cf. XLIV. xi. 2.

A.U.C. 547

auxilium, retro in regnum concessit, ut Dardanis bellum inferret.

IX. Extremo aestatis eius qua haec in Graecia gesta sunt, cum Q. Fabius Maximus filius [1] legatus ab M. Livio consule Romam ad senatum [2] nuntiasset consulem satis praesidii Galliae provinciae credere L. 2 Porcium cum suis legionibus esse, decedere se inde ac deduci exercitum consularem posse, patres non M. Livium tantum redire ad urbem, sed conlegam 3 quoque eius C. Claudium iusserunt. Id modo in decreto interfuit quod M. Livi exercitum reduci, Neronis legiones Hannibali oppositas manere in 4 provincia iusserunt. Inter consules ita per litteras convenit ut, quem ad modum uno animo rem publicam gessissent, ita, quamquam ex diversis regionibus convenirent, uno tempore ad urbem accederent; Praeneste qui prior venisset, collegam ibi opperiri 5 iussus. Forte ita evenit ut eodem die ambo Praeneste venirent. Inde praemisso edicto ut triduo post frequens senatus ad aedem Bellonae adesset, omni multitudine obviam effusa ad urbem accessere. 6 Non salutabant modo universi circumfusi,[3] sed con-

[1] Maximus filius Allen, Conway (with Maximi Gronovius, Eds.): maximi p (or p̄) P(3): maximus pre N: maximus $C^2A^2Sp^2JK$.

[2] senatum, followed by missus in A^4N^5JK Aldus, Froben: not so in P(1)N.

[3] circumfusi P(1)NJK Aldus: om. Froben 2, Johnson.

---

[1] For their threatened invasion cf. XXVII. xxxii. 9; xxxiii. 1.

[2] The undefined region meant by Gallia was often called Ager Gallicus, or merely suggested by the town-name Ariminum. There was no province then in the sense comparable to 'province of Sardinia.' Cf. Vol. VI. p. 315 and n. 2; below, x. 12; xxxviii. 13; XXIX, xiii. 2; XXX. i. 7.

had himself borne to his distressed allies, he withdrew B.C. 207 into his own kingdom in order to wage war against the Dardanians.[1]

IX. At the end of the summer in which these events took place in Greece, Quintus Fabius Maximus the son, as an emissary of Marcus Livius, the consul, reported to the senate at Rome that the consul considered Lucius Porcius with his legions a sufficient defence for Gaul, his own assignment;[2] that he himself could retire from it and his consular army could be withdrawn. Thereupon the senators ordered that not merely Marcus Livius but also his colleague Gaius Claudius should return to the city. The only difference in the decree was that they ordered the return of the army of Marcus Livius, but that Nero's legions facing Hannibal should remain in that province. Between the consuls an agreement was made by letter that, just as they had carried on the war with one purpose only, so, although coming from opposite directions, they should approach the city at one and the same time. Whichever should first reach Praeneste was instructed to wait for his colleague there. It chanced that both reached Praeneste on the same day. From there they sent in advance an edict that three days later the senate should meet with full attendance in the Temple of Bellona;[3] and with the whole populace flocking out to meet them they drew near to the city. Not only did everyone in the surrounding crowd greet them, [3] This temple stood below the Citadel and near the east end of the Flaminian Circus. Being outside the pomerium it was used by the senate when returning generals were to present their claims to a triumph; also when foreign ambassadors were to be received. Cf. xxxviii. 2; XXVI. xxi. 1; XXX. xxi. 12; XLII. xxxvi. 2.

A.U.C. 547

tingere[1] pro se quisque victrices dextras consulum cupientes, alii gratulabantur, alii gratias agebant, 7 quod eorum opera incolumis res publica esset. In senatu cum more omnium imperatorum expositis rebus ab se gestis postulassent ut pro re publica fortiter feliciterque[2] administrata et deis immortalibus haberetur honos et ipsis triumphantibus urbem
8 inire liceret, se vero ea quae postularent decernere patres merito deorum primum, dein secundum deos
9 consulum responderunt; et supplicatione amborum nomine et triumpho utrique decreto, inter ipsos, ne, cum bellum communi animo gessissent, triumphum
10 separarent, ita convenit, ut,[3] quoniam et in provincia M. Livi res gesta esset, et eo die quo pugnatum foret eius forte auspicium fuisset et exercitus Livianus deductus Romam venisset, Neronis deduci de provincia non potuisset, ut M. Livium quadrigis urbem ineuntem milites sequerentur, C. Claudius equo sine militibus inveheretur.

11 Ita consociatus triumphus cum utrique, tum magis ei qui quantum merito anteibat, tantum honore
12 conlegae cesserat, gloriam auxit. Illum equitem aiebant sex dierum spatio transcurrisse longitudinem

[1] contingere A¹JK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1) : prospicere N.
[2] feliciterque P(1)N Aldus : fideliterque SpA¹JK Froben 2.
[3] ut P(1)NJK Aldus, Eds. : om. Sp Froben 2, Conway.

[1] Since the consuls had commanded on alternate days, only one of them had both imperium and auspices on the day of the battle.

but vying with one another in their desire to grasp B.C. 207 the victorious right hands of the consuls some were congratulating them, others were offering thanks because by their services the state was safe. In the senate after the manner of all commanders-in-chief they stated their achievements and demanded that for a brave and successful conduct of the war honour should be paid to the immortal gods; likewise that they themselves should be permitted to enter the city in triumph. Whereupon the senators replied that they did indeed decree the granting of their demands with due recognition first of the gods, and then next to the gods, of the consuls. After a thanksgiving had been decreed in honour of them both and a triumph also to each, in order that they should not have separate triumphs after conducting the war with a common purpose, they came to an agreement as follows. Inasmuch as the battle had been fought in the province of Marcus Livius, and on the day of the battle the auspices also, as it happened, had been his,[1] and inasmuch as Livius' army had been brought back to Rome, while Nero's could not be brought back from his province, they agreed between them that Marcus Livius should enter the city in a four-horse chariot with his soldiers following him, and that Gaius Claudius should ride on horseback without his soldiers.

This sharing of the triumph added indeed to the glory of both, but even more so for the one who had yielded to his colleague in honour to the same degree that he surpassed him in his achievement. That man now on horseback in the space of six days had traversed the whole length of Italy, men kept saying, and had fought, standards against standards, with

A.U.C. 547

Italiae, et eo die cum Hasdrubale in Gallia signis conlatis pugnasse quo eum castra adversus sese in 13 Apulia posita habere Hannibal credidisset. Ita unum consulem pro utraque parte Italiae adversus duos exercitus,[1] duos imperatores, hinc consilium suum, 14 hinc corpus opposuisse. Nomen Neronis satis fuisse ad continendum castris Hannibalem; Hasdrubalem vero qua alia re quam adventu eius obrutum atque
15 exstinctum esse? Itaque iret alter consul sublimis curru multiiugis, si vellet, equis; uno equo per urbem verum triumphum vehi, Neronemque, etiam si pedes incedat, vel parta eo bello vel spreta eo triumpho
16 gloria memorabilem fore. Hi sermones spectantium Neronem usque in Capitolium prosecuti sunt. Pecuniae[2] in aerarium tulerunt sestertium triciens, 17 octoginta[3] milia aeris. Militibus M. Livius quinquagenos senos asses divisit; tantundem C. Claudius absentibus militibus suis est pollicitus, cum ad 18 exercitum redisset. Notatum est[4] eo die plura carmina militaribus iocis in C. Claudium quam in 19 consulem suum iactata; equites L. Veturium et Q. Caecilium legatos magnis tulisse laudibus hortatosque esse plebem ut eos consules in proxumum annum 20 crearent; adiecisse equitum praerogativae auctoritatem consules postero die in contione quam forti fidelique duorum praecipue legatorum opera usi essent commemorantes.

[1] exercitus Luchs, M. Müller (cf. xxviii. 9; xxxviii. 3): duces $P(1)NJK$. Koch and Madvig (1886) would substitute duas acies for duos duces, which Conway considers corrupt. Anaphora is defended by the balanced structure.

[2] Pecuniae $PSp?A^{a}JK$ Froben 2: -iam $P^{2}(3)$Aldus: -ia BDN.

[3] octoginta $P(1)NSp?$ Aldus, Froben: nonaginta A^{a}(marg.) and in numerals JK.

Hasdrubal in Gaul on a day on which Hannibal had B.C. 207 believed the consul had his camp established facing his own in Apulia. Thus a single consul in defence of both regions of Italy had confronted two armies and two generals, here with his strategy and there in person. Nero's name had been enough, they said, to keep Hannibal within his camp. As for Hasdrubal, what else than Nero's arrival had overwhelmed and destroyed him? Thus let the other consul drive standing erect in a chariot drawn, if he wished, by many horses. The truly triumphant progress through the city was on a single horse; and Nero, even if he went on foot, would be memorable, be it for the glory won in that war, or for his contempt of it in that triumph. Such was the talk of the spectators who accompanied Nero all the way to the Capitol. As for money, the consuls carried into the Treasury three million sesterces and eighty thousand asses. To his soldiers Marcus Livius apportioned fifty-six asses apiece. Gaius Claudius promised the same amount to his absent soldiers when he should return to the army. It has been remarked that in the jesting of the soldiers on that day more of their songs were levelled at Gaius Claudius than at their own consul; that the knights highly extolled Lucius Veturius and Quintus Caecilius, the lieutenant-generals, and urged the commons to elect them consuls for the following year; also that to the knights' preliminary choice the consuls on the next day added their authority by an address to the people, stating what brave and faithful service they had had in particular from their two lieutenants.

---

[4] est A^1N^2JK : om. $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben.

A.U.C. 547

X. Cum comitiorum tempus adpeteret et per dictatorem comitia haberi placuisset, C. Claudius consul M. Livium conlegam dictatorem dixit, Livius Q. Caecilium magistrum equitum. A M. Livio dictatore creati consules L. Veturius Q. Caecilius, is ipse qui tum erat magister equitum. Inde praetorum comitia habita; creati C. Servilius M. Caecilius Metellus Ti. Claudius Asellus Q. Mamilius Turrinus, qui tum aedilis plebis erat. Comitiis perfectis dictator magistratu abdicato dimissoque exercitu in Etruriam provinciam ex senatus consulto est profectus ad quaestiones habendas qui Etruscorum Umbrorumve populi defectionis ab Romanis ad Hasdrubalem sub adventum[1] eius consilia agitassent quique eum auxiliis aut commeatu aut ope aliqua iuvissent. Haec eo anno domi militiaeque gesta.

Ludi Romani ter toti instaurati ab aedilibus curulibus Cn. Servilio Caepione Ser. Cornelio Lentulo; item ludi plebeii semel toti instaurati ab aedilibus plebis M. Pomponio Mathone et Q. Mamilio Turrino.

A.U.C. 548

Tertio decimo anno Punici belli, L. Veturio Philone et Q. Caecilio Metello consulibus, Bruttii ambobus, ut cum Hannibale bellum gererent, provincia decreta. Praetores exinde sortiti sunt M. Caecilius

[1] adventum P(1)NSp?JK Froben 2: -tu x Aldus (and so in § 12).

X. Inasmuch as the time for elections was approaching and it had been decided that the elections should be conducted by a dictator, the consul Gaius Claudius named his colleague Marcus Livius dictator, and Livius named Quintus Caecilius master of the horse. The consuls elected were announced by Marcus Livius as dictator, namely, Lucius Veturius and Quintus Caecilius, the same being at the time master of the horse. Then the elections of praetors were held. Elected were Gaius Servilius, Marcus Caecilius Metellus, Tiberius Claudius Asellus, Quintus Mamilius Turrinus, who was at the time a plebeian aedile. The elections being completed, the dictator, abdicating his office and discharging his army, set out in accordance with a decree of the senate for Etruria as his province, to conduct an investigation as to what communities among the Etruscans or Umbrians had discussed plans to revolt from the Romans to Hasdrubal upon his arrival, and which states had aided him with auxiliaries or supplies or any kind of assistance. Such were the events at home and in the field that year. B.C. 207

The Roman Games were repeated three times completely by the curule aediles, Gnaeus Servilius Caepio and Servius Cornelius Lentulus. Likewise the Plebeian Games were completely repeated once by the plebeian aediles, Marcus Pomponius Matho and Quintus Mamilius Turrinus.

In the thirteenth year of the Punic war, the consulship of Lucius Veturius Philo and Quintus Caecilius Metellus, the land of the Bruttii was assigned by decree to them both as their province, to carry on war with Hannibal. The praetors then received their assignments by lot, Marcus Caecilius Metellus the B.C. 206

A.U.C. 548

Metellus urbanam, Q. Mamilius peregrinam, C. Ser-10 vilius Siciliam, Ti. Claudius Sardiniam. Exercitus ita divisi: consulum alteri quem C. Claudius prioris anni consul, alteri quem Q. Claudius propraetor—eae binae legiones erant—habuissent[1] exercitum; 11 in Etruria duas volonum legiones a C. Terentio propraetore M. Livius proconsul, cui prorogatum in 12 annum imperium erat, acciperet; et Q. Mamilius ut collegae iurisdictione tradita Galliam cum exercitu cui L. Porcius praetor[2] praefuerat obtineret decretum est, iussusque populari agros Gallorum qui ad Poenos 13 sub adventum Hasdrubalis defecissent. C. Servilio cum Cannensibus duabus legionibus, sicut C. Mami-14 lius tenuerat, Sicilia tuenda data. Ex Sardinia vetus exercitus, cui A. Hostilius praefuerat, deportatus; novam legionem quam Ti. Claudius traiceret secum 15 consules conscripserunt. Q. Claudio ut Tarentum,
C. Hostilio Tubulo ut Capuam provinciam haberet, 16 prorogatum in annum imperium est. M. Valerius proconsul, qui tuendae circa Siciliam maritumae orae praefuerat, triginta navibus C. Servilio praetori traditis[3] cum cetera omni classe redire ad arbem iussus.

XI. In civitate tanto discrimine belli sollicita, cum omnium secundorum adversorumque causas in

[1] habuissent P(1)NJ Eds.: -set K Aldus, Froben, Conway.
[2] praetor Pighius, Eds.: pro pr. P(1)NJK Weissenborn, who accepts it as Livy's error.
[3] praetori traditis Weissenborn, Conway: praeditis P(1)N: traditis $C^3A^1N^aJK$ Aldus, Froben.

[1] I.e. the city praetor. It was a frequent practice during this war to relieve the praetor peregrinus of his judicial duties so that he might take a command; e.g. XXV. iii. 2; XXVII. xxxvi. 11; XXX. i. 9; xxvii. 9; xl. 5.

city praetorship, Quintus Mamilius the duties of B.C. 206 praetor peregrinus; Gaius Servilius received Sicily and Tiberius Claudius Sardinia. The armies were divided as follows: to one of the consuls the army which Gaius Claudius had had as consul in the preceding year, to the other consul that which Quintus Claudius had had as propraetor; and these were of two legions each. In Etruria Marcus Livius as proconsul, with his command continued for one year, was to take the two legions of slave-volunteers from Gaius Terentius, the propraetor; and it was decreed that Quintus Mamilius, handing over his judicial duties to his colleague,[1] should have command of Gaul with the army which Lucius Porcius, the praetor, had commanded; and he was ordered to lay waste the lands of the Gauls who had revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Hasdrubal. The defence of Sicily was given to Gaius Servilius with the two legions from Cannae, just as Gaius Mamilius had held it. From Sardinia the old army which Aulus Hostilius had commanded was withdrawn. A new legion which Tiberius Claudius should take across with him was enrolled by the consuls. Military authority was continued for the year for Quintus Claudius, to have Tarentum as his assignment, and for Gaius Hostilius Tubulus, who was to have Capua. Marcus Valerius, the proconsul, who had been in charge of the defence of the entire seacoast of Sicily, was ordered to turn over thirty ships to Gaius Servilius, the praetor, and to return to the city with all the rest of his fleet.

XI. In the state perturbed by so critical a moment in the war, since men attributed to the gods the causes of everything fortunate and unfortunate,

A.U.C. 543

2 deos verterent, multa prodigia nuntiabantur: Tarracinae Iovis aedem, Satrici Matris [1] Matutae de caelo tactam; Satricanos haud minus terrebant in aedem Iovis foribus ipsis duo perlapsi angues; ab Antio nuntiatum est cruentas spicas metentibus visas 3 esse; Caere porcus biceps et agnus mas idem feminaque natus erat; et Albae duo soles visos ferebant 4 et nocte Fregellis lucem obortam; et bos in agro Romano locutus, et ara Neptuni multo manasse sudore [2] in circo Flaminio dicebatur, et aedes Cereris, 5 Salutis, Quirini de caelo tactae. Prodigia consules hostiis maioribus procurare iussi et supplicationem unum diem habere; ea ex senatus consulto facta. 6 Plus omnibus aut nuntiatis peregre aut visis domi prodigiis terruit animos hominum ignis in aede Vestae exstinctus, caesaque flagro est Vestalis cuius custodia eius noctis fuerat iussu P. Licini pontificis. 7 Id quamquam nihil portendentibus deis ceterum neglegentia humana acciderat, tamen et hostiis maioribus procurari et supplicationem ad Vestae haberi placuit.

8 Priusquam proficiscerentur consules ad bellum, moniti [3] a senatu sunt ut in agros reducendae plebis curam haberent: deum benignitate summotum bellum ab urbe Romana et Latio esse, et [4] posse sine

[1] Matris, after this $P(1)N$ om. as far as Satri- : supplied by $A^{1}N^{1}JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[2] manasse sudore $P(1)N$ Aldus: sudore manasse JK Froben 2.

[3] moniti $P(1)N$ Aldus: admoniti $Sp?A^{1}JK$ Froben 2.

[4] et $SpA^{1}N^{1}JK$ Froben 2 : om. $P(1)N$ Aldus.

---

[1] As in XXII. i. 10, also at Antium.

[2] Probably an aurora; cf. note on XXIX. xiv. 3.

[3] I.e. pontifex maximus, elected in 212 B.C.; XXV. v. 2-4.

many portents were reported: that at Tarracina the temple of Jupiter, at Satricum that of Mater Matuta, had been struck by lightning. The people of Satricum were no less alarmed by two serpents that glided into the temple of Jupiter, actually through the doorway. From Antium it was reported that ears of grain appeared to the reapers to be blood-stained.[1] At Caere a pig had been born with two heads and a lamb that was at the same time male and female; and at Alba they said that two suns were seen, and at Fregellae that light had appeared in the night ;[2] and an ox was said to have spoken in the country about Rome, and the altar of Neptune in the Flaminian Circus to have been dripping with sweat; and the temples of Ceres and Salus and Quirinus to have been struck by lightning. The consuls were bidden to expiate the prodigies with full-grown victims and to have a single day of prayer observed. Both orders were carried out in accordance with the decree of the senate. More terrifying to men than all the prodigies, whether reported from outside or seen in the city, was the extinction of the fire in the Temple of Vesta; and the Vestal who had been on duty that night was scourged by order of Publius Licinius, the pontifex.[3] Although the thing had happened without a portent from the gods but by a mortal's negligence, it was nevertheless decided that it should be expiated by full-grown victims and that a day of prayer at the Temple of Vesta should be observed. B.C. 206

Before the consuls should leave for the field they were reminded by the senate that they should take care to restore the common people to their farms. By the favour of the gods the war had been removed, they said, from the city of Rome and from Latium,

A.U.C. 548

metu in agris habitari; minime [1] convenire Siciliae 9 quam Italiae colendae maiorem curam esse. Sed res haudquaquam erat populo facilis, et [2] liberis cultoribus bello absumptis et inopia servitiorum et pecore direpto villisque dirutis aut incensis. Magna tamen pars auctoritate consulum compulsa in agros remi-
10 gravit. Moverant autem huiusce rei mentionem Placentinorum et Cremonensium legati, querentes agrum suum ab accolis Gallis incursari ac vastari, magnamque partem colonorum suorum dilapsam esse, et iam infrequentis se urbes, agrum vastum ac 11 desertum habere. Mamilio praetori mandatum ut colonias ab hoste tueretur; consules ex senatus consulto edixerunt ut qui cives Cremonenses atque Placentini essent ante certam diem in colonias reverterentur. Principio deinde veris et ipsi ad bellum profecti sunt.

12 Q. Caecilius consul exercitum ab C. Nerone, L. Veturius a Q. Claudio propraetore accepit novisque
13 militibus quos ipse conscripserat supplevit. In Consentinum agrum consules exercitum duxerunt, passimque depopulati, cum agmen iam grave praeda esset, in saltu angusto a Bruttiis iaculatoribusque 14 Numidis turbati sunt ita ut non praeda tantum sed armati quoque in periculo fuerint. Maior tamen tumultus quam pugna fuit, et praemissa praeda in-15 columes legiones in loca culta evasere. Inde [3] in

[1] metu . . . minime $A^1N^1(JK$ with habitare): om. $P(1)N$.
[2] et A^1N^1JK Aldus: om. $P(1)N$.
[3] Inde N^2 or N^1JK Aldus: om. $P(1)N$.

and it was possible to live on the farms without fear; B.C. 206
it was illogical to give more attention to the cultivation of Sicily than of Italy. But it was no easy matter for the people, since free farmers had been wiped out by the war, and there was a scarcity of slaves, while cattle had been stolen and farm-houses demolished or burned. A large proportion of the rustics, however, were constrained by the authority of the consuls to move back to their farms. The occasion for bringing up the matter had been the complaints of representatives of Placentia and Cremona that their territory was being raided and laid waste by neighbouring Gauls, and that a large part of their colonists had scattered, and that now they had sparsely peopled cities and land desolated and deserted. Mamilius, the praetor, was ordered to protect the colonies from the enemy. The consuls in accordance with a decree of the senate proclaimed that all citizens of Cremona and Placentia should return to their colonies before a fixed date. Then at the beginning of spring they also set out for the field.

Quintus Caecilius, the consul, received his army from Gaius Nero; Lucius Veturius took his from Quintus Claudius, the propraetor, and recruited it with fresh soldiers whom he had himself enrolled. The consuls led their army into the territory of Consentia and ravaged it far and wide. When the column was now laden with booty, they were so harried by Bruttians and Numidian spearmen in a narrow pass that not only the booty but also the troops were in danger. However, there was more commotion than battle; and sending the booty in advance the legions without loss made their way out into arable country. Thence the consul set out

A.U.C. 548

Lucanos profecti; ea sine certamine tota gens in dicionem populi Romani rediit.

XII. Cum Hannibale nihil eo anno rei gestum est. Nam neque ipse se obtulit in tam recenti volnere publico privatoque neque lacessierunt quietum Romani: tantam inesse vim, etsi omnia alia circa eum 2 ruerent, in uno illo duce censebant. Ac nescio an 3 mirabilior adversis quam secundis rebus fuerit, quippe qui, cum [1] in hostium terra per annos tredecim, tam procul ab domo, varia fortuna bellum gereret, exercitu non suo civili, sed mixto ex conluvione omnium gentium, quibus non lex, non mos, non lingua communis, 4 alius habitus, alia vestis, alia arma, alii ritus, alia sacra, alii prope dei essent, ita quodam uno vinculo copulaverit eos ut nulla nec inter ipsos nec adversus 5 ducem seditio exstiterit, cum et pecunia saepe in stipendium et commeatus in hostium agro deessent,[2] quorum inopia priore Punico bello multa infanda inter 6 duces militesque commissa fuerant. Post Hasdrubalis vero exercitum cum duce, in quibus spes omnis reposita victoriae fuerat, deletum cedendoque in angulum Bruttium cetera Italia concessum, cui non videatur mirabile nullum motum in castris factum? 7 Nam ad cetera id quoque accesserat ut ne alendi quidem exercitus nisi ex Bruttio agro spes esset, qui, ut

[1] qui cum x Crévier: qui cum et x Aldus, Froben: cum A^2N^2 or N^1: eum JK: et $P(1)A^2N$.
[2] deessent NJK Froben 2: -set $P(1)$ Aldus.

[1] This passage is obviously reminiscent of Polybius' tribute to Hannibal in a fragment of Book XI (xix. esp. 3–5). Cf. XXIII. v. 11; XXX. xxxiii. 8; XXIV. iii. 12.

for Lucania. That entire nation returned without a struggle to its allegiance to the Roman people. B.C. 206

XII. With Hannibal there was no campaigning that year. For neither did he invite attack, owing to his very recent wound, a blow national as well as personal, nor did the Romans provoke him so long as he remained inactive; such power they believed to be present in that one commander, even though everything else round him crashed. And I am inclined to think he was more marvellous in adversity than in success. For here he was, carrying on war in the enemy's land for thirteen years, so far from home with varying fortune, having an army not made up of his own citizens but a mixture of the offscourings of all nations, men who had in common no law, no custom, no language, differing from each other in bearing, in garb, in their arms, differing as to religious rites, sacred observances, one might almost say as to their gods. Yet he somehow bound them together by a single bond, so that no outbreak ensued among the men themselves nor any mutiny against their general.[1] Yet in the enemy's country both money to pay them and supplies were often wanting—deficiencies which in the previous Punic war had given rise to many unspeakable acts on the part of commanders and soldiers. Certainly after the destruction of Hasdrubal's army with its commander—and on them he had rested all his hope of victory—, when by retiring into the remote land of the Bruttii he had given up the rest of Italy, who would not find it a marvel that there was no outbreak in his camp? For added to everything else was this also, that he had no hope even of feeding his army except from the Bruttian region; and even supposing all of it to be under cultivation, it

A.U.C. 548

omnis coleretur, exiguus tamen tanto alendo exercitui
8 erat; tum magnam partem iuventutis abstractam a cultu agrorum bellum occupaverat et mos vitio etiam insitus genti per [1] latrocinia militiam exercendi.
9 Nec ab domo quicquam mittebatur de Hispania retinenda sollicitis, tamquam omnia prospera in Italia essent.
10 In Hispania [2] res quadam ex parte eandem fortunam, quadam longe disparem habebant: eandem quod proelio victi Carthaginienses duce amisso in ultimam Hispaniae oram usque ad Oceanum compulsi
11 erant, disparem autem quod Hispania non quam Italia modo, sed quam ulla pars terrarum bello reparando
12 aptior erat locorum hominumque ingeniis. Itaque ergo prima Romanis inita provinciarum, quae quidem continentis sint, postrema omnium nostra demum aetate ductu auspicioque Augusti Caesaris perdomita 13 est. Ibi tum Hasdrubal Gisgonis, maximus clarissimusque eo bello secundum Barcinos dux, regressus ab Gadibus rebellandi spe, adiuvante Magone Hamilcaris filio, dilectibus per ulteriorem Hispaniam habitis ad quinquaginta milia peditum, quattuor milia et 14 quingentos equites armavit. De equestribus copiis ferme inter auctores convenit; peditum septuaginta milia quidam adducta ad Silpiam urbem

[1] per $P^{z}A^{z}$Aldus: par $P(1)N$: inter $Sp^{?}N^{s}JK$ Froben 2.
[2] retinenda. . . . In Hispania om. $P(1)N$, three lines: supplied by $N^{s}A^{s}JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[1] Since Agrippa's completion of the conquest of north-western Spain is evidently meant here, we have in this refer-was nevertheless too small to feed so large an army. B.C. 206

Moreover a great part of the young men, drawn off from the farming of the land, had been claimed instead by the war and by their custom of training soldiers through brigandage, a practice viciously inbred in their nation. Furthermore, nothing was being sent from home, since they were concerned about their hold upon Spain, as though everything was succeeding in Italy.

In Spain the campaign was having an issue in part the same, in part very different: the same in that the Carthaginians, vanquished in battle with the loss of a general, had been forced to the farthest coast of Spain, even to the Ocean; on the other hand different in that Spain, owing to the nature of the country and its people, was better adapted not merely than Italy but than any other part of the world to preparing for another war. In consequence, though the first of the provinces, at least of those on the mainland, to be entered by the Romans, it has been the last of all to be completely conquered, and not until our own times under the command and auspices of Augustus Caesar.[1] There Hasdrubal son of Gisgo, being the greatest and most distinguished general after the Barca family in that war, had at that time returned from Gades in the hope of renewing the war. After conducting levies in Farther Spain with the help of Mago the son of Hamilcar, he armed about fifty thousand infantry and four thousand five hundred cavalry. As to the cavalry forces there is substantial agreement among the authorities, but some writers state that seventy thousand foot-soldiers were ence to a contemporary event evidence that Book XXVIII was written (or published) after 19 B.C.

A.U.C. 548

15 scribunt. Ibi super campos patentes duo duces Poeni ea mente ne detrectarent certamen consederunt.[1]

XIII. Scipio, cum ad eum fama tanti comparati exercitus perlata esset, neque Romanis legionibus tantae se fore[2] parem multitudini ratus ut non in speciem saltem opponerentur barbarorum auxilia, 2 neque in iis tamen tantum virium ponendum ut mutando fidem, quae cladis causa fuisset patri patruoque, 3 magnum momentum facerent, praemisso Silano ad Culcham duodetriginta oppidis regnantem, ut equites peditesque ab eo quos se per hiemem conscripturum 4 pollicitus erat acciperet, ipse ab Tarracone profectus protinus ab sociis qui accolunt viam modica contra- 5 hendo auxilia Castulonem pervenit. Eo adducta ab Silano auxilia, tria milia peditum et quingenti equites. Inde ad Baeculam urbem progressus[3] omni exercitu civium, sociorum, peditum equitumque quinque et 6 quadraginta milibus. Castra ponentes eos Mago et Masinissa cum omni equitatu adgressi sunt, tur-

[1] consederunt B^2ANJK Froben 2, Conway: -siderunt $P(3)$ Aldus, Eds.

[2] fore $P(3)N^2$ or N^1 Eds.: after parem JKx: om. Sp Froben 2, Conway.

[3] progressus $P(3)$ Eds.: progressus cum $ANJK$ Aldus: processum cum Sp? Froben 2, Conway.

[1] In the MSS. of Polybius 'ΗΛΙΓΓΑ (Elinga, unknown), probably an error for 'ΙΛΙΠΠΑ, i.e. Ilipa (accepted by his editors, XI. xx. 1). It lay 10 miles north of Hispalis (Seville), and on the right bank of the Baetis. Cf. XXXV. i. 10; Pliny N.H. III. 11; Strabo III. ii. 3; v. 9. For Livy's habit of substituting place-names familiar to his readers for those brought to the city of Silpia.[1] There in open plains B.C. 206 the two Carthaginian generals established themselves, resolved not to refuse a battle.

XIII. Scipio, when the news reached him that they had got together so large an army, thought that with Roman legions alone he would be no match for such a multitude unless barbarian auxiliaries should confront them, at least for appearance' sake. Yet he felt that these must not compose so large a part of his forces that by changing sides—which had been the cause of disaster to his father and uncle—they might decide the outcome. Accordingly he sent Silanus in advance to Culchas,[2] who ruled over twenty-eight towns, in order to receive from him the cavalry and infantry which he had promised to enlist during the winter. Then Scipio himself set out from Tarraco, and gathering up as he went a moderate number of auxiliaries from the allies dwelling near the road, he arrived at Castulo.[3] Thither Silanus brought auxiliaries, three thousand infantry and five hundred cavalry. From there Scipio advanced to the city of Baecula [4] with the entire army, forty-five thousand legionaries and allies, infantry and cavalry. As they were pitching camp Mago and Masinissa with all their used by Polybius cf. Ed. Meyer, Kleine Schriften II, 406 ff.; Veith in Kromayer, Antike Schlachtfelder IV, 518; Scullard, Scipio Africanus in the Second Punic War 127 f.

[2] Kolichas in Polybius l.c. §§ 3, 5.

[3] On a tributary of the upper Baetis, giving its name to the Saltus Castulonensis (Sierra Morena). The main road to Corduba and Gades passed through the city; Strabo III, iv. 9. fin. Cf. xix. 2, 4; xx. 8; XXIV. xli. 7.

[4] Cf. Vol. VII. p. 283 n. It was west of Castulo but on the same road. The site cannot be certainly determined, although it has been identified with Bailén. Cf. Polybius XI. xx. 5; Veith in Kromayer op. cit. IV. 503 ff.; Scullard op. cit. 300 ff.

A.U.C. 548

bassentque munientes, ni abditi post tumulum opportune ad id positum ab Scipione equites inproviso in 7 effusos incurrissent. Ei promptissimum quemque et proxime vallum atque in ipsos munitores primum invectum vixdum proelio inito fuderunt. Cum ceteris, qui sub signis atque ordine agminis incesserant, longior et diu ambigua pugna fuit. Sed cum
8 ab stationibus primum expeditae cohortes, deinde ex opere deducti milites atque arma capere iussi plures usque [1] et integri fessis subirent,[2] magnumque iam agmen armatorum a castris in proelium rueret, terga
9 haud dubie vertunt Poeni Numidaeque. Et primo turmatim abibant, nihil propter pavorem festinationemve confusis ordinibus; dein, postquam acrius ultimis incidebat Romanus neque sustineri impetus poterat, nihil iam ordinum memores passim, qua
10 cuique proximum fuit, in fugam effunduntur. Et quamquam eo proelio aliquantum et [3] Romanis aucti et deminuti hostibus animi erant, tamen numquam [4] per aliquot insequentes dies ab excursionibus equitum levisque armaturae cessatum est.

XIV. Ubi satis temptatae per haec levia certamina vires sunt, prior Hasdrubal in aciem copias eduxit,

[1] usque Sp²JK Froben 2 : om. P(1)N Aldus.
[2] subirent A¹N²JK Aldus : om. P(1)N.
[3] et A¹N²JK Aldus : om. P(1)N.
[4] numquam SpA¹N²JK Aldus : om. P(1)N.

[1] The reader would naturally assume that this attack and the important battle which follows took place very near Baecula. But at xii. 14 the Carthaginian generals were encamped near Silpia (Ilipa), i.e. less than 60 miles from the Atlantic at the nearest point, while Baecula is 130 miles farther in a straight line. In Polybius it is Scipio who does the marching (XI. xx. 9). No long march of the Carthaginians to meet him is mentioned, and near Baecula there is cavalry attacked them [1] and would have thrown the men working on the fortifications into confusion, had not cavalry concealed by Scipio behind a hill favourably situated for the purpose unexpectedly charged them in their disorder. These horsemen at the very beginning of the battle put to flight the most active and those who had been the first to ride up close to the earthwork and even among the men at work. With the rest, who had advanced under their standards and in marching order, the battle was more protracted and for a long time indecisive. But when light cohorts at first drawn off from the outposts, and then soldiers withdrawn from work on the fortifications and ordered to take up arms, came up in increasing number, and fresh to assist the weary, while by this time a long column of men under arms was dashing out from camp into battle, Carthaginians and Numidians thereupon faced about in unmistakable retreat. And at first they were retiring by troops, while their ranks were not at all broken on account of fear or haste. Then when the Roman fell more fiercely upon their rear and the attack could not be withstood, no longer mindful of their ranks, they scattered in flight hither and thither, each taking the shortest way. And although the spirit of the Romans was notably higher in consequence of that battle and that of the enemy notably lowered, still for some days following there was never any respite from sudden attacks by cavalry and light-armed. B.C. 206

XIV. When his forces had been sufficiently tested by these skirmishes, Hasdrubal was the first to lead no open plain suited to this battle. Hence this was near modern Seville and not a "second battle of Baecula," as Mommsen, Ihne and others have it.

A.U.C. 548

2 deinde et Romani processere. Sed utraque acies pro vallo stetit instructa, et cum ab neutris pugna coepta esset, iam die ad occasum inclinante a Poeno prius, deinde ab Romano in castra copiae reductae. 3 Hoc idem per dies aliquot factum. Prior semper Poenus copias castris educebat, prior fessis stando signum receptui dabat; ab neutra parte procursum 4 telumve missum aut vox ulla orta. Mediam aciem hinc Romani illinc Carthaginienses mixti Afris, cornua socii tenebant—erant autem utrisque [1] Hispani—; pro cornibus ante Punicam aciem elephanti 5 castellorum procul speciem praebebant. Iam hoc in utrisque castris sermonis erat, ita ut instructi stetissent pugnaturos; medias acies, Romanum Poenumque, quos inter belli causa esset, pari robore 6 animorum armorumque concursuros. Scipio ubi hoc obstinate credi [2] animadvertit, omnia de industria 7 in eum diem quo pugnaturus erat mutavit. Tesseram vesperi per castra dedit ut ante lucem viri equique curati et [3] pransi essent, armatus eques frenatos instratosque teneret equos.

8 Vixdum satis certa luce equitatum omnem cum

[1] utrisque $P(1)N$: utrimque N^1JK Aldus, Froben.

[2] hoc . . . credi JK Conway (with haec most Eds.): haec . . . credita $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben, Alschefski, Weissenborn.

[3] et supplied by Lipsius, Eds.: om. $P(1)N$ Conway: curati also is om. by Sp?JK Froben 2.

---

[1] Some of the elephants carried on their backs a crenellated tower from which javelins were hurled by four or more soldiers posted on the tower; hence the resemblance to forts; XXXVII. xl. 4; cf. Curtius VIII. xii. 7; Pliny N.H. VIII. 22 and 27; Lucretius V. 1302. Such elephanti turriti are represented in terracotta figures and on painted ware.

his troops out into battle-line; then the Roman also B.C. 206 went forward. But each of the two lines stood drawn up in front of its earthwork, and when neither side had begun the battle and the day was now nearing sunset, the troops were led back into camp, first by the Carthaginian and then by the Roman. The same thing happened for a number of days. Always the first to lead his troops out of camp, the first to sound the recall for his men weary of standing still, would be the Carthaginian. From neither side was there a charge, or a missile hurled, or any raising of a shout. The centre was held on one side by the Romans, on the other by the Carthaginians combined with Africans, the wings by their allies, and for both armies these were Spanish troops. In front of the wings, in advance of the Punic line of battle, the elephants presented from a distance the appearance of forts.[1] Already it was common talk in both camps that they were to fight in the formation in which they had stood; that the centres, the Roman and Carthaginian troops, between whom lay the cause of the war, would clash, evenly matched in spirit and in arms. When Scipio observed that this was a persistent belief, he deliberately changed everything for the day on which he was to give battle. At evening he passed a written order through the camp that before daybreak the horses should be cared for and the men have breakfast, that the horsemen under arms should keep their mounts bridled and saddled.[2]

It was not yet quite daylight when he sent all his

[2] Not quite literal for this period. Primarily the word has to do with a cloth kept in place by a girth and straps. Evolution of cloth into saddle was slow.

A.U.C. 548

levi armatura in stationes Punicas immisit; inde confestim ipse cum gravi agmine legionum procedit, 9 praeter opinionem destinatam suorum hostiumque Romano milite cornibus firmatis, sociis in mediam 10 aciem acceptis. Hasdrubal clamore equitum excitatus ut ex tabernaculo prosiluit tumultumque ante vallum et trepidationem suorum et procul signa legionum fulgentia plenosque hostium campos vidit, 11 equitatum omnem extemplo in equites emittit; ipse cum peditum agmine castris egreditur, nec ex ordine 12 solito quicquam acie instruenda mutat. Equitum iam diu anceps pugna erat nec ipsa per se decerni poterat,[1] quia pulsis, quod prope in vicem fiebat, in 13 aciem peditum tutus receptus erat; sed ubi iam haud plus quingentos passus acies inter sese aberant, signo receptui dato Scipio patefactisque ordinibus equitatum omnem levemque armaturam, in medium acceptam divisamque in partes duas, in subsidiis post 14 cornua locat. Inde, ubi incipiendae iam pugnae tempus erat, Hispanos—ea media acies fuit— 15 presso gradu incedere iubet; ipse e[2] dextro cornu —ibi namque praecrat—nuntium ad Silanum et Marcium mittit ut cornu extenderent in sinistram partem, quem ad modum se tendentem ad dextram 16 vidissent, et cum expeditis peditum equitumque prius pugnam consererent cum hoste quam coire inter se

[1] ipsa . . . poterat om. Spx: supplied from $P(1)NJK$.
[2] e om. Sp²JK.

[1] For this battle of Ilipa see the works already cited: Scullard, 126 ff. with plan; Veith, 517 ff. with map.

cavalry with the light-armed against the Punic outposts.[1] Immediately afterwards he himself with the heavy column of the legions went forward, and contrary to the fixed idea of his own men and of the enemy, he formed strong wings of his Roman soldiers, while the allies were taken into the centre. When Hasdrubal, who was aroused by the shouts of the horsemen, sprang out of his tent and saw the uproar outside his earthwork and the excitement among his men, and in the distance the gleaming standards of the legions and the plain filled with the enemy, he forthwith sent out all his cavalry against the horsemen. As for himself, he marched out of the camp with the infantry column, and in drawing up his line made no change from the customary order. The cavalry engagement had long been uncertain, and by itself it could not be decisive because when repulsed—and this repeatedly happened almost by turns—they could safely retire into the infantry line. But when the lines of battle were not more than half a mile apart, Scipio sounding the recall and opening his ranks admitted all the cavalry and the light-armed into the centre; and dividing them into two sections he posted them as a reserve behind the wings. Then, when it was now time to begin the battle, he ordered the Spaniards—they formed the centre of the line—to advance at a slow pace. From the right wing—for he was himself in command there—he sent a message to Silanus and Marcius [2] that they should prolong their wing towards the left, just as they had seen him pressing to the right, and with the light infantry and cavalry should engage the enemy B.C. 206

[2] Cf. Vol. VII. pp. 5 fin., 65 (and notes), 77. Repeatedly mentioned in this Book.

A.U.C. 543

17 mediae acies possent. Ita diductis cornibus cum ternis peditum cohortibus ternisque equitum turmis, ad hoc velitibus, citato gradu in hostem ducebant, 18 sequentibus in obliquum aliis. Sinus in medio erat, qua segnius Hispanorum signa incedebant.
19 Et iam conflixerant cornua, cum quod roboris in hostium acie [1] erat, Poeni veterani Afrique, nondum ad teli coniectum venissent, neque in cornua, ut adiuvarent pugnantes, discurrere auderent, ne aperirent mediam aciem venienti ex adverso hosti.
20 Cornua ancipiti proelio urgebantur: eques levisque armatura ac [2] velites circumductis alis in latera incurrebant; cohortes a fronte urgebant, ut abrumperent cornua a cetera acie. XV. Et cum ab omni parte haudquaquam par pugna erat, tum quod turba [3] Baliarium tironumque Hispanorum Romano Latino-
2 que militi obiecta erat. Et procedente iam die vires etiam [4] deficere Hasdrubalis exercitum coeperant, oppressos matutino tumultu coactosque priusquam cibo corpora firmarent, raptim in aciem

[1] hostium acie JK : acie hostium P(1)N.
[2] ac Madvig, Emend., Conway : et Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)NJK.
[3] turba JK Aldus, Froben : pugna P(1)N.
[4] die vires etiam $A^{s}N^{s}JK$ Eds. : om. P(1)N.

---

[1] Here Polybius XI. xxiii has a detailed account of complicated movements executed by the Roman wings in order to outflank the weaker Carthaginian wings before fighting could reach the centre of the lines. Cf. Scullard op. cit. 132 ff.; Veith, 522 ff.

[2] It has been held that Livy here mistranslated Polybius, who meant maniples. Everything depends upon the interpretation of τρεῖς σπείρας and a following parenthesis, "this infantry unit is called a cohort (κοόρτις) by the Romans"

before the centres could come together.[1] Thus B.C. 206 extending the wings, with three cohorts [2] of infantry and three troops of cavalry on each wing, and with skirmishers in addition, they led at a rapid pace against the enemy, while the rest followed them obliquely. In the centre was a curve where the Spanish units were more slowly advancing.

By this time the wings were already engaged, while the main strength of the enemy's line, the veteran Carthaginians and Africans, had not yet come within range, and did not dare to dash towards the wings to help the combatants, for fear of exposing the centre to the enemy directly advancing. The wings were being hard pressed by a double attack; cavalry and light-armed and skirmishers with enclosing wings were charging into their flanks, while the cohorts were pressing them in front, endeavouring to cut off the wings from the rest of the battle-line. XV. And not only was the battle in general far from being evenly matched, but especially because the horde of Baliares and Spanish recruits had been made to face Roman and Latin soldiers. Besides, as the day now wore on their strength also began to fail Hasdrubal's soldiers, who had been surprised by an early morning onslaught and compelled to go out into line in haste before they

(XI. xxiii. 1). It remains debatable whether "this unit" refers to the single σπείρα, which must then be a maniple, or to the three combined to make a cohort. For manipulus the regular word was σημεία. Later on σπείρα came to be cohort almost invariably. But in Polybius' time one could use either σημεία or σπείρα in the same meaning, as VI. xxiv. 5; so even in the same sentence, as l.c. § 8; III. cxiii. 3; XV. ix. 7. In this battle the larger number, 1800 men, seems absolutely required. Cf. Veith l.c.; F. G. Moore, Classical Weekly, XXXVII. 238 f.

A.U.C. 548

exire. Et[1] ad id sedulo diem extraxerat Scipio ut sera pugna esset; nam ab septima demum hora peditum signa cornibus incucurrerunt[2]; ad medias acies aliquanto serius pervenit pugna, ita ut prius aestus a meridiano sole laborque standi sub armis et simul fames sitisque corpora adficerent quam manus cum hoste consererent. Itaque steterunt scutis innixi. Iam[3] super cetera elephanti etiam, tumultuoso genere pugnae equitum velitumque et levis armaturae consternati, e cornibus in mediam aciem sese intulerant. Fessi igitur corporibus animisque rettulere pedem, ordines tamen servantes, haud secus quam si imperio ducis cederet[4] integra acies.[5] Sed cum eo ipso acrius, ubi inclinatam sensere rem, victores se undique inveherent, nec facile impetus sustineri posset, quamquam retinebat obsistebatque cedentibus Hasdrubal, ab tergo esse colles tutumque receptum, si modice se reciperent, clamitans, tamen vincente metu verecundiam, cum proximus quisque hostem caderet,[6] terga extemplo data, atque in fugam sese omnes effuderunt. Ac primo consistere[7] signa in radicibus collium ac revocare in ordines militem coeperant cunctantibus in adversum collem erigere aciem Romanis; deinde, ut inferri inpigre signa viderunt, integrata fuga in castra pavidi compel-

[1] Et N^1x: om. $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben.
[2] incucurrerunt $P(3)N$: incur- B Aldus: concur- Sp²JK Froben 2.
[3] Iam Weissenborn: nam $P(1)NJK$.
[4] cederet JK Aldus, Froben, Conway: cederent $P(1)N$ Eds.
[5] acies $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Conway: acie Weissenborn, Eds.
[6] caderet Madvig, Luchs, Riemann: cederet $P(3)A^1N^1JK$ Weissenborn, Conway.
[7] consistere $P(1)NJK$ Weissenborn, Conway: constituere Duker, Eds.

could take food to sustain them. And Scipio had B.C. 206 deliberately dragged out the day, in order that the battle might be belated. For it was not until the seventh hour that the infantry units [1] charged the wings. The battle reached the centre of the lines considerably later, so that the heat of the midday sun and the strain of standing under arms, and at the same time hunger and thirst, weakened their bodies before they engaged the enemy. Accordingly they stood resting on their shields. By this time, in addition to everything else, the elephants also took fright at the skirmishing tactics of cavalry and skirmishers and light-armed and had shifted from the wings into the centre. Weakened therefore in body and spirit the men retreated, keeping their ranks nevertheless, just as if by order of the general the line was giving way intact.

But when the victors, on seeing that the tide of battle had turned, for that reason charged with more spirit from all sides, and it was not easy to withstand their attack, although Hasdrubal tried to hold his men back and confronted them as they gave way, shouting to them again and again that in the rear there were hills and a safe refuge if they retired slowly. Nevertheless, as fear overcame their respect for him and those nearest to the enemy were falling, at once they faced about and all took to flight. And at first the standard-bearers began to halt at the foot of the hills and to call the soldiers back into their ranks, while the Romans hesitated to advance their line up the hill. Then when the enemy saw the standards coming bravely on, they resumed their flight and were

[1] I.e. those of xiv. 17, three cohorts on each wing (Veith), or one cohort as the passage has been commonly understood.

A.U.C. 548

11 luntur. Nec procul vallo Romanus aberat, cepissetque tanto impetu castra, nisi [1] ex vehementi sole, qualis inter graves imbre nubes effulget, tanta vis aquae deiecta esset [2] ut vix in castra sua receperint se victores, quosdam etiam religio ceperit [3] ulterius 12 quicquam eo die conandi. Carthaginienses, quamquam fessos labore ac volneribus nox imberque ad 13 necessariam quietem vocabat, tamen, quia metus et periculum cessandi non dabat tempus, prima luce oppugnaturis hostibus castra, saxis undique circa ex propinquis vallibus congestis augent vallum, munimento sese, quando in armis parum praesidii foret, 14 defensuri. Sed transitio sociorum fuga ut tutior mora videretur fecit. Principium defectionis ab 15 Attene regulo Turdetanorum factum est; is cum magna popularium manu transfugit; inde duo munita oppida cum praesidiis tradita a praefectis 16 Romano. Et ne latius inclinatis semel ad defectio-nem animis serperet res, silentio proximae noctis Hasdrubal castra movet.

XVI. Scipio, ut prima luce qui in stationibus erant rettulerunt profectos hostes, praemisso equitatu signa 2 ferri iubet; adeoque citato agmine ducti sunt ut, si via recta vestigia sequentes issent, haud dubie adsecuturi fuerint; ducibus [4] est creditum brevius aliud esse iter ad Baetim fluvium, ut transeuntes
3 adgrederentur. Hasdrubal clauso transitu fluminis

[1] nisi P⁴RA⁴N² or N⁴JK Aldus, Conway: ni se P(3) Eds.

[2] deiecta esset N⁴JK Aldus, Froben, Conway: deiecisset P(1)N Eds.

[3] ceperit P(3)NJ Aldus: ceperat Sp Froben 2: cepit K: coeperit CRB.

[4] ducibus, before this AN Aldus have sed.

driven panic-stricken into camp. Not far from the earthwork were the Romans; and by such momentum they would have captured the camp if, after a blazing sun, such as shines out in the midst of clouds heavy with rain, there had not been so extraordinary a downpour that the victors with difficulty retired to their camp, and had not some been beset by scruples also against any further attempt that day. The Carthaginians, although night and pouring rain invited them to needed rest, being weak from exertion and wounds, nevertheless, because fear and danger gave them no time to be idle when the enemy would attack the camp at daybreak, raised their earthwork by gathering stones from near-by valleys all round, intending to defend themselves by a fortification, since in their arms they would have no sufficient protection. But the desertion of their allies made flight seem safer than delay. Defection began with Attenes, prince of the Turdetani, who deserted with a large force of his tribesmen. Then two fortified towns were handed over with their garrisons to the Roman by their commanders. And for fear the mischief might spread farther, now that men were once disposed to change sides, Hasdrubal moved his camp in the silence of the following night. B.C. 206

XVI. Scipio, when men on outpost duty reported at daylight that the enemy had left, sent his cavalry ahead and ordered the standards to advance. The column also marched at such a pace that, if they had directly followed the enemy's track, they would undoubtedly have overtaken them. They believed the guides that there was another shorter road to the river Baetis, by which they might attack the enemy while crossing over. Hasdrubal, finding the passage

a.u.c. 545

ad Oceanum flectit, et iam inde fugientium modo effusi abibant; itaque[1] ab legionibus Romanis aliquantum intervalli fecit; eques levisque armatura nunc ab tergo nunc ab lateribus occurrendo fatigabat morabaturque; sed[2] cum ad crebros tumultus signa consisterent et nunc equestria nunc cum velitibus auxiliisque peditum proelia consererent, superverunt legiones. Inde non iam pugna sed trucidatio velut pecorum fieri, donec ipse dux fugae auctor in proximos colles cum sex milibus ferme semermium evasit; ceteri caesi captique. Castra tumultuaria raptim Poeni tumulo editissimo communiverunt, atque inde, cum hostis nequiquam subire iniquo ascensu conatus esset,[3] haud difficulter sese tutati sunt. Sed obsidio in loco nudo atque inopi vix in paucos dies tolerabilis erat; itaque transitiones ad hostem fiebant. Postremo dux ipse navibus accitis[4]—nec procul inde aberat mare—nocte relicto exercitu Gades perfugit. Scipio fuga ducis hostium audita decem milia peditum mille equites relinquit Silano ad castrorum obsidionem; ipse cum ceteris copiis septuagensimis castris, protinus causis regulorum civitatiumque cognoscendis, ut praemia ad veram meritorum aestimationem tribui possent, Tarraconem rediit. Post profectionem eius Masi-

[1] itaque $P(1)N$: idque $N^{a}JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[2] sed $P(3)NJK$ Aldus, Froben: et C Madvig, Emend.

[3] conatus esset $P(1)N$ Aldus: -ti essent $SpJK$ Froben 2 (with hostes above).

[4] accitis Weissenborn: acceptis $P^{2}(1)NJK$ Aldus: accipitis P.

[1] Hasdrubal had intended to cross the Baetis and then retreat to Gades (total distance about 75 miles to the harbour of that city). But now he is obliged to remain on the right bank, thus increasing the distance considerably.

of the river closed, turned aside towards the Ocean,[1] B.C. 206 and henceforward, scattering like fugitives, away they went. Thus he put a considerable distance between himself and the Roman legions. Cavalry and light-armed, dashing upon them now from the rear, now on the flanks, kept wearing them out and delaying them. But when in view of the numerous clashes the standards came to a halt and the men were engaged now with cavalry, now with skirmishers and auxiliary infantry, the legions came up. Thereafter it was no longer a battle but a slaughter as of cattle, until the general, himself now approving their flight, escaped to the nearest hills with some six thousand half-armed men. The rest were slain or captured. The Carthaginians hastily fortified an improvised camp on a very high hill and from it they defended themselves without difficulty, since the enemy had tried in vain to come up the steep slope. But in an exposed situation which furnished nothing a siege was scarcely endurable even for a few days. Accordingly there were repeated desertions to the enemy. Finally the general himself sent for ships [2]—the sea was not far away—and leaving his army by night he escaped to Gades. Scipio, learning of the flight of the enemy's general, left Silanus ten thousand infantry and a thousand cavalry to besiege the camp. With the rest of the forces he himself returned to Tarraco in seventy days' marches,[3] hearing the cases of chiefs and states as he proceeded, in order to bestow rewards according to the real worth of their services. After his departure Masi-

[2] From Gades; cf. § 13.

[3] The slow progress is explained by what immediately follows.

U.C. 548 nissa cum Silano clam congressus, ut ad nova consilia gentem quoque suam oboedientem haberet, cum 12 paucis popularibus in Africam traiecit, non tam evidenti eo [1] tempore subitae mutationis causa quam documento post id tempus constantissimae ad ultimam senectam fidei ne tum quidem eum sine proba-
13 bili causa fecisse. Mago inde remissis ab Hasdrubale navibus Gades petit; ceteri deserti ab ducibus, pars transitione, pars [2] fuga dissupati per proximas civitates sunt, nulla numero aut viribus manus insignis.
14 Hoc maxime modo ductu atque auspicio P. Scipionis pulsi Hispania Carthaginienses sunt, quarto decimo anno post bellum initum, quinto quam [3] P.
15 Scipio provinciam et exercitum accepit. Haud multo post Silanus debellatum referens Tarraconem ad Scipionem rediit. XVII. L. Scipio cum multis nobilibus captivis nuntius receptae Hispaniae Romam
2 est missus. Et [4] cum ceteri laetitia gloriaque ingenti eam rem volgo ferrent, unus qui gesserat, inexplebilis virtutis veraeque laudis, parvum instar eorum quae spe ac magnitudine animi concepisset
3 receptas Hispanias ducebat. Iam Africam magnamque Carthaginem et in suum decus nomenque velut

[1] eo NJK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N: illo Weissenborn.
[2] pars om. P(1)N.
[3] quam P(3)K; postquam ANSp?J Aldus.
[4] Et P(1)NJK Aldus: sed Madvig.

---

[1] He lived on until 148 B.C., upwards of 90 years old, and reigned 60 years; App. Pun. 106; Pliny N.H. VII. 156.

[2] An error corrected by x. 8 and xxxviii. 12, the 14th year of the war being 205 B.C.

[3] Livy had assigned Scipio's arrival in Spain to the year 211 B.C.; XXVI. xix, 11 ff. Consequently he placed the capture of New Carthage in 210 B.C. See Vol. VII. notes on pp. 68, 230, 296; Scullard, 304 ff.

nissa conferred secretly with Silanus, then crossed B.C. 206 over to Africa with a few of his countrymen, in order that in changing his policy he might count upon the obedience of his nation also. The reason for his sudden change was not so clear then as was later the evidence furnished by a loyalty unswerving down to extreme age,[1] that even at that time he had not acted without a reasonable ground. Mago then reached Gades on the ships sent back by Hasdrubal. The rest, abandoned by their generals, were scattered, some by desertion, others by flight, among the neighbouring states; no force remained which was notable for its numbers or its strength.

So much in general for the manner in which under the command and auspices of Publius Scipio the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain in the fourteenth year[2] from the beginning of the war, the fifth[3] after Publius Scipio received his province and army. Not much later Silanus returned to Scipio at Tarraco, reporting the war at an end.[4] XVII. Lucius Scipio with many noble captives was sent to Rome to announce the conquest of Spain. And while everyone else was publishing the fact abroad with great rejoicing and high praise, the one man who had accomplished it was insatiable in his craving for merit and well-earned distinction. He considered the conquest of Spain insignificant compared with all that he had imagined in his high-minded hopes. Already his eye was upon Africa and the greater Carthage and the glory of such a war, as if [4] Although his readers would here infer that a campaign has now been completed, the historian goes on to include a seemingly impossible range of operations within what remained of the same year, 206 B.C.

4 consummatam eius belli gloriam spectabat. Itaque praemoliendas sibi ratus iam res conciliandosque regum gentiumque animos, Syphacem primum 5 regem statuit temptare. Masaesuliorum is rex erat. Masaesulii, gens adfinis Mauris, in regionem Hispaniae maxime qua sita Nova Carthago est spec- 6 tant. Foedus ea tempestate regi cum Carthaginien- 7 sibus erat; quod haud gravius ei sanctiusque quam volgo barbaris, quibus ex fortuna pendet fides, ratus fore, oratorem ad eum C. Laelium cum donis mittit. 8 Quibus barbarus laetus, et quia res tum prosperae ubique Romanis, Poenis [1] in Italia adversae, in Hispania nullae iam erant, amicitiam se Romanorum accipere annuit: firmandae eius fidem nec dare nec 9 accipere nisi cum ipso coram duce Romano. Ita Laelius in id modo fide ab rege accepta, tutum adventum fore, ad Scipionem redit.

10 Magnum in omnia momentum Syphax adfectanti res Africae erat,[2] opulentissimus eius terrae rex,[3] bello iam expertus ipsos Carthaginienses, finibus etiam regni apte ad Hispaniam, quod freto exiguo 11 dirimuntur, positis. Dignam itaque rem Scipio ratus quae, quoniam aliter non [4] posset, magno periculo peteretur, L. Marcio Tarracone, M. Silano Carthagine Nova, quo pedibus ab Tarracone itineribus mag- 12 nis ierat, ad praesidium Hispaniae relictis, ipse cum

[1] Poenis BSp²JK Froben 2: poenis autem P(3)*B*ᵃ*N Aldus*.
[2] Africae erat JK Froben 2: erat Africae P(1)N Aldus.
[3] rex Sp²A¹JK Froben 2: om. P(1)N Aldus.
[4] aliter non x Luchs: non aliter P(1)NJK Aldus, Froben, Conway.

accumulated to bring him honour and a name. Accordingly, thinking that he must already make preparations and gain the goodwill of kings and tribes, he decided first to sound King Syphax. He was the king of the Masaesulians. A tribe bordering on the Mauri, the Masaesulians directly face the region of Spain in which lies New Carthage. At that time the king had a treaty with the Carthaginians; and Scipio, thinking it would have for Syphax no more weight and sanctity than is usual for barbarians, with whom loyalty depends upon success, sent Gaius Laelius as an envoy to him with gifts. Delighted with these, and since at that time the situation was everywhere favourable for the Romans but for the Carthaginians unfavourable in Italy and now quite hopeless in Spain, the barbarian indicated that he would accept the friendship of the Romans; that for its confirmation he would neither give nor receive a pledge except in the actual presence of the Roman commander. So Laelius, having received from the king a promise to this effect only, that for the visit safety would be assured, returned to Scipio. B.C. 206

A factor of great importance in every respect for a man planning an attack upon Africa was Syphax, the richest king in that land and one who had already gained experience even of the Carthaginians in war, while boundaries of his kingdom were also well situated with reference to Spain in being separated from it by a narrow strait only. Consequently Scipio thought the matter deserved to be pursued even at a great risk, since it was otherwise impossible. Leaving Lucius Marcius at Tarraco and Marcus Silanus at New Carthage—to which he had come by land in long stages from Tarraco—that they might defend Spain,

u.c. 548

C. Laelio duabus quinqueremibus ab Carthagine profectus tranquillo mari plurumum remis, interdum et 13 leni adiuvante [1] vento, in Africam traiecit. Forte ita incidit ut eo ipso tempore Hasdrubal pulsus Hispania, septem triremibus portum invectus, ancoris positis
14 terrae adplicaret naves, cum conspectae duae quinqueremes, haud cuiquam dubio quin hostium essent opprimique a pluribus, priusquam portum intrarent, possent, nihil aliud quam tumultum ac trepidationem simul militum ac nautarum nequiquam armaque et 15 naves expedientium fecerunt. Percussa enim ex alto vela paulo acriori vento prius in portum intulerunt quinqueremes quam Poeni ancoras molirentur;
16 nec ultra tumultum ciere quisquam in regio portu audebat. Ita in terram prior Hasdrubal, mox Scipio et Laelius egressi ad regem pergunt. XVIII. Magnificumque id Syphaci—nec erat aliter—visum, duorum opulentissimorum ea tempestate duces populorum uno die suam pacem amicitiamque petentes venisse.

2 Utrumque in hospitium invitat; et [2] quoniam fors eos sub uno tecto esse atque ad eosdem penates voluisset, contrahere ad [3] conloquium dirimen-
3 darum simultatium causa est conatus, Scipione abnuente aut privatim sibi ullum cum Poeno odium

[1] adiuvante P(1)N Aldus: iuvante SpJK Froben 2.
[2] et P(1)N Aldus, Froben: om. SpJK.
[3] ad P(1)N Aldus, Eds.: in SpN1JK Froben 2, Conway.

he himself sailed with Gaius Laelius and two quin- B.C. 206 queremes from (New) Carthage. Using oars for the most part over a calm sea, while at times a gentle wind lent its help, he crossed over to Africa.[1] It so chanced that at the very same time Hasdrubal, who had been forced out of Spain and had sailed into the harbour with seven triremes and cast anchor, was bringing his ships to the shore when the two quinqueremes were sighted. No one had any doubt that they belonged to the enemy, and that they could be surprised by superior numbers before they entered the harbour. But they caused nothing more than uproar and excitement both among soldiers and sailors, as they made ready their arms and ships all to no purpose. For the sails, catching a slightly stronger wind from the open sea, brought the quinqueremes into the harbour before the Carthaginians could weigh anchor. Nor did anyone dare to make further disturbance in the king's harbour. So first Has drubal and then Scipio and Laelius disembarked and went to the king. XVIII. To Syphax it seemed a splendid thing—as indeed it was—that the generals of the two richest peoples of that time had come on the same day to ask for peace and friendship from him.

He invited both of them to be his guests, and inas much as chance had ordained that they should be under one roof and in the same dwelling, he tried to draw them into a conference to put an end to their quarrels. Scipio indeed stated that neither as a private citizen had he any hatred toward esse quod conloquendo finiret, aut de re publica quicquam se[1] cum hoste agere iniussu senatus posse. 4 Illud magno opere tendente rege, ne alter hospitum exclusus mensa videretur, ut in animum induceret ad easdem venire epulas, haud abnuit; cenatumque 5 simul apud regem est; eodem[2] etiam lecto Scipio atque Hasdrubal, quia ita cordi erat regi, accubuerunt. 6 Tanta autem inerat comitas Scipioni atque ad omnia naturalis ingenii dexteritas ut non Syphacem modo, barbarum insuetumque moribus Romanis, sed hostem etiam infestissimum facunde adloquendo sibi con- 7 ciliarit.[3] Mirabiliorem[4] sibi eum[5] congresso coram 8 visum prae se ferebat quam bello rebus gestis, nec dubitare quin Syphax regnumque eius iam in Romanorum essent potestate; eam artem illi viro ad con- 9 ciliandos animos esse. Itaque non quo modo Hispaniae amissae sint quaerendum magis Carthaginiensibus esse quam quo modo Africam retineant 10 cogitandum. Non peregrinabundum neque circa amoenas oras vagantem tantum ducem Romanum, relicta provincia novae dicionis, relictis exercitibus, duabus navibus in Africam traiecisse et commisisse sese in hostilem terram, in potestatem[6] regiam, in fidem inexpertam, sed potiundae Africae spem 11 adfectantem. Hoc eum iam pridem volutare in

[1] Probably to Siga, in Mauretania, where Syphax at times resided; Pliny N.H. V. 19; Strabo XVII. iii. 9; App. Hisp. 29 f.

[1] quicquam se $P(3)M^2$ or M^7 Aldus: se before quicquam ANJK Froben 2.

[2] eodem SpJK Froben 2, Conway: et eodem $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.

[3] conciliarit Sp^2 Froben 2, Luchs, Conway: -aret $P(3)NJK$ Aldus, Eds.

[4] Mirabiliorem SpJK Conway: $P(1)N$ Eds. add -que.

[5] eum, after this $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds. have virum: om. SpJK Froben 2, Conway.

the Carthaginian which might be ended by a confer- B.C. 206 ence, nor as regarded the state could he treat with an enemy without an order from the senate. When the king kept insisting that he consent to come to the same feast for fear one of his guests should seem to have been excluded from his table, Scipio did not decline, and they dined together in the king's house. On the same couch even, since the king would have it so, Scipio and Hasdrubal reclined. Moreover, such was the genial manner of Scipio, such his inborn cleverness in meeting every situation, that by his eloquent mode of address he won not Syphax only, the barbarian unacquainted with Roman ways, but his own bitterest enemy as well. Hasdrubal plainly showed that when he met him face to face, Scipio seemed even more marvellous than in his achievements in war, and that he did not doubt Syphax and his kingdom would soon be in the power of the Romans; such skill did the man possess in winning men over.[1] And so, he said, it was not so essential for the Carthaginians to inquire how their Spanish provinces had been lost as to consider how they were still to hold Africa. It was not as a traveller, nor as one who idles along beautiful shores, that so great a Roman general had left a newly subdued province, had left his armies, and with only two ships had crossed over to Africa and entrusted himself to an enemy's land, to a king's power, to a man's untested honour; on the contrary he was cherishing a hope of conquering Africa. It had long

[1] A single sentence remains from Polybius' account of this meeting of the three and their conversation (XI. xxiv[a]. 4), here reflected by Livy.

[6] in potestatem N^s(but after regiam)A^sJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.

animo, hoc palam fremere, quod non quemadmodum Hannibal in Italia, sic Scipio in Africa bellum 12 gereret. Scipio, foedere icto cum Syphace, profectus ex Africa dubiisque et plerumque saevis in alto iactatus ventis die quarto Novae Carthaginis portum tenuit.

XIX. Hispaniae sicut a bello Punico quietae erant, ita quasdam civitates propter conscientiam culpae metu magis quam fide quietas esse apparebat, quarum maxume insignes et magnitudine et noxa
2 Iliturgi et Castulo erant. Castulo, cum prosperis rebus socii fuissent, post caesos cum exercitibus Scipiones defecerat[1] ad Poenos; Iliturgitani prodendis qui ex illa clade ad eos perfugerant inter-
3 ficiendisque scelus etiam defectioni addiderant. In eos populos primo adventu, cum dubiae Hispaniae essent, merito magis quam utiliter saevitum foret;
4 tunc iam tranquillis rebus quia tempus expetendae poenae videbatur venisse, accitum ab Tarracone L. Marcium cum tertia parte copiarum ad Castulonem oppugnandum mittit, ipse cum cetero exercitu
5 quintis fere[2] ad Iliturgin castris pervenit. Clausae

[1] defecerat Sp?JK Froben 2 : -rant P(1)N.
[2] fere Jx : ferre P : ferme P^2(1)N Aldus, Froben : om. K.

[1] The last previous mention of a town of this name was XXVI. xvii. 4. That was about 175 miles in a straight line from New Carthage, and in a quite unthinkable direction for retreating Romans. Amtorgis, where the two brothers separated, cannot be identified (XXV. xxxii. 5, 9). Iliturgi has taken the place here of a town less well known, perhaps that of Pliny's Ilorci (the rogus Scipionis, i.e. of Gnaeus, N.H. III. 9; Ilurgia in App. Hisp. 32, Ilourgeia in Polybius, XI. xxiv. sub. fin., a fragment which seems to belong here, Dindorf). This may be modern Lorca, on a tributary of the Tader, about 40 miles west of Cartagena; so Ed. Meyer, Kl. Schr. II. 445 f.

been Scipio's constant reflection, his open complaint, B.C. 206
he added, that he was not waging war in Africa, as Hannibal was in Italy. Scipio, after making a treaty with Syphax, set sail from Africa, and tossed in open sea by unsteady winds, mostly violent, he reached the harbour of New Carthage on the fourth day.

XIX. Although the Spanish provinces were having a respite from a Carthaginian war, still it was evident that on account of a guilty conscience certain states were quiet out of fear rather than because of loyalty. Most conspicuous both for size and guilt among these were Iliturgi [1] and Castulo.[2] Although in favourable times its citizens had been allies, Castulo, after the Scipios had been slain with their armies, had revolted to the Carthaginians. The men of Iliturgi, by betraying and slaying those who from that disaster had fled to them for refuge, had added a crime also to their revolt. On Scipio's first coming, when the Spanish provinces were wavering, vengeance upon those states would have been deserved but not politic. Now, however, since in a time of peace the moment for exacting the penalty seemed to have arrived, he summoned Lucius Marcius from Tarraco and sent him with a third of his forces to lay siege to Castulo. He himself with the rest of the army reached Iliturgi in about five stages. The gates had been closed and and Schulten in Hermes LXIII. 288 ff. Or possibly Lorqui on the Tader, 35 miles north-west of Cartagena; so Scullard, 143. Cf. Cambridge Ancient History VIII. 90.

[2] Cf. xiii. 4; XXIV. xli. 7. Here App. l.c. has Castax, unknown and an improbable form, but accepted by Scullard, 144 and Hallward in C.A.H. l.c. Any argument for rejecting Castulo is less cogent than in the case of Iliturgi. We may have our doubts, however, about an advance so far to the west unsupported except by the annalistic tradition. Cf. Kahrstedt in Meltzer, Geschichte der Karthager III. 495 ff.

erant portae omniaque instructa et parata ad oppugnationem arcendam: adeo conscientia quid se meritos 6 scirent pro indicto eis bello fuerat. Hinc et hortari milites Scipio orsus est: ipsos claudendo portas indicasse Hispanos quid ut timerent meriti essent. Itaque multo infestioribus animis cum eis quam cum
7 Carthaginiensibus bellum gerendum esse; quippe cum illis prope sine ira de imperio et gloria certari, ab his perfidiae et crudelitatis et sceleris poenas
8 expetendas esse. Venisse [1] tempus quo et nefandam commilitonum necem et in semet ipsos, si eodem fuga delati forent, instructam fraudem [2] ulciscerentur, et in omne tempus gravi documento sancirent ne quis umquam Romanum civem militemve [3] in ulla fortuna opportunum iniuriae duceret.

9 Ab hac cohortatione ducis incitati scalas electis per manipulos viris dividunt, partitoque exercitu ita ut parti alteri Laelius praeesset legatus, duobus simul
10 locis ancipiti terrore urbem adgrediuntur. Non dux unus aut plures principes oppidanos, sed suus ipsorum ex [4] conscientia culpae metus ad defendendam
11 inpigre urbem hortatur. Et meminerant et admonebant alii alios [5] supplicium ex se, non victoriam peti; ubi quisque mortem oppeteret, id referre, utrum in pugna et in acie, ubi Mars communis et victum saepe

[1] esse. Venisse Sp²N⁴JK Froben 2, Eds. (with evenisse Aldus): sevenisse P: evenisse $P^2(1)N$ Conway: venisse N^1.
[2] fraudem N^4JK Aldus, Froben: tradem P: stragem $P^2(3)N$.
[3] -ve C^2*Aldus*, Froben, Eds.: vel $P(1)N$: -que N^4JK Conway.
[4] ex Sp²N⁴JK Froben 2: om. $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[5] alii alios x Sigonius, Madvig: alios $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben Eds.: om. JK.

everything disposed and prepared to resist an attack. B.C. 206
So true was it that consciousness of what they knew they had deserved had meant as much for them as a declaration of war. With this point also Scipio opened his speech of encouragement to his soldiers, saying that the Spaniards by closing their gates had themselves shown what they had deserved to fear. Consequently, he said, they must wage war against them with much more animosity than against the Carthaginians. With these it was a contest almost devoid of anger in pursuit of power and glory; from the Iliturgians they must exact the penalty for treachery and cruelty and crime. The time had come for them to avenge the atrocious slaughter of their comrades and the perfidy which would have been brought to bear against themselves if in flight they had reached the same city. It was time also for them by a severe example to ordain that no one should ever account a Roman citizen or soldier in any misfortune as fair game for ill treatment.

Immediately after this exhortation from their general the officers, thoroughly aroused, issued ladders to men picked out of one maniple after another, and dividing the army so that Laelius as lieutenant should command one half, they attacked the city in two places at the same time, causing a double alarm. It was not a single commander or a number of leading men that urged the citizens gallantly to defend the city, but their own fear due to consciousness of guilt. They remembered and reminded one another also that the aim was their punishment, not victory; that when every man perished what mattered most was whether he did so in battle and in the line, where the fortune of the fray,

J.C. 48

12 erigeret et adfligeret victorem, an postmodo, cremata et diruta urbe, ante ora captarum coniugum liberorumque, inter verbera et vincula, omnia foeda atque
13 indigna passi exspirarent. Igitur non militaris modo aetas aut viri tantum, sed feminae puerique super [1] animi corporisque vires adsunt, propugnantibus [2] tela ministrant, saxa in muros munientibus gerunt.
14 Non libertas solum agebatur, quae virorum fortium tantum pectora acuit, sed ultima omnibus [3] supplicia et foeda mors ob oculos erat. Accendebantur animi et certamine laboris ac periculi atque ipso inter se
15 conspectu. Itaque tanto ardore certamen initum est ut domitor ille totius Hispaniae exercitus ab unius oppidi iuventute saepe repulsus a muris haud satis
16 decoro proelio trepidaret.[4] Id ubi vidit Scipio. veritus ne vanis tot [5] conatibus suorum et hostibus [6] cresceret animus et segnior miles fieret, sibimet conandum ac partem periculi capessendam esse ratus, increpita ignavia militum ferri scalas iubet et se ipsum, 17 si ceteri cunctentur, escensurum minatur. Iam subierat haud mediocri periculo moenia, cum clamor undique ab sollicitis vicem imperatoris militibus sublatus, scalaeque multis simul partibus erigi 18 coeptae; et ex altera parte Laelius institit. Tum

[1] super $P(1)NJK$: supra Aldus, Froben.
[2] propugnantibus JK Aldus, Froben, Luchs (obp- N^{1}). pugnantibus $P(1)N$ Eds., Conway.
[3] omnibus JK Aldus, Froben, Riemann, Conway : omnium $P(1)N$ Eds.
[4] trepidaret $P(1)N$ Aldus : -darit SpK Froben 2 : -dant J.
[5] tot $Sp N^{1} JK$ Froben 2 : om. $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[6] suorum et hostibus om. Spx.

making no distinctions, often lifted up the defeated and dashed down the victor, or whether later, when their city was in ashes and ruins, there before the faces of their captured wives and children, after enduring every outrage and indignity, they breathed their last under the scourge and in chains. Accordingly not merely those of military age or men alone, but women and children also helped beyond their powers of mind and body, bringing up weapons for the fighting men and carrying stones for the builders up to the wall. The stake was not freedom only, which whets the courage of brave men alone, but all had before their eyes extreme penalties and a hideous death. Bravery was kindled by emulation in toil and danger and by the mere sight of one another. And so the battle was begun with such heat that that famous army, the conqueror of all Spain, was repeatedly beaten back from the walls by the young men of a single town and thrown into disorder in an inglorious battle. When Scipio saw this, he was afraid that, owing to so many vain attempts made by his men, the enemy's spirits might be cheered and his own soldiers lose heart. Thinking that he must himself make the attempt and claim a share in the danger, he berated the soldiers for their cowardice, ordered ladders to be brought up, and threatened that if the rest hesitated he would climb up himself. Already at no small risk [1] he had come close to the walls when from all sides an outcry was made by the soldiers, who were concerned for their commander and began to set up ladders in many places at the same time; and on the other side Laelius pressed the attack. Then the resistance of B.C. 206

[1] App. Hisp. 32 has him wounded; Zonaras IX. x. 2.

c.c. 48 victa oppidanorum vis, deiectisque propugnatoribus occupantur muri.

Arx etiam ab ea parte qua [1] inexpugnabilis videbatur inter tumultum capta est. XX. Transfugae Afri, qui tum inter auxilia Romana erant, et oppidanis 2 in ea tuenda unde periculum videbatur versis et Romanis subeuntibus [2] . . . qua adire poterant, conspexerunt editissimam urbis partem, quia [3] rupe praealta tegebatur, neque opere ullo munitam et 3 ab defensoribus vacuam. Levium corporum homines et multa exercitatione pernicium, clavos secum ferreos portantes, qua per inaequaliter eminentia rupis poterant scandunt. Sicubi nimis arduum et leve saxum 4 occurrebat, clavos per modica intervalla figentes cum velut gradus fecissent, primi insequentes [4] extrahentes manu, postremi sublevantes eos qui prae se 5 irent,[5] in summum evadunt. Inde decurrunt cum 6 clamore in urbem iam captam ab Romanis. Tum vero apparuit ab ira et ab odio urbem oppugnatam esse. Nemo capiendi vivos, nemo patentibus ad direptionem omnibus praedae memor est; trucidant inermes iuxta atque armatos, feminas pariter ac viros; usque ad infantium caedem ira crudelis per- 7 venit. Ignem deinde tectis iniciunt ac diruunt quae incendio absumi nequeunt; adeo vestigia quoque

[1] qua $P^{r}M^{1}AN$ Aldus, Eds.: quae $P(3)R^{2}SpJK$ Froben 2.

[2] subeuntibus, followed by s.c. tr. in $P(3)N$, the meaningless abbreviation apparently representing something unintelligible in P's archetype. Aldus supplied scalis moenia, Alschefski, contra.

[3] quia Sp? Froben 2, Luchs, Conway: quae $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Eds.

[4] insequentes (or -is) $Sp?N^{s}JK$ Froben 2: sequentis (or -tes) $P(1)N$ Aldus.

the townsmen was broken and, once the defenders had been dislodged, the walls were occupied. B.C. 206

The citadel also in the midst of the confusion was captured from the side on which it appeared to be impregnable. XX. African deserters, who were at that time in the Roman auxiliaries, just when the townsmen had turned to the defence of places where the danger was evident, while at the same time the Romans kept coming up . . . by any possible approach, caught sight of a very lofty part of the city lacking any kind of fortifications, lacking defenders as well, because it was protected by a very high cliff. Men of light build and nimble, thanks to much training, they carried iron spikes with them and climbed up wherever they could over the irregular projections of the cliff. Wherever they encountered rock too steep and smooth, by driving in spikes at suitable intervals they made something like steps. Then while the first men with their hands drew up those who followed and the last pushed up those ahead of them, they made their way up to the summit. Thence they dashed down with a shout into the city already captured by the Romans. It was then in truth evident that the city had been attacked out of anger and hatred. No one thought of taking men alive, no one thought of booty, although every place was open for plunder. They slaughtered the unarmed and the armed alike, women as well as men; cruel anger went even so far as to slay infants. Then they threw firebrands into houses and demolished what could not be consumed by the flames. So delighted were they to destroy even the

[5] prae se irent Sp?N²JK Froben 2 : praeirent P(1)N Aldus.

.U.C. 548 urbis exstinguere ac delere memoriam hostium sedis cordi est.

8 Castulonem inde Scipio exercitum ducit, quam urbem non Hispani modo convenae, sed Punici etiam exercitus ex dissipata passim fuga reliquiae tutaban-
9 tur. Sed adventum Scipionis praevenerat fama cladis Iliturgitanorum, terrorque inde[1] ac desperatio
10 invaserat; et in diversis causis cum sibi quisque consultum sine alterius respectu vellet, primo tacita suspicio, deinde aperta discordia secessionem inter
11 Carthaginienses atque Hispanos fecit. His Cerdubelus, propalam deditionis auctor, Himilco Punicis auxiliaribus praeerat; quos urbemque clam fide 12 accepta Cerdubelus Romano prodit. Mitior ea victoria fuit; nec tantundem noxae admissum erat, et aliquantum irae lenierat voluntaria deditio.

XXI. Marcius inde in barbaros, si qui nondum perdomiti erant, sub ius dicionemque redigendos missus. Scipio Carthaginem ad vota solvenda deis munusque gladiatorium, quod mortis causa patris patrui-
2 que paraverat, edendum rediit. Gladiatorum spectaculum fuit non ex eo genere hominum ex quo lanistis comparare mos est, servorum de catasta ac liberorum[2] qui venalem sanguinem habent: voluntaria omnis et 3 gratuita opera pugnantium fuit. Nam alii missi ab regulis sunt ad specimen insitae genti virtutis osten-

[1] inde Sp?JK Froben 2: deinde P(1)N Aldus.

[2] de catasta ac liberorum, corrected by Ursinus (but with aut) from de causa ac liberorum of SpN[1] (-torum J: -tinorum K): ac liberorum Weissenborn: om.P(1)N, one line; followed by Gronovius, with quive for qui.

traces of the city and to blot out the memory of B.C. 206 their enemies' abode.

Scipio then led his army to Castulo, a city defended not only by Spaniards from other places but also by remnants of the Carthaginian army after a scattering flight in every direction. But Scipio's coming had been preceded by a report of the disaster at Iliturgi, and in consequence alarm and despair had taken possession. Also as their interests were different, since everyone wished to be safeguarded himself without regard to any one else, at first unexpressed suspicion, then open discord produced a separation between Carthaginians and Spaniards. The latter were commanded by Cerdubelus, an open advocate of surrender, the Punic auxiliaries by Himilco. After receiving a secret promise Cerdubelus betrayed garrison and city to the Roman commander. More merciful was this victory. Not so serious a crime had been committed and voluntary surrender had greatly appeased their anger.

XXI. Marcius was thereupon sent to bring under Roman sway and authority any barbarians who had not yet been thoroughly subdued. Scipio returned to (New) Carthage to pay his vows to the gods and to conduct the gladiatorial show which he had prepared in honour of his deceased father and uncle. The exhibition of gladiators was not made up from the class of men which managers are in the habit of pitting against each other, that is, slaves sold on the platform and free men who are ready to sell their lives. In every case the service of the men who fought was voluntary and without compensation. For some were sent by their chieftains to display an example of the courage inbred in their tribe; some declared on their

u.c. 548

4 dendum, alii ipsi professi se pugnaturos in gratiam ducis, alios aemulatio et certamen, ut provocarent
5 provocative[1] haud abnuerent traxit; quidam quas disceptando controversias finire nequierant aut noluerant, pacto[2] inter se ut victorem res sequeretur,
6 ferro decreverunt. Neque obscuri generis homines sed clari inlustresque, Corbis et Orsua, patrueles fratres, de principatu civitatis quam Ibem vocabant
7 ambigentes, ferro se certaturos professi sunt. Corbis maior erat aetate; Orsuae pater princeps proxime fuerat, a fratre maiore post mortem eius principatu
8 accepto. Cum verbis disceptare Scipio vellet ac sedare iras, negatum id ambo dicere cognatis communibus, nec alium deorum hominumve quam Mar-
9 tem se iudicem habituros esse. Robore maior, minor flore aetatis ferox, mortem in certamine quam ut alter alterius imperio subiceretur praeoptantes, cum dirimi ab tanta rabie nequirent, insigne spectaculum exercitui praebuere documentumque quantum cupiditas
10 imperii malum inter mortales esset. Maior usu armorum et astu facile stolidas vires minoris superavit. Huic gladiatorum spectaculo ludi funebres additi pro copia provinciali et castrensi apparatu.

XXII. Res interim nihilo minus ab legatis gerebantur. Marcius superato Baete amni, quem incolae Certim appellant, duas opulentas civitates sine cer-

[1] -ve $P(1)N$ Aldus: -que Sp^2JK Froben 2.
[2] pacto $P(1)NSp^2JK$ Froben 2: pacti x Aldus, Madvig, Riemann.

---

[1] Only here, site unknown, unless it be Ibi, 12 miles north-north-west of Alicante (Castrum Album, XXIV. xli. 3).
[2] Another local name was Perces: Steph. Byz. 156. 9.

own motion that they would fight to please the general; in other cases rivalry and the desire to compete led them to challenge or, if challenged, not to refuse. Some who had been unable or unwilling to end their differences by a legal hearing, after agreeing that the disputed property should fall to the victor, settled the matter with the sword. Men also of no obscure family but conspicuous and distinguished, Corbis and Orsua, being cousins and competing for the post of chief of a city called Ibes,[1] declared that they would contend with the sword. Corbis was the older in years. Orsua's father had lately been chief, having succeeded to an elder brother's rank upon his death. When Scipio desired to settle the question by a hearing and to calm their anger, they both said they had refused that request to their common relatives, and that they were to have as their judge no other god or man than Mars. The older man was confident in his strength, the younger in the bloom of his youth, each preferring death in the combat rather than to be subject to the rule of the other. Since they could not be made to give up such madness, they furnished the army a remarkable spectacle, demonstrating how great an evil among mortals is the ambition to rule. The older man by his skill with arms and by his cunning easily mastered the brute strength of the younger. In addition to this gladiatorial show there were funeral games so far as the resources of the province and camp equipment permitted. B.C. 206

XXII. Meantime operations were carried on no less actively by the lieutenants. Marcius after crossing the river Baetis, which the inhabitants call Certis,[2] accepted the surrender of two rich cities without an u.c. 2 tamine in deditionem accepit. Astapa urbs erat,[1] 18 Carthaginiensium semper partis; neque id tam dignum ira erat quam quod extra necessitates belli

3 praecipuum in Romanos gerebant odium. Nec urbem aut situ aut munimento tutam habebant quae ferociores iis animos faceret; sed ingenia incolarum latrocinio laeta ut excursiones in finitimum agrum sociorum populi Romani facerent impulerant et vagos milites Romanos lixasque et mercatores exciperent.
4 Magnum etiam comitatum, quia paucis parum tutum fuerat, transgredientem fines positis insidiis circum-
5 ventum iniquo loco interfecerant.[2] Ad hanc urbem oppugnandam cum admotus exercitus esset, oppidani conscientia scelerum, quia nec deditio tuta ad tam infestos videbatur, neque spes moenibus aut armis tuendae salutis erat, facinus in se ac suos foedum ac
6 ferum consciscunt. Locum in foro destinant quo pretiosissima rerum suarum congererent. Super eum cumulum coniuges ac liberos considere cum iussissent, ligna circa exstruunt[3] fascesque virgultorum coni-
7 ciunt. Quinquaginta deinde armatis iuvenibus praecipiunt ut, donec incertus eventus pugnae esset, praesidium eo loco fortunarum suarum corporumque
8 quae cariora fortunis essent servarent; si rem inclinatam viderent atque in eo iam esse ut urbs caperetur, scirent omnes quos euntes in proelium

[1] erat N[4]JK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)N.
[2] interfecerant Sp[2] Froben 2 : -erunt P(1)NJK Aldus.
[3] exstruunt A[6]?N[4] or N[2]JK Eds. : extrui (or exst-) P(1)N.

---

[1] Ostippo in Pliny N.H. III. 12 and inscriptions; now Estepa, 70 miles east-south-east of Seville. App. Hisp. 33 retells the tale.

engagement. There was the city of Astapa,[1] always B.C. 206 on the side of the Carthaginians; and this did not so much justify anger as that they bore a particular hatred against the Romans over and above the exigencies of war. Nor did they have a city secure either by reason of its situation or fortifications to make them over-confident. But their natural delight in brigandage had impelled the inhabitants to make raids into adjoining territory of allies of the Roman people and to capture stray Roman soldiers and sutlers and merchants. Even a caravan—large because there had been too little safety for small numbers—crossing their territory had been entrapped in an unfavourable spot by an ambuscade and cut to pieces. When the army had been brought up to lay siege to this city, the men of the town, prompted by a guilty conscience, because neither surrender to an enemy so incensed seemed safe nor was there any hope of defending their lives by walls and arms, resolved to carry out against themselves and their families a brutal and barbarous act.[2] A spot in the marketplace was selected where they were to bring together their most valuable possessions. Having ordered their wives and children to sit down upon that heap they piled up wood all around and threw on bundles of brush. They then instructed fifty armed young men to keep guard at that place, so long as the issue of the battle was uncertain, over their treasures and over persons that were dearer than treasures. If they should see that the battle had gone against them and the city was on the point of being captured, they were to know that all those whom they now saw

[2] Cf. XXI. xiv, the similar conduct of the Saguntines, and XXXI. xvii, Abydus; cf. Polybius XVI. xxxi. ff.

U.C. 548

9 cernerent mortem in ipsa pugna obituros; illos se per deos superos inferosque orare ut memores libertatis, quae illo die aut morte honesta aut servitute infami finienda esset, nihil relinquerent in quod
10 saevire iratus hostis posset. Ferrum ignemque in manibus esse; amicae ac fideles potius ea quae peritura forent [1] absumerent manus quam insul-
11 tarent superbo ludibrio hostes. His adhortationibus exsecratio dira adiecta, si quem a proposito spes mollitiave animi flexisset.

Inde concitato agmine patentibus portis ingenti
12 cum tumultu erumpunt. Neque erat ulla satis firma statio opposita, quia nihil minus quam ut [2] egredi obsessi [3] moenibus auderent timeri poterat. Perpaucae equitum turmae levisque armatura repente
13 e castris ad id ipsum emissa occurrit. Acrior impetu atque animis quam compositior ullo ordine [4] pugna fuit. Itaque pulsus eques qui primus se hosti obtulerat terrorem intulit levi armaturae; pugnatumque sub ipso vallo foret, ni robur legionum perexiguo ad instruendum dato tempore aciem direxis-14 set. Ibi quoque trepidatum parumper circa signa est, cum caeci furore in volnera ac ferrum vecordi audacia ruerent; dein vetus miles, adversus temerarios impetus pertinax, caede [5] primorum insequentes sup-

[1] forent Jx Froben 2 : fuerant K : essent P(1)N Aldus.

[2] ut P(1)NJK Eds., Conway : ne Madvig, Luchs, M. Müller.

[3] obsessi Weissenborn : posset P(3)N : hostes Jac. Gronovius, Johnson : om. CA[1] or A[6]JK Aldus, Froben, Eds., Conway.

[4] ullo ordine P(1)NK Aldus : ordine ullo J Froben 2, Conway.

[5] caede, following this word P(1)N have a long misplaced passage which begins at our chapter XXXVII. 9 (conscriptis) and extends to XXIX. i. 24 (imperio). The dislocation was noted by later hands and corrected in HJK from Sp (see p. 212, n. 3).

marching out to battle would meet death where they were fighting. They implored them, they said, by the gods above and below to remember the freedom which must be brought to an end that day either by an honourable death or an infamous slavery, and leave nothing upon which an angry enemy might vent his fury. Sword and firebrand were in their hands; let friendly and loyal hands destroy all that was doomed to perish, rather than have the enemy offer indignities with insolent mockery. To these exhortations they added a dreadful curse, in case hope or weakness of character should turn any one from their purpose. B.C. 206

Then at the double they burst out of wide-open gates with a great uproar. And no outpost in sufficient strength had been stationed to face them, since nothing less could be feared than that the besieged should venture to sally out from the walls. A very few troops of cavalry and such light-armed infantry as were suddenly sent out of the camp for that very purpose encountered them. The battle was fierce in courageous onslaught rather than regular in any formation. Accordingly the horsemen who had been the first to confront the enemy were beaten back and brought panic to the light-armed. The fighting would also have been directly outside the earthwork had not the heavy legionary infantry drawn up their line of battle in spite of the very short time given them to form. Even there for a short time there was some alarm in the front line, while men blinded by frenzy dashed on to meet wounds and steel with mad recklessness. Then the veteran soldiers, steadfast against rash attacks, by slaying the first men checked those who followed.

A.U.C. 548

pressit. Conatus paulo post ultro inferre pedem, ut neminem cedere atque obstinatos mori in vestigio quemque suo vidit, patefacta acie, quod ut facere posset multitudo armatorum facile suppeditabat, cornua hostium amplexus, in orbem pugnantes ad unum omnes occidit.

XXIII. Atque haec tamen caedes ab impetu[1] hostium iratorum ac tum maxime dimicantium iure[2] belli in armatos repugnantesque edebatur;[3] foedior alia in urbe trucidatio erat, cum turbam feminarum puerorumque inbellem inermemque[4] cives sui caederent et in succensum rogum semianima pleraque inicerent corpora, rivique sanguinis flammam orientem restinguerent; postremo ipsi, caede miseranda suorum fatigati, cum armis medio incendio se iniecerunt. Iam caedi perpetratae victores Romani supervenerunt. Ac primo conspectu tam foedae rei mirabundi parumper obstupuerunt; dein cum aurum argentumque cumulo rerum aliarum interfulgens[5] aviditate ingenii humani rapere ex igni vellent, correpti alii flamma sunt, alii ambusti adflatu vaporis, cum receptus primis urgente ab tergo ingenti[6] turba non esset. Ita Astapa sine praeda militum ferro ignique absumpta est. Marcius ceteris

[1] caedes ab impetu, supplied here by M. Müller: Weissenborn supplied vis et impetus after dimicantium (with edebant); Madvig, odium (with edebat); Johnson and Conway, in morem after iratorum (and with edebantur). Something is lacking in P(1)NJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] iure belli in armatos re- om. P(1)N, one line, found in A[1]N[1]JK Aldus, Froben.

[3] edebatur JK: -bantur $M^1A^1N^1$ Aldus, Froben: -bā P: -bam CRMBD: -bant C^2AN.

[4] -que P(1)N Aldus: om. SpJK Froben 2, Conway.

[5] interfulgens N^1(altern.) JK Eds.: interfluens P(1)N.

A little later, venturing to take the offensive, when B.C. 206 they saw no one giving way and every man resolutely dying in his tracks, they extended their line, as superior numbers of armed men made it possible for them to do, outflanked the enemy, and as they fought in circular formation slew them to the last man.

XXIII. Such slaughter, however, arose from the attack of a furious enemy, fighting at that moment according to the law of war against armed men resisting. More horrible was another butchery within the city, when their own citizens were slaying an unarmed, unresisting throng of women and children and throwing bodies, very often only half-dead, upon a pyre they had lighted, and streams of blood were putting out the rising flames. Finally the men, exhausted by the pitiful slaying of their own kin, threw themselves and their arms into the midst of the fire. The slaughter was already finished when the victorious Romans arrived. And at the first sight of so terrible a scene they stood for a little while stunned with amazement. Then, when gold and silver glistened in the heap of other objects and with the eagerness which is natural to man they were trying to snatch them from the flames, some caught fire themselves, others were scorched by the hot blast,[1] since those in front had no way of escape, while the mass of men pressed upon them from the rear. Thus was Astapa destroyed by sword and fire without booty for the soldiers. Marcius, having received the

[1] Here Polybius' narrative survives in a single sentence about frantic efforts to recover gold and silver, XI. xxiv. 11.

[6] ab tergo ingenti Sp?N[4] Froben 2 : ingenti JK Aldus : om. P(1)N.

a.u.c. 548

eius regionis metu in deditionem acceptis victorem exercitum Carthaginem ad Scipionem reduxit.

6 Per eos ipsos dies perfugae a Gadibus venerunt pollicentes urbem Punicumque praesidium quod in ea urbe esset et imperatorem praesidii cum classe pro-
7 dituros esse.[1] Mago ibi ex fuga substiterat, navibusque in Oceano collectis aliquantum auxiliorum et trans fretum ex Africa [2] ora et ex proximis Hispaniae
8 locis per Hannonem praefectum coegerat. Fide accepta dataque perfugis, et Marcius eo cum expeditis cohortibus et Laelius cum [3] septem triremibus, quinqueremi una est missus, ut terra marique communi consilio rem gererent.

XXIV. Scipio ipse gravi morbo implicitus, graviore tamen fama, cum ad id quisque quod audierat insita hominibus [4] libidine alendi de industria rumores adiceret aliquid, provinciam omnem ac maxime
2 longinqua eius turbavit; apparuitque quantam excitatura molem vera fuisset clades, cum vanus rumor tantas procellas excivisset. Non socii in fide, non 3 exercitus in officio mansit. Mandonius et Indibilis, quibus, quia regnum sibi Hispaniae pulsis inde Carthaginiensibus destinarant animis, nihil pro spe
4 contigerat, concitatis popularibus—Lacetani autem

[1] esse om. JK Conway.
[2] ex Africa (africae P^1)$P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: africae SpJK.
[3] expeditis . . . cum A^4N^4(om. cum)JK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.
[4] hominibus N^4JK Eds.: hominum $P(1)N$.

---

[1] Cf. Vol. VII. pp. 279, n. 4; 282, n. 1; below, xxv. 11; XXIX. i. 19 and iii. 1 ff.
[2] Probably an error for Laeetani; in the north-east corner surrender of all the other tribes of that region owing B.C. 206 to their fear, led his victorious army back to Scipio at (New) Carthage.

About the same time came deserters from Gades promising to betray the city and the Punic garrison in that city and the commander of the garrison together with the fleet. Mago after his flight had halted there, and having assembled ships on the Ocean, he had gathered up a considerable force of auxiliaries both from the African coast across the strait and from the nearest places in Spain with the help of Hanno, the prefect. Promises were received from the deserters and given them, and Marcius with cohorts lightly equipped and Laelius also with seven triremes and one quinquereme were sent thither, to carry on the campaign by land and sea with a single plan.

XXIV. Scipio himself fell ill with an alarming malady, but still more alarming as reported, since everyone added something to what he had heard, with the inbred human passion for purposely magnifying rumours. His illness agitated the whole province and especially the distant parts of it. And how serious a situation would have been created if the fatality had been real was evident, since an empty report had stirred up such tempests. Allies did not remain loyal, nor the army mindful of duty. Mandonius and Indibilis,[1] because they had reckoned upon a kingdom of Spain for themselves when the Carthaginians should be expelled from it, and yet nothing to match their hopes had come to them, stirred up their countrymen—and they were Lacetani [2]—called of Spain around Barcino (Barcelona); xxxiv. 4; XXI. xxiii. 2; XXXIV. xx. 2.

A.U.C. 548 erant—et iuventute Celtiberorum excita agrum Suessetanum Sedetanumque sociorum populi Romani hostiliter depopulati sunt.

5 Civilis alius furor in castris ad Sucronem ortus. Octo ibi milia militum erant, praesidium gentibus
6 quae cis Hiberum incolunt inpositum. Motae autem eorum mentes sunt non tum primum cum de vita imperatoris dubii rumores [1] allati sunt, sed iam ante licentia ex diutino, ut fit, otio conlecta, et non nihil quod in hostico laxius rapto suetis vivere artiores in 7 pace res erant. Ac primo sermones tantum occulti serebantur: si bellum in provincia esset, quid sese inter pacatos facere? si debellatum iam et confecta
8 provincia esset, cur in Italiam non revehi? Flagitatum quoque stipendium procacius quam ex more et modestia militari erat, et ab custodibus probra in circumeuntes vigilias tribunos iacta, et noctu quidam praedatum in agrum circa pacatum ierant; postremo interdiu ac propalam sine commeatu ab signis
9 abibant. Omnia libidine ac licentia militum, nihil instituto ac [2] disciplina militiae aut imperio eorum
10 qui praeerant gerebatur. Forma tamen Romanorum castrorum constabat una ea re [3] quod tribunos, ex

[1] rumores om. $P(1)N$.
[2] ac JK Froben 2: aut $P(1)N$ Aldus, Conway.
[3] re Weissenborn, Eds.: spe $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben, Conway (who conjs. qua for quod): specie Freinsheim.

[1] Also north of the Ebro and near the coast; xxxi. 7; XXIX. i. 26. So were the Suessetani, enemies in XXV. xxxiv. 6, but now allies, neighbours of the Edetani across the river.

[2] The town of the same name on the river (now the Júcar). Near it Pompey fought against Sertorius; Plutarch Sert. 19; Pomp. 19; App. B.C. I. 110. Livy's source for the narrative of this mutiny was Polybius XI. xxv–xxx. Cf. App. Hisp. 34 ff. It remained a mutiny to the end (xxix. 12). The only citizens were (1) Romans in the army, and (2) Italian out the young men of the Celtiberians and ravaged B.C. 206 the territory of the Suessetani and Sedetani,[1] allies of the Roman people, in warlike fashion.

From citizens sprang a different outbreak in the camp near Sucro.[2] Eight thousand soldiers were there, posted as a garrison for the tribes dwelling on this side of the Ebro. Their disloyalty, however, was not just beginning when unsubstantiated reports of the general's imminent danger reached them, but existed even before, owing to the usual licence resulting from long inaction. It was also to some extent because men accustomed to live unrestrainedly on plunder in an enemy's territory felt the pinch of peace-time. And at first they merely engaged in secret conversations: If there was a war in the province, what were they doing among people already pacified? If the war was over now and the province set in order, why were they not transported back to Italy? They made demands also for their pay with more petulance than accorded with the customary self-control of the soldier; and sentries heaped reproaches on tribunes making the rounds of the guard, and at night some men had gone out for plunder into peaceful country all around. Finally by day and openly without permission they would leave their standards. Everything was being done in accordance with the whim and fancy of the soldiers, nothing according to the traditions and discipline of the service or the orders of superior officers. The outward appearance, however, of a Roman camp was maintained in this alone, that, believing the allies serving with them (xxxii. 6). There can be no hint of civil war in civilis furor, for the theme now to be developed was announced in § 2, non exercitus, etc.

U.C. 548

contagione furoris haud expertes seditionis defectionisque rati fore, et iura reddere in principiis sinebant et signum ab eis petebant et in stationes ac 11 vigilias ordine [1] ibant; et ut vim imperii abstulerant, ita speciem dicto parentium ultro ipsi [2] imperantes servabant.
12 Erupit deinde seditio, postquam reprehendere atque inprobare tribunos ea quae fierent et conari obviam ire et propalam abnuere furoris eorum se
13 futuros socios senserunt. Fugatis itaque e principiis ac post paulo e castris tribunis, ad principes seditionis, gregarios milites, C. Albium Calenum et C. Atrium Umbrum, delatum omnium consensu im-14 perium est. Qui nequaquam tribuniciis contenti ornamentis, insignia etiam summi imperii, fasces securesque, attrectare ausi; neque eis [3] venit in mentem suis tergis suis [4] cervicibus virgas illas securesque imminere quas ad metum aliorum prae-
15 ferrent. Mors Scipionis falso credita obcaecabat animos, sub cuius volgatam mox [5] famam non dubita-
16 bant totam Hispaniam arsuram bello; in eo tumultu et sociis pecunias imperari et diripi propinquas urbes posse; et turbatis rebus, cum omnia omnes auderent, minus insignia fore quae ipsi fecissent. XXV. Cum alios subinde recentes nuntios non mortis modo, sed etiam funeris exspectarent, neque superveniret

[1] ordine Sp²JK Froben 2: in ordinem P(1)N Aldus: in orbem Madvig.

[2] ipsi $C^{2}N^{1}$(altern.)JK Aldus, Froben: si im P: si P^{2}(1)(C²)N: sibi $M^{1}A^{5}$: sibi ipsi Conway.

[3] neque eis $N^{1}JK$ Aldus, Froben, Conway: nequem P(1)N: neque $P^{2}M^{1}$Eds.

[4] suis Sp² Froben 2, Conway: suisque P(1)NJK Aldus, Eds.

[5] mox P(1)N: iam $N^{1}JK$ Aldus, Froben, Conway.

tribunes, infected with their madness, would not fail B.C. 206 to share their mutiny and revolt, they permitted them to hear cases before the headquarters, went to them for the password and did outpost and guard duty in succession. Moreover, though they had robbed their command of power, yet they kept up a show of obedience while actually giving orders themselves.

Then the mutiny broke out after they observed that the tribunes censured and disapproved of what was being done and were endeavouring actively to oppose it, also openly declaring that they would not be partners in their madness. Accordingly, chasing the tribunes out of the space before headquarters and soon after out of the camp, they by common consent bestowed the command upon the leaders of the mutiny, the privates Gaius Albius of Cales and Gaius Atrius, an Umbrian. These men, not at all satisfied with the distinguishing marks of tribunes, ventured to pollute the insignia of the very highest command, the fasces and axes. Nor did it occur to them that those rods and axes, which they caused to be carried before them to frighten others, were hanging over their own backs and their own necks. The unfounded belief in Scipio's death was the cause of their blindness and, once rumour of it should presently be spread abroad, they had no doubt that all Spain would be ablaze with war. In that uprising, they thought, money could be exacted from allies, and also neighbouring cities plundered; and in the confusion, when any man would dare anything, what they had themselves done would be less conspicuous. XXV. While they waited from moment to moment for fresh news, expecting to hear not only of his death but even of his funeral, and yet none came and the groundless

U.C. 548

quisquam, evanesceretque temere ortus rumor, tum
2 primi auctores requiri coepti. Et subtrahente se quoque, ut credidisse potius temere quam finxisse rem talem videri posset, destituti duces iam sua ipsi insignia et pro vana imagine imperii quod gererent veram iustamque mox in se versuram potestatem
3 horrebant. Stupente[1] ita seditione, cum vivere primo, mox etiam valere Scipionem certi auctores adferrent, tribuni militum septem ab ipso Scipione
4 missi supervenerunt.[2] Ad quorum primum adventum exasperati animi; mox ipsis placido sermone permulcentibus notos cum quibus congressi erant,
5 leniti sunt. Circumeuntes enim tentoria primo, deinde in principiis praetorioque, ubi sermones inter se serentium circulos vidissent, adloquebantur percunctantes magis quae causa irae consternationisque
6 subitae foret quam factum accusantes. Volgo stipendium non datum ad diem iactabatur, et, cum eodem tempore quo scelus Iliturgitanorum exstitisset post duorum imperatorum duorumque exercituum stragem sua virtute defensum nomen Romanum ac retenta provincia esset, Iliturgitanos poenam noxae meritam habere, suis recte factis
7 gratiam qui exsolvat non esse. Talia querentes[3] aequa orare, seque ea relaturos ad imperatorem respondebant; laetari quod nihil tristius nec insana-

[1] stupente P(1)Eds.: stupenti (with seditioni) JK Luchs, Riemann: -ebant N.

[2] ab ipso Scipione missi supervenerunt Sp?JK Froben 2, Luchs, Conway: qui ab ipso Scipione sunt P(3) (with sunt missi AN, while N^4 adds supervenere, and N^2 deletes qui). Possibly qui is evidence for a lost clause.

[3] querentes, for this Riemann has querentibus.

[1] Cf. xix. i. and n.

report was losing hold, then its first sponsors began B.C. 206 to be sought out. And as one after another drew back, that he might be thought to have rashly believed such a thing rather than to have invented it, the deserted leaders were now alarmed at their own insignia and, in place of the empty semblance of command which was theirs, at the real, duly bestowed authority that would presently turn against them. Thus when the mutiny was at a standstill and credible informants brought the news, first that Scipio was alive, and then that he was even well, seven tribunes of the soldiers arrived, being sent by Scipio himself. Upon their arrival there was at first irritation; soon after, as the tribunes themselves by mild words calmed acquaintances whom they had met, the men were less resentful. For going round at first among the tents, then in the headquarters square and before the general's tent, where they saw groups talking together, they would speak to the men, asking them what was the reason for their anger and their sudden mania, instead of finding fault with them for what they had done. A common complaint was that their pay had not been given them on the proper date; also that, whereas at the time when the men of Iliturgi [1] had committed their crime, after the slaughter of the two commanders-in-chief and the two armies, the Roman name had been defended and the province retained by their own courage, yet, while the Iliturgians now had a due punishment for their crime, there was no one to reward their own good deeds. In reply the tribunes said that those who complained of such matters only were making just pleas, and they would report them to the commander-in-chief. They were glad that there was nothing more serious bilius esset; et P. Scipionem deum benignitate et rem publicam esse gratiae referendae.

8 Scipionem bellis adsuetum, ad seditionum pro-cellas rudem, sollicitum habebat res, ne aut exercitus 9 peccando aut ipse puniendo modum excederet. In praesentia, ut coepisset, leniter agi placuit et missis circa stipendiarias civitates exactoribus stipendii 10 spem propinquam facere; et [1] edictum subinde propositum ut ad stipendium petendum convenirent Carthaginem, seu carptim partes [2] seu universi mal-11 lent. Tranquillam seditionem iam [3] per se languescentem repentina quies rebellantium Hispanorum fecit; redierant enim in fines omisso incepto Mandonius et Indibilis, postquam vivere Scipionem allatum 12 est; nec iam erat aut civis aut externus cum quo 13 furorem suum consociarent. Omnia circumspec-tantes consilia [4] nihil reliqui habebant praeter non [5] tutissimum a malis consiliis receptum, ut imperatoris vel iustae irae vel non desperandae clementiae sese committerent: etiam hostibus eum ignovisse cum 14 quibus ferro dimicasset; suam seditionem sine volnere, sine sanguine fuisse, nec ipsam atrocem nec atroci poena dignam,—ut ingenia humana sunt ad suam 15 cuique levandam culpam nimio plus facunda.[6] Illa

[1] facere; et JK Luchs, Conway: -eret et N^t: fecere $P(1)N$: facere Aldus, Froben.

[2] partes $P(1)N^z$: per partes Gronovius: om. as a gloss Riemann.

[3] iam N^tJK Eds.: om. $P(1)N$.

[4] consilia $P(1)NJK$ Eds.: om. Gronovius, Conway.

[5] non $P(1)NJK$ Eds.; unum Aldus, Froben, Conway: enim Sp.

nor more incurable; and by favour of the gods B.C. 206
Scipio and the republic, they said, were in a position to show gratitude.

Scipio, who was familiar with wars but unacquainted with the gusts of mutinies, was kept in a state of concern lest either the army should go to excess in wrong-doing or he himself in punishing them. For the present he decided to use gentle measures, as he had begun to do, and to bring the hope of pay nearer by sending collectors round the tributary states. Next an edict was posted up that they should assemble at (New) Carthage to get their pay, whether they preferred to do so as separate units or all together. The mutiny, already of itself on the wane, was quelled by sudden peace on the part of the rebellious Spaniards. For Mandonius and Indibilis had abandoned their project and retired to their borders when they had news that Scipio was alive. Nor was there either a fellow-citizen or foreigner any longer with whom the soldiers might share their madness. On surveying all possible plans they had nothing left except a not altogether safe retreat from criminal designs, namely, to give themselves up either to the commander's well-grounded anger or to his mercy, as not beyond their hopes. He had pardoned even enemies, they said, with whom he had fought with the sword; their mutiny had been free from wounds, free from bloodshed, and neither in itself savage nor meriting a savage punishment. So unduly eloquent is human nature in minimizing one's own guilt.

---

[6] facunda $A^{s}?N^{2}$ or $N^{s}JK$ Eds.: faciunda $P(3)N$: f(o)ecunda Duker, Madvig 1863.

u.c. 548 dubitatio erat, singulaene cohortes an universi ad stipendium petendum irent. Inclinavit sententia, quod tutius censebant, universos ire.

XXVI. Per eosdem dies quibus haec illi consul-
2 tabant consilium de iis Carthagini erat, certabaturque sententiis utrum in auctores tantum seditionis—erant autem ii numero haud plus quam quinque et triginta—animadverteretur, an plurium supplicio vindicanda tam foedi exempli defectio magis quam
3 seditio esset. Vicit sententia lenior ut, unde culpa orta esset, ibi poena consisteret; ad multitudinem
4 castigationem satis esse. Consilio dimisso, ut id actum videretur, expeditio adversus Mandonium Indibilemque edicitur exercitui qui Carthagine erat et 5 cibaria dierum aliquot parare iubentur. Tribunis septem qui et antea Sucronem ad leniendam seditionem ierant obviam exercitui missis quina nomina
6 principum seditionis edita sunt, ut eos per idoneos homines benigno voltu ac sermone in hospitium
7 invitatos sopitosque [1] vino vincirent. Haud procul iam Carthagine aberant cum ex obviis auditum postero die omnem exercitum cum M. Silano in Lacetanos proficisci non metu modo [2] omni qui tacitus insidebat animis liberavit eos, sed laetitiam ingentem fecit, quod magis habituri solum imperatorem quam

[1] sopitosque A¹N¹JK Eds.: -que (om. sopitos) P(3)*K*².
[2] modo A¹N¹JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

The only question was whether to go in separate cohorts to get their pay, or all together. Their decision was that all should go together, which they thought safer. B.C. 206

XXVI. During the days on which they were thus deliberating there was a war-council in regard to them at (New) Carthage, and a conflict of opinions as to whether the leaders only of the mutiny—and they were not more than thirty-five in number—should be punished, or whether punishment of a larger number was required in penalizing, not a mutiny but rather a rebellion which set so terrible an example. The milder opinion prevailed, that punishment should be limited to those with whom the breach of discipline had begun, whereas for the mass a reprimand was enough. After the dismissal of the council, to give the impression that this was the matter discussed, an expedition against Mandonius and Indibilis was announced to the army which was at (New) Carthage, and they were ordered to make ready their rations for several days. The seven tribunes who had already gone to Sucro to repress the mutiny and were now sent to meet the army had each of them the names of five leaders of the mutiny assigned him, to have them invited with kindly countenance and words by suitable men to be their guests, lulled to sleep by wine and then bound. The mutineers were now not far from (New) Carthage when the news, heard from those they met, that on the next day the entire army would set out under Marcus Silanus against the Lacetani, not only relieved them of all fear which remained unexpressed in their minds, but caused great rejoicing that they would have the commander alone, rather than be themselves in his

B.C. 48

8 ipsi futuri in potestate eius essent. Sub occasum solis urbem ingressi sunt exercitumque alterum
9 parantem omnia ad iter viderunt. Excepti sermonibus de industria compositis—laetum opportunumque adventum eorum imperatori esse, quod sub ipsam profectionem alterius exercitus venissent—
10 corpora curant. Ab tribunis sine ullo tumultu auctores seditionis, per idoneos homines perducti in 11 hospitia, comprensi ac vincti sunt. Vigilia quarta impedimenta exercitus cuius[1] simulabatur iter proficisci coepere; sub lucem signa mota, et ad portam retentum agmen custodesque circa omnes portas 12 missi, ne quis urbe egrederetur. Vocati deinde ad contionem qui pridie venerant, ferociter in forum ad tribunal imperatoris, ut ultro territuri succlama-
13 tionibus, concurrunt. Simul et imperator in tribunal escendit[2] et reducti armati a portis[3] inermi contioni
14 se[4] ab tergo circumfuderunt. Tum omnis ferocia concidit et, ut postea fatebantur, nihil aeque eos terruit quam praeter spem robur et colos imperatoris, quem adfectum visuros crediderant, voltusque qualem 15 ne in acie quidem aiebant meminisse. Sedit tacitus paulisper, donec nuntiatum est deductos in forum

[1] cuius $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: cui Sp? Froben 2.
[2] escendit PCR: as- R^2MBDAN Aldus: con- Sp?JK Froben 2.
[3] a portis before armati JK.
[4] contioni se $P(3)$: se contioni $ANJK$ Aldus, Froben.

power. At sunset they entered the city and saw the other army making every preparation for the march. Received with studied words of welcome—that their coming was a happy and timely thing for the general, in that they had arrived at the very time the other army was leaving—they took refreshment and rest. The tribunes, without causing any commotion, had the promoters of the mutiny brought by suitable persons to their hospitable quarters, then seized and bound. At the fourth watch the baggage of the army which, it was pretended, was to march away began to take the road. By daybreak the standards were in motion, but at the gate the column was halted and guards were sent round to all the gates, that no one should leave the city. Then the men who had arrived the day before, on being summoned to an assembly, rushed fiercely into the open space [1] and up to the general's platform, intending actually to intimidate him by their interruptions. At the same moment that the general mounted the platform the armed men brought back from the gates surrounded the unarmed assembly from the rear. Then all their fierceness failed them and, as they afterwards admitted, nothing alarmed them so much as the unexpected strength and healthy colour of the general whom they had believed they would see as an invalid, also an expression of his face such as, they said, they never remembered even in battle. He sat in silence for a moment, until the report reached him that the promoters of the mutiny had been B.C. 206

[1] I.e. Polybius' ἀγορά (VI. xxxi. 1 f.) to the right of the headquarters, not the similar space (also called forum) in which stood the quaestorium; XLI. ii. 11.

u.c. 48 auctores seditionis et parata omnia esse. XXVII. Tum silentio per praeconem facto ita coepit:

" Numquam mihi defuturam orationem qua exer-
2 citum meum adloquerer credidi, non quo verba umquam potius quam res exercuerim, sed quia prope a pueritia in castris habitus adsueram militaribus in-
3 geniis; apud vos quem ad modum loquar nec consilium nec oratio suppeditat, quos ne quo nomine
4 quidem appellare debeam scio. Cives? qui a patria vestra descistis. An milites? qui imperium auspiciumque abnuistis, sacramenti religionem rupistis. Hostes? Corpora, ora, vestitum, habitum civium adgnosco; facta, dicta, consilia, animos
5 hostium video. Quid enim vos, nisi quod Ilergetes et[1] Lacetani, aut optastis aliud aut sperastis? Et illi tamen Mandonium atque Indibilem, regiae nobilitatis viros, duces furoris secuti sunt; vos auspicium et imperium ad Umbrum Atrium et 6 Calenum Albium detulistis. Negate vos id omnes fecisse aut factum voluisse, milites; paucorum eum furorem atque amentiam esse; libenter credam negantibus; nec enim ea sunt commissa quae, volgata in omnem exercitum, sine piaculis ingentibus expiari possint.[2]

7 " Invitus ea tamquam volnera attingo; sed nisi
8 tacta tractataque sanari non possunt. Equidem pulsis Hispania Carthaginiensibus nullum locum tota

[1] et JK Aldus, Froben: aut P(1)N: ac Drakenborch conj.

[2] possint P(1)NJK Eds.: possent Riemann.

[1] The following speech has few direct borrowings from the briefer discourse in Polybius XI. xxviii f., e.g., the comparison brought into the open space and that everything was ready. XXVII. Then, when the herald had enforced silence, Scipio began as follows:[1] B.C. 206

"Never have I supposed that language with which to address my army would fail me; not that I have ever occupied myself with words rather than deeds, but because, having lived in camps almost from boyhood, I was familiar with the minds of soldiers. But how to speak to you—for that both thoughts and language fail me. I do not know even by what name I ought to address you. Citizens? when you have revolted from your country? Or soldiers? when you have rejected the high command and the auspices, have broken the sanctity of your oath? Enemies? I recognize the bodies, faces, clothing, appearance of citizens, but the deeds, the words, the plans, the spirit of enemies. For what else did you either wish or hope for but the same as the Ilergetes and the Lacetani? And yet they followed Mandonius and Indibilis, men of royal rank, as leaders in their madness. You conferred the auspices and high command upon the Umbrian Atrius and the Calenian Albius. Say that not all of you did that, soldiers, or wished it done; that it was the frenzy and folly of a few; I will gladly accept your denial. For the acts committed were such that, if they were shared by the entire army, they cannot be expiated without atonements on a great scale.

"Unwillingly do I handle such misdeeds, as if they were wounds. But unless handled and treated they cannot be healed. As for myself, after the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain I did not believe of a crowd to the sea, § 11, more fully developed in the Greek peroration, xxix. 9–11.

U.C. provincia,[1] nullos homines credebam esse ubi vita
548 invisa [2] esset mea; sic me non solum adversus socios
9 gesseram, sed etiam adversus hostes. In castris en meis—quantum opinio [3] fefellit!—fama mortis meae non accepta solum, sed etiam exspectata est.
10 Non [4] quod ego volgari facinus per omnes velim—equidem, si totum exercitum meum [5] mortem mihi optasse crederem, hic statim ante oculos vestros morerer, nec me vita iuvaret invisa civibus et militibus 11 meis. Sed multitudo omnis sicut natura maris per se inmobilis est, at [6] venti et aurae cient; ita [7] aut tranquillum aut procellae in vobis sunt; et causa atque origo omnis furoris penes auctores est, vos 12 contagione insanistis; qui mihi ne hodie quidem scire videmini quo amentiae progressi sitis, quid facinoris in me, quid in patriam parentesque ac liberos vestros, quid in deos sacramenti testes, quid adversus auspicia sub quibus militatis,[8] quid adversus morem militiae disciplinamque maiorum, quid adversus summi imperii maiestatem ausi sitis.

13 "De me ipso taceo—temere potius quam avide credideritis, is denique ego sim, cuius imperii taedere exercitum minime mirandum sit—: patria quid de vobis meruerat, quam cum Mandonio et Indibili con-14 sociando consilia prodebatis? Quid populus Romanus, cum imperium ablatum ab tribunis suffragio

[1] nullum . . . provincia A'N'JK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)N.
[2] invisa A'N'JK : om. P(1)N.
[3] opinio P(1)NJK : me opinio Riemann.
[4] Non JK Aldus, Froben : vero P(3)N : verum C[4].
[5] meum om. P(1)N.
[6] at suggested (not read) by Conway : et P(3) Weissenborn : om. Gronovius, Conway : ut DA'N'JK Aldus, Froben, Alschefski, Madvig : si et N : sed Crévier.

there was in the entire province any place, any people, B.C. 206 where my life was hated; so had I borne myself not only towards allies, but also towards enemies. Behold! here in my own camp—how mistaken I was!—a rumour of my death was not only believed but even waited for. Not that I should wish the crime to be shared by all. For my part, if I believed that the whole of my army had desired my death I should die here at once before your eyes, nor would a life hated by my fellow-citizens and my soldiers give me pleasure. But every crowd is in itself motionless, as is the natural state of the sea; rather do winds and breezes ruffle it. So among you there is either calm or sudden storms. And the cause and source of every madness is chargeable to its promoters; your insanity came by contagion. Even today you do not seem to me to know what a pitch of frenzy you have reached, what a crime you have dared to commit against me, against your country and parents and children, against the gods, witnesses of your oath, what a crime as regards the auspices under which you are serving, or the custom of the service and the discipline of your ancestors, or the dignity of the supreme command!

"Of myself I say nothing, granting that you were hasty rather than eager in believing, granting in short that I am a man whose authority irks an army, and no wonder. But the country, what evil had she done you, when you were betraying her by sharing your designs with Mandonius and Indibilis? What harm had the Roman people done you when you took away

---

[7] ita om. SpN[3]JK Froben 2.
[8] militatis P(1)N: militastis Sp?JK Froben 2.

u.c. 548 populi creatis ad homines privatos detulistis, cum eo ipso non contenti si pro tribunis illos haberetis, fasces imperatoris vestri ad eos quibus servus cui imperarent numquam fuerat, Romanus exercitus detulistis? 15 In praetorio tetenderunt Albius et Atrius, classicum apud eos cecinit. signum ab iis petitum est, sederunt in tribunali P. Scipionis, lictor apparuit, summoto incesserunt, fasces cum securibus praelati sunt. 16 Lapides pluere et fulmina iaci de caelo et insuetos fetus animalia edere vos portenta esse putatis: hoc est portentum quod nullis hostiis, nullis supplicationibus sine sanguine eorum qui tantum ausi facinus sunt [1] expiari possit.

XXVIII. "Atque ego, quamquam nullum scelus rationem habet, tamen, ut in re nefaria, quae mens, 2 quod consilium vestrum fuerit scire velim. Regium quondam in praesidium missa legio interfectis per scelus principibus civitatis urbem opulentam per 3 decem annos tenuit; propter quod facinus tota legio, milia hominum quattuor, in foro Romae securi per- 4 cussi sunt. Sed illi primum non Atrium Umbrum semilixam, nominis etiam abominandi ducem, sed D. Vibellium tribunum militum secuti sunt, nec cum Pyrrho nec cum Samnitibus aut Lucanis, hostibus 5 populi Romani, se coniunxerunt; vos cum Mandonio

[1] sunt N^1(altern.)JK Aldus, Froben : sint $P(1)N$.

[1] Cf. Periocha 12 fin.; Polybius I. vii. 6 ff. This legion was made up of Campanians. As such they were Roman citizens and did not serve as auxiliaries.

[2] Cf. Periocha 15. Livy overlooked serious losses the legion must have suffered when the city was captured and in the course of ten years. This may reduce the number executed to about Polybius' figure—more than 300; l.c. §§ 11 f.

the command from tribunes elected by vote of the people and conferred it upon private persons, when, not even satisfied with having them as tribunes, you, a Roman army, bestowed the fasces of your commander upon men who had never had a slave to whom they might give orders? In the headquarters were lodged Albius and Atrius; at their tent sounded the trumpet, men came to them for the watchword; they sat on Publius Scipio's tribunal. A lictor attended them; the way was cleared before they proceeded; fasces with their axes were borne before them. Showers of stones and thunderbolts hurled from the sky and animals bringing forth strange offspring you reckon portents; here we have a portent which cannot be expiated by any victims, by any set days of prayer, without the blood of those who have dared so great a crime. B.C. 203

XXVIII. "And although no crime has a reasonable ground, nevertheless I should like to know what was your purpose, what your plan, seeing that we are dealing with a flagrant offence. A legion formerly sent as a garrison to Regium,[1] after foully slaying the leading men of the state, held that wealthy city for ten years. For that crime the entire legion, four thousand men,[2] were beheaded in the Forum at Rome. But in the first place they did not follow the lead of Atrius the Umbrian, half-soldier half-sutler, with an ominous name[3] also, but of Decimus Vibellius, a tribune of the soldiers; neither did they ally themselves with Pyrrhus, nor with the Samnites and Lucanians, enemies of the Roman people. You

[3] I.e. from ater, 'coal black,' 'unlucky'; cf. the dies atri of the calendar.

A.U.C. 548

et Indibili et [1] consilia communicastis et arma conso-6 ciaturi fuistis. Illi, sicut Campani Capuam Tuscis veteribus cultoribus ademptam, Mamertini in Sicilia Messanam, sic Regium habituri perpetuam sedem erant, nec populum Romanum nec socios populi Ro-7 mani ultro lacessituri bello: Sucronemne vos domicilium habituri eratis? Ubi si vos decedens confecta provincia imperator relinquerem, deum hominumque fidem implorare debebatis, quod non rediretis [2] ad coniuges liberosque vestros.
8 "Sed horum quoque memoriam, sicut patriae meique, eieceritis ex animis vestris; viam consilii scelerati sed non ad ultimum dementis exsequi volo.
9 Mene vivo et cetero incolumi exercitu, cum quo ego die uno Carthaginem cepi, cum quo quattuor imperatores,[3] quattuor exercitus Carthaginiensium fudi, fugavi. Hispania [4] expuli, vos octo milia hominum, minoris certe omnes pretii quam Albius et Atrius sunt quibus vos subiecistis. Hispaniam provinciam populo 10 Romano erepturi eratis? Amolior et amoveo nomen meum; nihil ultra facile creditam mortem meam a 11 vobis violatus sim: quid? si ego morerer, mecum exspiratura res publica, mecum casurum imperium populi Romani erat? Ne istuc Iuppiter optimus maximus sirit, urbem auspicato deis auctoribus in

[1] et SpN^{s}JK Froben 2 : om. P(1)N Aldus.
[2] rediretis $M^{1}A^{6?}N^{2}JK$ Aldus, Froben, Eds. : redieritis P 1)(-entis D)N Conway.
[3] quattuor imperatores om. P(1)N.
[4] Hispania $A^{6}N^{s}JK$ Luchs, Conway : om. P(1) Eds.

[1] It was in fact the Samnites who captured Etruscan Capua; cf. IV. xxxvii. 1. (424 B.C.); Strabo V. iv. 3.

have shared your plans with Mandonius and Indibilis B.C. 206 and were to have been their comrades in arms as well. The legion would have held Regium as its permanent abode, just as the Campanians [1] held Capua, wrested away from its former Etruscan inhabitants, just as the Mamertines held Messana in Sicily; and it would not have gone so far as to attack the Roman people or allies of the Roman people. Was Sucro to have been your domicile? If I had left you there when as general-in-command I was retiring from my province completely subdued, it would have been right for you to implore the help of gods and men because you were not returning to your wives and children.

"But granted that you have banished their memory also from your minds, as you have that of your country and of myself, I wish to follow up the outcome of your plan, a criminal one but not utterly insane. If I lived and the rest of the army was intact with which I captured (New) Carthage in a single day and with which I routed, put to flight, drove out of Spain, four generals,[2] four armies of the Carthaginians, would you —eight thousand men, all of you certainly of less consequence than Albius and Atrius, to whom you submitted yourselves—would you really have intended to wrest the province of Spain from the Roman people? Suppose I take no account whatever of my name—granted that I have not been wronged by you except in your readiness to believe me dead, tell me, if I had been dying would the state have breathed its last with me, would the empire of the Roman people have fallen with me? May Jupiter the best and greatest forbid that the city, founded with due auspices and

[2] Both Hasdrubals, Hanno (ii. 11) and Mago (xvi. 13).

a.u.c. 548 aeternum conditam huic fragili[1] et mortali corpori 12 aequalem esse. Flaminio, Paulo, Graccho,[2] Postumio Albino, M. Marcello, T. Quinctio Crispino, Cn. Fulvio, Scipionibus meis, tot tam praeclaris imperatoribus uno bello absumptis superstes est populus Romanus, eritque mille aliis nunc ferro nunc morbo[3] morientibus: meo unius funere elata esset res
13 publica?[4] Vos ipsi hic in Hispania patre et patruo meo, duobus imperatoribus, interfectis Septimum Marcium ducem vobis adversus exsultantes recenti victoria Poenos delegistis. Et sic loquor tamquam 14 sine duce Hispaniae futurae fuerint: M. Silanus eodem iure, eodem imperio mecum in provinciam missus, L. Scipio frater meus et C. Laelius legati, 15 vindices maiestatis imperii deessent? Utrum exercitus exercitui, an duces ducibus, an dignitas, an causa comparari poterat? Quibus si omnibus superiores essetis, arma contra patriam, contra cives vestros ferretis? Africam Italiae, Carthaginem urbi Romanae imperare velletis? Quam ob noxam patriae? XXIX. Coriolanum quondam damnatio iniusta, miserum et indignum exilium ut iret ad oppugnandam patriam impulit; revocavit tamen a publico parricidio privata

[1] huic fragili $P(1)N$ Aldus: fragili huic JK Froben.
[2] Flaminio . . . Graccho Sp?N²JK Froben 2: om. $P(1)N$.
[3] nunc morbo A^6N^2 or N^2JK: om. $P(1)N$.
[4] esset res publica SpJK (preceded in all three by populi romani, which Froben 2, Luchs and others retain) Conway: res p. (or publica) $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.

[1] Cf. IV. iv. 4; V. vii. 10. For urbs aeterna see Trans. Amer. Philol. Assn. XXV. (1894), 34 ff.; Franz Christ in Tübinger Beiträge XXXI. (1938), 59 ff.

[2] Although Gnaeus Scipio was not legally an imperator, having been sent to Spain by Publius, while he himself returned to Italy (XXI. xxxii. 3; xl. 3), it was unnecessary favour of the gods to endure forever,[1] should live no B.C. 203 longer than this frail, mortal body! Although Flaminius, Paulus, Gracchus, Postumius Albinus, Marcus Marcellus, Titus Quinctius Crispinus, Gnaeus Fulvius, my Scipios—so many generals and so distinguished—have perished in one war, the Roman people survives and will survive, although a thousand others die, now by the sword, now by disease. At my funeral—one man's—would the republic have been borne to its tomb? You yourselves here in Spain, after the slaying of my father and uncle, two generals,[2] appointed Septimus Marcius as your commander against the Carthaginians, who were overjoyed by their recent victory. And I am speaking just as if the Spanish provinces would have been without a commander. But would Marcus Silanus, who was sent with me into the province with the same authority, the same command, would my brother Lucius Scipio and Gaius Laelius, my lieutenants, have failed to avenge the dignity of the high command? Could army have been compared with army, or generals with generals? Could rank or cause have been matched? If in all these respects you had been superior, would you have borne arms against your country, against your fellow-citizens? Would you have wished Africa to rule over Italy, Carthage over the city of Rome? For what offence on the part of your country? XXIX. Coriolanus was once impelled by an unjust condemnation, a wretched and undeserved banishment, to set out to besiege his native city. Nevertheless family devotion recalled him from foul treason to the state. In your case what for the historian to be pedantic. Cf. XXV. xxxii. 1; xxxvii. 9; XXVI. ii. 5.

A.U.C. 548

2 pietas: vos qui dolor, quae ira incitavit? Stipendiumne diebus paucis imperatore aegro serius numeratum satis digna causa fuit cur patriae indiceretis bellum, cur ad Ilergetes desciscerentis a populo Romano, cur nihil divinarum humanarumve rerum inviolatum vobis esset?

3 "Insanistis profecto, milites, nec maior in corpus meum vis morbi quam in vestras mentes invasit.
4 Horret animus referre quid crediderint homines, quid speraverint, quid optaverint:[1] auferat omnia inrita oblivio, si potest; si non, utcumque silentium tegat.
5 Non negaverim tristem atrocemque vobis visam orationem meam:[2] quanto creditis facta vestra atrociora esse quam dicta mea? Et me ea quae fecistis pati aequum censetis;[3] vos ne dici quidem omnia aequo
6 animo fertis?[4] Sed ne ea quidem ipsa ultra exprobrabuntur. Utinam tam facile vos obliviscamini eorum
7 quam ego obliviscar! Itaque quod ad universos vos attinet, si erroris paenitet, satis superque poenarum habeo. Albius Calenus et Atrius Umber et ceteri nefariae seditionis auctores sanguine luent quod ad-
8 miserunt. Vobis supplicii eorum spectaculum non modo non acerbum, sed laetum etiam, si sana mens rediit, debet esse: de nullis enim quam de vobis infestius aut inimicius[5] consuluerunt."
9 Vix finem dicendi fecerat cum ex praeparato simul omnium rerum terror oculis auribusque est
10 offusus. Exercitus, qui corona contionem circum-

[1] quid optaverint P(1)N Aldus, Froben: om. SpJK.
[2] meam P(1)N Aldus: om. Sp?JKx Froben 2.
[3] pati aequum censetis om. P(1)N, one line.
[4] fertis P(1)N: feretis A'N'JK Aldus, Froben.
[5] inimicius Aldus, Froben, Eds.: inicius P(3): iniquius CAN: immitius JK.

grievance, what anger spurred you on? Was delay of B.C. 206 a few days in receiving your pay owing to the illness of your general a sufficient reason why you should declare war on your country, why you should revolt from the Roman people to the Ilergetes, why not one thing divine or human should be to you inviolable?

"Insane you surely were, soldiers, and no more critical ailment attacked my body than your minds. I shrink from recalling what men believed, what they hoped, what they desired. Let forgetfulness carry away and cancel everything if possible; if not, let silence somehow cover it all. I would not deny that my speech has seemed to you severe and cruel; how much more cruel do you believe your acts are than my words? And you think I ought patiently to bear what you have done: on your side can you not bear patiently even the telling of the whole story? But even those acts themselves will not be the subject of further reproaches. May you forget them as easily as I shall forget them! Accordingly, so far as the mass of you are concerned, if you repent of your mistake, that is to me a quite sufficient punishment. Albius of Cales and Atrius the Umbrian and the rest of those who brought about a wicked mutiny will atone with their blood for what they have done. To you the spectacle of their punishment, if your minds have returned to health, ought not only to bring no bitterness but even joy. For there are no men whom they have treated in a more hostile and unfriendly spirit than yourselves."

Scarcely had he made an end of speaking when, in accordance with previous orders, their eyes and ears were assailed by terrifying sights and sounds everywhere. The troops who had encircled the asdederat, gladiis ad scuta concrepuit; praeconis audita

A.U.C. 548

11 vox citantis nomina damnatorum in consilio; nudi in medium protrahebantur, et simul omnis apparatus supplicii expromebatur. Deligati ad palum virgisque caesi et securi percussi, adeo torpentibus metu qui aderant ut non modo ferocior vox adversus atrocitatem 12 poenae, sed ne gemitus quidem exaudiretur. Tracti inde de medio omnes,[1] purgatoque loco citati milites nominatim apud tribunos militum in verba P. Scipionis iurarunt, stipendiumque ad nomen singulis persolutum est. Hunc finem exitumque seditio militum coepta apud Sucronem habuit.

XXX. Per idem tempus ad Baetim fluvium Hanno, praefectus Magonis, missus a Gadibus cum parva manu Afrorum, mercede Hispanos sollicitando ad
2 quattuor milia iuvenum armavit. Castris deinde exutus ab L. Marcio, maxima parte militum inter tumultum captorum castrorum, quibusdam etiam in fuga amissis, palatos persequente equite, cum paucis ipse effugit.

3 Dum haec ad Baetim fluvium geruntur, Laelius interim freto in Oceanum evectus ad Carteiam classe accessit. Urbs ea in ora Oceani sita est, ubi primum

[1] omnes $P(1)NJK$: exanimes Allen: trunci et inanim^{i} omnes Johnson conj. (after Polybius XI. xxx. 3).

[1] At the north end of the Bay of Gibraltar, about half-way between the Rock, Calpe, and Algeciras. Livy thinks of the Atlantic as beginning immediately beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and thus including nearly the whole of the Strait sembly crashed swords against shields. The herald's voice was heard, calling out the names of those condemned in the war-council. They were being dragged out into the centre stripped, and at the same time everything requisite for punishment was being brought out. Bound to a stake they were scourged and beheaded, while the spectators were so paralysed by fear that not only was no fierce protest against the severity of the punishment heard, but not even a groan. Then all the bodies were dragged away from the centre, and after the ground had been cleansed the soldiers, summoned by name, in the presence of the military tribunes, swore allegiance to Publius Scipio; and as each man was called his pay was counted out to him. Such was the end and outcome of the mutiny of the soldiers which began at Sucro. B.C. 206

XXX. About the same time along the Baetis River Hanno, Mago's prefect, who had been sent from Gades with a small force of Africans, enlisting Spaniards for pay, armed about four thousand young men. Then stripped of his camp by Lucius Marcius, while the largest part of his troops were lost in the confusion of its capture, some also lost in the flight, since the cavalry pursued the scattered fugitives, Hanno himself with a small number only escaped.

While these things were going on along the Baetis River, Laelius meantime sailed down the strait into the Ocean and came with his fleet to Carteia.[1] This city is situated on the coast of the Ocean, where (Fretum Gaditanum). In 171 B.C. Carteia became a Latin colony; XLIII. iii. 3 f. Cf. also Strabo III. i. 7; Mela II. 96.

A.U.C. 548

4 e faucibus angustis panditur mare. Gades sine certamine per proditionem [1] recipiendi, ultro qui eam rem pollicerentur in castra Romana venientibus, spes, sicut ante dictum est, fuerat. Sed [2] patefacta inmatura proditio est, conprensosque omnes Mago Adherbali praetori Carthaginem devehendos tradit. 5 Adherbal coniuratis in quinqueremem inpositis, praemissaque ea, quia tardior quam triremis erat, ipse cum octo triremibus modico intervallo sequitur. 6 Iam fretum intrabat quinqueremis cum Laelius et ipse in quinqueremi ex [3] portu Carteiae sequentibus septem triremibus evectus in Adherbalem ac triremes [4] invehitur, quinqueremem satis credens deprensam rapido in freto in adversum aestum reciprocari non posse. 7 Poenus in re subita parumper incertus trepidavit [5] utrum quinqueremem sequeretur 8 an in hostes rostra converteret. Ipsa cunctatio facultatem detractandae pugnae ademit; iam enim sub ictu teli erant, et undique instabant hostes. Aestus quoque arbitrium moderandi naves ademerat. Neque erat navali pugna [6] similis, quippe ubi nihil vo- 9 luntarium, nihil artis aut consilii esset. Una natura freti aestusque totius certaminis potens suis, alienis navibus nequiquam remigio in contrarium tendentes invehebat; et [7] fugientem navem videres vertice

[1] per proditionem Sigonius, Eds.: per dedit- $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: per dit- Sp: proditione Froben 2.
[2] Sed om. $P(1)N$.
[3] ex $A^{v}JK$: e Froben 2: om. $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[4] ac triremes om. $P(1)N$.
[5] trepidavit $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: -bat JK.
[6] pugna Froben: pugnae $P(1)NJK$ Aldus.
[7] et $P(1)NJK$ Eds.: ut $A^{1}N^{1}K$ Aldus, Froben, Luchs.

[1] Cf. above, xxiii. 6.

the sea begins to open out after the narrow entrance. B.C. 206
Of Gades, as has been said above, he had hoped without a battle to gain possession by betrayal,[1] since men actually came into the Roman camp to make such a promise. But the betrayal was prematurely revealed, and Mago arrested all the conspirators and turned them over to Adherbal, the magistrate,[2] to be transported to Carthage. Adherbal placed the conspirators on a quinquereme and after sending it in advance, because it was slower than a trireme, himself followed with eight triremes at no great distance. The quinquereme was already entering the strait when Laelius, also on a quinquereme, sailed out from the harbour of Carteia followed by seven triremes, and steered for Adherbal and his triremes, feeling quite sure that the quinquereme, caught in the swift current of the strait, could not reverse its course in the face of the tide. The Carthaginian in the unexpected situation was troubled for the moment and uncertain whether to follow his quinquereme or to turn his prows towards the enemy. That hesitation in itself deprived him of the power to refuse a battle; for they were already within range and the enemy was pressing them from all sides. The tide also had deprived them of control of their ships. Nor was the fight like a naval battle; for here there was no initiative, no skill or strategy. The nature of the strait and its tide alone controlled the entire engagement, carrying men, vainly struggling to row in the opposite direction, against their own ships or those of the enemy. And one might have seen a fleeing ship swung about by a swirl

[2] I.e. one of the two sufĕtes and at the same time a general. Cf. xxxvii. 2 (at Gades); XXX. vii. 5.

A.U.C. 548

retro intortam victoribus inlatam, et sequentem, si in contrarium tractum incidisset maris, fugientis modo 10 sese avertentem. Iam in ipsa pugna haec, cum infesto[1] rostro peteret hostium navem, obliqua ipsa ictum alterius rostri accipiebat; illa, cum transversa obiceretur hosti, repente intorta in proram circumage-
11 batur. Cum inter triremes fortuna regente anceps proelium misceretur, quinqueremis Romana seu pondere tenacior, seu pluribus remorum ordinibus scindentibus vertices cum facilius regeretur, duas triremes suppressit, unius praelata impetu lateris
12 alterius remos detersit; ceterasque quas indepta esset mulcasset, ni cum reliquis quinque navibus Adherbal velis in Africam transmisisset.

XXXI. Laelius victor Carteiam revectus, auditis quae acta Gadibus erant—patefactam proditionem coniuratosque missos Carthaginem, spem ad inritum
2 redactam qua venissent—nuntiis ad L. Marcium missis, nisi si[2] terere frustra tempus sedendo ad Gades vellent, redeundum ad imperatorem esse, adsentiente Marcio paucos post dies ambo Cartha-
3 ginem rediere. Ad quorum discessum non respiravit

[1] infesto JK Aldus, Froben, Eds.: infesta P(1)N Conway.
[2] si *om. N*²*J Aldus, Froben.*

---

[1] If a quinquereme had but one bank of oars, each oar pulled by five men, as many now incline to believe, it remains unexplained how Livy in comparing a quinquereme in battle with triremes could simply say that the former had more ordines remorum, unless he thought that to be the case. In XXIV. xxxiv. 7 exteriore ordine remorum includes all the oars on one side of a ship but does not tell us whether in a single bank or in five. Certainly the quinquereme, however rowed, was a more impressive sight from the shore than a trireme even and borne against the victors, and a pursuing ship, B.C. 206

if it chanced upon an opposite current, turning away as if in flight. In actual combat now one ship, aiming to ram a ship of the enemy with its beak, turning aslant would itself receive the blow of the other's beak. Another ship, exposing its beam to the enemy, would suddenly be swung and turned bow foremost. While between the triremes an indecisive battle controlled by chance was in progress, the Roman quinquereme, whether because she was steadier by reason of her weight or more easily steered as her more numerous banks of oars [1] cleft the whirling waters, sank two triremes and shooting past another swept away the oars on one side. In addition she would have seriously damaged the rest of the ships with which she had closed, had not Adherbal with five remaining ships crossed over to Africa under sail.

XXXI. Laelius as victor sailed back to Carteia, and on hearing of the occurrences at Gades—that the betrayal had been revealed and the conspirators sent to Carthage; that the hope in which they had come to him had been frustrated—he sent messengers to Lucius Marcius, saying that unless they wished to waste time to no purpose in idling before Gades, they must return to the commander-in-chief. As Marcius agreed, they both returned after a few days to (New) Carthage. Upon their departure Mago was not only to a landlubber; cf. XXIX. xi. 4. For the whole question see A. Köster, Das antike Seewesen 143 ff.; and in Kromayer-Veith, Heerwesen, etc. 182 f.; 616 f.; W. W. Tarn, Hellenistic Military and Naval Developments 124 ff.; and in Journal of Hellenic Studies, XXV. 137 ff., 156, 204 ff.; Starr, C. G., Class. Philol. XXXV. 353 ff.; 373.

A.U.C. 548

modo Mago, cum terra marique ancipiti metu urgeretur, sed etiam audita rebellione Ilergetum 4 spem recuperandae Hispaniae nanctus, nuntios Carthaginem ad senatum mittit qui simul seditionem civilem in castris Romanis, simul defectionem sociorum in maius verbis extollentes hortentur[1] ut auxilia mitterent quibus traditum a patribus imperium Hispaniae repeti posset.

5 Mandonius et Indibilis in fines regressi paulisper, dum quidnam de seditione statueretur scirent, suspensi quieverunt, si civium errori ignosceretur, non 6 diffidentes sibi quoque ignosci posse. Postquam volgata est atrocitas supplicii, suam quoque noxam 7 pari poena aestimatam rati, vocatis rursus ad arma popularibus contractisque quae ante habuerant auxiliis, in Sedetanum agrum, ubi principio defectionis stativa habuerant, cum viginti milibus peditum, duobus milibus[2] equitum et quingentis transcenderunt.

XXXII. Scipio, cum fide solvendi pariter omnibus noxiis innoxiisque stipendii tum voltu ac sermone in omnes placato facile reconciliatis militum animis, 2 priusquam castra ab Carthagine moveret, contione advocata multis verbis in perfidiam rebellantium 3 regulorum invectus, nequaquam eodem animo se ire

[1] hortentur P(1)N Eds.: hortarentur M[1]²*N*[4]JK Aldus, Froben, Luchs.
[2] peditum duobus milibus om. P(1)N.

[1] Cf. xxiv. 4.

relieved, since he was beset by a two-fold source of alarm, by sea and by land, but when he heard of the defection of the Ilergetes he conceived the hope also of recovering Spain. Accordingly he sent messengers to the senate at Carthage, to exaggerate at the same time both the mutiny of citizens in the Roman camp and the rebellion of allies, and to urge them to send auxiliaries, by whose help rule over Spain, which they had inherited from their fathers, could be recovered. B.C. 206

Mandonius and Indibilis returned into their own territory and for a time remained quietly on the alert, until they should know what decision was reached in regard to the mutiny, not without confidence that, if a misunderstanding on the part of Roman citizens should be pardoned, they themselves also might possibly be pardoned. After the harsh punishment came to be generally known, they thought that their guilt likewise was reckoned as deserving the same penalty. Recalling the men of their tribe to arms and assembling their previous auxiliaries, with twenty thousand infantry and two thousand five hundred cavalry they crossed into the land of the Sedetani,[1] where they had maintained a permanent camp at the beginning of the rebellion.

XXXII. Scipio by his conscientiousness in paying all his men, guilty and innocent alike, and more by his countenance and speech showing no resentment against any one, easily won the hearts of his soldiers. Before moving his camp away from (New) Carthage he summoned an assembly. There after inveighing at great length against the treachery of the chiefs in rebellion, he declared that in order to punish their crime he was setting out in a very different spirit

A.U.C. 548

professus est ad vindicandum id scelus quo civilem
4 errorem nuper sanaverit. Tum se haud secus quam viscera secantem sua cum gemitu et lacrimis triginta hominum capitibus expiasse octo milium seu imprudentiam seu noxam; nunc laeto et erecto animo
5 ad caedem Ilergetum ire. Non enim eos neque natos in eadem terra nec ulla secum societate iunctos esse; eam quae sola fuerit fidei atque amicitiae [1] ipsos
6 per scelus rupisse. In exercitu suo se, praeterquam quod omnes cives aut socios Latinique nominis videat, etiam eo moveri quod nemo fere sit miles qui non aut a patruo suo Cn. Scipione, qui primus Romani nominis in eam provinciam venerit, aut a patre
7 consule aut a se sit ex Italia advectus. Scipionum nomini auspiciisque [2] omnes adsuetos, quos secum in patriam ad meritum triumphum deducere velit, quos consulatum petenti, velut si omnium communis agatur honos, adfuturos speret.
8 Quod ad expeditionem [3] attineat quae instet, immemorem esse rerum suarum gestarum qui id bellum ducat. Magonis hercule sibi, qui extra orbem terrarum in circumfusam Oceano insulam cum paucis perfugerit navibus, maiorem curam esse quam Ilergetum; quippe illic et ducem Carthaginiensem et 9 quantumcumque Punicum praesidium esse, hic latrones latronumque duces, quibus ut ad populandos finitimorum agros tectaque urenda et rapienda

[1] fidei atque amicitiae P(1)N: -dem atque -tiam N[4]JK Aldus, Froben.
[2] -que AN Aldus, Froben: om. P(3)SpJK.
[3] expeditionem, after this Sp?N[4]JK Froben 2 add eam.

[1] Cf. p. 141 and note.

from that in which he recently cured a misunderstanding on the part of citizens. At that time, he said, with sighing and tears, just as though he were cutting into his own vital organs, he had atoned by the lives of thirty men for the folly, or it might be the guilt, of eight thousand. But now with joy and exaltation of spirit he was advancing to the slaughter of the Ilergetes. For they had not been born in the same land, nor were they linked by any alliance with himself. The only bond which once existed, that of loyalty and friendship, they had themselves broken by their crime. As for his own army, he was stirred on seeing all the men in it citizens or allies and Latins, and also because there was hardly a soldier who had not been brought from Italy either by his uncle Gnaeus Scipio, who was the first of the Romans to come into that province, or by his father as consul, or by himself. They were all of them accustomed to the name and auspices of the Scipios, being men whom he would like to bring home to their country for a well-earned triumph, men who he hoped would support his canvass for the consulship, just as if an honour shared by all alike were at stake. B.C. 206

So far as concerned the enterprise now impending, he said, any man who considered it a war was forgetting their own achievements. Mago surely, who fled with a few ships beyond the known world to an island surrounded by the Ocean,[1] was a greater concern to him than the Ilergetes. For there it was a Carthaginian general and also a Punic force however small; here there were brigands and brigand chiefs, who might, to be sure, have considerable strength for ravaging the lands of neighbouring tribes and for burning houses and stealing cattle, but none

U.C. 548 pecora aliqua vis sit, ita in acie ac signis conlatis nullam esse; magis velocitate ad fugam quam armis
10 pugnaturos esse. Itaque non quod ullum inde periculum aut semen maioris belli videat, ideo se, priusquam provincia decedat, opprimendos Ilergetes
11 duxisse, sed primum ne inpunita tam scelerata defectio esset, deinde ne quis in provincia simul virtute tanta et felicitate perdomita relictus hostis dici
12 posset. Proinde deis bene iuvantibus sequerentur, non tam ad bellum gerendum—neque enim cum pari hoste certamen esse—quam ad expetendas ab hominibus scelestis poenas.

XXXIII. Ab hac oratione dimissos ad iter se comparare in diem posterum iubet, profectusque decumis castris pervenit ad Hiberum flumen. Inde superato amni die quarto in conspectu hostium posuit castra.
2 Campus ante montibus circa saeptus erat. In eam vallem Scipio cum pecora, rapta pleraque ex ipsorum [1] hostium agris, propelli ad inritandam feritatem bar-
3 barorum iussisset, velites subsidio misit, a quibus ubi per procursationem commissa pugna esset, Laelium cum equitatu impetum ex occulto facere iubet.
4 Mons opportune prominens equitum insidias texit, nec ulla mora pugnae facta est. Hispani in conspecta procul pecora, velites in Hispanos praeda occupatos
5 incurrere. Primo missilibus territavere; deinde missis levibus telis, quae inritare magis quam decer-

[1] ipsorum N•JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

at all in battle-line and when standards faced standards. In battle they would rely more upon swiftness in flight than upon arms. Accordingly it was not because he saw any danger from them or the seed of a greater war, that he had thought the Ilergetes must be overpowered before he left his province. It was in the first place in order that so criminal a rebellion might not go unpunished, and then that it might not possibly be said that any enemy had been left in a province which had been thoroughly conquered by such courage combined with such success. Wherefore with the kind aid of the gods let them follow him, not so much to carry on a war—for it was no conflict with a well-matched enemy—as to exact punishment from criminals. B.C. 206

XXXIII. Dismissing them after this speech, he ordered them to make ready for the march on the morrow; and setting out he came in ten stages to the river Hiberus. Then crossing the river, he pitched camp on the fourth day in sight of the enemy. In front was level ground hemmed in on this side and that by mountains. Into that valley Scipio first ordered men to drive cattle—mostly booty from the enemy's own farms—to tempt the barbarians' love of pillage, and then sent light-armed troops to their assistance. When these had begun the battle with a charge, he ordered Laelius to make an attack with cavalry from an ambush. A hill conveniently projecting concealed the ambsucade of cavalry, and the battle began without delay. The Spaniards, catching sight of cattle in the distance, dashed upon them, the light-armed upon the Spaniards busy with their plunder. At first they inspired alarm by their missiles; then abandoning their light weapons, which nere pugnam poterant, gladios nudant, et conlato pede res coepta geri est; ancepsque [1] pedestre certamen erat, ni [2] equites supervenissent. Neque ex adverso tantum inlati obvios obtrivere, sed circumvecti etiam quidam per infima clivi ab tergo se, ut plerosque intercluderent, obiecerunt,[3] maiorque caedes fuit quam quantam edere levia per excursiones proelia solent.

A.U.C. 543

7 Ira magis accensa adverso proelio barbaris est quam imminuti animi. Itaque ne perculsi [4] viderentur, prima luce postero die in aciem processere. Non capiebat omnes copias angusta, sicut ante dictum est, valles; duae ferme peditum partes et [5] omnis equitatus in aciem descendit; quod relicum peditum erat obliquo constituerunt [6] colle. Scipio, pro se esse loci angustias ratus, et quod in arto pugna Romano aptior quam Hispano militi futura videbatur, et quod in eum locum detracta hostium acies esset qui non omnem multitudinem eorum caperet, novo etiam consilio adiecit animum; equitem nec se posse circumdare cornibus in tam angusto spatio, et hosti quem cum pedite deduxisset inutilem fore. Itaque imperat Laelio ut per colles quam occultissimo itinere circumducat equites segregetque quantum possit [7] equestrem a pedestri pugnam; ipse omnia signa peditum in hostes vertit; quattuor cohortes in fronte statuit, quia latius pandere aciem non poterat. Moram

[1] pede . . . ancepsque om. $P(1)N$, two lines probably, supplied from $A^{t}N^{t}JK$ Aldus, Froben.
[2] ni $P^{1}CJK$ Froben 2: nisi $P(3)N$ Aldus.
[3] obiecerunt $P(3)M^{1}N$ Aldus: -cere JK Froben 2.
[4] perculsi $Sp?A^{t?}JK$ Froben 2: pulsi $P(1)N$ Aldus.
[5] et $A^{z}JK$: om. $P(1)N$.
[6] constituerunt $P(1)N$ Aldus: -stiterunt $M^{3}Sp?JK$ Froben 2.
[7] possit $ANJK$ Aldus, Froben: posset $P(3)$.

could provoke rather than decide the battle, they B.C. 206 drew their swords and began fighting at close quarters. And the infantry battle would have remained doubtful if the cavalry had not arrived. Not only did they trample down those they met by a frontal attack, but some also rode round along the lowest part of the slope and made an attack in the rear, so that they cut off a good many; and the slaughter was greater than unimportant skirmishes usually cause.

This defeat kindled the anger of the barbarians, instead of diminishing their courage. Consequently, not to appear daunted, they went out into battle-line at daybreak the next day. The valley being narrow, as stated above, had no room for all the forces. About two-thirds of the infantry and all the cavalry came down into line. The remainder of their infantry they stationed on the slope of the hill. Scipio, who thought the limited space was to his advantage, both because a battle at close range seemed likely to be better suited to the Roman than to the Spanish soldier, also because the enemy's line had been enticed down into a position which did not have room for all of their multitude, turned his attention to a further new plan. He could not place his cavalry on the wings, he thought, in so limited a space, and the enemy would have no use of the cavalry they had brought down with their infantry. Therefore he ordered Laelius to lead his cavalry about over the hills, taking the road that was best hidden, and to separate the cavalry battle, so far as he could, from that of the infantry. As for himself, he made all his infantry units face the enemy; four cohorts he placed in the front line, since he was unable to extend his line to a greater length. He did not delay u.c. 548 pugnandi nullam fecit, ut ipso certamine averteret ab conspectu transeuntium per colles equitum. Neque ante circumductos sensere quam tumultum equestris 14 pugnae ab tergo accepere. Ita duo diversa [1] proelia erant; duae peditum acies, duo equitatus per longitudinem campi, quia misceri ex genere utroque proelium angustiae non patiebantur, pugnabant.

15 Hispanorum cum neque pedes equiti neque eques pediti auxilio esset, pedes fiducia equitis temere commissus campo caederetur, eques circumventus nec peditem a fronte—iam enim stratae pedestres copiae erant—nec ab tergo equitem sustineret, et ipsi, cum diu in orbem sese stantibus equis defendissent, ad unum omnes caesi sunt, nec quisquam peditum equitumve superfuit qui in valle pugna-16 verunt. Tertia pars, quae in colle ad spectaculum magis tutum quam ad partem pugnae capessendam steterat, et locum et tempus ad fugiendum habuit.
17 Inter eos et reguli ipsi fugerunt, priusquam tota circumveniretur acies inter tumultum elapsi.

XXXIV. Castra eodem die Hispanorum, praeter ceteram praedam, cum tribus ferme milibus hominum
2 capiuntur. Romani sociique ad mille et [2] ducenti eo [3] proelio ceciderunt; volnerata amplius tria milia hominum. Minus cruenta victoria fuisset, si patentiore campo et ad fugam capessendam facili foret pugnatum.

[1] diversa *NJK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)N.
[2] et JK (with ducentos) : om. P(1)N.
[3] eo, before this Conway restores in, found in C and suggested by the ducentii of P(3)(-ti P^{x}).

beginning the engagement, in order to divert B.C. 206 attention by the battle itself from the sight of the cavalry crossing over the hills; and they were not aware that the horsemen had outflanked them until they heard the din of a cavalry battle in their rear. Thus there were two distinct battles; two infantry lines, two cavalry forces, were fighting down the length of the level ground, since the narrow space did not permit a battle that combined both arms. On the Spanish side neither did infantry aid cavalry nor cavalry infantry; the foot-soldiers, who in reliance upon the cavalry had been rashly posted on the level ground, were cut to pieces; the cavalry, being outflanked, were neither withstanding Roman infantry in front—for their own infantry were already overwhelmed—nor Roman cavalry in the rear. Consequently the horsemen also, after they had formed a circle and with their horses at a standstill had defended themselves for a long time, were all slain to a man; and not one of their foot or horse that fought in the valley survived. Only a third of them, having stood on the hill, to look on in safety rather than to take part in the battle, had both a suitable position and time for flight. Among them the princes also fled, having slipped away in the confusion before the entire line should be surrounded.

XXXIV. The camp of the Spaniards was captured the same day, with about three thousand men in addition to other booty. Of the Romans and allies about twelve hundred fell in that battle; more than three thousand men were wounded. The victory would have been less bloody if the battle had been fought on a more open ground affording an easy escape.

a.u.c. 548

3 Indibilis abiectis belli consiliis nihil tutius in adflictis rebus experta fide et clementia Scipionis
4 ratus, Mandonium fratrem ad eum mittit; qui advolutus genibus fatalem rabiem temporis eius accusat, cum velut contagione quadam pestifera non Ilergetes modo et Lacetani, sed castra quoque
5 Romana insanierint. Suam quidem et fratris et reliquorum popularium eam condicionem esse ut aut, si ita videatur, reddant spiritum P. Scipioni ab eodem illo acceptum, aut servati bis uni debitam vitam pro
6 eo in perpetuum devoveant. Antea in causa sua fiduciam sibi fuisse nondum experta clementia eius; nunc contra nullam in causa, omnem in misericordia victoris spem positam [1] habere.

7 Mos vetustus erat Romanis, cum quo nec foedere nec aequis legibus iungeretur amicitia, non prius imperio in eum tamquam pacatum uti quam omnia divina humanaque dedidisset, obsides accepti, arma
8 adempta, praesidia urbibus imposita forent. Scipio multis invectus in praesentem Mandonium absentemque Indibilem verbis, illos quidem merito perisse ipsorum maleficio ait, victuros suo atque populi
9 Romani beneficio. Ceterum se neque arma iis adempturum [2] neque obsides imperaturum [3]—quippe ea pignera timentium rebellionem esse; se libera 10 arma relinquere, solutos animos—neque se [4] in

[1] positam $P(1)N$ Aldus: repositam Sp²N¹JK Froben 2.
[2] se . . . adempturum om. $P(1)N$: supplied by A^1N^1JK Aldus, Froben.
[3] neque . . . imperaturum om. $P(1)NJK$ old Eds.: supplied by Weissenborn.
[4] se $P(1)NJK$ Eds.: rejected by Conway.

Indibilis, having discarded his plans for war, B.C. 206 thought no refuge safer in his distress than Scipio's honesty and mercy, of which he had had experience, and sent his brother Mandonius to him. Mandonius, clasping Scipio's knees, laid the blame upon the fateful madness of a time in which some pestilent epidemic had frenzied not merely the Ilergetes and Lacetani but also a Roman camp. As for himself, indeed, and his brother and the rest of their countrymen, such was their situation that they should either give back to Publius Scipio, if he approved, the life they had received also from him, or, if spared twice, they should perpetually devote to him the lives they owed to him alone. Formerly, when they had as yet no experience of his mercy, they had confidence in their cause. Now, however, they had no hope, he said, in their cause, but rested it all on the pity of the victor.

The old custom of the Romans in establishing peaceful relations with a people neither on the basis of a treaty nor on equal terms had been this: not to exert its authority over that people, as now pacified, until it had surrendered everything divine and human, until hostages had been received, arms taken away and garrisons posted in its cities. Scipio, however, after inveighing at length against Mandonius, who was present, and the absent Indibilis, said that in consequence of their own misdeeds they had surely deserved to die; that they should live by his kindness and that of the Roman people. But he would not take away their arms nor demand hostages; for those were the pledges for men who feared a rebellion, whereas he was leaving them their arms without restriction, their minds relieved of fear. And if they obsides innoxios, sed in ipsos, si defecerint, saeviturum, nec ab inermi, sed ab armato hoste poenas expetiturum. Utramque fortunam[1] expertis permittere sese utrum propitios an iratos habere Ro-11 manos mallent. Ita dimissus Mandonius pecunia tantummodo imperata ex qua stipendium militi 12 praestari posset. Ipse Marcio in ulteriorem Hispaniam praemisso, Silano Tarraconem remisso[2] paucos moratus dies, dum imperatam pecuniam Ilergetes pernumerarent, cum expeditis Marcium iam adpropinquantem Oceano adsequitur.

A.U.C. 548

XXXV. Incohata res iam ante de Masinissa aliis atque aliis de causis dilata erat, quod Numida cum ipso utique congredi Scipione volebat atque eius dextra fidem sancire; ea tum itineris tam longi ac
2 tam devii causa Scipioni fuit. Masinissa cum Gadibus esset, certior adventare eum a Marcio factus, causando corrumpi equos inclusos in insula penuriamque omnium rerum et facere ceteris et ipsos sentire, 3 ad hoc equitem marcescere desidia, Magonem[3] perpulit ut se traicere in continentem ad depopu-
4 landos proximos Hispaniae agros pateretur. Transgressus tres principes Numidarum praemittit ad

[1] expetiturum. Utramque fortunam A'N'JK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)N.

[2] Silano . . . remisso $A^{6?}N'JK$: om. P(1)N.

[3] Magonem om. P(1)NJK : supplied by z (1518) : Conway would prefer Poenorum praefectum, one line.

[1] Gades, the oldest Phoenician city in the West (possibly 300 years older than Carthage), was built at first on a very small island at the north-west end of a long narrow island tapering away to the south-south-east. In later times the harbour was closed in that direction by the slow action of Atlantic tides, so that the long island became a peninsula. The city, should revolt his wrath would be directed, not against innocent hostages, but against themselves, and he would exact punishment, not from an unarmed, but from an armed enemy. As they had known both kinds of fortune, he gave them their choice, whether they preferred to find the Romans kindly disposed or angry. Thus Mandonius was dismissed with no other demand than money, that the soldiers might receive their pay. After sending Marcius ahead into Farther Spain and Silanus back to Tarraco, Scipio delayed a few days for the Ilergetes to pay the whole amount demanded, and then with an unencumbered force overtook Marcius as he was now approaching the Ocean. B.C. 206

XXXV. Dealings which had to do with Masinissa, begun even before this time, had been postponed on one pretext or another because the Numidian desired in any case to meet Scipio in person and to ratify the agreement by clasping his hand. That was Scipio's reason at this time for a march so long and so circuitous. Masinissa, being at Gades and informed by Marcius of Scipio's approach, pretended that the horses, being shut up on an island,[1] were deteriorating and not only causing a general scarcity for the rest but also themselves suffering from it. Adding that the horsemen were losing their vigour from inaction, he prevailed upon Mago to permit him to cross over to the mainland in order to lay waste the nearest lands in Spain. After crossing over he sent three prominent Numidians in advance to fix a time and

[1] now Cadiz, is separated from the mainland to the east (at the Trocadero) by a channel three-fourths of a mile wide. Cf. Strabo III. v. 3; Mela III. 46; Pliny N.H. IV. 119 f.; Schulten in Arch. Anzeiger 1927, pp. 203 ff. (maps).

u.c. 548 tempus locumque conloquio statuendum. Duos pro obsidibus retineri ab Scipione iubet; remisso tertio qui quo iussus erat adduceret Masinissam, cum paucis
5 in conloquium venerunt. Ceperat iam ante Numidam ex fama rerum gestarum admiratio viri, substitueratque animo speciem quoque corporis amplam ac
6 magnificam; ceterum maior praesentis veneratio cepit, et, praeterquam quod suapte natura multa maiestas inerat, adornabat promissa caesaries habitusque corporis non cultus munditiis, sed virilis vere
7 ac militaris, et aetas erat in medio virium robore, quod plenius nitidiusque ex morbo velut renovatus flos iuventae faciebat.
8 Prope attonitus ipso congressu Numida gratias de fratris filio remisso agit. Ex eo tempore adfirmat eam se quaesisse occasionem quam tandem oblatam
9 deum immortalium beneficio non omiserit. Cupere se illi populoque Romano operam navare ita ut nemo unus externus magis enixe adiuverit rem Romanam.
10 Id se, etiamsi iam pridem vellet, minus praestare in Hispania, aliena atque ignota terra,[1] potuisse; in qua autem genitus educatusque in spem paterni regni
11 esset, facile praestaturum. Si quidem eundem Scipionem ducem in Africam Romani mittant, satis 12 sperare perbrevis aevi Carthaginem esse. Laetus eum Scipio vidit audivitque, cum caput rerum in omni hostium equitatu Masinissam fuisse sciret, et

[1] terra, here P(1)N Eds.: before aliena JK Froben 2, Conway: in both places N^1.

---

[1] Here a brother's son, while according to XXVII. xix. 9, perhaps from a different source, Massiva would be a sister's son.

place for a conference. He gave instructions that B.C. 206 two were to be kept by Scipio as hostages. When the third had been sent back to conduct Masinissa to the place indicated in the order, they came with a small escort to the conference. The Numidian had already been filled with admiration for the man in consequence of his reported achievements, and had conjured up in mind an ideal figure, tall and stately. But greater still was the reverence that possessed him for the man in his presence; and while Scipio had great natural dignity, long hair added charm, as did a general appearance not due to studied elegance, but truly masculine and soldierly; and his age was exactly at the height of physical strength, amplified and made more dazzling by the youthful bloom which appeared to have been renewed after his illness.

Almost dazed by merely meeting him, the Numidian thanked him for sending home his nephew.[1] From that time on, he said, he had sought the opportunity which he did not let slip when at last it was presented him by the favour of the immortal gods. He was eager to give such services to Scipio and the Roman people that no individual foreigner would have aided the Roman state with more ardour. That aid, although he had long wished to give it, he had been unable to furnish in Spain, a foreign and unknown land. But in the land in which he had been born and brought up in the hope of inheriting his father's kingdom, he would easily furnish it. If indeed the Romans should send Scipio as commander into Africa as well he was quite confident that Carthage would be very short-lived. Scipio was glad to see and hear him, since he knew that in the entire cavalry of the enemy Masinissa had been the soul a.u.c. 548 ipse iuvenis specimen animi prae se ferret. Fide data acceptaque profectus retro Tarraconem est.

13 Masinissa permissu Romanorum, ne sine causa traiecisse in continentem videretur, populatus proximos agros Gades rediit.

XXXVI. Magoni desperatis in Hispania rebus, in quarum spem seditio primum militaris, deinde defectio Indibilis animos eius sustulerant, paranti traicere in Africam nuntiatum ab Carthagine est iubere senatum ut classem quam Gadibus haberet in 2 Italiam traiceret; conducta ibi Gallorum ac Ligurum quanta maxima posset iuventute coniungeret se[1] Hannibali neu senescere bellum maximo impetu,
3 maiore fortuna coeptum sineret. Ad eam rem et a Carthagine pecunia Magoni advecta est, et ipse quantam potuit a Gaditanis exegit, non aerario modo eorum sed etiam templis spoliatis, et privatim omnibus coactis aurum argentumque in publicum conferre.
4 Cum praeterveheretur Hispaniae oram, haud procul Carthagine Nova expositis in terram militibus proximos depopulatur[2] agros; inde ad urbem classem
5 adpulit. Ibi cum interdiu milites in navibus tenuisset, nocte in litus expositos ad partem eam muri qua capta Carthago ab Romanis fuerat, ducit, nec praesidio satis valido urbem teneri ratus et aliquos

[1] se om. $P(1)N$: supplied by A'JK Aldus, Froben.
[2] depopulatur $P(3)N$ Eds. : -tus BDJK Aldus, Froben, Luchs.

---

[1] Including the famous temple of Hercules, 12 miles south of the city, on a very small peninsula, now an island (Santipetri). Cf. XXI. xxi. 9; Strabo l.c. sub fin.; Mela l.c.; Schulten op. cit. 1922, pp. 38 ff.; 1927, p. 211.

of everything, and in himself the young man showed B.C. 206 clear evidence of his spirit. After giving and receiving promises Scipio set out on the return to Tarraco. Masinissa by permission of the Romans, that he might not appear to have crossed to the mainland without reason, devastated the nearest lands and returned to Gades.

XXXVI. Just as Mago, who had despaired of success in Spain—a hope to which first the mutiny of the soldiers and then the rebellion of Indibilis had raised his spirits—was preparing to cross over to Africa, word reached him from Carthage that the senate commanded him to take the fleet which he had at Gades over to Italy. There he was ordered to hire the greatest possible number of young Gauls and Ligurians, to join Hannibal and not permit a war that had been begun with the greatest vigour and even greater good fortune to decline now. For that purpose money was brought to Mago from Carthage, and in addition he himself exacted all that he could from the citizens of Gades by plundering not merely their treasury but also the temples,[1] and by compelling all private owners to contribute gold and silver to the public funds.

As he was sailing along the coast of Spain he landed soldiers not far from New Carthage and laid waste the nearest farms; then he brought his fleet up to the city. There after keeping the soldiers on shipboard during the day, he landed them on the shore by night and led them to that part of the wall where (New) Carthage had been stormed by the Romans.[2] For he thought the city was not held by a garrison of sufficient strength, also that with the

[2] Cf. XXVI. xlv. 7 ff.; xlvi. 2.

U.C. 48 oppidanorum ad spem novandi res aliquid moturos.
6 Ceterum nuntii ex agris trepidi simul populationem agrestiumque fugam et hostium adventum adtule-7 rant, et visa interdiu classis erat, nec sine causa electam ante urbem stationem apparebat. Itaque instructi armatique intra portam ad stagnum ac 8 mare versam continebantur. Ubi effusi hostes, mixta inter milites navalis turba, ad muros tumultu maiore quam vi subierunt, patefacta repente porta Romani 9 cum clamore erumpunt, turbatosque hostes et ad primum incursum coniectumque telorum aversos usque 10 ad litus cum multa caede persequuntur; nec, nisi naves litori adpulsae trepidos accepissent, super-11 fuisset fugae aut pugnae quisquam. In ipsis quoque trepidatum navibus est, dum, ne hostes cum suis simul inrumperent, trahunt scalas, orasque et ancoras, ne in moliendo mora esset, praecidunt; 12 multique adnantes navibus, incerto prae tenebris quid aut peterent aut vitarent, foede interierunt.
13 Postero die cum classis inde retro ad Oceanum, unde venerat, fugisset, ad octingenti[1] homines caesi inter murum litusque et ad duo milia armorum inventa.

[1] octingenti $P(1)N$ Drakenborch, Conway: -tos A^5*?Eds.*: decc JK.

---

[1] Inexact, for the gate at the west end of the city beneath the citadel of Hasdrubal faced neither lagoon nor sea. It merely gave access to a bridge over the canal (outlet of the lagoon) and so by diverging roads to the stagnum or to the harbour. See plan in Vol. VII; Scullard, 298 f.

[2] Used in place of gang-planks. Cf. Bell. Alex. 20. 4; Theocr. 22. 30.

[3] From stern to shore; XXII. xix. 10; Quint. IV. ii. 41. Bows were headed seaward and held by ancoralia (here prospect of changing sides many of the townspeople B.C. 206 would take an active part. But messengers coming in alarm from the country had brought news at the same time of lands laid waste and farmers fleeing and the enemy approaching. By day the fleet also had been seen, and it was evident that an anchorage before the city had not been chosen without reason. Accordingly the men were kept drawn up under arms inside the gate which faced the lagoon and the sea.[1] When the enemy pouring out of the ships—a mob of sailors mingling with the soldiers—approached the walls with an uproar out of proportion to their power the Romans suddenly opened the gate and burst out with a shout, threw the enemy into confusion, routed them at the first charge and the first volley of their missiles and pursued them down to the shore with great slaughter. And if the ships moored to the shore had not received them in their alarm not a man would have survived the flight and the battle. Even on the ships also there was confusion while, to prevent the enemy from dashing on board along with their own men, they were drawing in the ladders [2] and cutting hawsers [3] and cables, to avoid delay in getting away. And many perished miserably while swimming towards the ships, as in the darkness it was not clear what they should make for and what they should avoid. On the next day, when the fleet had slipped away, returning towards the Ocean from which it had come, about eight hundred bodies and some two thousand weapons were found between the wall and the shore.

ancorae by the same figure of speech as "shores" for "shore cables"). Cf. XXXVII. xxx. 10.

U.C. 548

XXXVII. Mago cum Gades repetisset, exclusus inde, ad Cimbios—haud procul a Gadibus is locus abest—classe adpulsa, mittendis legatis querendoque quod portae sibi socio atque amico clausae forent, 2 purgantibus iis multitudinis concursu factum, infestae ob direpta quaedam ab conscendentibus naves militibus, ad conloquium sufetes eorum, qui summus Poenis est magistratus, cum quaestore elicuit, laceratosque 3 verberibus cruci adfigi iussit. Inde navibus ad Pityusam insulam centum milia ferme a continenti— 4 Poeni tum eam incolebant—traiecit. Itaque classis bona cum pace accepta est, nec commeatus modo benigne praebiti, sed in supplementum classis iuventus armaque data. Quorum fiducia Poenus in Baliares insulas—quinquaginta inde milia absunt—tramisit. 5 Duae sunt Baliares insulae,[1] maior altera atque opulentior armis virisque; et portum habet, ubi commode hibernaturum se—et iam extremum autumni erat— 6 credebat.[2] Ceterum haud secus quam si Romani eam insulam incolerent hostiliter classi occursum est. Fundis ut nunc plurimum, ita tum solo eo telo utebantur, nec quisquam alterius gentis unus tantum ea arte quantum inter alios omnes[3] Baliares excellunt. 7 Itaque tanta vis lapidum creberrimae grandinis modo

[1] insulae $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.: om. Sp^2JK Froben 2.
[2] credebat $P(1)N$ Eds.: censebat Sp^2N^4JK Froben 2, Conway.
[3] alios omnes $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.: omnes alios JK Conway: alias omnes Gronovius.

[1] Mentioned here only.
[2] The larger (now Iviza) separated by a narrow strait from a smaller island also called Ebusus. Cf. XXII. xx. 7; Pliny N.H. III. 76, 78; Strabo III. v. 1; Mela II. 125; Diodorus Sic. V. 16.

XXXVII. Mago, upon his return to Gades finding himself shut out of the city, put in with his fleet to Cimbii,[1] a place not far from Gades. He sent emissaries and complained because the gates had been closed against him, an ally and friend. The Gaditani tried to excuse themselves, saying it was done by a mob enraged on account of some looting committed by the soldiers as they were embarking. He thereupon enticed their sufĕtes—the highest magistrates among the Phoenicians—together with the treasurer to a conference and ordered them to be scourged and crucified. Then he crossed over on his ships to the island of Pityusa,[2] about a hundred miles from the mainland. Carthaginians at that time inhabited the island; consequently the fleet was received on friendly terms, and not only were supplies generously furnished but young men to recruit the fleet, and arms also were given. Relying upon these the Carthaginian crossed over to the Balearic Islands, fifty miles away. B.C. 206

There are two Balearic Islands,[3] one larger and richer in arms and men. It has a harbour also, where Mago—and it was now the end of autumn—believed he could winter comfortably. But an attack was made on the fleet, just as if the inhabitants of the island were Romans. The sling, now their most used weapon, was then their only one, and not a single man in any other tribe so excels in the art of using it as do all the Balearic Islanders in comparison with other peoples. Accordingly such a volley of stones, [3] Now Mallorca and Menorca, 30 miles apart, the former with its towns, Palma and Pollentia (Pollenzo); Mela II. 124 and the others just cited.

u.c. 548 in propinquantem iam terrae classem effusa est ut intrare portum non ausi averterent in altum naves. 8 In minorem inde Baliarium insulam traiecerunt, fer- 9 tilem agro, viris armis haud aeque validam. Itaque egressi navibus super portum loco munito castra locant; ac sine certamine urbe agroque potiti, duobus milibus auxiliarium inde conscriptis [1] missisque Carthaginem, ad hibernandum naves subduxerunt. 10 Post Magonis ab Oceani ora discessum Gaditani Romanis deduntur.

XXXVIII. Haec in Hispania P. Scipionis ductu auspicioque gesta. Ipse L. Lentulo et L. Manlio Acidino propraetoribus [2] provincia tradita decem 2 navibus Romam rediit, et senatu extra urbem dato in aede Bellonae quas res in Hispania gessisset disseruit, quotiens signis conlatis dimicasset, quot oppida ex hostibus vi cepisset, quas gentes in dicio- 3 nem populi Romani redegisset; adversus quattuor se imperatores, quattuor victores exercitus in Hispaniam isse; neminem Carthaginiensem in iis terris 4 reliquisse. Ob has res gestas magis temptata est triumphi spes quam petita pertinaciter, quia neminem ad eam diem triumphasse qui sine magistratu res 5 gessisset constabat. Senatu misso urbem est in-

[1] conscriptis: on the misplaced passage in P beginning here cf. p. 212, n. 3.

[2] propraetoribus C^2 or C^3 Alschefski, Walters: pro P(3): om. P^1*? or* P^2*MANJK Eds.*

[1] Both had been praetors (in 211 and 210 B.C. respectively) but were not technically propraetors, having been sent out as private citizens cum imperio, thus having the rank and authority of proconsuls. Such was Scipio's own status. Cf. XXIX. xii. 2; xiii. 7; XXXI. xx. 4 (Vol. IX. p. 59 and note).

like the densest hail, was rained upon the fleet now B.C. 206 approaching land that, not venturing to enter the harbour, they headed their ships out to sea. Thereupon they crossed over to the smaller of the Balearic Islands, fertile in its land, not so strong in men and arms. Disembarking, therefore, they pitched camp in a strong position above the harbour. And having gained possession of the city and its territory without a battle they enlisted two thousand auxiliaries from there, sent them to Carthage and beached their ships to spend the winter. After Mago's retirement from the coast of the Ocean Gades surrendered to the Romans.

XXXVIII. Such were the results in Spain under the command and auspices of Publius Scipio. Turning over the province to Lucius Lentulus and Lucius Manlius Acidinus, the propraetors,[1] Scipio himself returned to Rome with ten ships. And when a session of the senate was granted him in the Temple of Bellona[2] outside the city, he set forth his achievements in Spain; how many times he had fought pitched battles; how many towns he had taken by force from the enemy; what tribes he had subjected to the sway of the Roman people. He had gone to Spain, he said, against four generals-in-command,[3] against four victorious armies; he had left not a Carthaginian in that country. For these achievements he sought the desired triumph but did not make an insistent demand, because it was established that down to that time no one who had commanded without being a magistrate had triumphed. The senate having [2] Cf. ix. 5 and note.

[3] Cf. xxviii. 9, note.

B.C. 48 gressus, argentique prae se in aerarium tulit quattuordecim[1] milia pondo trecenta quadraginta duo et 6 signati argenti magnum numerum. Comitia inde creandis consulibus habuit L. Veturius Philo, centuriaeque omnes ingenti favore P. Cornelium Scipionem[2] consulem dixerunt; collega additur ei
7 P. Licinius Crassus pontifex maximus. Ceterum comitia maiore quam ulla per id bellum celebrata
8 frequentia proditum memoriae est. Convenerant undique non suffragandi modo, sed etiam spectandi causa P. Scipionis, concurrebantque et domum frequentes et in Capitolium ad immolantem eum, cum centum bubus votis in Hispania Iovi sacrificaret;
9 spondebantque[3] animis, sicut C. Lutatius superius bellum Punicum finisset, ita id quod instaret P. Cor-
10 nelium finiturum, atque uti Hispania omni Poenos expulisset, sic Italia pulsurum esse; Africamque ei, perinde ac debellatum in Italia foret, provinciam de-11 stinabant. Praetoria inde comitia habita. Creati duo qui tum aediles plebis erant, Sp. Lucretius et Cn. Octavius, et ex privatis Cn.[4] Servilius Caepio et L. Aemilius Papus.

B.C. 49 12 Quarto decimo anno Punici belli P. Cornelius Scipio et P. Licinius Crassus ut consulatum inierunt, nominatae consulibus provinciae sunt, Sicilia Scipioni

[1] quattuordecim N^2x Conway: decem quattuor $P(1)N$ Eds; cf. p. 14, crit. note 3; XXVI. xlix. 3; XXIX. ii. 17.
[2] Scipionem, with the nomen omitted except in JK (J omitting Scipionem), and so in § 8; cf. xxxix. 9.
[3] spondebantque $P(1)N$ Aldus: despon- Sp²JK Froben 2.
[4] Octavius . . . Cn. om. $P(1)N$: supplied by A^cN^cJK Eds.

[1] As being a private citizen; cf. Vol. VII. p. 80, n. 1; XXXII. vii. 4.

adjourned, he entered the city on foot,[1] and before B.C. 206 him he caused fourteen thousand three hundred and forty-two pounds of silver to be carried to the treasury, and a great number of silver coins. Then an election for the choice of consuls was conducted by Lucius Veturius Philo, and all the centuries with great enthusiasm named Publius Cornelius Scipio consul. As his colleague he was given Publius Licinius Crassus, the pontifex maximus. The election was thronged, it is further related, by greater numbers than any other during that war. From every side they had come together, not only to vote but also to get a sight of Publius Scipio, and they flocked in large numbers both to his house [2] and to him on the Capitol as he was sacrificing, offering up to Jupiter the hundred oxen he had vowed in Spain. They promised themselves also that, just as Gaius Lutatius had finished the former Punic war, so Publius Cornelius would finish the war that was upon them; and that as he had driven the Carthaginians entirely out of Spain, so he would drive them out of Italy; further assuring themselves that Africa should be his province, just as if the war in Italy were over. Then the election of praetors was held. Two who at that time were plebeian aediles were elected, Spurius Lucretius and Gnaeus Octavius, and from private life Gnaeus Servilius Caepio and Lucius Aemilius Papus.

In the fourteenth year of the Punic war, at the B.C. 205 time Publius Cornelius Scipio and Publius Licinius Crassus entered upon their consulship, the consuls' provinces were designated, Sicily for Scipio—

[2] It was south of the Forum, just behind the Tabernae Veteres; XLIV. xvi. 10.

U.C. 549 extra sortem, concedente collega, quia sacrorum cura pontificem maximum in Italia retinebat, Bruttii 13 Crasso. Tum praetoriae provinciae in sortem coniectae. Urbana Cn. Servilio obtigit, Ariminum—ita Galliam appellabant—Sp. Lucretio, Sicilia L. Aemilio, Cn. Octavio Sardinia.
14 Senatus in Capitolio habitus. Ibi referente P. Scipione senatus consultum factum est ut, quos ludos inter seditionem militarem in Hispania vovisset, ex ea pecunia quam ipse in aerarium detulisset faceret.

XXXIX. Tum Saguntinorum legatos in senatum introduxit. Ex eis maximus natu: "Etsi nihil ultra malorum est, patres conscripti, quam quod passi sumus, ut ad ultimum fidem vobis praestaremus, tamen ea vestra merita imperatorumque vestrorum erga nos fuerunt ut nos cladium nostrarum non 2 paeniteat. Bellum propter nos suscepistis, susceptum quartum decimum annum tam pertinaciter geritis ut saepe ad ultimum discrimen et ipsi veneritis
3 et populum Carthaginiensem adduxeritis. Cum in Italia tam atrox bellum et Hannibalem hostem haberetis, consulem cum exercitu in Hispaniam velut ad conligendas[1] reliquias naufragii nostri
4 misistis. P. et Cn. Cornelii, ex quo in provinciam venerunt, nullo tempore destiterunt quae nobis secunda quaeque adversa hostibus nostris essent
5 facere. Iam omnium primum oppidum nobis restituerunt; per omnem Hispaniam cives nostros venum

[1] conligendas (col-) P(1)N Aldus, Eds.: conciliandas *SpN*²(altern.)JK Conway.

[1] Cf. ix. 1, note.
[2] Cf. Vol. VII. p. 2, note; XXIV. x. 1; XXX. xxvii. 1.

without casting lots, as his colleague gave way B.C. 205 because the charge of religious rites kept a pontifex maximus in Italy—and the land of the Bruttians for Crassus. Then the praetorian assignments were determined by lot. The city praetorship fell to Gnaeus Servilius, Ariminum[1]—so they used to designate Gaul—to Spurius Lucretius, Sicily to Lucius Aemilius, Sardinia to Gnaeus Octavius.

The senate met on the Capitol.[2] There, the question being raised by Publius Scipio, a decree of the senate was passed that the games which he had vowed during the mutiny of the soldiers in Spain should be celebrated by him, drawing upon the money which he had himself brought into the treasury.

XXXIX. Thereupon he presented the ambassadors from Saguntum. The eldest of these spoke as follows: "Although no calamity exists which goes beyond what we have suffered, conscript fathers, in our desire to keep our faith with you to the very end, nevertheless, such have been your services and those of your generals towards us that we do not regret our disasters. You undertook the war on our account; having undertaken it you have carried it on with such persistence through thirteen years that often you yourselves reached the extreme of danger and brought the Carthaginian people often to the same pass. Although in Italy you had so terrible a war and Hannibal as your enemy, you sent a consul with his army into Spain, as if to gather up the flotsam of our shipwreck. Publius Cornelius and Gnaeus Cornelius from the time when they came into the province never ceased doing what was in our favour and against our enemies. First of all they restored our city to us; they sent men all over Spain in search of

a.u.c. 549

datos dimissis qui conquirerent, ex servitute in 6 libertatem restituerunt. Cum iam prope esset ut optabilem ex miserrima fortunam[1] haberemus, P. et Cn. Cornelii imperatores vestri luctuosius nobis prope[2] quam vobis perierunt.

7 "Tum vero ad hoc retracti ex distantibus locis in sedem antiquam videbamur ut iterum periremus et al-
8 terum excidium patriae videremus—nec ad perniciem nostram Carthaginiensi utique aut duce aut exercitu opus esse; ab Turdulis nos, veterrimis hostibus, qui prioris quoque excidii causa nobis fuerant, exstingui
9 posse—cum ex insperato repente misistis nobis hunc P. Scipionem, quem fortunatissimi omnium Saguntinorum videmur, quia consulem declaratum videmus ac vidisse nos civibus nostris renuntiaturi sumus, 10 spem, opem,[3] salutem nostram; qui cum plurimas hostium vestrorum cepisset in Hispania urbes, ubique ex captorum numero excretos Saguntinos in 11 patriam remisit; postremo Turdetaniam, adeo infestam nobis ut illa gente incolumi stare Saguntum non posset, ita bello adflixit ut non modo nobis, sed[4]— absit verbo invidia—ne posteris quidem timenda 12 nostris esset. Deletam urbem cernimus eorum quorum in gratiam Saguntum deleverat Hannibal;

[1] fortunam A^s or A^1N^zJK Aldus, Froben, Luchs, Conway : fortuna $P(1)(A?)N$ Eds.

[2] prope A^sN^s*(altern.)JK Aldus, Froben* : quoque $P(1)N$.

[3] opem $Sp?JKN^s$ Froben 2 : omnem $P(1)N$ (all with salutemque, which N^s Aldus have with opem).

[4] sed om. $P(1)NJ$: supplied by Ussing (before ne by A^zKz Aldus).

[1] The most that we know about this tribe is that they were neighbours of the Turdetani in Baetica, fully 250 miles from Saguntum, which was in the land of the Edetani. Livy and his source (probably Coelius) ignored the impossible distance our citizens who had been sold and out of slavery B.C. 205 restored them to freedom. When now we had almost attained an enviable lot after the utmost misery, Publius Cornelius and Gnaeus Cornelius, your generals, brought almost more sorrow to us than to you by their death.

"Then indeed we seemed to ourselves to have been dragged back from distant places to our former abode merely to perish again and to witness a second destruction of our native city. We were thinking also that there was no need whatever of a Carthaginian general or army for our ruin, that we could be wiped out by the Turduli,[1] our oldest enemies, who had been responsible for our former destruction as well, when suddenly and unexpectedly you sent us this Publius Scipio. In seeing him declared consul and in reporting, as we intend, to our citizens that we have seen him, our hope, our help, our safety, so elected we deem ourselves the most fortunate of all the Saguntines. On capturing many cities of your enemies in Spain he everywhere separated Saguntines from the number of captives and sent them back to their native city. Finally, as for Turdetania, which was so hostile to us that Saguntum could not stand if that tribe was preserved, he so crushed it in war that not only we, but even our descendants do not need to fear it—without boasting be it said! We see the ruined city of a people to favour whom Hannibal had destroyed Saguntum. We receive and made the Turdetani (§ 11), or here the Turduli, responsible. App. Hisp. 10 has Τορβολῆται, and if any Greek source had such a reading as Τορδολῆται the confusion might perhaps be accounted for. Cf. XXI. vi. 1; XXIV. xlii. 11; Strabo III. i. 6; ii. 11, 15; iii. 5; E. Meyer, Kl. Schr. II. 408. In Polybius' account no tribe is mentioned (III. xiv. f., xvii).

A.U.C. 549

vectigal ex agro eorum capimus, quod nobis non[1] 13 fructu iucundius est quam ultione. Ob haec, quibus maiora nec sperare nec optare ab dis immortalibus poteramus, gratias actum nos decem legatos 14 Saguntinus senatus populusque ad vos misit, simul gratulatum, quod ita res per hos[2] annos in Hispania atque Italia gessistis ut[3] Hispaniam non Hibero amne tenus, sed qua terrarum ultimas finit[4] Oceanus, domitam armis habeatis, Italiae, nisi quatenus vallum 15 castrorum cingit, nihil reliqueritis Poeno. Iovi optimo maximo, praesidi Capitolinae arcis, non grates tantum ob haec agere iussi sumus, sed donum hoc etiam, si vos permitteretis, coronam auream in 16 Capitolium victoriae ergo ferre. Id uti permittatis quaesumus, utique, si vobis ita videtur,[5] quae nobis imperatores vestri commoda tribuerunt, ea rata atque perpetua auctoritate vestra faciatis.

17 Senatus legatis Saguntinis respondit et dirutum et restitutum Saguntum fidei socialis utrimque 18 servatae documentum omnibus gentibus fore; suos imperatores recte et ordine et ex voluntate senatus fecisse, quod Saguntum restituerint civesque Saguntinos servitio exemerint; quaeque alia eis[6] benigne fecerint, ea senatum ita voluisse fieri; donum permit- 19 tere ut in Capitolio ponerent. Locus inde lautiaque

[1] non, $P(3)N^2$ Aldus add tam.

[2] per hos A^zN^s*(altern.)JK Aldus, Froben* : hos $P(1)N$.

[3] ut N^sJK : utin $P(1)$: uti Alschefski : om. N.

[4] ultimas finit $P(1)N$ Aldus, also J (prefixing non) : -mus finis Sp? Froben 2 : -mus finit K.

[5] videtur SJK Froben 2. (On this single leaf of S, beginning ita videtur, cf. p. 168, n. 2) : videretur $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[6] eis Aldus : his $P(1)N$.

from their territory a revenue which is not more B.C. 205 welcome to us as income than as vengeance. For these things—and we could not hope or pray for greater things from the immortal gods—the senate and people of Saguntum have sent us, ten ambassadors, to you to express our thanks, at the same time to congratulate you because for these years you have so conducted the war in Spain and in Italy that you hold Spain subdued by arms, not merely so far as the river Hiberus, but even where Ocean sets bounds to the most distant lands, and have left the Carthaginian only so much of Italy as the fortification of his camp encircles. To Jupiter greatest and best, defender of the Capitoline citadel, we have been bidden not merely to render thanks for all this but with your permission to carry this gift of a golden wreath also to the Capitol on account of your victory. We beg you to permit this, and if it seems best to you, that you ratify and perpetuate by your authority those advantages which your generals have bestowed upon us."

The senate replied to the Saguntine ambassadors that the destruction and restoration of Saguntum would be to all nations an example of a loyalty which both allies have maintained; that its generals had been entirely right and had complied with the wish of the senate in restoring Saguntum and rescuing the citizens of Saguntum from slavery; and that wherever the generals had treated them with consideration the senate had approved of such action; that they permitted them to deposit their gift on the Capitol. It was then ordered that lodgings and com-

[6] eis P(1)N Aldus, Froben: aliis S.

A.U.C. 549

legatis praeberi iussa, et muneris ergo in singulos [1] 20 dari ne minus dena milia aeris. Legationes deinde 21 ceterae in senatum introductae [2] auditaeque. Et petentibus Saguntinis ut, quatenus tuto possent, Italiam spectatum irent, duces dati litteraeque per 22 oppida missae ut Hispanos comiter acciperent. Tum de re publica, de exercitibus scribendis, de provinciis relatum.

XL. Cum Africam novam provinciam extra sortem P. Scipioni destinari homines fama ferrent, et ipse nulla iam modica gloria contentus non ad gerendum modo bellum, sed ad finiendum diceret se consulem 2 declaratum esse,[3] neque aliter id [4] fieri posse quam si ipse in Africam exercitum transportasset,[5] et acturum se id per populum aperte ferret, si senatus adversaretur,—id consilium haudquaquam primoribus patrum cum placeret, ceteri [6] per metum aut ambi- 3 tionem mussarent, Q. Fabius Maximus rogatus sententiam: "Scio multis vestrum videri, patres conscripti, rem actam hodierno die agi et frustra habiturum orationem qui tamquam de integra re de Africa 4 provincia sententiam dixerit. Ego autem primum

[1] ergo in singulos SA²N²JK Eds.: om. P(1)N, a line.
[2] in senatum introductae SN²JK Eds.: om. P(1)N, another line.
[3] esse P(1)N Aldus, Froben, Eds.: om. SN²JK Conway.
[4] aliter id P(1)N Aldus: id aliter SSpJK.
[5] transportasset SSpJ Froben 2: -taret P(1)NK Aldus.
[6] ceteri P(3)SJK: ceterique C^2AN Aldus, Froben: et ceteri Madvig.

[1] The term lautia by its derivation from lavare at first meant bathing facilities, but came to include other comforts provided for guests of the state. Cf. XXX. xvii. 14.

forts [1] be provided for the ambassadors, and that to B.C. 205 each of them be presented not less than ten thousand asses as a gift.[2] Then the rest of the embassies were introduced into the senate and had their hearing. And upon request of the Saguntines that they might make a tour of Italy so far as they could safely do so, guides were furnished them and letters sent to the different towns, bidding them to receive the Spaniards hospitably. Thereupon the senate took up matters concerning the state, the enrolment of armies, the assignment of posts.[3]

XL. While it was commonly reported that without casting lots Africa was to be assigned to Publius Scipio as a new province, he himself, no longer satisfied with moderate fame, kept saying that he had been named consul not only to carry on the war but also to finish it. This was impossible unless he should himself transport his army to Africa, he said, openly declaring that he would accomplish that result by popular vote if the senate should oppose. This plan being by no means approved by the leading senators, while because of fear or else to curry favour, all the rest failed to speak out, Quintus Fabius Maximus, when asked his opinion, said: "I know that many of you, conscript fathers, hold that we are today debating a closed question, and that whoever expresses an opinion on Africa as a province, just as if it were an open question, will be speaking to no purpose. For myself, however, in the first place I

[2] Cf. XXX. l.c., for a gift in money to ambassadors.

[3] This last had already been done (xxxviii. 12 f.). Popular feeling, however, favoured at least giving Scipio power to cross over from Sicily to Africa if he should deem it best (xlv. 8), or even substituting Africa for Sicily as his assignment.

A.U.C. 549

illud ignoro, quem ad modum certa iam[1] provincia Africa consulis, viri fortis ac strenui, sit, quam nec senatus censuit in hunc annum provinciam esse
5 nec populus iussit. Deinde, si est, consulem peccare arbitror qui de re transacta simulando se referre senatum ludibrio habet, non senatorem[2] qui de quo
6 consulitur suo loco dicit sententiam. Atque ego certum habeo dissentienti mihi ab ista festinatione in Africam traiciendi duarum rerum subeundam opi-
7 nionem esse: unius, insitae ingenio meo cunctationis, quam metum pigritiamque homines adulescentes sane appellent, dum ne[3] paeniteat adhuc aliorum speciosiora primo aspectu consilia semper visa, mea
8 usu meliora; alterius, obtrectationis atque invidiae adversus crescentem in dies gloriam fortissimi
9 consulis. A qua suspicione si me neque vita acta et mores mei neque dictatura cum quinque consulatibus tantumque gloriae belli domique partae vindicat ut propius fastidium eius sim quam desiderium, aetas saltem liberet.[4] Quae enim mihi aemulatio cum eo
10 esse potest qui ne filio quidem meo aequalis sit? Me dictatorem, cum vigerem adhuc viribus et in cursu maximarum rerum essem, recusantem nemo aut in senatu aut apud[5] populum audivit quo minus insectanti me magistro equitum, quod fando numquam ante auditum erat, imperium mecum aequaretur;

[1] certa iam P(1)N Aldus: iam certa SJK Froben 2.
[2] senatorem, P(1)N Aldus add modo.
[3] ne C[2]D Gronovius, Eds.: me P(1)N: me non SA[1]N[1]JK Aldus, Froben, Luchs: me ne Weissenborn conj., Riemann.
[4] liberet P(1)NJK Aldus: -rat SSp Froben 2.
[5] apud (or -ut) P(1) Aldus: om. N: ad SSpN[1]JK Froben 2.

do not understand how Africa is already definitely B.C. 205 assigned to that brave and energetic man, the consul, since neither has the senate voted nor the people commanded[1] that it be a province for this year. In the second place, if it is his, I think that the consul who mocks the senate by pretending to bring before the house business upon which action has been taken is at fault, not a senator who in his proper order states his opinion on the matter under consideration. And I am quite certain that in opposing such haste to cross over into Africa I must expose myself to two charges, first, of an inborn habit of delay, which young men are free to call fear and lack of spirit, provided there are as yet no regrets that other men's policies have always appeared at first sight more attractive, mine the better in practice. Secondly, they will accuse me of carping criticism and envy towards the daily increasing fame of a very brave consul. From this suspicion if neither my past life and my character nor my dictatorship and five consulships can defend me, together with so much glory won in the field and at home that I tend to be sated rather than to crave it, may my years at least bring exemption. For what rivalry can I have with a man who is not even my son's contemporary? In my dictatorship, although I was still at the height of my powers and in the stream of great events, no one heard me refuse either in the senate or before the people to have the command of my master of the horse, who was inveighing against me, made equal to mine, a thing which never had been heard of before.[2]

[1] The people in such a case could act only on request of the senate; XXX. xxvii. 3; xl. 10. Scipio's threat (§ 2) would first involve action by the senate. [2] Cf. XXII. xxv f.

u.c. 519
11 rebus quam verbis adsequi malui ut qui aliorum[1] iudicio mihi comparatus erat sua mox confessione
12 me sibi praeferret; nedum ego perfunctus honoribus certamina mihi atque aemulationem[2] cum adulescente florentissimo proponam: videlicet ut mihi iam vivendo, non solum rebus gerendis fesso, si huic negata fuerit, Africa provincia decernatur. Cum ea gloria quae parta est vivendum atque moriendum est.
14 Vincere ego prohibui Hannibalem, ut a vobis quorum vigent nunc vires etiam vinci posset.

XLI. "Illud te mihi ignoscere, P. Corneli, aequum erit, si, cum in me ipso numquam pluris famam hominum quam rem publicam fecerim, ne tuam
2 quidem gloriam bono publico praeponam.[3] Quamquam, si aut bellum nullum in Italia aut is hostis esset ex quo victo nihil gloriae quaereretur, qui te in Italia retineret, etsi id bono publico faceret, simul cum bello materiam gloriae tuae isse[4] ereptum videri posset.
3 Cum vero Hannibal hostis incolumi exercitu quartum decimum annum Italiam obsideat, paenitebit te, P. Corneli, gloriae tuae, si hostem eum qui tot funerum, tot cladium nobis causa fuit, tu consul Italia expuleris et, sicut penes C. Lutatium prioris Punici perpetrati belli titulus fuit, ita penes te huius fuerit?
4 Nisi aut Hamilcar Hannibali dux est praeferundus

[1] aliorum P(1)N Aldus, Eds.: aliquorum SN[c]JK Froben 2, Conway.

[2] aemulationem (or em-) CDAN Aldus: -ne P(3): -nes SA[1]JK Froben 2.

[3] bono publico praeponam (pro- SN[c]) SA[c]N[c]JK Aldus, Froben, Eds.: om. P(1)N, a line (P leaving a gap).

[4] isse P(1)NSz: ire A[c]JK Aldus, Froben.

[1] Cf. Periocha 19 fin.; Polybius I. lix.–lxi for the naval victory off the Aegates Islands, 241 B.C.; XXII. xiv. 13; XXIII. xiii. 4.

By acts rather than words I preferred to gain this result, that one who by the verdict of other men had been made my colleague should presently by his own admission place me above himself. Much less would I, who have filled the high offices, set before me competition and rivalry with a young man in the very flower of his youth, with the intention, of course, of having Africa, if it be denied him, awarded as a province to me, who am now worn out by mere living, not only by cares of state. With such glory as has been already earned must I live and die. I have prevented Hannibal from conquering, in order that you men whose powers are still strong might even conquer him. B.C. 205

XLI. "One thing it will be right, Publius Cornelius, for you to pardon me—inasmuch as in my own case I have never rated what men say more highly than the state—namely, if I do not prefer your glory, either, to the welfare of the state. If, however, there were no war in Italy, or if the enemy were one from whose defeat no glory was to be earned, only then could a man who kept you in Italy, even if he did so with advantage to the state, be thought to have been bent on taking away the war from you and with it your opportunity for fame. But since Hannibal as an enemy with army intact is occupying Italy for the fourteenth year, will you be dissatisfied with your fame, Publius Cornelius, if in your consulship you shall have driven out of Italy the enemy who has caused us so many losses, so many disasters, and if you shall have the distinction of finishing the present war, just as Gaius Lutatius had that of ending the former Punic war?[1] Unless Hamilcar is to be rated above Hannibal as a general, or that war above this aut illud bellum huic, aut victoria illa maior clariorque quam haec—modo contingat ut te consule vincamus—futura est. Ab Drepanis aut Eryce detraxisse Hamilcarem quam Italia expulisse Poenos atque Hannibalem malis? Ne tu quidem, etsi magis partam [1] quam speratam gloriam amplecteris, Hispania potius quam Italia bello liberata gloriatus fueris. "Nondum is est Hannibal, quem non magis timuisse videatur quam contempsisse qui aliud bellum maluerit. Quin igitur ad hoc accingeris nec per istos circuitus, ut, cum in Africam traieceris, secuturum te illuc Hannibalem speres potius quam recto hinc itinere, ubi Hannibal est, eo bellum intendis,[2] si [3] egregiam istam palmam belli Punici patrati [4] petis? Hoc et natura prius est, tua cum defenderis, aliena ire oppugnatum. Pax ante in Italia quam bellum in Africa sit, et nobis prius decedat timor quam ultro aliis inferatur. Si utrumque tuo ductu auspicioque fieri potest, Hannibale hic victo, illic Carthaginem expugna; si altera utra victoria novis consulibus relinquenda est, prior cum maior clariorque, tum causa etiam insequentis fuerit. Nam nunc quidem, praeterquam quod et in Italia et in Africa duos diversos exercitus alere aerarium non potest, praeter-

.u.c. 549

[1] partam SJK: paratam P(1)N.

[2] intendis P(3)NSJK: -dis? (end of sentence) Drakenborch, Conway: -das D Crévier, Luchs: -dens Madvig 1863 (and Emend.).

[3] si, added by Halm, Madvig 1886, M. Müller, Riemann: et by Weissenborn: both rejected by Conway.

[4] patrati SSp Froben 2: parati P(3)*B*²*N*: peracti *A*¹*JK Aldus.*

[1] Now Monte San Giuliano, 2465 ft. It had a famous temple of Aphrodite, whose cult was presumably of Phoenician origin. Cf. XXI. x. 7; xli. 6 ff.; Polybius I. lv. 7 ff.; Strabo VI. ii.

one, or unless that victory was greater and more famous than this one is to be, if only it be our good fortune to win in your consulship. Would you rather have dragged Hamilcar away from Drepana or down from Eryx[1] than have driven the Carthaginians and Hannibal out of Italy? Although you take more delight in glory already won than in glory hoped for, even you would not boast of having rid Spain of the war rather than Italy. B.C. 205

"Not yet has Hannibal reached such a pass that the man who preferred some other war would not seem to have feared rather than despised him. Therefore gird yourself for this war, and not employing your roundabout method—crossing first to Africa, and then hoping Hannibal will follow you thither—but rather by a direct march from here aim your campaign at the region where Hannibal is, if you seek your glorious palm for bringing the Punic war to an end. This is also the natural order: first to defend your own possessions, then to proceed to attack those of others. First peace in Italy, then be it war in Africa! and let our fear abate before we use fear as an offensive weapon against others. If both can be done under your lead and your auspices, after defeating Hannibal here, storm Carthage over there. If one or the other of these two victories must be left to new consuls, the earlier will prove not only greater and more celebrated but the cause as well of the later victory. For at the present time, not to mention that the treasury cannot support two widely separated armies, in Italy and in Africa, not to mention that no resources

6. Here Hamilcar held out until the Roman naval victory brought the First Punic War to an end. Drepana (Trapani), the seaport, was 4½ miles away.

u.c. 549 quam quod unde classes tueamur, unde commeatibus praebendis[1] sufficiamus nihil reliqui est, quid? periculi[2] tandem quantum adeatur quem fallit? P. Licinius in Italia, P. Scipio bellum in 13 Africa geret. Quid? si—quod omnes dei omen avertant et dicere etiam reformidat animus, sed quae acciderunt accidere possunt—victor Hannibal ire ad urbem perget, tum demum te consulem ex Africa, 14 sicut Q. Fulvium a Capua, arcessemus? Quid quod in Africa quoque Mars communis belli erit? Domus tibi tua, pater patruusque intra triginta dies
15 cum exercitibus caesi documento sint, ubi per aliquot annos maxumis rebus terra marique gerendis amplissimum nomen apud exteras gentes populi Romani
16 vestraeque familiae fecerant.[3] Dies me deficiat, si reges imperatoresque temere in hostium terram transgressos cum maximis cladibus suis exercitu-
17 umque suorum enumerare velim. Athenienses, prudentissima civitas, bello domi relicto, auctore aeque inpigro ac nobili iuvene magna classe in Siciliam tramissa, una pugna navali florentem rem publicam suam in perpetuum adflixerunt.

XLII. "Externa et nimis antiqua repeto. Africa eadem ista et M. Atilius, insigne utriusque fortunae
2 exemplum, nobis documento sint. Ne tibi, P. Corneli, cum ex alto Africam conspexeris, ludus

[1] praebendis, here SJK Froben 2, Luchs: after sufficiamus P(1)N Aldus, most Eds.

[2] periculi, here ends the single extant leaf of S (cf. p. 158, n. 5).

[3] fecerant $N^{a}JK$ Aldus, Froben: -rint P(1)(-im B)N.

[1] Cf. XXVI. viii–xi. [2] I.e. Alcibiades.

remain out of which we may maintain fleets, out of B.C. 205 which we may be able to furnish supplies, pray tell me, who does not see how great is the danger involved? Publius Licinius will carry on the war in Italy, Publius Scipio in Africa. Tell me, if a victorious Hannibal—may all the gods avert the omen! and my mind even shudders to mention it; but what has happened can happen—if he shall advance towards the city, then and not before, are we to summon you as consul out of Africa, as we summoned Quintus Fulvius [1] from Capua? What of it that in Africa also the fortune of war will make no distinctions? Let your own house be a warning, your father and uncle, slain with their armies within thirty days, and that in a land where for some years by very great achievements on land and sea they won a most honourable name among foreign nations for the Roman people and for your family. Time would fail me if I should attempt to enumerate the kings and generals who have rashly invaded the land of their enemies with disastrous defeats for themselves and their armies. The Athenians, although their state had great foresight, leaving a war at home crossed over to Sicily with a great fleet under the leadership of a young man [2] as energetic as he was noble, and in a single naval battle permanently ruined their prosperous state.

XLII. "Foreign examples are these that I am recalling and too ancient. Let that same Africa of yours and Marcus Atilius,[3] a striking example of good fortune and bad, be a lesson to us. Verily, Publius Cornelius, when you sight Africa from the sea your et iocus fuisse Hispaniae tuae videbuntur. Quid 3 enim simile? Pacato mari praeter[1] oram Italiae Galliaeque vectus Emporias in urbem sociorum classem adpulisti; expositos milites per tutissima omnia ad socios et amicos populi Romani Tarra-4 conem duxisti; ab Tarracone deinde iter per praesidia Romana; circa Hiberum exercitus patris patrui-que tui post amissos imperatores ferociores calamitate 5 ipsa facti, et dux tumultuarius quidem ille L. Marcius et militari suffragio ad tempus lectus, ceterum, si nobilitas ac iusti honores adornarent, claris imperatoribus qualibet arte belli par; oppugnata per summum otium Carthago nullo trium Punicorum 6 exercituum socios defendente; cetera—neque ea elevo—nullo tamen modo Africo bello comparanda, ubi non portus ullus classi nostrae apertus, non ager pacatus, non civitas socia, non rex amicus, non 7 consistendi usquam locus, non[2] procedendi; quacumque circumspexeris, hostilia omnia atque infesta.

[3] Regulus; Periocha 17 f.; Polybius I. xxv. 7–xxxv.; Diodorus Sic. XXIII. 12. 15. Cf. below XXX. xxx. 23.

"An Syphaci Numidisque credis? Satis sit semel creditum; non semper temeritas est felix, et fraus fidem in parvis sibi praestruit, ut, cum operae pre-8 tium sit, cum mercede magna fallat. Non hostes patrem patruumque tuum armis prius quam Celtiberi socii fraude circumvenerunt; nec tibi ipsi a Magone

[1] praeter x Aldus, Froben, Eds.: per P(1)NJK.
[2] consistendi usquam locus, non A[1]N[1]JK Eds.: om. P(1)N.

[1] For this voyage cf. XXVI. xix. 11 ff.
[2] Cf. on xiv. 15.

Spanish provinces will seem to you to have been mere child's play. For what is there that is comparable? Over an unmolested sea you sailed along the coast of Italy and Gaul,[1] and put in with your fleet at Emporiae, a city of our allies. Landing your troops you led them through country everywhere perfectly safe and reached allies and friends of the Roman people at Tarraco. From Tarraco it was then a march from one Roman post to another. Along the Hiberus were the armies of your father and uncle, which after losing their generals had gained more spirit even from disaster. Their commander also was the well-known Lucius Marcius,[2] irregularly appointed, to be sure, being chosen for an emergency by vote of the soldiers, but if nobility and the normal magistracies added their distinction, equal to famous generals in all the arts of war. (New) Carthage was taken without any interference, since none of the three Punic armies came to the defence of their allies. The rest of your campaign—and I do not belittle it—cannot, however, be compared in any way with a war in Africa, where there is no harbour open to our fleet, no subjugated territory, no allied city, no friendly king, no place anywhere to hold your ground, no place to advance, while wherever you look, the country all about you will be hostile and dangerous. B.C. 205

"Can it be that you trust Syphax and the Numidians? Let it suffice to have trusted them once. Not always is rashness successful, and treachery seeks in small matters to ensure trustfulness, so that when it becomes worth while, it may deceive with great profit. The enemy did not overpower your father and uncle by force of arms until the Celtiberian allies had done so by treachery. Nor in your own case was et Hasdrubale, hostium ducibus, quantum ab Indibili 9 et Mandonio in fidem acceptis periculi fuit. Numidis tu credere potes, defectionem militum tuorum expertus? Et Syphax et Masinissa se quam Carthaginienses malunt potentis[1] in Africa esse, 10 Carthaginienses quam quemquam alium. Nunc illos aemulatio inter se[2] et omnes causae certaminum acuunt, quia procul externus metus est; ostende Romana arma et exercitum alienigenam; iam[3] velut ad commune restinguendum incendium con-

U.C. 549

11 current. Aliter eidem illi Carthaginienses Hispaniam defenderunt, aliter moenia patriae, templa deum, aras et focos defendent, cum euntes in proelium pavida prosequetur coniunx et parvi liberi occursabunt.

12 "Quid porro, si satis confisi Carthaginienses consensu Africae, fide sociorum regum, moenibus suis, cum tuo exercitusque tui praesidio nudatam Italiam viderint, ultro ipsi novum exercitum in Italiam aut
13 ex Africa miserint, aut Magonem, quem a Baliaribus classe transmissa iam praeter oram Ligurum Alpinorum vectari constat, Hannibali se coniungere 14 iusserint? Nempe in eodem terrore erimus in quo nuper fuimus, cum Hasdrubal in Italiam transcendit, quem tu, qui non solum Carthaginem sed omnem Africam exercitu tuo es clausurus, e manibus tuis in 15 Italiam emisisti. Victum a te dices; eo quidem minus

[1] potentis (or -es) P(1)N Aldus, Eds.: -tissimos A'JK Froben 2, Conway.
[2] se P(1)N: sese A'N'JK Aldus, Froben.
[3] iam A'N'JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

there as much danger from Mago and Hasdrubal, B.C. 205 generals of the enemy, as from Indibilis and Mandonius, who had come under your protection. Can you trust the Numidians after experiencing a mutiny of your own soldiers? Both Syphax and Masinissa prefer that they themselves rather than the Carthaginians should be supreme in Africa, and the Carthaginians rather than anyone else. At present rivalry between them and all possible reasons for contention spur them on because the foreigners whom they fear are far away. Show them Roman arms and a foreign-born army, and now they will rush, as it were, to put out a fire that concerns them all. In one fashion those same Carthaginians have defended Spain; in quite another fashion will they defend the walls of their native city, the temples of the gods, their altars and hearths, when as they go out to battle a frightened wife will escort them and little children will throw themselves in their way.

"Furthermore, what if the Carthaginians, confidently relying upon the united spirit of Africa, the loyalty of the allied kings, and their own walls, shall take the initiative themselves when they have seen Italy stripped of protection from yourself and your army? What if they either send a new army into Italy from Africa, or order Mago—and it is known that he has crossed from the Balearic Islands on his fleet and is already sailing along the coast held by the Alpine Ligurians—to unite with Hannibal? Surely we shall be in the same panic as we were recently when Hasdrubal crossed into Italy—the man whom you, who are about to invest not merely Carthage but all Africa by your army, allowed to slip out of your hands into Italy. He had been defeated by you, u.c. 519 vellem—et id tua, non rei publicae solum causa—iter datum victo in Italiam esse. Patere nos omnia quae prospera tibi ac populi Romani imperio evenere tuo consilio adsignare, adversa casibus incertis belli 16 et fortunae delegare:[1] quo melior fortiorque es, eo magis talem praesidem sibi patria[2] atque universa Italia retinet. Non potes ne ipse quidem dissimulare, ubi Hannibal sit, ibi caput atque arcem huius belli esse, quippe qui prae te feras eam tibi causam traiciendi in 17 Africam[3] esse ut Hannibalem eo trahas. Sive hic igitur[4] sive illic, cum Hannibale est tibi futura res.

"Utrum tandem ergo firmior eris in Africa solus an hic tuo conlegaeque tui[5] exercitu coniuncto? Ne Claudius quidem et Livius consules tam recenti exemplo quantum id intersit documento sunt?
18 Quid? Hannibalem utrum tandem extremus angulus agri Bruttii, frustra iam diu poscentem ab domo auxilia, an propinqua Carthago et tota socia Africa 19 potentiorem armis virisque faciet? Quod istud consilium est, ibi malle decernere ubi tuae dimidio minores copiae sint, hostium multo maiores, quam ubi duobus exercitibus adversus unum tot proeliis et tam diuturna ac gravi militia fessum pugnandum sit?
20 Quam compar consilium tuum parentis tui consilio sit reputa. Ille consul profectus in Hispaniam, ut

[1] delegare Gronovius, Eds. (cf. XXI. xlvi. 10): legare $P(1)N$ Allus, Froben: relegare SpA^1JK Conway.

[2] patria, after this A^1N^1JK Conway have tua.

[3] traiciendi in Africam A^1N^1JK Allus, Froben, Eds.: om. $P(1)N$, one line.

[4] hic igitur P^1D Eds.: igitur $P(3)$: igitur hic $C^1?M^3ANJK$ Luchs, Conway.

you will say; all the more do I regret—and this for B.C. 205 your own sake, not merely for that of the state—that a passage into Italy was allowed to the defeated. Permit us to attribute to your strategy all that resulted favourably for you and the empire of the Roman people, to ascribe the unfavourable to the uncertainties of war and to fortune. The better and braver man you are the more do your native city and all Italy keep their hold upon so capable a defender. You are unable even yourself to conceal the fact that where Hannibal is, there is the centre and stronghold of this war, since you declare that your reason for crossing over to Africa is in order to draw Hannibal thither. Therefore, be it here, be it there, you will have Hannibal to deal with.

"Will you, therefore, be stronger, pray, in Africa when alone, or here, uniting your army with that of your colleague? Do not Claudius also and Livius, the consuls, by a very recent instance prove how great a difference that makes? And tell me, pray, will the remote and secluded Bruttian territory make Hannibal stronger in arms and men, when he has long been begging in vain for auxiliaries from home, or rather Carthage near at hand and all Africa her ally? What is that plan of yours, to prefer to decide the issue just where your forces are reduced by one-half, the forces of the enemy greatly increased, rather than where two armies have to fight against one exhausted by so many battles and a service so long and so hard? Reflect how different is your plan from that of your father. He as consul had set out for Spain, but he

[5] tui CM[1]DA[2]N[6] Aldus, Eds.: tut P (with obscure correction) and R: tute MBAN: om. Sp[2]N[3]JK Froben 2, Conway.

U.C. 519 Hannibali ab Alpibus descendenti occurreret, in Italiam ex provincia rediit: tu, cum Hannibal in Italia sit, relinquere Italiam paras, non quia rei publicae id [1] utile, sed quia tibi [2] amplum et gloriosum 21 censes esse, sicut cum provincia et exercitu relicto sine lege, sine senatus consulto duabus navibus populi Romani imperator fortunam publicam et maiestatem imperii, quae tum in tuo capite periclitabantur, 22 commisisti. Ego [3] P. Cornelium rei publicae nobisque, non sibi ipsi privatim creatum consulem existimo, exercitusque ad custodiam urbis atque Italiae scriptos esse, non quos regio more per superbiam consules quo terrarum velint traiciant."

XLIII. Cum oratione ad tempus parata Fabius, tum auctoritate et inveterata [4] prudentiae fama magnam partem senatus et seniores maxime cum [5] movisset, pluresque consilium senis quam animum adulescentis [6]
2 ferocem laudarent, Scipio ita locutus fertur: "Et ipse Q. Fabius principio orationis, patres conscripti, commemoravit in sententia sua posse obtrectationem
3 suspectam esse; cuius ego rei non tam ipse ausim tantum virum insimulare quam ea suspicio, vitio ora-
4 tionis an rei, haud sane purgata est. Sic enim honores suos et famam rerum gestarum extulit verbis

[1] id $P(1)NJK$ Eds.: om. Conway.

[2] tibi $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.: tibi id A^1N^1JK Conway.

[3] Ego, after this A^1JK have p.c. or patres conscripti (retained by Alschefski, Conway); and so after P. Cornelium Aldus.

[4] inveterata JK Aldus, Froben, most Eds.: -tae (or -te) $P(1)N$.

[5] cum om. $P(1)NJK$: supplied here by Weissenborn, after fama by Madvig, after magnam by Riemann.

[6] adulescentis A^6 Eds.: -tia M^1(altern.)N^1JK Aldus, Froben, Conway: -tiae $P(1)N$.

returned to Italy from his province in order to meet B.C. 205 Hannibal as he came down from the Alps.[1] You, although Hannibal is in Italy, are preparing to leave Italy, not because you think it to the advantage of the state, but because you hold it great and glorious for yourself. It was thus that leaving province and army, unauthorized by any law or decree of the senate, you, a commanding general of the Roman people, entrusted to two ships the fortune of the state and majesty of the empire, which were at that time endangered in your person. My opinion is that Publius Cornelius was elected consul for the republic and for us, not for himself and his personal ends, and that armies were enlisted for the defence of the city and Italy, not that consuls in the arrogant manner of tyrants may transport them to whatever lands they choose."

XLIII. When Fabius by a speech adapted to the situation, but especially by his prestige and long-established reputation for foresight, had stirred a large part of the senate and in particular the older members, and while more were praising the wisdom of the veteran than the confident spirit of the young man, Scipio is said to have spoken as follows: "Even Quintus Fabius himself at the beginning of his speech, conscript fathers, stated that in his expression of opinion captious criticism might be suspected. Far as I should be from venturing to bring that charge against so great a man, nevertheless such suspicion has certainly not been cleared away, be it the speech or the subject that is at fault. For he has highly extolled his offices and the fame of his achievements

[1] Cf. XXI. xxxii. 1 ff.

A.U.C. 549

ad exstinguendum invidiae crimen tamquam mihi ab infimo quoque periculum sit ne mecum aemuletur, et non ab eo qui, quia super ceteros excellat, quo me [1] quoque niti non dissimulo, me sibi aequari nolit. 5 Sic senem se perfunctumque et me infra aetatem fili etiam sui posuit tamquam non longius quam quantum vitae humanae spatium est cupiditas gloriae extendatur maximaque pars eius in memoriam ac 6 posteritatem promineat. Maximo cuique id accidere animo certum habeo ut se non cum praesentibus modo, sed cum omnis aevi claris viris comparent.[2] 7 Equidem haud dissimulo me tuas, Q. Fabi, laudes non adsequi solum velle, sed—bona venia tua dixerim—si 8 possim, etiam exsuperare. Illud nec tibi in me nec mihi in minoribus natu animi sit ut nolimus quemquam nostri similem evadere civem; id enim non eorum modo quibus inviderimus, sed rei publicae et paene omnis generis humani detrimentum sit.[3]

9 " Commemoravit quantum essem periculi aditurus, si in Africam traicerem, ut meam quoque, non solum rei publicae et exercitus vicem videretur 10 sollicitus. Unde haec repente cura de me [4] exorta? Cum pater patruusque meus interfecti, cum duo exercitus eorum prope occidione occisi essent, cum amissae Hispaniae, cum quattuor exercitus Poenorum quattuorque duces omnia metu armisque 11 tenerent, cum quaesitus ad id bellum imperator nemo se ostenderet praeter me, nemo profiteri nomen

[1] quo me A^sN^sJK Eds.: om. $P(1)N$ Alschefski, M. Müller.
[2] comparent P Eds.: -aret P^2 or $P^1(3)NJK$ Aldus, Froben.
[3] sit P^2 or $P^1(1)$ Aldus, Froben, Eds.; st P: est $SpJK$ Conway.
[4] cura de me $P(1)N$: de me cura JK.

in order to refute the charge of envy, just as if it were B.C. 205 from men of the lowest rank that there is danger of rivalry for me, and not rather from one who because he rises above all others—a distinction towards which I do not deny that I also am striving—is unwilling to have me compared with himself. He has represented himself as an old man and one who has played his part, and me as younger even than his son, just as if the desire for glory did not reach farther than the span of human life and project in fullest measure into the memory of posterity. Of the greatest minds it is true, I am sure, that they compare themselves not only with the living but with eminent men in every age. For my part I do not deny, Quintus Fabius, that I wish not only to attain to your fame but also—by your good leave—if possible to surpass it. Let us not have such a spirit—you towards me, I towards younger men—that we should be unwilling to have any fellow-citizen come to be like us. For that would be a loss affecting, not only those whom we have envied, but the state also and almost the entire human race.

"He called to mind how great a danger I should encounter if I were to cross over to Africa, so that he seemed concerned for me also, not merely for the state and the army. Whence has come this sudden solicitude about me? When my father and uncle had been slain, when their two armies had been all but annihilated, when the Spanish provinces had been lost, when four armies of Carthaginians and four generals held the whole country in the grip of fear and arms, when, though sought for, no commanding general presented himself for that war except myself, no one had dared to put forward his name, when the

v.c. ausus esset, cum mihi quattuor et viginti annos nato 12 detulisset imperium populus Romanus, quid ita tum nemo aetatem meam, vim hostium, difficultatem belli, patris patruique recentem cladem commemorabat? Utrum maior aliqua nunc in Africa calamitas accepta
13 est quam tunc in Hispania erat? An maiores nunc sunt exercitus in Africa et duces plures melioresque quam tunc in Hispania fuerunt? An aetas mea tunc
14 maturior bello gerendo fuit quam nunc est? An cum Carthaginiensi hoste in Hispania quam in Africa bellum geri aptius est? Facile est post fusos fugatosque quattuor exercitus Punicos, post tot urbes
15 vi captas aut metu subactas in dicionem, post perdomita omnia usque ad Oceanum, tot regulos, tot saevas gentes, post receptam totam Hispaniam ita ut vestigium belli nullum reliquum sit, elevare meas
16 res gestas, tam hercule quam, si victor ex Africa redierim, ea ipsa elevare quae nunc retinendi mei causa, ut terribilia eadem videantur, verbis extolluntur.
17 "Negat aditum esse in Africam, negat ullos patere portus. M. Atilium captum in Africa commemorat, tamquam M. Atilius primo accessu ad Africam offenderit, neque recordatur illi ipsi tam infelici imperatori patuisse tamen portus Africae, et res egregie [1] primo anno gessisse [2] et, quantum ad Carthaginienses duces adtinet, invictum ad ultimum 18 permansisse. Nihil igitur me isto exemplo terrueris. Si hoc bello, non priore, si nuper et non annis ante

[1] egregie (or -iae) PJK: -ias P^2(3) Aldus: gestas ab eo egregias AN (om. gessisse).
[2] gessisse P(3)A^1N^1JK Aldus: om. AN Gronovius.

[1] The implied exception was the Spartan (mercenary) general presently to be mentioned.

Roman people had bestowed upon me at the age of B.C. 205 twenty-four years its high command, why in such circumstances did no one at that time call to mind my youth, the might of the enemy, the difficulty of the war, the recent disaster to my father and my uncle? Has some greater catastrophe now befallen us in Africa than had been suffered then in Spain? Or are there now larger armies in Africa and more generals and better than there were then in Spain? Or was my age then riper for the conduct of war than it is now? Or is it more suitable to wage war with a Carthaginian enemy in Spain than in Africa? It is easy to disparage my achievements after the rout and flight of four Punic armies, after the storming of so many cities or their subjugation through fear, after a thorough and complete conquest all the way to the Ocean—so many princes, so many warlike nations—after the recovery of all Spain so that no trace of war remains. It will indeed be just as easy if I return as a victor from Africa to disparage precisely the same things which now, in order to hold me back, are magnified by the speaker to make them appear terrible.

"He denies that we have any access to Africa, he denies that any harbours are open to us. He states that Marcus Atilius was captured in Africa, as if Marcus Atilius met disaster upon his first landing in Africa. Also he does not recall that even that unfortunate general found the harbours of Africa nevertheless open to him and conducted a remarkable campaign in his first year, and so far as Carthaginian generals are concerned,[1] remained undefeated to the end. You shall not frighten me, therefore, by the example you give. If that disaster had been incurred in this war, not in the former war, if recently and not

a.u.c. 549

quadraginta ista[1] clades accepta foret, qui ego minus in Africam Regulo capto quam Scipionibus 19 occisis in Hispaniam traicerem? Nec felicius Xanthippum Lacedaemonium Carthagini quam me patriae meae sinerem natum esse, cresceretque mihi ex eo ipso fiducia quod possit[2] in hominis unius virtute
20 tantum momenti esse. At etiam Athenienses audiendi sunt, temere in Siciliam omisso domi bello 21 transgressi. Cur ergo, quoniam Graecas fabulas enarrare vacat, non Agathoclem potius Syracusanum regem, cum diu Sicilia Punico bello ureretur, transgressum in hanc eandem Africam avertisse eo bellum unde venerat refers?

XLIV. "Sed quid ultro metum inferre hosti et ab se remoto periculo alium in discrimen adducere quale sit, veteribus externisque exemplis admonere opus
2 est? Maius praesentiusve ullum exemplum esse quam Hannibal potest?[3] Multum interest alienos populari
3 fines an tuos uri et exscindi videas; plus animi est inferenti periculum quam propulsanti. Ad hoc maior ignotarum rerum est terror; bona malaque hostium
4 ex propinquo ingressus fines aspicias. Non speraverat Hannibal fore ut tot in Italia populi[4] ad se deficerent,

[1] ista P(1)NJK Eds., Johnson: ista ita N[s]x Conway.
[2] possit P(1)N Aldus, Froben, most Eds.: posset JK Madvig, Luchs, Riemann.
[3] Maius . . . potest A[s]N[s]JK Weissenborn, Luchs: om. P(1)N Madvig.
[4] populi Sp?A[s]N[s]JK Eds. (after deficerent Riemann): om. P(1)N.

---

[1] An error for fifty years. In XXIX. xxviii. 5 Livy has prope quinquaginta for the actual fifty-two.

forty years ago,[1] why after Regulus' capture should I B.C. 205 hesitate to cross over to Africa any more than to Spain after the Scipios had fallen? I should not admit that the Spartan Xanthippus'[2] birth had been more fortunate for Carthage than mine for my native city; and my confidence would be increased by the mere possibility of such weight in the ability of a single man. But we must hear likewise of the Athenians, how neglecting a war at home they crossed rashly to Sicily. Why then, since you have time to tell Greek tales, do you not prefer to relate how Agathocles,[3] King of Syracuse, after Sicily had long been ablaze with a Punic war, crossed over into this same Africa and diverted the war to the country from which it had come?

XLIV. "But what is the need of calling to mind by old and foreign examples what it means to make fear an offensive weapon against the enemy, and removing danger from yourself to bring another into peril? Can there be any greater and more effective example than Hannibal? A great difference it makes whether you are seeing the land of others ravaged or your own being burned over and devastated. More spirit has an aggressor than a defender. Besides there is greater dread of things unknown; on entering the territory of the enemy you have a near view of their advantages and disadvantages. Hannibal had not hoped that so many states in Italy would come over to his side as did so after the

[2] Cf. Polybius I. xxxii. ff., xxxvi; Periocha 18; Diodorus Sic. XXIII. 14 f.

[3] For the career of this tyrant of Syracuse (died 289 B.C.) and his wars with the Carthaginians both in Sicily and Africa v. Diodorus Sic. XX. 3–18 et passim; Justin XXII f.

u.c. 519

quot defecerunt [1] post Cannensem cladem: quanto minus quicquam in Africa Carthaginiensibus firmum aut stabile sit,[2] infidis sociis, gravibus ac superbis
5 dominis! Ad hoc nos, etiam deserti ab sociis, viribus nostris, milite Romano stetimus; Carthaginiensi nihil civilis roboris est, mercede paratos milites habent, Afros Numidasque, levissima fidei mutandae
6 ingenia. Hic modo nihil morae sit, una et traiecisse me audietis et ardere bello Africam et molientem hinc Hannibalem [3] et obsideri Carthaginem. Laetiores et frequentiores ex Africa exspectate nuntios
7 quam ex Hispania accipiebatis. Has mihi spes subicit fortuna populi Romani, di foederis ab hoste violati testes, Syphax et Masinissa reges, quorum ego fidei ita innitar ut bene tutus a perfidia sim.
8 "Multa quae nunc ex intervallo non apparent bellum aperiet. Id [4] est viri et ducis, non deesse fortunae praebenti se et oblata casu flectere ad con-
9 silium. Habebo, Q. Fabi, parem quem das Hannibalem; sed illum ego potius traham quam ille me retineat. In sua terra cogam pugnare eum, et Carthago potius praemium victoriae erit quam
10 semiruta Bruttiorum castella. Ne quid interim, dum traicio, dum expono exercitum in Africa, dum castra ad Carthaginem promoveo, res publica hic detrimenti capiat, quod tu, Q. Fabi, cum victor tota

[1] quot defecerunt K Aldus, Eds.: defecerunt Sp[2]A[1]J Froben 2, Conway (after deficerent with a colon). Most MSS. have the verb but once, e.g. -ficerent $P(3)M^2N$, for which -fecerunt P^1 or P^2(-fic-)R^2MB.

[2] sit $P(1)NJ$(altern.) Aldus, Eds.: est JK Froben 2, Conway.

[3] et molientem hinc Hannibalem $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: doubted by Luchs 1889 and bracketed by M. Müller; variously altered; defended by Johnson, Conway.

[4] Id $P(1)N$: et id A^1N^1JK Aldus, Froben.

disaster at Cannae. How much less is anything in Africa to be strong and steadfast for the Carthaginians, faithless as allies, oppressive and arrogant as masters! Furthermore, even when deserted by our allies, we kept our footing by our own forces, our Roman soldiers. The Carthaginians have no forces of their own citizens. They have mercenaries, Africans and Numidians, very inconstant by nature and ready to change their allegiance. If only there is no delay here, at the same moment you will hear that I have crossed and that Africa is ablaze with war, and Hannibal casting off from here, and Carthage blockaded. Look for more cheering news from Africa and more frequent than you used to receive from Spain. Inspiring these hopes in me are the fortune of the Roman people, the gods who witnessed the treaty violated by the enemy, the kings, Syphax and Masinissa, on whose honour I shall rely—but so as to be well protected against treachery. B.C. 205

"Many things which, owing to distance, are not now evident the war will reveal. It is the part of a man and a general not to prove wanting when fortune presents herself, and to fit what is offered by chance into his plan. I shall have Hannibal as the antagonist you assign me, Quintus Fabius; but I shall draw him after me, not let him hold me back. In his own land will I compel him to fight, and Carthage is to be the reward of victory, not the half-ruined strongholds of the Bruttians. Meantime, while I am crossing over, while landing my army in Africa, while moving my camp up to Carthage, let the republic suffer no harm here. That service you, Quintus Fabius, were able to guarantee while everywhere in Italy the victorious

U.C. 549 11 volitaret Italia Hannibal, potuisti praestare, hoc vide ne contumeliosum sit concusso iam et paene fracto Hannibale negare posse P. Licinium consulem, virum fortissimum, praestare, qui, ne a sacris absit pontifex maximus, ideo in sortem tam longinquae provinciae 12 non venit.[1] Si hercules nihilo maturius hoc quo ego censeo modo perficeretur bellum, tamen ad dignitatem populi Romani famamque apud reges gentesque externas pertinebat, non ad defendendam modo Italiam, sed ad inferenda etiam Africae arma 13 videri nobis animum esse, nec hoc credi volgarique, quod Hannibal ausus sit neminem ducem Romanum audere, et priore Punico bello tum, cum de Sicilia certaretur, totiens Africam ab[2] nostris exercitibusque[3] et classibus oppugnatam, nunc, cum de 14 Italia certetur, Africam pacatam esse. Requiescat aliquando vexata tam diu Italia; uratur evasteturque 15 in vicem Africa. Castra Romana potius Carthaginis portis immineant quam nos iterum vallum hostium ex moenibus nostris videamus. Africa sit reliqui belli sedes; illuc terror fugaque, populatio agrorum, defectio sociorum, ceterae belli clades, quae in nos per quattuordecim annos ingruerunt, vertantur.

16 Quae ad rem publicam pertinent et bellum quod instat et provincias de quibus agitur dixisse satis est; 17 illa longa oratio nec ad vos pertinens sit, si, quemadmodum Q. Fabius meas res gestas in Hispania ele-

[1] venit P(1)NJK Aldus; veniat Sp? Froben 2.
[2] ab P(3): a AN Aldus: om. Sp?JK Froben 2.
[3] -que om. Sp?ANJK Aldus, Froben.

Hannibal flitted about. Would it not be insulting, B.C. 205 with Hannibal now shaken and almost broken, to claim that Publius Licinius, the consul—a very brave man who took no part in the allotment of so distant a province, solely that as pontifex maximus he might not be absent from religious ceremonies—cannot do the same? If in truth the war were not completed any more promptly by the method which I propose, it would nevertheless conduce to the dignity of the Roman people and its reputation among kings and foreign nations to let it be seen that we have the spirit not only to defend Italy but also to invade Africa. Likewise not to have it believed and published abroad that what Hannibal has dared no Roman general dares, and that in the former Punic war, at a time when the stake was Sicily, Africa was attacked so many times by our armies and fleets, but that now, when Italy is the stake, Africa is at peace. Let Italy, so long harried, at length have rest; let Africa in turn be burned over and laid waste. Let Roman camps threaten the gates of Carthage; better so than that we should see the enemy's earthworks from our walls for the second time. Let Africa be the theatre of the remainder of the war. In that direction may terror and flight be diverted, the devastation also of farms, the desertion of allies, and the other calamities of war which for fourteen years have assailed us.

"It is enough to have spoken of matters concerning the state and the war now in progress and the provinces which are in question. A long speech it would be and one of no concern to you senators if, after the manner in which Quintus Fabius has disparaged my achievements in Spain, I on my part should be

u.c. 549

vavit, sic ego [1] contra gloriam eius eludere et meam
18 verbis extollere velim. Neutrum faciam, patres conscripti, et, si nulla alia re, modestia certe et temperando linguae adulescens senem vicero. Ita et vixi et gessi res ut tacitus ea opinione quam vestra sponte conceptam animis haberetis facile contentus essem."

XLV. Minus aequis animis auditus est Scipio, quia volgatum erat, si apud senatum non obtinuisset ut provincia Africa sibi decerneretur, ad populum ex-
2 templo laturum. Itaque Q. Fulvius, qui consul quater et censor [2] fuerat, postulavit a consule ut palam in senatu diceret permitteretne patribus ut de provinciis decernerent, staturusque eo esset quod cen-
3 suissent, an ad populum laturus. Cum Scipio respondisset se quod e re publica esset facturum, tum
4 Fulvius: "Non ego ignarus quid responsurus facturusve esses quaesivi, quippe cum prae te feras temptare te [3] magis quam consulere senatum, et ni provinciam tibi quam volueris extemplo decernamus,
5 paratam rogationem habeas. Itaque a vobis, tribuni plebis, postulo" inquit "ut sententiam mihi ideo non dicenti quod, etsi [4] in meam sententiam discedatur,
6 non sit ratum habiturus consul, auxilio sitis." Inde altercatio orta, cum consul negaret aequum esse tribunos intercedere quo minus suo quisque loco

[1] ego $P(1)N$: et ego JK Aldus, Froben.
[2] et censor A^2N^2JK Aldus, Froben : om. $P(1)N$.
[3] te $P(3)$: om. $ANJK$ Aldus, Froben.
[4] etsi Gronovius, Eds. : est $P(1)N$: si A^6N^2JK Luchs.

minded to scoff at his fame and to enlarge upon my own. I will do neither, conscript fathers, and if in no other respect, in modesty at least and in control of my tongue I, who am young, will outstrip the older man. Such have been my life and achievements that, although silent, I am quite content with the opinion which of your own accord you have formed and retain." B.C. 205

XLV. Scipio met with a less favourable hearing because it had been generally reported that, if he should not carry his point in the senate and have Africa decreed him as his province, he would at once bring a bill before the people. And so Quintus Fulvius, who had been consul four times and censor, demanded of the consul that he should frankly state in the senate whether he would permit the senators to make a decree in regard to the provinces and would stand by their vote, or was intending to bring a bill before the people. When Scipio replied that he would act for the best interests of the state, Fulvius said: "I was not unaware, when I asked my question, of the answer you would give or of what you would do, since you make it plain that you are sounding the senate rather than consulting it, and since, unless we at once decree for you the province which you have desired, you have a bill ready. Accordingly, tribunes of the people" he said "I demand of you that you come to my defence if I decline to express an opinion for the reason that, even in case our vote by division should favour a motion of mine, the consul will not consider it valid." Then arose a dispute, the consul maintaining that it was not right for the tribunes to use their veto to excuse a senator from stating his opinion when called upon in his regular

B.C. 549

7 senator[1] rogatus sententiam diceret. Tribuni ita decreverunt: "Si consul senatui de provinciis permittit, stari eo quod senatus censuerit placet, nec de ea re ferri ad populum patiemur; si non permittit, qui de ea re sententiam recusabit dicere auxilio erimus."

8 Consul diem ad conloquendum cum conlega petit; postero die permissum senatui est. Provinciae ita decretae: alteri consuli Sicilia et triginta rostratae naves quas C. Servilius superiore anno habuisset; permissumque ut in Africam, si id e re publica esse
9 censeret, traiceret; alteri Bruttii et bellum cum Hannibale cum eo exercitu, quem[2] ⟨mallet⟩. L. Veturius et Q. Caecilius sortirentur inter se compararentve uter in Bruttiis duabus legionibus quas consul reliquisset
10 rem gereret, imperiumque in annum prorogaretur cui ea provincia evenisset. Et ceteris, praeter consules praetoresque,[3] qui exercitibus provinciisque prae-11 futuri erant[4] prorogata imperia. Q. Caecilio sorti evenit ut cum consule in Bruttiis adversus Hannibalem bellum gereret.

[1] senator A^6N^1JK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.

[2] quem $P(1)NJK$: at least mallet must have followed: mallet ex duobus qui ibi essent Madvig: mallet ex duobus quos consules habuissent Weissenborn.

[3] praeter . . . praetoresque $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: probably to be rejected as a gloss with Conway, who suspected another lacuna.

[4] praefuturi erant also corrupt, Conway, who would conj. praefuerant.

---

[1] This decree so fortified the opposition that Scipio was unable to risk a vote referring the question to the people.

[2] A small fleet in comparison with the hundred ships assigned to Sicily in 208 B.C.; XXVII. xxii. 9. For an invasion a order. The tribunes made this decree: "If the consul permits the senate to assign the provinces, we decide that he must stand by the vote of the senate, and we will not allow a bill touching that matter to be brought before the people. If he does not permit, we will come to the defence of a man who refuses to express an opinion on that matter." [1] B.C. 205

The consul begged for one day to confer with his colleague; on the next day he gave the senate his permission. The provinces were assigned by decree as follows: to one of the consuls Sicily and the thirty war-ships [2] which Gaius Servilius had commanded in the previous year; [3] and permission to cross over to Africa was given, if he should consider that to be to the advantage of the state; to the other consul the land of the Bruttians and the war with Hannibal, together with the army which he preferred.[4] Lucius Veturius and Quintus Caecilius were to decide between them by lot or by arrangement which of them was to wage war in the Bruttian land with the two legions which the consul should leave there, and whichever should have that province assigned to him was to have his command continued for one year. And for the rest who were to command armies and provinces—apart from consuls and praetors—their commands were continued. It fell to Quintus Caecilius by lot to wage war together with the consul in the Bruttian land against Hannibal.

much larger navy would seem to be required. Add the 30 new ships presently to be built (§ 21). But actually only 40 war-ships escorted 400 transports in 204 B.C.; XXIX. xxvi. 3.

[3] Cf. x. 16.

[4] I.e. of the two in that region; cf. x. 10; xi. 12; xlvi. 2.

A.U.C. 549

12 Ludi deinde Scipionis magna frequentia et favore spectantium celebrati. Legati Delphos ad donum ex praeda Hasdrubalis portandum missi M. Pomponius Matho et Q. Catius. Tulerunt coronam auream ducentum pondo et simulacra spoliorum ex [1] mille pondo argenti facta.[2]

13 Scipio cum ut dilectum haberet neque impetrasset neque magnopere tetendisset, ut voluntarios 14 ducere sibi milites liceret tenuit et, quia inpensae negaverat rei publicae futuram classem, ut quae ab sociis darentur ad novas fabricandas naves acciperet. Etruriae primum populi pro suis quisque facul- 15 tatibus consulem adiuturos polliciti: Caerites frumentum sociis navalibus commeatumque omnis generis, Populonenses ferrum, Tarquinienses lintea in vela, Volaterrani interamenta [3] navium et frumentum, 16 Arretini tria milia scutorum, galeas totidem, pila gaesa hastas longas, milium quinquaginta summam 17 pari cuiusque generis numero expleturos, secures rutra falces alveolos molas, quantum in quadraginta longas naves opus esset, tritici centum et viginti milia modium, et in viaticum decurionibus remigibusque 18 conlaturos; Perusini Clusini Rusellani abietem in fabricandas naves et frumenti magnum numerum;

[1] ex SpD Froben 2: et P(3)NJK Aldus.
[2] facta SpDJ Froben 2: facti P(3)NK Aldus.
[3] interamenta P(3)NJK: ferramenta x: inceramenta Gronovius.

[1] Doubtless in the form of trophies, possibly a pair of them, to flank the golden wreath, presumably to be set up in one of the treasure houses. At XXIII. xi. 3 Apollo had bidden them send a gift when they had preserved their state. So Fabius Pictor, the Roman ambassador, had reported in 216 B.C.

[2] Cf. XXX. xxxix. 2; now Piombino, the nearest port to Elba. Usually Populonia, but Polybius and Strabo use the Scipio's games were then held with great crowds and great approval on the part of the spectators. As ambassadors Marcus Pomponius Matho and Quintus Catius were sent to Delphi to carry a gift from the spoils of Hasdrubal. They took a golden wreath weighing two hundred pounds and representations of spoils[1] made of a thousand pounds of silver. B.C. 205

Although he had neither gained consent to hold a levy, nor had been especially insistent, Scipio obtained permission to take volunteers and to receive whatever should be given by the allies towards the construction of new ships,—this because he had stated that the fleet would not be an expense to the state. First the Etruscan communities promised that they would aid the consul, each according to its own resources. The men of Caere promised grain for the crews and supplies of every kind, the men of Populonium[2] iron, Tarquinii linen for sails, Volaterrae the interior fittings of ships, also grain. Arretium promised three thousand shields, an equal number of helmets; and that they would furnish a total of fifty thousand javelins, short spears and lances, with an equal proportion of each type; also axes, shovels, sickles, baskets and hand-mills, as many as were needed for forty war-ships; a hundred and twenty thousand pecks of wheat also; and that they would contribute allowances[3] for petty officers and oarsmen. Perusia, Clusium and Rusellae[4] promised fir for shipbuilding and a great quantity of grain. He neuter (P. at XXXIV. xi. 3; S. at V. ii. 5 f., 8). So also the Itin. Ant.

[3] In addition to their pay.

[4] Beyond the Umbro and near Vetulonia; X. iv. 5; xxxvii. 3.

u.c. 549

19 abiete et [1] ex publicis silvis est usus. Umbriae populi et praeter hos Nursini [2] et Reatini et Amiternini Sabinusque omnis ager milites polliciti. Marsi Paeligni Marrucinique multi voluntarii nomina in 20 classem dederunt. Camertes cum aequo foedere cum Romanis essent, cohortem armatam sescentorum 21 hominum miserunt. Triginta navium carinae, viginti quinqueremes, decem quadriremes, cum essent positae, ipse ita institit operi ut die quadragesimo quinto quam ex silvis detracta materia erat naves instructae armataeque in aquam deductae sint.

XLVI. Profectus in Siciliam est triginta navibus longis, voluntariorum septem ferme milibus in naves
2 impositis. Et P. Licinius in Bruttios ad duos exercitus consulares venit. Ex iis eum sibi sumpsit
3 quem L. Veturius consul habuerat; Metello ut, quibus praefuisset legionibus, iis praeesset,[3] facilius cum adsuetis imperio rem gesturum ratus permisit.
4 Et praetores diversi in provincias profecti. Et quia pecunia ad bellum deerat, agri Campani regionem a Fossa Graeca ad mare versam vendere quaestores
5 iussi, indicio quoque permisso qui ager civis Campani fuisset, uti is publicus populi Romani esset; indici praemium constitutum, quantae pecuniae ager

[1] et conj. Luchs, Walters, adopted by Conway; om. P(1)NJK Eds.

[2] Nursini, SpJK Froben 2 add -que and om. et praeter hos of P(1)N Aldus.

[3] legionibus . . . praeesset A[1]N[2]JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

---

[1] I.e. just as if they were allies and hence bound to furnish troops.

[2] Near Cumae and probably dug by that city long before to drain marshy lowlands near the sea; cf. XXII. xvi. 4.

used fir also from forests belonging to the state. B.C. 205
The communities of Umbria and in addition Nursia and Reate and Amiternum and the whole Sabine district promised soldiers. Marsians, Paelignians and Marrucini in large numbers gave in their names as volunteers for the fleet. Camerinum, although it treated with the Romans on an equal footing, sent an armed cohort of six hundred men.[1] After thirty keels had been laid down, twenty quinqueremes and ten quadriremes, Scipio so pushed the work that on the forty-fifth day after the timber had been brought from the forests the ships, rigged and equipped, were launched.

XLVI. He set out for Sicily on thirty war-ships after embarking some seven thousand volunteers. And Publius Licinius came to the two consular armies in the land of the Bruttians. Of these he took the army which Lucius Veturius had commanded as consul. He allowed Metellus to command the same legions which he had previously commanded, for he thought Metellus would more easily carry on the war with men accustomed to his authority. The praetors also set out in different directions to their provinces. And because there was a lack of money for the war the quaestors were ordered to sell a region of Campania extending from the Fossa Graeca[2] to the sea, it being permitted also to give information as to any land which had belonged to a Campanian citizen, so that it might become public land of the Roman people. For the informant one-tenth of the price of the land

Not far away was Liternum, where Scipio Africanus later lived in retirement at his villa, described by Seneca Ep. 86, 1–12; cf. Val. Max. II. x. 2; and there was his tomb; Seneca l.c.

u.c. 519

6 indicatus esset pars decuma. Et Cn. Servilio praetori urbano negotium datum ut Campani cives, ubi cuique [1] ex senatus consulto liceret habitare, ibi [2] habitarent, animadverteretque in eos qui alibi habitarent.

7 Eadem aestate Mago Hamilcaris filius ex minore Baliarium insula, ubi hibernarat, iuventute lecta in classem imposita, in Italiam triginta ferme rostratis navibus et multis onerariis duodecim milia peditum, 8 duo ferme equitum traiecit, Genuamque nullis praesidiis maritumam oram tutantibus repentino adventu cepit. Inde ad oram Ligurum Alpinorum, si quos ibi 9 motus facere posset, classem appulit. Ingauni—Ligurum ea gens est—bellum ea tempestate gere- 10 bant cum Epanteriis Montanis. Igitur Poenus Savone, oppido Alpino, praeda deposita et decem longis navibus in statione ad praesidium relictis, ceteris Carthaginem missis ad tuendam maritumam 11 oram, quia fama erat Scipionem traiecturum, ipse societate cum Ingaunis, quorum gratiam malebat, composita Montanos instituit oppugnare. Et crescebat exercitus in dies ad famam nominis eius

[1] cuique $P(1)N$ Aldus : -cunque $SpN^{s}JK$.
[2] habitare, ibi $P(1)N$ Aldus : om. $SpJK$ Froben 2.

[1] On the Ligurian coast; cf. XXI. xxxii. 5, the first appearance of Genoa in history; XXIX. v. 2. Destroyed by Mago and rebuilt by Spurius Lucretius, XXX. i. 10.

[2] I.e. Western; see note on Savo below.

[3] Cf. XXIX. l.c. Their town was a seaport, Album Ingaunum or Albingaunum, now Albenga; Strabo IV. vi. 1; Mela II. 72; Tacitus Hist. II. 15 fin. The Epanterii were above them on the slopes of the coast range (Alpes Maritimae).

reported was established as a reward. And to B.C. 205
Gnaeus Servilius, the city praetor, was assigned the task of seeing to it that Campanian citizens should dwell only where in accordance with a decree of the senate it was permitted them severally to dwell, and of punishing those who were dwelling elsewhere.

In the same summer Mago the son of Hamilcar embarked upon his fleet picked young men from the smaller of the Balearic Islands, where he had wintered, and brought across to Italy on some thirty war-ships and many transports twelve thousand infantry and about two thousand cavalry. Upon his sudden arrival he also captured Genua,[1] since no forces were guarding the sea-coast. Then he put in with his fleet to the coast belonging to the Alpine[2] Ligurians, in the hope of causing some uprising there. The Ingauni,[3] a Ligurian tribe, were at that time carrying on a war with the Epanterii Montani. Accordingly the Carthaginian, depositing his plunder at Savo,[4] a town at the foot of the Alps, and leaving ten war-ships at anchor to protect it, sent the rest to Carthage to defend the sea-coast, because there was a report that Scipio would cross over. Mago himself made an alliance with the Ingauni, whose friendship he preferred, and set about attacking the Montani. And his army was daily increasing because the Gauls

[4] Now Savona, 27 miles west of Genoa. Though a seaport it is an oppidum Alpinum as lying at the foot of the Maritime Alps. Eastward of Savona is another coast range; a part of the Apennines. On the dividing line between the two, cf. Strabo l.c. and V. i. 3; also Decimus Brutus writing to Cicero, Ep. XI. xiii. 2. For Vada Sabat(i)a, now Vado, west of Savo, cf. XXIX. v. 2, note; Strabo l.c.; Mela l.c.; Pliny N.H. III. 48; Itin. Ant. 295.

U.C. 549

12 Gallis undique confluentibus. Ea res [1] litteris cognita Sp. Lucreti, ne frustra Hasdrubale cum exercitu deleto biennio ante forent laetati, si par aliud inde bellum, duce tantum mutato, oreretur, curam 13 ingentem accendit [2] patribus. Itaque et M. Livium proconsulem ex Etruria volonum exercitum admovere Ariminum iusserunt, et Cn. Servilio praetori negotium datum ut, si e re publica censeret esse, duas urbanas legiones, imperio cui videretur dato, ex urbe duci iuberet. M. Valerius Laevinus Arretium eas legiones duxit.

14 Eisdem diebus naves onerariae Poenorum ad octoginta circa Sardiniam ab Cn. Octavio, qui provinciae praeerat, captae. Eas Coelius frumento misso ad Hannibalem commeatuque onustas, Valerius praedam Etruscam Ligurumque et [3] Montanorum captivos 15 Carthaginem portantes captas tradit. In Bruttiis nihil ferme anno eo memorabile gestum. Pestilentia incesserat pari clade in Romanos Poenosque, nisi quod Punicum exercitum super morbum etiam fames 16 adfecit. Propter Iunonis Laciniae templum aestatem Hannibal egit, ibique aram condidit dedicavitque cum ingenti rerum ab se gestarum titulo, Punicis Graecisque litteris insculpto.

[1] res Rhenanus, Eds. (after litteris Alschefski): om. P(1)NSpJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] accendit P(1)NSpJK Froben 2: accendere x Aldus.

[3] et P(1)NJK, Aldus, Weissenborn, Conway: om. Froben 2, Madvig, Luchs, Riemann, Friedersdorff, unwilling to accept as genuine the statement that there were Ligurian captives also, i.e. Ingauni, § 9.

---

[1] Cf. xxxviii. 11, 13; XXX. i. 9 f.

[2] Antias; cf. Vol. VI. p. 492, n. 2; VII. pp. 24, n. 1 and 187. For Coelius cf. VI. p. 183, n. 2; VII. pp. 41, 323.

on hearing his name flocked together from all sides. B.C. 205
This fact, when it was made known to the senators through a letter of Spurius Lucretius,[1] kindled great anxiety among them, for fear they had rejoiced in vain two years before over the destruction of Hasdrubal and his army, if another equally serious war with only a change of commander should break out from that quarter. So they ordered Marcus Livius, the proconsul, to bring his army of slave-volunteers from Etruria to Ariminum. Also they assigned to Gnaeus Servilius, the praetor, if he thought it to the advantage of the state, the duty of appointing at his discretion a commander for the two city legions and ordering them to be brought up from the city. Marcus Valerius Laevinus brought these legions to Arretium.

Just at that time about eighty Carthaginian transports were captured off Sardinia by Gnaeus Octavius, who was in command of that province. Coelius states that they were laden with grain sent to Hannibal and with provisions, Valerius[2] that they were captured while carrying Etruscan booty and captive Ligurians and Montani to Carthage. In the land of the Bruttians virtually nothing notable was done that year. An epidemic, equally disastrous to both, had attacked Romans and Carthaginians, with this difference that in addition to disease hunger also weakened the Carthaginian army. Hannibal spent the summer near the temple of Juno Lacinia,[3] and there he erected an altar and dedicated it together with a great record of his achievements in a Punic and Greek inscription.

[3] Cf. Vol. VI. pp. 115, n., 182 f., notes (especially in reference to the inscription); VII. p. 315. The promontory took its name from ναός, temple, and is still Capo Nao (or delle Colonne).

LIBRI XXVIII PERIOCHA

Res in Hispania prospere gestae a Silano Scipionis legato et ab L. Scipione fratre adversus Poenos, a P. Sulpicio proconsule socio Attalo rege Asiae adversus Philippum regem Macedonum pro Aetolis referuntur. Cum M. Livio et Claudio Neroni consulibus triumphus decretus esset, Livius, qui in provincia sua rem gesserat, quadrigis invectus est, Nero, qui in collegae provinciam, ut victoriam eius adiuvaret, venerat, equo secutus est, et in hoc habitu plus gloriae reverentiaeque habuit; nam et plus in bello quam collega fecerat. Ignis in aede Vestae neglegentia virginis quae non custodierat exstinctus est; caesa est flagro. P. Scipio in Hispania cum Poenis debellavit XIIII anno eius belli, quinto post anno quam ierat, praeclusisque in totum possessione provinciae eius hostibus Hispanias recepit; et a Tarracone in Africam ad Syphacem regem Massyliorum transvectus foedus iunxit. Hasdrubal Gisgonis ibi cum eo in eodem lecto cenavit. Munus gladiatorium in honorem patris patruique Carthagine Nova edidit, non ex gladiatoribus, sed ex his qui aut in honorem ducis aut ex provocatione descendebant; in quo reguli fratres de regno ferro contenderunt. Cum Gisia urbs obpugnaretur, oppidani liberos et coniuges rogo exstructo occiderunt et se insuper praecipitaverunt. Ipse Scipio, dum gravi morbo implicitus est, seditionem in parte exercitus motam confirmatus

[1] An error for New Carthage; cf. xvii. 12.
[2] Astapa in the text, xxii. 2; xxiii. 5.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXVIII

Successes gained in Spain against the Carthaginians by Silanus, Scipio's lieutenant, and by his brother Lucius Scipio are narrated, and those gained by Publius Sulpicius as proconsul with Attalus, King of Asia, as ally against Philip, King of the Macedonians, on behalf of the Aetolians. When a triumph was awarded by decree to Marcus Livius and Claudius Nero, the consuls, Livius, who had commanded in his own province, drove into the city in a four-horse chariot. Nero, who had entered his colleague's province to aid him to victory, followed on horseback; and in this appearance he earned more fame and respect; for he had done more also than his colleague in the war. The fire in Vesta's temple went out owing to the carelessness of the virgin who had failed to keep watch over it. She was scourged. Publius Scipio brought the war with the Carthaginians in Spain to an end in the fourteenth year of the war, the fifth year after his arrival; and he gained possession of Spain after completely shutting the enemy out from occupation of that province. And from Tarraco [1] he crossed over into Africa, to Syphax, King of the Massylians, and made a treaty with him. Hasdrubal son of Gisgo dined with him there, reclining on the same couch. Scipio gave a gladiatorial show at New Carthage in honour of his father and uncle, not by gladiators but by men who went into the arena either to honour the general or in accepting a challenge. In that show princes who were brothers fought for kingship with the sword. During the siege of the city of Gisia [2] the citizens slew their children and wives upon a pyre which they had built and threw themselves upon it. Scipio himself, when a mutiny broke out in one part of the army while he was discussit, rebellantesque Hispaniae populos coegit in deditionem venire. Et amicitia facta cum Masinissa rege Numidarum, qui illi auxilium, si in Africam traiecisset, pollicebatur, cum Gaditanis quoque post discessum inde Magonis, cui Carthagine scriptum erat ut in Italiam traiceret, Romam reversus consulque creatus. Africam provinciam petenti contradicente Q. Fabio Maximo Sicilia data est, permissumque ut in Africam traiceret, si id e re publica esse censeret. Mago Hamilcaris filius a minore Baliari insula, ubi hiemaverat, in Italiam traiecit.

seriously ill, upon recovering quelled it and compelled the rebellious peoples in Spain to surrender. And he made friends with Masinissa, King of the Numidians, who promised him assistance if he should cross over to Africa. Having made friends with the men of Gades also after the departure of Mago, who had received written orders from Carthage to cross over to Italy, Scipio returned to Rome and was elected consul. When he begged for Africa as his province, while Quintus Fabius Maximus opposed, Sicily was given to him and he was permitted to cross over to Africa if he thought that for the advantage of the state. Mago son of Hamilcar crossed over to Italy from the smaller of the Balearic Islands, where he had wintered.

BOOK XXIX

LIBER XXIX

U.C. 49

I. Scipio postquam in Siciliam venit, voluntarios
2 milites ordinavit centuriavitque Ex iis trecentos iuvenes, florentes aetate et virium robore insignes,[1] inermes circa se habebat, ignorantes quem ad usum
3 neque centuriati neque armati servarentur. Tum ex totius Siciliae iuniorum numero principes genere et fortuna trecentos equites qui secum in Africam traicerent legit, diemque iis qua equis armisque
4 instructi atque ornati adessent edixit. Gravis ea militia procul domo, terra marique multos labores magna pericula allatura videbatur; neque ipsos modo sed parentes cognatosque eorum ea cura angebat.
5 Ubi dies quae edicta[2] erat advenit, arma equosque ostenderunt. Tum Scipio renuntiari sibi dixit quosdam equites Siculorum tamquam gravem et 6 duram horrere eam militiam; si qui ita animati essent, malle eos sibi iam tum fateri quam postmodo querentes segnes atque inutiles milites rei publicae esse; expromerent quid sentirent; cum bona venia
7 se auditurum. Ubi ex iis unus ausus est dicere se

[1] insignes, inermes Conway: insignes (or -is), SpA[1]N1JK Froben 2: inermis (or -es P(1)NH Aldus, Edd.

[2] edicta JK Aldus, Froben, Luchs: dicta P(1)NH.

BOOK XXIX

I. Scipio, now that he had reached Sicily, assigned B.C. 205 his volunteers to their ranks and centuries. Three hundred of them, young men in the bloom of their youth and conspicuous for their physical strength, he kept about him unarmed and ignorant of the purpose for which they were being reserved without being organized in centuries or furnished with arms. Then he chose out of the number of the younger men of all Sicily three hundred horsemen, men of high rank and of wealth, to cross over with him into Africa. He appointed a day also on which they were to present themselves equipped and furnished with horses and arms. Such service far from home seemed to them formidable and likely to bring many hardships and great dangers on land and sea. And concern on this account troubled not merely the men themselves but also their parents and relations. When the day which had been appointed came the men displayed their arms and horses. Then Scipio said reports were coming to him that some of the Sicilian horsemen shrank from that service as formidable and difficult. If any were of that mind he preferred that they should confess it to him at once, rather than complain later and prove spiritless soldiers and useless for the state. Let them declare what was their mind; he would give them a kindly hearing. When one of them ventured to say that prorsus, si sibi utrum vellet [1] liberum esset, nolle

8 militare, tum Scipio ei: "Quoniam igitur, adulescens, quid sentires non dissimulasti, vicarium tibi expediam cui tu arma equumque et cetera instrumenta militiae tradas et tecum hinc extemplo domum ducas, 9 exerceas, docendum cures equo armisque." Laeto condicionem accipienti unum ex trecentis quos inermes habebat tradit. Ubi hoc modo exauctoratum equitem cum gratia imperatoris ceteri viderunt, se
10 quisque excusare et vicarium accipere. Ita trecentis Siculis Romani equites substituti sine publica inpensa. Docendorum atque exercendorum [2] curam Siculi habuerunt, quai edictum imperatoris erat, ipsum milita-
11 turum qui ita non fecisset. Egregiam hanc alam equitum evasisse ferunt multisque proeliis rem publicam adiuvisse.

12 Legiones inde cum inspiceret, plurimorum stipendiorum ex iis milites delegit, maxime qui sub duce
13 Marcello militaverant, quos cum optima disciplina institutos credebat, tum etiam ab longa Syracusarum obsidione peritissimos esse urbium oppugnandarum; nihil enim parvum, sed Carthaginis iam excidia
14 agitabat animo. Inde exercitum per oppida dispertit; frumentum Siculorum civitatibus imperat, ex Italia

[1] vellet Sp²JK Froben 2: velit P(1)NH.

[2] atque exercendorum A¹N¹H(ac)JK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N, a line, as they omit multisque proeliis rem publicam just below (supplied as above).

[1] A similar method of raising cavalry inexpensively was used by the Spartan King Agesilāus in order to make war upon the Persian King's satrap Tissaphernes near Ephesus, 395

if he was free to choose whichever he wished he did not wish to serve at all, thereupon Scipio said to him: "Accordingly, since you have not concealed what your mind is, young man, I will furnish a substitute for you, and to him you shall hand over your arms and horse and the other equipment for the service, and forthwith shall take him away with you to your home, train him and see that he is taught horsemanship and the use of arms." As the man gladly accepted the terms Scipio turned over to him one of the three hundred unarmed men that he had. When the others saw the horseman thus discharged with the consent of the commander, every man excused himself and took a substitute. Thus three hundred Sicilians were replaced by Roman horsemen without expense to the state. Of their training and drilling the Sicilians were in charge, because the general's order was that any man who failed to do so should himself serve.[1] They say that this cavalry squadron proved excellent and was of value to the state in many battles. B.C. 205

Then while mustering the legions he chose out of them soldiers who had served for the greatest number of campaigns, especially those who had done so under Marcellus as commander, believing them to have been schooled by the best training and in particular to be most skilled in besieging cities in consequence of the long siege of Syracuse. For he was planning nothing small, but already the destruction of Carthage. Thereupon he distributed his army among the towns, requisitioned grain from the Sicilian cities, spared the grain imported from advecto parcit; veteres naves reficit et cum iis C. Laelium in Africam praedatum mittit; novas Panhormi[1] subducit, quia ex viridi materia raptim factae erant, ut in sicco hibernarent.

B.C.; Xenophon Hell. III. iv. 15; Ages. I. 24; Plutarch Ages. 9.

15 Praeparatis omnibus ad bellum Syracusas, nondum ex magnis belli motibus satis tranquillas, venit.
16 Graeci res a quibusdam Italici generis eadem vi qua per bellum ceperant retinentibus, concessas sibi ab
17 senatu repetebant. Omnium primum ratus tueri publicam fidem, partim edicto, partim iudiciis etiam in pertinaces ad obtinendam iniuriam redditis suas
18 res Syracusanis restituit. Non ipsis tantum ea res, sed omnibus Siciliae populis grata fuit, eoque enixius ad[2] bellum adiuverunt.

19 Eadem aestate in Hispania coortum ingens bellum conciente Ilergete Indibili, nulla alia de causa quam per admirationem Scipionis contemptu imperatorum 20 aliorum orto. Eum superesse unum ducem Romanis, ceteris ab Hannibale interfectis, rebatur;[3] eo nec in Hispaniam caesis Scipionibus alium quem mitterent habuisse, et postquam in Italia gravius bellum urgueret, adversus Hannibalem eum arcessitum.

[1] Panhormi $P(1)H$: panormi NK : -mis J.
[2] ad om. NJK Froben 2.
[3] rebatur Gronovius : rebantur $PCRM^{1?}A^{1}N^{1}HJK$: om. (as a gloss) Duker, Conway.

---

[1] I.e. of the previous year at least; cf. XXVIII. xlv. 8, where thirty war-ships are mentioned.

[2] Evidently Laevinus' efforts to remedy abuses had not been altogether successful (XXVI. xl. 1). Syracusans (Graeci) had often been unable to recover landed property still occupied and forcibly held by Italians; cf. ibid. xxx. 10; xxxii. 6 (the latter implying the senate's promise of compensation).

Italy. He repaired the old ships,[1] and with these sent Gaius Laelius to Africa for plunder. The new ships he beached at Panormus, that they might winter out of the water, since they had been built in haste of green timber. B.C. 205

Every preparation for the war having been made, he came to Syracuse, which was not yet quite peaceful after the great unsettlement due to the war. The Greeks were making their claims to properties granted them by the senate against certain Italians who were holding on with the same use of force with which they had seized the property during the war.[2] Thinking it of the utmost importance to keep a promise given by the state, Scipio restored their property to the Syracusans, partly by an edict, partly also by granting hearings against those who persisted in maintaining an unlawful possession. This act was acceptable not only to the owners themselves but to all the communities of Sicily as well, and all the more energetically did they render assistance for the war.

In the same summer a great war broke out in Spain, instigated by Indibilis[3] of the Ilergetes for no other reason than because contempt for other generals sprang from admiration for Scipio. He thought that Scipio was the one general left to the Romans, the rest having been killed by Hannibal; that consequently after the slaying of the Scipios they had no one else to send to Spain, and had also, once the war grew more serious in Italy, summoned him to face Hannibal; that, besides

[3] Cf. XXVIII. xxiv ff. and note on xxiv. 3. Indibilis was prince of a north-eastern tribe, the Ilergetes; XXVI. xlix. 11; cf. XXVIII. xxvii. 5.

.c. 21 Praeterquam quod nomina tantum ducum in Hispania
9 Romani haberent,[1] exercitum quoque inde veterem deductum; trepida omnia et[2] inconditam turbam
22 tironum esse. Numquam talem occasionem libe-
23 randae Hispaniae fore. Servitum ad eam diem aut Carthaginiensibus aut Romanis, nec in vicem his aut
24 illis, sed interdum utrisque simul. Pulsos ab Romanis Carthaginienses; ab Hispanis, si consentirent, pelli Romanos posse, ut ab omni externo imperio[3] soluta in perpetuum Hispania in patrios rediret mores
25 ritusque. Haec taliaque dicendo non populares modo, sed Ausetanos quoque, vicinam gentem, concitat et alios finitimos sibi atque illis populos.
26 Itaque intra paucos dies triginta milia peditum, quattuor ferme equitum in Sedetanum agrum, quo edictum erat, convenerunt.

II. Romani quoque imperatores L. Lentulus et L. Manlius Acidinus, ne glisceret prima neglegendo
2 bellum, iunctis et ipsi exercitibus per agrum Ausetanum hostico tamquam pacato clementer ductis mili-

[1] haberent SpHJK Froben 2: habeant Weissenborn, Conway: -bant $P(1)NH^2$ Aldus.

[2] et Sp?A^{a}JK Aldus, Froben: ut $P(1)NH$.

[3] externo imperio $A^{a}JK$ Froben 2: imperio externo $P(3)C^{4}NH$ Aldus. For the felia probably misplaced in P's archetype and inserted in $P(1)N$ between imperio and externo, cf. critical n. on XXVIII. xxii. 14. The correct order is found in HJK Aldus, Froben. In P the passage covers over 33 pp.

[1] Their territory reached from the Pyrenees south-east to the Mediterranean, Gerunda being their chief town (now Gerona). Cf. XXI. xxiii. 2; lxi. 8 (here and in XXXIX. lvi. 1 they even approach the Ebro; not so in Caesar B.C. I. lx. 2);

having merely nominal commanders in Spain, the Romans had taken away the veteran army also. There was nothing but confusion and an untrained mob of recruits. Never would there be such an opportunity for the liberation of Spain. Slaves they had been down to that time, either to Carthaginians or to Romans, and not by turns to the one people or the other but at times to both at once. The Carthaginians had been driven out by the Romans; the Spaniards, if they should agree, were able to drive out the Romans, so that, free from all foreign authority, Spain might return permanently to its ancestral customs and usages. By these and similar utterances he stirred up not only his own countrymen but also the Ausetani,[1] a neighbouring tribe, and other peoples adjoining his territory and theirs. And thus within a few days thirty thousand infantry and about four thousand horse came together in the territory of the Sedetani,[2] in accordance with their instructions. B.C. 205

II. The Roman commanders on their part, Lucius Lentulus and Lucius Manlius Acidinus,[3] for fear the war might grow more serious from neglect of the first hostile acts, likewise united their armies, and leading their soldiers through the Ausetanian territory with restraint on an enemy's soil, as though it

XXVI. xvii. 4 (doubtful reading); XXXIV. xx. 1; below, ii. 5; iii. 3.

[2] Often confused with the Edetani, and north of the Ebro, but we do not know their exact location. Cf. XXVIII. xxiv. 4; xxxi. 7.

[3] Cornelius Lentulus and Manlius had been praetors in 211 and 210 B.C. respectively; XXV. xli. 12; XXVI. xxiii. 1; sent to Spain cum imperio; cf. XXVIII. xxxviii. 1; styled proconsuls without having held the consulship; below, xiii. 7.

c.c. 49

tibus ad sedem hostium pervenere et [1] trium milium spatio procul a castris eorum posuerunt castra. 3 Primo per legatos nequiquam temptatum ut discederetur ab armis; dein cum in pabulatores Romanos impetus repente ab equitibus Hispanis factus esset, summisso ab statione Romana equitatu equestre proelium fuit haud sane memorando in 4 partem ullam eventu. Sole oriente postero die armati instructique omnes mille ferme passus procul 5 a castris Romanis aciem ostendere. Medii Ausetani erant; cornua dextrum Ilergetes, laevum ignobiles tenebant Hispani populi; inter cornua et mediam aciem intervalla patentia satis late fecerant [2] qua 6 equitatum, ubi tempus esset, emitterent. Et Romani more suo exercitum cum instruxissent, id modo hostium imitati sunt, ut inter legiones et ipsi 7 patentes equiti relinquerent vias. Ceterum Lentulus ei parti usum equitis fore ratus quae prior in dehiscentem intervallis hostium aciem equites emisisset, 8 Ser. Cornelio tribuno militum imperat equites per patentes in hostium acie vias permittere equos iubeat. 9 Ipse coepta parum prospere pedestri pugna, tantum moratus dum cedenti duodecimae legioni, quae in laevo cornu adversus Ilergetes locata erat, tertiam decumam legionem ex subsidiis in primam aciem fir- 10 mamentum ducit, postquam aequata ibi pugna est, ad L. Manlium inter prima signa hortantem ac sub-

[1] pervenere et M^3A^4 Weissenborn: -veneret PR: -veniret $R^2(3)$: -venere N^4HJK Aldus, Froben.

[2] fecerant x Gronovius: fecerunt $P(1)NHJK$.

were friendly, they reached the place where their B.C. 205 enemies had concentrated and pitched camp three miles away from their camp. At first a vain effort was made through envoys to make them abandon fighting. Then when an attack was suddenly made upon Roman foragers by Spanish horse and from a Roman outpost horsemen were sent to the rescue, there was a cavalry battle with no success for either side worth mentioning. At sunrise on the following day, under arms and drawn up, all of them displayed their battle-line at a distance of about a mile from the Roman camp. The Ausetani were in the centre; of the wings the Ilergetes occupied the right, unimportant Spanish tribes the left. Between the wings and the centre they had made spaces broad enough to send the cavalry through when the time came. And the Romans, having drawn up their army in the customary fashion, imitated this feature only of the enemy's line, that they likewise left broad spaces between the legions for the passage of cavalry. But Lentulus thought that whichever side should first send its cavalry out into the enemy's line with its gaping intervals would use its cavalry to advantage. He therefore ordered Servius Cornelius, a tribune of the soldiers, to command his cavalry to give their horses free rein through the broad openings in the battle-line of the enemy. Lentulus himself, after the infantry battle had begun without success, delayed only long enough to bring up the thirteenth legion from the reserves into the front line to support the twelfth legion, which had been placed on the left wing facing the Ilergetes and was giving way. Now that the battle was evenly balanced there, he came up to Lucius Manlius, who sidia quibus res postulabat locis inducentem venit;

11 indicat tuta ab laevo cornu esse; iam missum ab se Ser.[1] Cornelium procella equestri hostes circumfusurum.
12 Vix haec dicta dederat cum Romani equites in medios invecti hostes simul pedestres acies turbarunt, simul equitibus Hispanorum viam immittendi equos 13 clauserunt. Itaque omissa pugna equestri ad pedes Hispani descenderunt. Romani imperatores ut turbatos hostium ordines et trepidationem pavorem-que et fluctuantia viderunt signa, hortantur, orant milites ut perculsos invadant neu restitui aciem 14 patiantur. Non sustinuissent tam infestum impetum barbari, ni regulus ipse Indibilis cum equitibus ad pedes degressis ante prima signa peditum se obiecis-15 set. Ibi aliquamdiu atrox pugna stetit; tandem, postquam ii qui circa regem seminecem restantem, deinde pilo terrae adfixum pugnabant obruti telis 16 occubuerunt, tum fuga passim coepta. Plures caesi, quia equos conscendendi equitibus spatium non fuerat, et quia perculsis acriter institerunt Romani;
nec ante abscessum est quam castris quoque exuerunt 17 hostem. Tredecim[2] milia Hispanorum caesa eo die, mille[3] octingenti ferme capti; Romanorum so-ciorumque paulo amplius ducenti, maxime in laevo

[1] Ser. Froben 2, Eds.: P(1)NSpIIJ have servium after Cornelium: Madvig, Conway om. praenomen.
[2] tredecim A[1]JK Conway (cf. XXVI. xlix. 3 and below, xxxvii. 6): decem tria P(1)NH.
[3] mille P(∞)A[1]JK: om. P2NH Aldus, Froben.

was in the foremost ranks, encouraging the men and bringing up reserves to such positions as the case required. He informed him that all was secured on the left wing; that he had already sent Servius Cornelius to surround the enemy with a whirlwind attack of cavalry. B.C. 205

Scarcely had Lentulus said this when the Roman horse, charging into the midst of the enemy, threw the infantry lines into confusion and at the same time closed for the Spanish cavalry the route by which they might launch their attack. Accordingly the Spaniards gave up the cavalry battle and dismounted. The Roman generals, on seeing the broken ranks of the enemy, and their fright and alarm and the wavering standards, exhorted and implored their soldiers to attack the discouraged enemy and not allow the line to re-form. The barbarians would have failed to withstand so impetuous an attack, had not even their prince, Indibilis, exposed himself with the dismounted cavalry in front of the first units of the infantry. At that point a fierce battle continued for some time. Finally, when those who kept on fighting round the prince, who resisted though half-dead, but was pinned to the ground by a javelin, were overwhelmed by missile weapons and fell, at that moment began a flight pell-mell. Greater numbers were slain because the horsemen had left no room to mount their horses, and because the Romans made a spirited attack upon the terrified. And they did not withdraw until they had routed the enemy out of his camp as well. Thirteen thousand Spaniards were slain that day, about one thousand eight hundred captured. Of the Romans and their allies little more than two 18 cornu, ceciderunt. Pulsi castris Hispani aut qui ex proelio effugerant, sparsi primo per agros, deinde in suas quisque civitates redierunt.

III. Tum a Mandonio evocati in concilium conquestique ibi clades suas increpitis auctoribus belli legatos mittendos ad arma tradenda deditionemque 2 faciendam censuere. Quibus culpam in auctorem belli Indibilem ceterosque principes, quorum plerique in acie cecidissent, conferentibus tradentibusque arma et 3 dedentibus sese responsum est in deditionem ita accipi eos, si Mandonium ceterosque belli concitores tradidissent vivos; si minus, exercitum se in agrum Ilergetum Ausetanorumque et deinceps aliorum 4 populorum inducturos.[1] Haec dicta legatis renuntiataque in concilium. Ibi Mandonius ceterique principes conprehensi et traditi ad supplicium. 5 Hispaniae populis reddita pax; stipendium eius anni duplex et frumentum sex mensum imperatum sagaque et togae exercitui, et obsides ab triginta ferme populis accepti.

6 Ita Hispaniae rebellantis tumultu haud magno motu intra paucos dies concito et compresso, in Afri- 7 cam omnis terror versus. C. Laelius nocte ad Hipponem Regium cum accessisset, luce prima ad populandum agrum sub signis milites sociosque navales[2]

[1] inducturos N^2JK: ducturos $P(1)NH$ Aldus, Froben.

[2] navales (or -is) $P(1)NH$ Aldus, Froben, Eds.: to this in auxilium is added (before navales) by N^1 Conway, (after nav.) by A^2JK.

---

[1] Livy or his Roman source must have confused Hippo Diarrhȳtus (Bizerte) with Hippo Regius (near Bône), which was ten days' journey from Carthage (so Procopius Bell. IV (Vand. II.), iv. 26; Mela I. 33; Pliny N.H. V. 22; VI. 212). Laelius would not lay waste land claimed by Masinissa. Cf. p. 334 for the real Hippo Regius.

hundred fell, mainly on the left wing. Those of the Spaniards who were driven out of their camp or had escaped from the battle scattered at first over the country and then returned to their respective communities. B.C. 205

III. Then they were summoned by Mandonius to a council, and there, after lamenting their heavy losses and berating those who were responsible for the war, they voted that envoys should be sent to arrange for a surrender of arms and a capitulation. When the envoys laid the blame upon Indibilis as responsible for the war and upon the rest of their leading men, most of whom, they said, had fallen in the battle, and offered to deliver their arms and surrender, the answer given them was: that their surrender would be accepted only in case they should deliver Mandonius and the other instigators of the war alive. If not, the generals said they would lead their army into the lands of the Ilergetes and Ausetani and the other tribes one after another. Such was the reply given to the legates and reported by them to the council. Thereupon Mandonius and the other leaders were seized and handed over to be punished. For the peoples of Spain peace was restored, a double tribute for that year and grain for six months exacted, also cloaks and togas for the army; and hostages were accepted from about thirty tribes.

Thus a rebellious uprising in Spain was incited and suppressed within a few days with no serious consequences, and alarm was completely shifted to Africa. Gaius Laelius, having reached Hippo Regius [1] by night, led out his soldiers and marines under their standards at daybreak to lay the country

B.C. 8 duxit. Omnibus pacis modo incuriose agentibus 49 magna clades inlata; nuntiique trepidi Carthaginem terrore ingenti conplevere, classem Romanam Scipionemque imperatorem—et fama fuerat iam in 9 Siciliam transgressum—advenisse. Nec quot naves vidissent, nec quanta manus agros popularetur satis gnari omnia in maius metu augente accipiebant.
Itaque primo terror pavorque, dein[1] maestitia 10 animos incessit: tantum fortunam mutasse ut qui modo ipsi exercitum ante moenia Romana habuissent victores stratisque tot hostium exercitibus omnes Italiae populos aut vi aut voluntate in deditionem 11 accepissent, ii verso Marte Africae populationes et obsidionem Carthaginis visuri forent, nequaquam pari 12 ad patienda ea robore ac Romani fuissent. Illis Romanam plebem, illis Latium iuventutem prae-buisse maiorem semper frequentioremque pro tot 13 caesis exercitibus subolescentem; suam plebem imbellem in urbe, imbellem in agris esse; mercede parari auxilia ex Afris, gente ad omnem auram spei 14 mobili atque infida. Iam reges, Syphacem post conloquium cum Scipione alienatum, Masinissam aperta defectione infestissimum hostem. Nihil 15 usquam spei, nihil auxilii esse. Nec Magonem ex
Gallia movere tumultus quicquam nec coniungere

[1] dein P(1)NH Aldus (daein P): deinde JK Froben 2.

[1] The earlier inhabitants, mostly rustics, many of them mercenary soldiers; cf. XXVIII. xiv. 4, 19; xx. 1, etc.; below, iv. 2.

[2] Cf. XXVIII. xviii.

waste. Since everybody was free from concern, as B.C. 205
if in peace-time, great losses were inflicted. And excited messengers filled Carthage with great alarm, reporting that the Roman fleet and Scipio as commander-in-chief had arrived. In fact it had been previously rumoured that he had already crossed over to Sicily. Lacking exact information also as to how many ships the messengers had seen and how large a force was laying waste the country, they exaggerated every report under the stimulus of fear. Accordingly alarm and panic at first, then dejection came over their spirits. So far, they said, had fortune changed that those who as victors had but lately had their own army before the walls of Rome and, after laying low so many armies of the enemy, had by force or by voluntary action received the surrender of all the peoples of Italy, with the shifting fortune of war were now destined to see the devastation of Africa and a siege of Carthage, when they had no such strength as the Romans had possessed to endure all that. For them, they said, the Roman populace, for them Latium had always furnished a greater and more numerous body of young men growing up in place of so many armies slain. As for their own populace, they were unwarlike in the city, unwarlike in the country. Hireling auxiliaries were being recruited from the Africans,[1] a race shifting with every fickle breath of hope and lacking in loyalty. Of the kings, moreover, Syphax had been alienated after his conference with Scipio,[2] they said, and Masinissa by open defection had shown himself their bitterest enemy. Nowhere was there any hope, nowhere any aid. Mago was neither setting in motion any uprising on the part of Gaul, u.c. 549 sese Hannibali, et Hannibalem ipsum iam et fama senescere et viribus.

IV. In haec deflenda prolapsos ab recenti nuntio animos rursus terror instans revocavit ad consultandum quonam modo obviam praesentibus periculis 2 iretur. Dilectus raptim in urbe agrisque haberi placet; mittere ad conducenda Afrorum auxilia; munire urbem, frumentum convehere, tela arma parare; instruere naves ac mittere ad Hipponem 3 adversus Romanam classem. Iam haec agentibus nuntius tandem venit Laelium, non Scipionem, copiasque, quantae ad incursiones agrorum satis sint, transvectas; summae [1] belli molem adhuc in 4 Sicilia esse. Ita respiratum, mittique legationes [2] ad Syphacem aliosque regulos firmandae societatis causa coeptae. Ad Philippum quoque missi qui ducenta argenti talenta pollicerentur, ut in Siciliam 5 aut in Italiam traiceret. Missi et ad suos imperatores in Italiam ut omni terrore Scipionem retinerent; 6 ad Magonem non legati modo, sed viginti quinque longae naves, sex milia peditum, octingenti equites, septem elephanti, ad hoc magna pecunia ad conducenda auxilia, quibus fretus propius urbem Romanam exercitum admoveret coniungeretque se Hannibali.

7 Haec Carthagine parabant agitabantque cum [3]

[1] summae P: summam P^1 or P^2 Aldus, Froben: summi HJK.

[2] legationes here HJK: after Syphacem $P(1)N^{\text{a}}$? Aldus, Froben.

[3] cum $SpN^{\text{a}}HJK$ Froben 2, Conway: tum A^{a}; om. $P(1)N$ Eds. beginning a new sentence with Ad.

nor uniting with Hannibal; and Hannibal himself B.C. 205 by this time was on the decline both in repute and in strength.

IV. Such were the laments into which men had fallen in consequence of the recent news when impending alarm roused them again to deliberate how they should meet the dangers of the moment. It was decided to hold levies speedily in city and country; to send men to hire African auxiliaries; to fortify the city, to bring in grain, to provide arms offensive and defensive, to equip ships and send them to Hippo to face the Roman fleet. While they were already thus employed the news at last came that Laelius, not Scipio, had sailed across and only sufficient forces to raid the farms; that the bulk of the main army was still in Sicily. So there was a breathing spell, and they set about sending embassies to Syphax and other princes, to cement an alliance. To Philip also envoys were sent to promise him two hundred talents of silver, on condition that he should cross over into Sicily or Italy.[1] Men were sent likewise to their own commanders in Italy, that by every sort of alarm they should keep Scipio there. Not only envoys were sent to Mago but twenty-five war-ships, six thousand infantry, eight hundred horsemen, seven elephants, and in addition a large sum of money to hire auxiliaries. Relying upon these resources he was to advance nearer to the city of Rome with his army and unite with Hannibal.

Such were their plans and deliberations at Carthage

[1] Instead of doing so Philip made a treaty with the Romans; below, xii. 14. For a previous effort of the king to form an alliance with Carthage cf. XXIII. xxxiii. f.

u.c. 49 ad Laelium praedas ingentes ex agro inermi ac nudo praesidiis agentem Masinissa, fama Romanae classis 8 excitus, cum equitibus paucis venit. Is segniter rem agi ab Scipione questus, quod non iam exercitum in Africam traiecisset, perculsis Carthaginiensibus, Syphace impedito finitumis bellis; quem certum habere, si spatium ad sua ut velit componenda detur, nihil 9 sincera fide cum Romanis acturum. Hortaretur, stimularet Scipionem ne cessaret; se, quamquam regno pulsus esset, cum haud contemnendis copiis adfuturum peditum equitumque. Nec ipsi Laelio morandum in Africa esse; classem credere profectam a Carthagine, cum qua absente Scipione non satis tutum esset [1] contrahi certamen. V. Ab hoc sermone dimisso Masinissa Laelius postero die naves praeda onustas ab Hippone solvit, revectusque in Siciliam mandata Masinissae Scipioni exposuit.

2 Eisdem ferme diebus naves quae ab Carthagine ad Magonem missae erant inter Albingaunos Ligures 3 Genuamque accesserunt. In iis locis tum forte Mago tenebat classem; qui legatorum auditis verbis iubentium exercitus quam maximos comparare, extemplo Gallorum et Ligurum [2]—namque utriusque gentis 4 ingens ibi multitudo erat—concilium habuit; et

[1] esset N^{1}(altern.)HJK Aldus, Froben, Conway: esse $P(1)N$ Eds.

[2] et Ligurum $A^{1}N^{1}HJK$: om. $P(1)N$.

[1] A different account, followed by Livy in xxxiii. 9, placed Masinissa, at the time of Laelius' landing, in the region of the Emporia, far away to the south-east (cf. xxv. 12 and note).

when Masinissa, aroused by the report of a Roman fleet, came with a few horsemen to Laelius,[1] who was carrying off a vast amount of booty from territory that lacked troops and garrisons. Masinissa complained that Scipio was conducting the war without spirit in not having already transported his army to Africa, while the Carthaginians were panic-stricken and Syphax was entangled in wars with neighbours. He was certain, he said, that if Syphax should be given time to settle his affairs to his own satisfaction, there would be no real loyalty in his dealings with the Romans. Laelius should exhort and spur Scipio on to avoid delay. For himself, although he had been driven out of his kingdom, he would assist with no inconsiderable forces of infantry and cavalry. Laelius also must not tarry in Africa. A fleet, he believed, had sailed from Carthage, and with that fleet it was unsafe to engage in the absence of Scipio. V. Directly after this conversation Laelius sent Masinissa away, and on the following day he weighed anchor at Hippo, his ships booty-laden, and sailing back to Sicily delivered Masinissa's messages to Scipio. B.C. 205

About the same time the ships which had been sent to Mago from Carthage came into port between Ligurian Albingaunum and Genua.[2] In that region, as it happened, Mago had his fleet at the time. On hearing the words of the envoys, who urged him to get together the largest possible armies, he at once held a council of Gauls and Ligurians; for great numbers of both nations were present. And he told

[2] For that coast and its ports cf. XXVIII. xlvi. 8 ff. and notes. Here Savo (Savona), or Vada Sabat(i)a (2½ miles farther west), is evidently meant.

.c. missum se ad eos vindicandos in libertatem ait et, 9 ut ipsi cernant, mitti sibi ab domo praesidia; sed quantis viribus, quanto exercitu id bellum geratur, in 5 eorum potestate esse. Duos exercitus Romanos, unum in Gallia, alterum in Etruria esse; satis scire Sp. Lucretium se cum M. Livio iuncturum; multa milia armanda esse ut duobus ducibus, duobus 6 exercitibus Romanis resistatur. Galli summam ad id suam voluntatem esse dicere; sed cum una castra Romana intra fines, altera in finitima terra Etruria prope in conspectu habeant, si palam fiat auxiliis adiutum ab sese[1] Poenum, extemplo infestos utrimque exercitus in agrum suum incursuros.
Ea ab Gallis desideraret quibus occulte adiuvari 7 posset: Liguribus, quod procul agro urbibusque eorum castra Romana sint, libera consilia esse; illos armare iuventutem et capessere pro parte bellum aequum esse. Ligures haud abnuere, tempus modo duorum mensum petere ad dilectus habendos.
8 Interim Mago milites Gallos, dimissis clam per agros eorum, mercede conducere; commeatus quoque omnis generis occulte ad eum a Gallicis populis 9 mittebantur. M. Livius exercitum volonum ex Etruria in Galliam traducit,[2] iunctusque Lucretio, si se Mago ex Liguribus propius urbem moveat, obviam ire parat, si Poenus sub angulo Alpium

[1] ab sese $P(1)N$ Aldus: ab (or a) se esse A^1N^2HJK.
[2] traducit $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben: traiecit N^1HJK.

[1] Cf. XXVIII. ix. 1 and note.
[2] Cf. ibid. xlvi. 12 f.; below, xiii. 4.
[3] It was safe to assume that he would follow Hasdrubal's example in making for the Adriatic coast, to enter Italy at Ariminum. The shorter Riviera route was never practicable them that he had been sent to restore their liberty, B.C. 205 and that forces were being sent to him from home, as they themselves saw; but with what resources, with how large an army that war was to be waged depended upon themselves. There were two Roman armies, he said, one in Gaul,[1] the other in Etruria. He was sure that Spurius Lucretius would unite with Marcus Livius;[2] that many thousands must be armed for resistance to two generals, two Roman armies. The Gauls said that they were entirely willing to do so, but that since they had almost before their eyes one Roman camp within their borders and another in the neighbouring land of Etruria, if it should become known that they had aided the Carthaginian by furnishing auxiliaries, forthwith hostile armies would invade their territory from both directions. From Gauls he should require such support as could be given in secret. Ligurians were free to act, they said, since Roman camps were far from their land and their cities; it was right that they should arm their young men and take their proper share in the war. The Ligurians did not refuse, but simply asked for two months' time to hold levies. Meanwhile Mago by sending men secretly through their territory hired Gauls as soldiers. Supplies also of every kind were coming to him in secret from the Gallic nations. Marcus Livius led his army of slave-volunteers over from Etruria into Gaul and, having united with Lucretius, prepared to confront Mago, should he move out of Liguria towards the city;[3] but should the Carthauntil 109 B.C., when the Via Aurelia was extended to Pisae, Genua, and Vada Sabatia; Strabo V. i. 11; cf. Mommsen C.I.L. V. p. 885.

B.C. 249 quietus se contineat, et ipse in eadem regione [1] circa Ariminum Italiae praesidio futurus.

VI. Post reditum ex Africa C. Laeli et Scipione stimulato Masinissae adhortationibus et militibus, praedam ex hostium terra cernentibus tota classe efferri, accensis ad traiciendum quam primum, intervenit maiori minor cogitatio Locros urbem recipiendi, quae sub defectionem Italiae desciverat et ipsa ad
2 Poenos. Spes autem adfectandae eius rei ex minima re adfulsit. Latrociniis [2] magis quam iusto bello in Bruttiis gerebantur res, principio ab Numidis facto et Bruttiis non societate magis Punica quam suopte
3 ingenio congruentibus in eum morem; postremo Romani quoque milites iam [3] contagione quadam rapto gaudentes, quantum per duces licebat, excursiones in 4 hostium agros facere. Ab iis egressi quidam urbe Locrenses circumventi Regiumque abstracti fuerant. In eo captivorum numero fabri quidam fuere, adsueti forte [4] apud Poenos mercede opus in arce Locrorum
5 facere. Hi cogniti ab Locrensium principibus, qui [5] pulsi ab adversa factione, quae Hannibali Locros
6 tradiderat, Regium se contulerant, cum cetera percunctantibus, ut mos est qui diu absunt, quae

[1] regione $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.: statione N^1HJK Froben 2, Conway.

[2] Latrociniis, before this quia Sp^2N^1(altern.): quod JK Aldus, Froben.

[3] milites iam A^1N^1 Aldus, Froben: iam $P(1)N$: milites HJK.

[4] forte om. $P(1)N$.

[5] qui $P(3)$ Aldus: om. AN: qui exsulabant Regii SpA^1N^1HJK Froben 2, of which all but A^1N^1 om. Regium se contulerant ($P(1)N$ Aldus).

[1] For the broader meaning of angulus = recessus, "remote region," cf. XXVIII. xii. 6; xlii. 18.

ginian quietly remain in a distant region[1] at the B.C. 205 foot of the Alps, he too would remain where he was, near Ariminum, for the defence of Italy.

VI. After the return of Gaius Laelius from Africa Scipio was spurred on by Masinissa's encouragement, and the soldiers seeing booty from the land of the enemy being brought ashore from an entire fleet, were likewise fired with a desire to cross over as soon as possible. The greater design, however, was interrupted by a lesser, that of recovering the city of Locri, which in the rebellion of Italy had also gone over to the Carthaginians.[2] Bright hopes of accomplishing that purpose, moreover, arose from a petty circumstance. There was brigandage rather than normal war operations in the country of the Bruttii, where a beginning had been made by the Numidians, and the Bruttians fell in with that practice not more on account of their Punic alliance than of their own nature. Finally the Roman soldiers also from a kind of infection now delighted in plunder, making raids upon the enemy's farms just as far as their commanders permitted. They had overpowered certain Locrians straying from the city and had carried them off to Regium. In the number of these captives were some artisans who, as it happened, were in the habit of plying their trade for hire among the Carthaginians in the citadel of Locri. These men were recognized by leading Locrians who, on being driven out by the opposing party, which had surrendered Locri to Hannibal, had retired to Regium. On being asked the questions usually put by men long absent, the artisans first

[2] As Livy has twice told: in 216 B.C., at XXIII. xxx. 8, and more fully under 215 in XXIV. i.

c. 9 domi agerentur exposuissent, spem fecerunt, si redempti ac remissi forent, arcem se iis tradituros; ibi se habitare, fidemque sibi rerum omnium inter 7 Carthaginienses esse. Itaque, ut qui simul desiderio patriae angerentur, simul cupiditate inimicos ulciscendi arderent, redemptis extemplo iis remissisque, 8 cum ordinem agendae rei composuissent signaque quae procul edita observarent, ipsi ad Scipionem Syracusas profecti, apud quem pars exsulum erat, referentes ibi promissa captivorum cum spem ab 9 effectu haud abhorrentem consuli fecissent, tribuni militum cum iis M. Sergius et P. Matienus missi iussique ab Regio tria milia militum Locros ducere; et Q. Pleminio propraetori scriptum ut rei agendae adesset.

10 Profecti ab Regio, scalas ad editam altitudinem arcis fabricatas portantes, media ferme nocte ex eo loco unde convenerat signum dedere proditoribus 11 arcis; qui parati intentique et ipsi scalas ad id ipsum factas cum demisissent pluribusque simul locis scandentes accepissent, priusquam clamor oreretur, in vigiles Poenorum, ut in nullo tali metu sopitos, 12 impetus est factus. Quorum gemitus primo morientium exauditus, deinde [1] subita consternatio ex somno et tumultus, cum causa ignoraretur, postremo

[1] deinde J Froben 2: dein $P^2(3)R^2HK$ Aldus (P having dubita for subita).

---

[1] I.e. legatus pro praetore, representing Scipio. Cf. viii. 5; xvii. 10.

[2] Cf. XXVIII. v. 17 and note.

told them what was going on at home, and then B.C. 205 inspired the hope that, if ransomed and sent back, they would betray the citadel to them. It was there, they said, that they dwelt and among the Carthaginians were trusted in everything. Accordingly the leading men, being tormented by home-sickness and at the same time fired with a desire for vengeance on their enemies, at once ransomed the artisans and sent them back after agreeing upon a plan of action and signals for the display of which in the distance they should be on the watch. They themselves went to Scipio at Syracuse, with whom were some of the exiles. There they reported the promises of the captives and inspired in the consul a hope which gave good prospect of success. Consequently Marcus Sergius and Publius Matienus, tribunes of the soldiers, were sent with them and ordered to take three thousand soldiers from Regium to Locri. And a written order was sent to the propraetor [1] Quintus Pleminius to assist in carrying out the project.

Setting out from Regium, carrying ladders constructed for the height of the citadel as reported, about midnight they set a signal [2] for the betrayers of the citadel from the place agreed upon. These men were ready and alert, and after they on their part also had lowered ladders made for that very purpose and at several different places at the same time had admitted scaling parties, before any outcry could arise came the attack upon the Carthaginian guards, who in the absence of any such fear naturally were asleep. At first it was the groans of the dying indistinctly heard; then sudden terror on awaking, and confused action, since the reason was unknown; finally greater certainty as they awakened

13 certior res aliis excitantibus alios. Iamque ad arma pro se quisque vocabat: hostes in arce esse et caedi vigiles; oppressique forent Romani nequaquam numero pares, ni clamor ab iis qui extra arcem erant sublatus incertum unde accidisset, omnia vana augente
14 nocturno tumultu, fecisset. Itaque velut plena iam [1] hostium arce territi Poeni omisso certamine in alteram arcem—duae sunt haud multum inter se distantes—
15 confugiunt. Oppidani urbem habebant, victoribus praemium in medio positam; ex arcibus duabus
16 proeliis cotidie levibus certabatur. Q. Pleminius Romano, Hamilcar Punico praesidio praeerat. Arcessentes ex propinquis locis subsidia copias 17 augebant; ipse postremo veniebat Hannibal; nec sustinuissent Romani, nisi Locrensium multitudo, exacerbata superbia atque avaritia Poenorum, ad Romanos inclinasset.

VII. Scipioni [2] ut nuntiatum est in maiore discrimine Locris rem verti ipsumque Hannibalem adven-
2 tare, ne praesidio [3] etiam periclitaretur, haud facili inde receptu, et ipse a Messana L. Scipione fratre in praesidio ibi relicto, cum primum aestu fretum inclinatum est. . . .[4] naves mari secundo misit.

[1] iam N^{a}(altern.)HJK Aldus, Froben: nam P: om. P^{2}(1)N.

[2] Scipioni P(1)N Aldus, Froben: scipio $A^{r}HJK$ Sigonius.

[3] praesidio P(1)N^{1}: praesidium $C^{1}M^{1?}A^{1?}JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[4] Here a numeral seems to have been omitted, Weissenborn conj., Conway.

---

[1] I.e. the so-called "descending" tide, running south into the Ionian Sea; XXIII. xli. 11; Strabo I. iii. 11. This strait one another. By this time every man was shouting B.C. 205 his loudest "To arms!" that enemies were on the citadel and guards being cut down. And the Romans, who were by no means equal in numbers, would have been overpowered, had not an outcry raised by the men who were outside the citadel made it uncertain from what quarter the sounds came, while everything they imagined was intensified by the uproar in the dark. Accordingly the Carthaginians, supposing the citadel to be already filled with the enemy, were terrified, gave up fighting and fled to the other citadel; for there are two not far apart. The inhabitants were holding the city, set between combatants as a prize for the victors. From the two citadels came slight engagements every day. Quintus Pleminius commanded the Roman, Hamilcar the Carthaginian garrison. Summoning reinforcements from neighbouring places they kept increasing their numbers. Finally Hannibal himself was on the way, and the Romans would not have held out if the mass of the Locrians, embittered by the arrogance and greed of the Carthaginians, had not taken the side of the Romans.

VII. Scipio, on being informed that the situation at Locri had become more critical and that Hannibal himself was approaching, was afraid to take risks for the garrison as well, since it was not easy to retire from the place. Accordingly he too set out from Messana, after leaving his brother Lucius Scipio there in command of the garrison; and as soon as the strait shifted with the tide, he cast off with . . . ships while the current favoured.[1] And Hannibal

[1] has marked tides—very rare in the Mediterranean. Cf. the Euripus, XXVIII. vi. 10 and note.

B.C. 149

3 Et [1] Hannibal a Buloto amni—haud procul is ab urbe Locris abest—nuntio praemisso ut sui luce prima summa vi proelium cum Romanis ac Locrensibus consererent, dum ipse aversis omnibus in eum tumultum ab tergo urbem incautam adgrederetur, 4 ubi luce coeptam invenit pugnam, ipse nec in arcem se includere, turba locum artum inpediturus, voluit, neque scalas quibus scanderet [2] muros attulerat.[2] 5 Sarcinis in acervum coniectis cum haud procul muris ad terrorem hostium aciem ostendisset, cum equitibus Numidis circumequitat [3] urbem, dum scalae quaeque alia ad oppugnandum opus erant parantur, ad visen- 6 dum qua maxime parte adgrederetur. Progressus ad murum, scorpione icto qui proximus eum forte steterat, territus inde tam periculoso casu receptui canere cum iussisset, castra procul ab ictu teli 7 communit. Classis Romana a Messana Locros aliquot horis die [4] superante accessit; expositi omnes e navibus et ante occasum solis urbem ingressi sunt.

8 Postero die coepta ex arce a Poenis pugna, et Hannibal iam scalis aliisque omnibus ad oppugnationem paratis subibat muros, cum repente in eum nihil minus quam tale quicquam timentem patefacta porta 9 erumpunt Romani. Ad ducentos, improvidos cum invasissent, occidunt; ceteros Hannibal, ut consulem

[1] Et HJK Aldus, Froben : om. P(1)N.

[2] Both verbs are plural in HJK Froben 2.

[3] -equitat P^2(3)R^2 : -equitabat HJK Aldus, Froben, Luchs : -equitib. at P.

[4] die C^2 Gronovius : dici or diei P(1)N : multo die Weissenborn conj., Conway : multa die A^1HV^1*JK Aldus, Froben.*

sent a messenger from the river Bulotus—it is not far B.C. 205 from the city of Locri—ordering his men to engage in battle with the Romans and Locrians with the utmost violence at daybreak, while, when all eyes were turned in the direction of that conflict, he should himself attack the city unawares from the rear. When he came upon the battle, already begun at daybreak, he did not wish to shut himself in the citadel, where he would have clogged a cramped space by his numbers, and on the other hand he had not brought ladders for scaling city walls. After making a pile of the soldiers' baggage and displaying his line of battle at no great distance from the walls to frighten the enemy, while ladders and other requisites for an assault were being prepared, he rode round the city with his Numidian horsemen, to discover just where to make the attack. He had approached the wall when a man who happened to stand nearest to him was struck by a missile from a scorpion. Frightened away by an occurrence so dangerous, he thereupon ordered the recall to be sounded and fortified a camp beyond the range of missiles. The Roman fleet sailing from Messana reached Locri while several hours of daylight remained. All were landed from the ships and before sunset they entered the city.

On the following day a battle was begun by the Carthaginians from their citadel, and Hannibal, having made ready the ladders and everything else for the assault, was coming close to the walls when suddenly the Romans opened a gate and sallied out against an enemy who feared anything but that. In making this surprise attack they slew about two hundred. As for the rest, Hannibal on

B.C. 49 adesse sensit, in castra recipit,[1] nuntioque misso ad eos qui in arce erant ut sibimet ipsi consulerent, 10 nocte motis castris abiit. Et qui in arce erant, igni iniecto tectis quae tenebant, ut is tumultus hostem moraretur, agmen suorum fugae simili cursu ante noctem adsecuti sunt.

VIII. Scipio ut et arcem relictam ab hostibus et vacua vidit castra, vocatos ad contionem Locrenses 2 graviter ob defectionem incusavit; de auctoribus supplicium sumpsit bonaque eorum alterius factionis principibus ob egregiam fidem adversus Romanos 3 concessit. Publice nec dare nec eripere se quicquam Locrensibus dixit; Romam mitterent legatos; quam senatus aequum censuisset, eam fortunam 4 habituros. Illud satis scire, etsi male de populo Romano meriti essent, in meliore statu sub iratis Romanis futuros quam sub amicis Carthaginiensibus 5 fuerint. Ipse Pleminio legato praesidioque quod arcem ceperat ad tuendam urbem relicto, cum quibus venerat copiis Messanam traiecit.

6 Ita superbe et crudeliter habiti Locrenses ab Carthaginiensibus post defectionem ab Romanis fuerant ut modicas iniurias non aequo modo animo 7 pati sed prope libenti possent; verum enimvero tantum Pleminius Hamilcarem praesidii praefectum, tantum praesidiarii milites Romani Poenos scelere learning that the consul was there withdrew them B.C. 205 to his camp, and sending word to the men in the citadel to shift for themselves, he broke camp in the night and marched away. And the men in the citadel set fire to the houses which they were occupying, that the commotion might delay the enemy, and with a speed that resembled flight overtook their own column before nightfall.

[1] recipit P(1)N Froben 2: recepit B^2N^1HJK Aldus.

VIII. Scipio, seeing that the citadel had been abandoned by the enemy and the site of the camp deserted, summoned the Locrians to an assembly and stoutly upbraided them for their revolt. He punished those who had prompted it and bestowed their property upon the leaders of the other party in view of their conspicuous loyalty towards the Romans. As regards their state, he said he would neither grant the Locrians anything nor take anything away. They should send envoys to Rome; and whatever lot the senate thought it proper for them to have would be theirs. Even though they had deserved ill of the Roman people, of this he was certain, that they would be in a better position under angry Romans than they were under friendly Carthaginians. Leaving Pleminius, his lieutenant, to defend the city with the force which had captured the citadel, Scipio crossed over to Messana with the troops with which he had come.

With such arrogance and cruelty had the Locrians been treated by the Carthaginians after their revolt from the Romans that they could bear minor wrongs not only calmly but almost willingly. In actual fact, however, so far did Pleminius surpass Hamilcar, commandant of the garrison, so far did the Roman soldiers in the garrison surpass the Carthaginians in

A.U.C. 549

atque avaritia superaverunt ut non armis, sed vitiis
8 videretur certari. Nihil omnium quae inopi invisas opes potentioris [1] faciunt praetermissum in oppidanos est ab duce aut a militibus; in corpora ipsorum, in liberos, in coniuges infandae contumeliae editae.
9 Nam [2] avaritia ne sacrorum quidem spoliatione abstinuit; nec alia modo templa violata, sed Proserpinae etiam intacti omni aetate [3] thensauri, praeterquam quod a Pyrrho, qui cum magno piaculo sacrilegii
10 sui manubias rettulit, spoliati dicebantur. Ergo sicut ante regiae naves laceratae naufragiis nihil in terram integri praeter sacram pecuniam deae quam 11 asportabant [4] extulerant,[5] tum quoque alio genere cladis eadem illa pecunia omnibus contactis ea violatione templi furorem obiecit atque inter se ducem in ducem, militem in militem rabie hostili vertit.

IX. Summae rei Pleminius praeerat: militum pars sub eo quam ipse ab Regio adduxerat,[6] pars sub tri-
2 bunis erat. Rapto poculo argenteo ex oppidani domo Plemini miles fugiens sequentibus quorum erat, obvius forte Sergio et Matieno tribunis militum fuit;
3 cui cum iussu tribunorum ademptum poculum esset,

[1] potentioris JK Aldus, Froben: -ores P(1)NH.
[2] Nam P(1)N Aldus, Froben: iam *Sp*²*A*⁶*HJK*.
[3] aetate *P*²(3)N Aldus, Froben: ae P: aevo (or evo) *N*¹*HJK*.
[4] asportabant (or -bat) P(3)*CA*¹*N*¹? Aldus: -averant *Sp*²*HJK Froben* 2.
[5] extulerant (or -rat) P(3)*NCM*²*A*¹*N*¹?HJK Aldus: extulerunt Sp. Froben 2.
[6] adduxerat *CA*²*NK Aldus, Froben*: ab- P(3)SpHJ.

villainy and greed that they seemed to be competing B.C. 205 not in arms but in vices. Of all the things that make the power of the stronger odious to the helpless man not one was overlooked by commander and soldiers in dealing with the townspeople. Unutterable insults were practised upon their own persons, upon wives. It goes without did not refrain from de- And not only were it also the treasure- untouched in every age except that they were said to have been despoiled by Pyrrhus, who met with a signal punishment and restored the plunder gained by his sacrilege.[2] Consequently, just as formerly the king's ships, battered and wrecked, had landed nothing intact but the goddess' sacred money which they were trying to carry away, so on this occasion also, with a different kind of disaster that same money visited insanity upon all who had shared in that desecration of the temple, and mutually turned commander against commander, soldier against soldier, with the frenzy of enemies.

IX. The chief command belonged to Pleminius. Part of the soldiers whom he had brought from Regium were under him, part under the tribunes. Having stolen a silver cup from the house of a citizen, a fleeing soldier of Pleminius was being pursued by the owners when he chanced to meet Sergius and Matienus, tribunes of the soldiers. By order of the tribunes the cup was taken away from the man.

[1] The chief divinity of Locri was Persephone, her famous temple and rich treasury being just outside the walls and to the north-west. Cf. xviii. 3.

[2] Cf. xviii. 4–6 and notes.

A.U.C. 549

iurgium inde et clamor, pugna postremo orta inter Plemini milites tribunorumque, ut suis quisque opportunus advenerat, multitudine simul ac tumultu crescente. Victi Plemini milites cum ad Pleminium, cruorem ac volnera ostentantes, non sine vociferatione atque indignatione concurrissent, probra in eum ipsum iactata in iurgiis ref sese proripuit vocatosque expediri iubet. Dum enim militumque fide.
tur, repente milites fe
omnibus locis, velut adversus hostes ad arma conclamatum esset, concurrerunt; et cum violata iam virgis corpora tribunorum vidissent, tum vero in multo inpotentiorem subito rabiem accensi, sine respectu non maiestatis modo sed etiam humanitatis, in legatum impetum lictoribus prius indignum in modum mulcatis faciunt. Tum [2] ipsum ab suis interceptum et seclusum hostiliter lacerant et prope exsanguem naso auribusque mutilatis relinquunt.

His Messanam nuntiatis Scipio post paucos dies Locros hexeri [3] advectus cum causam Plemini et tribunorum audisset, Pleminio noxa liberato relictoque in eiusdem loci praesidio, tribunis sontibus iudicatis et in vincla coniectis, ut Romam ad senatum mitte-

[1] fidem Sp²HJK Froben 2: om. P(3): auxilium (after verb) M²?N Aldus.

[2] Tum Aldus. Froben: tunc P(1)NHJK.

[3] hexeri SpJ Froben 2: hexere Madrig: hexerce P(3)N?: om. H Aldus.

---

[1] Pleminius represents Scipio and has imperium.

[2] This rare type of vessel had been used in the First Punic War for the flag-ships of Regulus and Manlius; Polybius

Thereupon angry words followed and shouting, B.C. 205
finally a battle between Pleminius' soldiers and those of the tribunes, while numbers and rioting increased in proportion as one side or the other gained a timely arrival. The soldiers of Pleminius were worsted, and when they came running to him displaying bloody wounds, not without angry shouts as they reported insults that had been heaped even upon him in an altercation, he was inflamed with anger, dashed out of his house, summoned the tribunes and ordered them to be stripped and the rods made ready. While time was being taken to strip them—for they resisted and called upon the soldiers to help them—suddenly soldiers, flushed by their recent victory, came running from every quarter, just as if there had been a call to arms against the enemy. And when they caught sight of the tribunes' backs already welted by the rods, upon that they were indeed suddenly fired to a much more uncontrollable madness, and after roughly handling the lictors in shameful fashion, without regard even for humanity, not to say for the dignity of his rank,[1] they assaulted the legatus. Then, having separated and cut him off from his men, they slashed him as if an enemy and, mutilating his nose and ears, left him almost lifeless.

These acts being reported at Messana, Scipio a few days later sailed to Locri on a hexēris.[2] Then having heard the case of Pleminius and the tribunes, he discharged Pleminius as innocent and left him in command of the same place, while the tribunes were adjudged guilty and put in chains, to be sent to the

I. xxvi. 11. It was the next grade above the quinquereme. Cf. XXVIII. xxx. 11, note.

u.c. 549

rentur, Messanam atque inde Syracusas rediit.[1] 9 Pleminius impotens irae, neglectam ab Scipione et 10 nimis leviter latam suam iniuriam ratus, nec quemquam aestimare alium eam litem posse nisi qui atrocitatem[2] eius patiendo sensisset, tribunos adtrahi ad se iussit, laceratosque omnibus quae pati corpus ullum potest suppliciis interfecit, nec satiatus 11 vivorum poena insepultos proiecit. Simili crudelitate et in Locrensium principes est usus quos ad conquerendas iniurias ad P. Scipionem profectos audivit; 12 et quae antea per lubidinem atque avaritiam foeda exempla in socios ediderat, tunc ab ira multiplicia edere, infamiae atque invidiae non sibi modo sed etiam imperatori esse.

X. Iam comitiorum adpetebat tempus cum a P. Licinio consule litterae Romam allatae, se exercitumque suum gravi morbo adflictari,[3] nec sisti potuisse, ni eadem vis mali aut gravior etiam in hostes in- 2 gruisset; itaque, quoniam ipse venire ad comitia non posset, si ita patribus videretur, se Q. Caecilium Metellum dictatorem comitiorum causa dicturum. Exer- 3 citum Q. Caecili dimitti e re publica esse; nam[4] neque usum eius ullum in praesentia esse, cum Hannibal iam in hiberna suos receperit, et tanta incesserit in ea castra vis morbi ut, nisi mature dimittantur, nemo

[1] rediit $P(1)N$ Aldus: redit HJK Froben 2.

[2] posse . . . atrocitatem A^1N^1HJK Eds.: om. $P(1)N$, one line.

[3] adflictari (or af-) A^2N^2HJK Eds.: adfectari (or af-) $P(1)N$.

[4] nam $P(1)NJK$ Eds.: bracketed by Conway.

senate at Rome; whereupon he returned to Messana B.C. 205 and thence to Syracuse. Pleminius was beside himself with rage, thinking the wrong done to him had been overlooked by Scipio and treated as too trivial; also that no one else was capable of naming a penalty for the offence except a man who had known its barbarity by suffering. Accordingly he ordered the tribunes to be brought before him, and had them mangled by every torture which any human body can endure and then put to death. Not satisfied with a penalty paid by the living either, he threw them out unburied. The like cruelty was used by him against leading men of the Locrians who, he learned, had gone to Publius Scipio to complain of the outrages. Then in anger he multiplied the shameful acts which, prompted previously by lust and greed, he had perpetrated upon the allies, and brought infamy and odium not only upon himself but also upon his general.

X. The time for the elections was already at hand when a letter from Publius Licinius, the consul, reached Rome, reporting that he and his army were suffering from a serious malady, and that they could not have held out if an equally violent or even more serious disease had not been visited upon the enemy. Accordingly, since he was unable to come in person to the elections, he would name Quintus Caecilius Metellus dictator to hold the elections, if the senators approved. It was to the interest of the state, he said, that the army of Quintus Caecilius should be discharged; for at present his army had nothing to do, since Hannibal had already withdrawn his troops into winter quarters; and so violent a malady had befallen Caecilius' camp that, unless the troops were promptly disbanded, not one man, it

u.c. 549

omnium superfuturus videatur. Ea consuli a patribus facienda ut e re publica fideque sua duceret permissa. 4 Civitatem eo tempore repens religio invaserat invento carmine in libris Sibyllinis propter crebrius 5 eo anno de caelo lapidatum inspectis, quandoque hostis alienigena terrae Italiae bellum intulisset, eum pelli Italia vincique posse, si mater Idaea a Pessinunte 6 Romam advecta foret. Id carmen ab decemviris inventum eo magis patres movit, quod et legati qui donum Delphos portaverant referebant et sacrificantibus ipsis Pythio Apollini laeta exta [1] fuisse et responsum oraculo editum maiorem multo victoriam quam cuius ex spoliis dona portarent adesse populo 7 Romano. In eiusdem spei summam conferebant P. Scipionis velut praesagientem animum de fine belli, 8 quod depoposcisset provinciam Africam. Itaque quo maturius fatis ominibus [2] oraculisque portendentis sese [3] victoriae compotes fierent, id cogitare atque agitare,[4] quae ratio transportandae Romam deae esset.

XI. Nullasdum in Asia socias civitates habebat populus Romanus; tamen memores Aesculapium

[1] laeta exta A^1 Eds.: omnia laeta exta N^sHJK Aldus, Froben: laeta $P(1)N$: omnia laeta Johnson, Conway.

[2] ominibus Rhenanus: omnibus $P(1)NSpHJK$ Aldus.

[3] portendentis sese Aldus, Froben: -denti sese $P(1)NHJK$: om. Sp, three or four lines (port- to trans-).

[4] atque agitare N^sHJK: om. $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben.

[1] Kybele (Cybele), the Phrygian Mother of the Gods; Preller, Griechische Mythologie I[4]. 643 ff.; Roscher, Lex. II. i. 1638 ff., 1666 ff.; Catullus 63; Lucretius II. 600 ff.; Dio Cass. frag. 57. 61; Strabo XII. v. 3; Appian Hann. 56; Cicero de Harusp. Resp. 27 f. Ovid's imaginative account should be compared, Fasti IV. 247–348 (see Frazer's notes). Pessinus was near the border of Galatia (towards Phrygia), ca. 80 miles south-west of Ancyra (Ankara). Cf. xi. 7, note.

seemed, would survive. The consul was permitted B.C. 205 by the senate to do whatever he thought consistent with the public interest and his own conscience.

At that time religious scruples had suddenly assailed the citizens because in the Sibylline books, which were consulted on account of the frequent showers of stones that year, an oracle was found that, if ever a foreign foe should invade the land of Italy, he could be driven out of Italy and defeated if the Idaean Mother [1] should be brought from Pessinus to Rome. The discovery of that oracle by the decemvirs impressed the senators all the more because the ambassadors also who had carried a gift to Delphi reported that, when they offered sacrifices themselves to Pythian Apollo, the omens had been favourable, and that likewise from the sanctum there had come a response that a much greater victory was in prospect for the Roman people than that from spoils of which they were bringing gifts. To the facts supporting that same hope the senators added Publius Scipio's state of mind, virtually forecasting the end of the war, in that he demanded Africa as his province. And so, that they might the sooner be in possession of the victory which foreshadowed itself in oracles, forecasts [2] and responses, they planned and discussed what should be the method of transporting the goddess to Rome.

XI. In Asia the Roman people had as yet no allied states. They bore in mind, however, that Aesculapius [3] also had been summoned once upon a

[2] Referring mainly to Scipio's confident anticipation, while "oracles" covers the Sibylline prophecy and "responses" that from Delphi (Gronovius).

[3] Cf. X. xlvii. 7; Periocha 11; Strabo l.c. (cf. n. 1).

U.C. 549

quoque ex Graecia quondam hauddum ullo foedere 2 sociata valetudinis populi causa arcessitum, tunc iam cum Attalo rege propter commune adversus Philippum bellum coeptam amicitiam esse, facturum
3 eum quae posset populi Romani causa, legatos ad eum decernunt M. Valerium Laevinum, qui bis consul fuerat ac res in Graecia gesserat, M. Caecilium Metellum praetorium, Ser. Sulpicium [1] Galbam aedilicium, duos quaestorios, Cn. Tremelium Flaccum 4 et M. Valerium Faltonem. Iis quinque naves quinqueremes, ut ex dignitate populi Romani adirent eas terras ad quas concilianda maiestas 5 nomini Romano esset decernunt. Legati Asiam petentes protinus Delphos cum escendissent, oraculum adierunt consulentes ad quod negotium domo missi essent, perficiendi eius quam sibi spem popu-6 loque Romano portenderet. Responsum esse ferunt per Attalum regem compotes eius fore quod peterent; cum Romam deam devexissent, tum curarent ut
eam qui vir optimus Romae esset hospitio exciperet.[2] 7 Pergamum ad regem venerunt. Is legatos comiter acceptos Pessinuntem in Phrygiam deduxit sacrumque

[1] Metellum . . . Sulpicium N¹HJK: om. P(1)N, two lines.
[2] exciperet P(3)N: ac- JK Aldus, Froben: re- B.

---

[1] Cf. XXX. xxiii. 5. One list of the consuls gives Laevinus a first consulship in 220 B.C.; Chronogr. an. 354 in C.I.L. I. p. 524. He may have been a suffectus in 208 B.C. (end of the year, both consuls being dead; XXVII. xxxiii. 7). In Livy a new man when elected in 211 B.C.; XXVI. xxii. 12.

[2] See XXVIII. xxx. 11 and note. Whatever may have been the arrangement of the oars on a quinquereme, it is clear that these larger vessels were meant to impress all who saw them with the dignitas of the Roman state.

time from Greece on account of an epidemic, while B.C. 205
there was as yet no treaty of alliance; that at present on account of a joint war against Philip they had already entered into friendly relations with King Attalus. Thinking that he would do what he could for the sake of the Roman people, they decided to send ambassadors to him. These were Marcus Valerius Laevinus, who had been twice consul [1] and had held a command in Greece, Marcus Caecilius Metellus, an ex-praetor, Servius Sulpicius Galba, an ex-aedile, and two former quaestors, Gnaeus Tremelius Flaccus and Marcus Valerius Falto. For them they voted five quinqueremes,[2] that in keeping with the dignity of the Roman people they might visit lands where the highest respect for the Roman name was to be won. The ambassadors on the voyage to Asia made their way up to Delphi and consulted the oracle, enquiring what hope of accomplishing the task for which they had been sent from home it foresaw for themselves and the Roman people. The response, they say, was that they should gain what they sought with the help of King Attalus; that after conveying the goddess to Rome they were then to make sure that the best man at Rome should hospitably welcome her. They came to the king at Pergamum. He courteously received the ambassadors and, escorting them to Pessĭnus in Phrygia,[3] presented them with the sacred stone [4]

[3] The region was still held by the Gallic invaders, but the temple was favoured and adorned by the kings at Pergamum. That Attalus and the legati actually went to Pessĭnus, about 240 miles from his capital, is very unlikely.

[4] Probably a meteorite, small enough to be used later as the face of her statue; Arnobius VII. 49; cf. VI. 11; Herodian I. 11, 1; Appian Hann. 56. Cp. p. 261, n. 2.

A.U.C. 549

iis lapidem quam matrem deum esse incolae dicebant
8 tradidit ac deportare Romam iussit. Praemissus [1] ab legatis M. Valerius Falto nuntiavit deam adportari; quaerendum virum optimum in civitate esse qui eam rite hospitio acciperet.

9 Q. Caecilius Metellus dictator ab consule in Bruttiis comitiorum causa dictus exercitusque eius dimissus, magister equitum L. Veturius Philo.
10 Comitia per dictatorem habita.[2] Consules facti M. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Sempronius Tuditanus 11 absens, cum provinciam Graeciam haberet. Praetores inde creati Ti. Claudius Nero, M. Marcius Ralla, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Pomponius Matho. Comitiis perfectis [3] dictator sese magistratu abdicavit.

12 Ludi Romani ter, plebei septiens instaurati. Curules erant aediles Cn. et L. Cornelii Lentuli; Lucius Hispaniam provinciam habebat; absens creatus 13 absens eum honorem gessit. Ti. Claudius Asellus et M. Iunius Pennus plebei aediles fuerunt. Aedem Virtutis eo anno ad portam Capenam M. Marcellus dedicavit septumo decumo anno postquam a patre eius primo consulatu vota in Gallia ad Clastidium 14 fuerat. Et flamen Martialis eo anno est mortuus M. Aemilius Regillus.

XII. Neglectae eo biennio res in Graecia erant. Itaque Philippus Aetolos desertos ab Romanis,[4] cui

[1] Praemissus P(3)C[4]JK(-sis CH): remissus Sp? Rhenanus.
[2] habita here HJK Aldus, Froben: before per P(1)N.
[3] perfectis HJK Froben 2: peractis P(1)N Aldus, Conway.
[4] Romanis Sp?A[4]HJK Froben 2: romano P(1)N Aldus.

[1] Cf. Vol. VI. p. 494, note; VII. p. 312 f., notes; Platner-Ashby, Topogr. Dict. 258 f. For the younger Marcellus cf. p. 288, n. 1.

[2] No abandonment has been previously mentioned, but neglect for many months would have the same effect.

which the inhabitants said was the Mother of the Gods, and bade them carry it away to Rome. Sent on in advance by the ambassadors, Marcus Valerius Falto brought the news that they were bringing the goddess; they must seek out the best man in the state to receive her with due hospitality. B.C. 205

Quintus Caecilius Metellus was named, by the consul who was in the land of the Bruttians, dictator for the purpose of holding the elections, and Metellus' army was disbanded. Lucius Veturius Philo was named master of the horse. The elections were held by the dictator. Marcus Cornelius Cethegus and Publius Sempronius Tuditanus were elected consuls, the latter in his absence, since he had Greece as his province. Then Tiberius Claudius Nero, Marcus Marcius Ralla, Lucius Scribonius Libo, Marcus Pomponius Matho were elected praetors. The elections being completed, the dictator abdicated his office.

The Roman Games were repeated for three of the days, the Plebeian Games for seven. The curule aediles were Gnaeus and Lucius Cornelius Lentulus. Lucius was in charge of the province of Spain; being elected in absence he was aedile in absence. Tiberius Claudius Asellus and Marcus Iunius Pennus were plebeian aediles. The Temple of Valour [1] at the Porta Capena was dedicated that year by Marcus Marcellus, in the seventeenth year after it had been vowed at Clastidium in Gaul by his father in his first consulship. And the flamen of Mars, Marcus Aemilius Regillus, died that year.

XII. In Greece the situation had been ignored in the last two years. Consequently when the Aetolians were abandoned by the Romans,[2] the one defence in

A.U.C. 549

uni fidebant auxilio, quibus voluit condicionibus ad 2 petendam et paciscendam subegit pacem. Quod nisi omni vi perficere maturasset, bellantem eum cum Aetolis P. Sempronius proconsul, successor imperii missus Sulpicio cum decem milibus peditum et mille equitibus [1] et triginta quinque rostratis navibus, haud parvum momentum ad opem ferendam sociis, oppres-
3 sisset. Vixdum pace facta nuntius regi venit Romanos Dyrrachium venisse, Parthinosque et propinquas gentes alias motas esse ad spem novandi res, Dimal-4 lumque oppugnari. Eo se averterant Romani ab Aetolorum quo missi erant [2] auxilio, irati quod sine auctoritate sua adversus foedus cum rege pacem 5 fecissent. Ea cum audisset Philippus, ne qui motus maior in finitimis gentibus populisque oreretur, magnis itineribus [3] Apolloniam contendit, quo Sempronius se receperat, misso Laetorio legato cum parte copiarum et quindecim navibus in Aetoliam ad visendas res pacemque, si posset, turbandam.
6 Philippus agros Apolloniatium vastavit et ad urbem admotis copiis potestatem pugnae Romano fecit; 7 quem postquam quietum muros tantummodo tueri vidit, nec satis fidens viribus ut urbem oppugnaret,

[1] decem . . . equitibus A^1N^1HJK: reduced by om. to dem militibus in P: little improved in $P^2(1)N$.

[2] Eo se averterant . . . erant A^1N^1HJK Aldus, Froben: eos verterant $P(1)N$, two lines om.

[3] populisque . . . itineribus A^1N^1HJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(3)$, another om. of two lines.

[1] He had been censor (XXVII. xi. 7), and already proconsul in Greece before his consulship; cf. XXVIII. xxxviii. 1, note.

[2] On the Adriatic, location uncertain, but near the Parthini and Dyrrhachium (Durazzo). Cf. XXXIII. xxxiv. 11; XLIII. xxi. 3; Polybius II. xi. 11; III. xviii. 1, 3; VII. ix. 13 (text of a treaty between Hannibal and Philip).

which they trusted, Philip compelled them to sue B.C. 205 for peace and make a treaty on terms of his own choosing. Had he not used every effort to bring that about promptly, he would have been surprised while still making war upon the Aetolians by Publius Sempronius,[1] the proconsul, who with ten thousand infantry and a thousand cavalry and thirty-five warships had been sent as Sulpicius' successor in command and was no small factor in bringing aid to the allies. Scarcely had peace been made when word came to the king that the Romans had arrived at Dyrrachium, and that the Parthini and other neighbouring tribes were aroused to the hope of revolution and that Dimallum [2] was besieged. To that place the Romans had turned aside from helping the Aetolians, to whom they had been sent. They were angry because without Roman consent and contrary to the treaty [3] the Aetolians had made peace with the king. On hearing of this Philip, fearing some greater disturbance might begin among neighbouring tribes and peoples, hastened by forced marches to Apollonia,[4] to which Sempronius had withdrawn after sending Laetorius, his lieutenant, with a part of his troops and fifteen ships into Aetolia to survey the situation and, if possible, to disturb the peace. Philip laid waste the farms of the Apollonians and, moving his troops up to the city, gave the Roman an opportunity to engage. As soon as he saw that they remained inactive, merely defending the walls, Philip, who had not sufficient confidence in his forces to assault the city and was desirous of peace

[3] Cf. XXVI. xxiv. 8–14.
[4] Cf. Vol. VI. p. 303, n. 3; 305, 307; VII. p. 95 fin.

A.U.C. 549

et cum [1] Romanis quoque, sicut cum Aetolis, cupiens pacem, si posset, si minus, indutias facere, nihil ultra inritatis novo certamine odiis in regnum se recepit.

8 Per idem tempus taedio diutini belli Epirotae temptata prius Romanorum voluntate legatos de 9 pace communi ad Philippum misere, satis confidere conventuram eam adfirmantes, si ad conloquium cum 10 P. Sempronio imperatore Romano venisset. Facile impetratum—neque enim ne ipsius quidem regis ab-11 horrebat animus—ut in Epirum transiret. Phoenice urbs est Epiri; ibi prius conlocutus rex cum Aëropo et Derda et Philippo, Epirotarum praetoribus, postea
12 cum P. Sempronio congreditur. Adfuit conloquio Amynander Athamanum rex et magistratus alii Epirotarum et Acarnanum. Primus Philippus praetor verba fecit et petit simul ab rege et ab imperatore Romano ut finem belli facerent darentque eam 13 Epirotis veniam. P. Sempronius condiciones pacis dixit, ut Parthini et Dimallum et Bargullum et Eugenium Romanorum essent, Atintania, si missis Romam legatis ab senatu impetrasset, ut Macedoniae 14 accederet.[2] In has [3] condiciones cum pax con-

[1] et cum Sp²A¹HJK Froben 2: cum P(1)N Aldus.

[2] Macedoniae accederet Alschefski: -niae (or -nie) cederet P(1)N: -nia cederet A¹N¹ (altern.)H(-tur)JK Aldus: -ni accederent Froben 2 (-ret Gronovius).

[3] has HJK: eas P(1)N Eds.

---

[1] In Chaonia (northern Epirus), a few miles from the port of Onchesmos, opposite Corcyra (Corfu); Polybius II. v. 3; Strabo VII. vii. 5.

[2] The Athamanes (in eastern Epirus, close to the Pindus range; Strabo IX. v. 1) had a king, the neighbouring tribes only στρατηγοί. A peacemaker in 208 B.C. (XXVII. xxx. 4), Amynander allowed Philip to pass through his territory, and with the Romans also, if possible, just as with the Aetolians, but if not, of making an armistice, retired to his own kingdom without provoking any further animosities by a fresh conflict. B.C. 205

About the same time the Epirotes, weary of the protracted war, first sounding the disposition of the Romans, sent ambassadors to Philip in regard to a general peace, asserting their confidence that it would be agreed upon if he should come to a conference with Publius Sempronius, the Roman general. The king was easily prevailed upon to cross over into Epirus, for he himself was not disinclined to peace. Phoenice[1] is a city in Epirus; there the king first conferred with Aëropus and Derdas and Philip, chief magistrates of the Epirotes, and later met Publius Sempronius. Present at the conference were Amynander,[2] King of the Athamanians, and in addition magistrates of the Epirotes and Acarnanians. The first to speak was Philip, the magistrate, begging the king and at the same time the Roman general to make an end of the war and grant that favour to the Epirotes. Publius Sempronius stated as terms of the peace that the Parthini and Dimallum and Bargullum[3] and Eugenium[3] should fall to the Romans; that Atintania[4] should be annexed to Macedonia, if the king, sending ambassadors to Rome, should obtain the senate's consent. Peace being agreed upon on these terms, thus the Aetolians were obliged to make a separate peace with Macedonia (§ 1).

[3] Small places, unknown; probably near Dimallum.

[4] In north-western Epirus, in the upper valley of the Aōus river; XXVII. xxx. 13. Allied with Rome in the Illyrian War of 219 B.C., but now subject to Philip.

A.U.C. 549 veniret, ab rege foederi adscripti Prusia Bithyniae rex, Achaei, Boeoti, Thessali, Acarnanes, Epirotae, ab Romanis Ilienses, Attalus rex, Pleuratus, Nabis Lacedaemoniorum tyrannus, Elei, Messenii, Athenienses. Haec conscripta consignataque sunt, et in duos menses indutiae factae, donec Romam mitterentur legati, ut populus in has condiciones pacem iuberet: iusseruntque omnes tribus, quia verso in Africam bello omnibus aliis in praesentia levari bellis volebant. P. Sempronius pace facta ad consulatum Romam decessit.

A.U.C. 550 XIII. M. Cornelio P. Sempronio consulibus—quintus decimus is annus belli Punici erat—provinciae Cornelio Etruria cum vetere exercitu, Sempronio Bruttii, ut novas scriberet legiones, decretae. Praetoribus M. Marcio urbana, L. Scribonio Liboni peregrina et eidem Gallia, M. Pomponio Mathoni Sicilia, Ti. Claudio Neroni Sardinia evenit. P.[1] Scipioni cum eo exercitu, cum ea classe quam habebat, prorogatum in annum imperium est; item P. Licinio, ut Bruttios duabus legionibus obtineret, quoad eum in provincia cum imperio morari consuli e re publica visum esset. Et M. Livio et Sp. Lucretio

[1] P. P(1)A²N: proconsuli SpHJK.

---

[1] As progenitors of the Romans. Cf. their statement when Lucius Scipio visited Ilium in 190 B.C.: XXXVII. xxxvii. 1 ff.; cf. XXXVIII. xxxix. 10; Herodian I. 11. 3. Early evidence for the Aeneas legend.

[2] A king of the Thracians; XXVI. xxiv. 9; XXVII. xxx. 13; XXVIII. v. 7.

[3] From 207 to 192 B.C. Successor of Machanidas, who fell in battle three years before this; Polybius XI. xviii. Fre-

Prusias, King of Bithynia, the Achaeans, Boeotians, B.C. 205
Thessalians, Acarnanians and Epirotes were included on the king's side of the treaty; on the side of the Romans, the Ilians,[1] King Attalus, Pleuratus,[2] Nabis, tyrant of the Lacedaemonians,[3] also the Eleans, Messenians and Athenians. These provisions were reduced to writing and sealed, and an armistice was made for two months, that meanwhile ambassadors might be sent to Rome, so that the people might order peace to be made on these terms. And all the tribes so ordered, since, now that the war had shifted to Africa, they wished for the present to be relieved of all other wars. Publius Sempronius, after the peace had been made, left his province for Rome to enter upon his consulship.

XIII. In the consulship of Marcus Cornelius and B.C. 204
Publius Sempronius, this being the fifteenth year of the Punic war, the province of Etruria was assigned by decree to Cornelius with the old army, the land of the Bruttii to Sempronius, with orders to enrol new legions. As for the praetors, the city jurisdiction fell to Marcus Marcius, that over strangers and also the province of Gaul to Lucius Scribonius Libo, Sicily to Marcus Pomponius Matho, Sardinia to Tiberius Claudius Nero. Publius Scipio's command was continued for one year with the army and the fleet which he then had. The same was done in the case of Publius Licinius, who was to hold the Bruttian territory with two legions so long as the consul should judge it to the public interest for him to remain in the province with a high command. Marcus Livius also and Spurius Lucretius had their comquently mentioned by Livy in subsequent books; his death XXXV. xxxv. 19.

A.U.C. 550

cum binis legionibus quibus adversus Magonem Galliae praesidio fuissent prorogatum imperium est, 5 et Cn. Octavio, ut cum Sardiniam legionemque Ti. Claudio tradidisset, ipse navibus longis quadraginta maritimam oram, quibus finibus senatus censuisset, 6 tutaretur. M. Pomponio praetori in Sicilia Cannensis exercitus, duae legiones decretae; T. Quinctius Tarentum, C. Hostilius Tubulus Capuam pro praetoribus, sicut priore anno, cum vetere uterque 7 praesidio obtinerent. De Hispaniae imperio, quos in eam provinciam duos pro consulibus mitti placeret latum ad populum est. Omnes tribus eosdem L. Cornelium Lentulum et L. Manlium Acidinum pro consulibus, sicut priore anno tenuissent, obtinere eas 8 provincias iusserunt. Consules dilectum habere instituerunt et ad novas scribendas in Bruttios legiones et in ceterorum—ita enim iussi ab senatu erant—exercituum supplementum.

XIV. Quamquam nondum aperte Africa provincia decreta erat, occultantibus id, credo, patribus, ne praesciscerent Carthaginienses, tamen in eam spem erecta civitas erat in Africa eo anno bellatum iri 2 finemque bello Punico adesse. Impleverat ea res

---

[1] Frequently mentioned in these books; cf. esp. XXV. v. 10 and the speech following; XXIII. xxxi. 2, 4; XXIV. xviii. 9; XXVI. ii. 14; XXVII. ix. 4; XXVIII. x. 13; below, xxiv. 11 f.

[2] Better known as Flamininus (his cognomen). Elected consul for 198 B.C., though he had not been aedile and in spite of his youth. Cf. XXXI. xlix. 12; XXXII. vii. 8–12. His province as consul was Macedonia (ibid. viii. 4). In the next year he vanquished Philip at Cynoscephalae, near Scotussa; XXXIII. vii–x. Cf. Polybius XVIII. xxii ff.; Plutarch's Flamininus 7 f.

mands continued, with two legions each to defend Gaul against Mago. So Gnaeus Octavius also, with the order that, after turning over Sardinia and the legion to Tiberius Claudius, his duty should be the defence of the sea-coast with forty war-ships within an area to be defined by the senate. To Marcus Pomponius, the praetor in Sicily, was assigned the army [1] from Cannae, two legions. Titus Quinctius [2] was to have Tarentum, Gaius Hostilius Tubulus to have Capua, both as propraetors, as in the preceding year, with the old garrison in each case. As for the command in Spain, the question what two men it wished to send to that province as proconsuls was brought before the people. The tribes unanimously ordered that the same men, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus and Lucius Manlius Acidinus should hold these provinces [3] as proconsuls, as they had done in the preceding year. The consuls began the conduct of a levy both for the enrolment of new legions for the Bruttian territory and to fill the ranks of the other armies; for so they had been ordered by the senate. B.C. 204

XIV. Although Africa had not been openly assigned as a province, while the senators kept the matter dark, I believe, for fear the Carthaginians might know in advance, nevertheless the people were aroused to hope that the war would be waged that year in Africa, and that the end of the Punic war was at hand. That situation had filled men's [3] Formal organization as Hispania Citerior and Hispania Ulterior did not come until seven years later, 197 B.C., with the dividing line at the Saltus Castulonensis (Sierra Morena); XXXII. xxviii. 11; XXXIII. xxi. 6 f.; xxv. 9; XXXIV. xvii. 1.

a.u.c. 550

superstitionum [1] animos, pronique et ad nuntianda et 3 ad credenda prodigia erant. Eo plura volgabantur:
duos soles visos, et nocte interluxisse, et facem
Setiae ab ortu solis ad [2] occidentem porrigi visam; Tarracinae portam, Anagniae et portam et multis locis murum de caelo tactum; in aede Iunonis Sospitae Lanuvi cum horrendo fragore strepitum editum.
4 Eorum procurandorum causa diem unum supplicatio fuit, et novendiale sacrum, quod de caelo lapidatum
5 esset, factum. Eo accessit consultatio de matre Idaea accipienda, quam, praeterquam quod M.
Valerius, unus ex legatis, praegressus [3] actutum in Italia fore nuntiaverat, recens nuntius aderat 6 Tarracinae iam esse. Haud parvae rei iudicium senatum tenebat qui vir optimus in civitate esset; 7 veram certe victoriam eius rei sibi quisque mallet quam ulla imperia honoresve suffragio seu patrum seu 8 plebis delatos. P. Scipionem Cn. filium eius qui in Hispania ceciderat, adulescentem nondum quaes-torium, iudicaverunt in tota civitate virum bonorum [4] 9 optimum esse. Id quibus virtutibus inducti ita iudi-

[1] superstitionum $P(3)P^1N$: -nem RN^2J: -ne A^2K Aldus, Froben.

[2] ad $P(1)N$ Aldus: in Sp²HJK Froben 2.

[3] praegressus $P(1)N$ Aldus: re- Sp²HJK Froben 2.

[4] bonorum Gronovius, Eds. (cf. C.I.L. I. ii. 9): bonum $P(1)N$ (genitive?) Alschefski: om. N^2HJK Luterbacher.

[1] Again an aurora probably, as rare in Italy; cf. XXVIII. xi. 3, Fregellae; XXXII. xxix. 2, Frusino, 197 B.C. An earlier instance, 223 B.C. at Ariminum, Zonaras VIII. xx. 4; more in Iulius Obsequens, e.g. 44 and 70 (102 and 42 B.C.), from lost books of Livy. Cf. Cicero de Div. I. 97 (Pease).

[2] Meteors were often reported among the prodigies; XXX. ii. 11; XLI. xxi. 13; XLIII. xiii. 3; XLV. xvi. 5; Cicero de Div. (Pease) I. 18 and 97; II. 60; N.D. II. 14.

minds with superstitious fears and they were inclined both to report and to believe portents. All the greater was the number of them in circulation: that two suns had been seen, and that at night there had been light for a time;[1] and that at Setia a meteor[2] had been seen shooting from east to west; that at Tarracina a city-gate had been struck by lightning, at Anagnia a gate and also the wall at many points; that in the temple of Juno Sospita at Lanuvium a noise was heard with a dreadful crash. To expiate these there was a single day of prayer, and on account of the shower of stones nine days of rites[3] were observed. In addition they deliberated on the reception of the Idaean Mother,[4] in regard to whom not only had Marcus Valerius, one of the ambassadors, arriving in advance, reported that she would be in Italy very soon, but also there was recent news that she was already at Tarracina. It was no unimportant decision that occupied the senate—the question who was the best man in the state. At any rate every man would have preferred a real victory in that contest to any high commands or magistracies, whether conferred by vote of the senators or of the people. Publius Scipio, son of the Gnaeus who had fallen in Spain, was the young man not yet of an age to be quaestor,[5] whom they judged to be the best of good men among all the citizens. If writers who lived nearest in time to men who B.C. 204

[3] Cf. Vol. VII. p. 90, note.

[4] Cf. p. 244, n. 1; George F. Moore, Hist. of Religions I. 556 f.

[5] There was still no law fixing a minimum age—not until 24 years later. Cf. Vol. VI. p. 344, n. 3. In 191 B.C. this Scipio Nasica reached the consulship; XXXV. xxiv. 5; XXXVI. i. 1.

A.U.C. 550

carint, sicut traditum a proximis memoriae temporum illorum scriptoribus libens posteris traderem,[1] ita meas opiniones coniectando rem vetustate obrutam 10 non interponam. P. Cornelius cum omnibus matronis Ostiam obviam ire deae iussus, isque eam de nave accipere [2] et in terram elatam tradere [3] ferendam [4] 11 matronis. Postquam navis ad ostium amnis Tiberini accessit, sicut erat iussus, in salum nave evectus ab sacerdotibus deam accepit extulitque in terram.
12 Matronae primores civitatis, inter quas unius Claudiae Quintae insigne est nomen, accepere; cui dubia, ut traditur, antea fama clariorem ad posteros tam religioso ministerio pudicitiam fecit.
13 Eae per manus, succedentes deinde aliae aliis, omni obviam effusa civitate, turibulis ante ianuas positis qua praeferebatur atque accenso ture, precantibus [5]
14 ut volens propitiaque urbem Romanam iniret, in aedem Victoriae quae est in Palatio, pertulere deam pridie idus [6] Apriles; isque dies festus fuit. Populus

[1] traderem $P(3)B^2N$ Aldus: -diderim SpA^4N^4HJK Froben 2.
[2] accipere $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Eds.: -ret N^2H Froben 2, Conway.
[3] tradere $P(1)NHJK$ Aldus, Eds.: -ret x Froben 2, Conway.
[4] ferendam C^4M^7? Froben 2: referendam A^4N^4HJK Aldus: ferenda (-dam MAN) cum $P(3)N$.
[5] precantibus $P(1)NHJK$ Alschefski: precantes Ussing.
[6] idus $P(1)NHJK$ Aldus, Froben, most Eds.: nonas Pighius, Weissenborn.[3]

[1] A Phrygian man and woman, Dion. Hal. II. xix. 4 f. Romans were excluded by a decree of the senate, but the remembered those days had handed down by what B.C. 204 virtues the senate was led to make that judgment, I should indeed gladly hand it on to posterity. But I shall not interject my own opinions, reached by conjecture in a matter buried by the lapse of time. Publius Cornelius was ordered to go to Ostia with all the matrons to meet the goddess, and himself to receive her from the ship, and carrying her to land to turn her over to the matrons to carry. After the ship had reached the mouth of the river Tiber, in compliance with the order he sailed out into open water on a ship, received the goddess from her priests [1] and carried her to land. The foremost matrons in the state, among whom the name of one in particular, that of Claudia Quinta,[2] is conspicuous, received her. Claudia's repute, previously not unquestioned, as tradition reports it, has made her purity the more celebrated among posterity by a service so devout. The matrons passed the goddess from hand to hand in an unbroken succession to each other, while the entire city poured out to meet her. Censers had been placed before the doors along the route of the bearers, and kindling their incense, people prayed that gracious and benignant she might enter the city of Rome. It was to the Temple of Victory, which is on the Palatine, that they carried the goddess on the day before the Ides of April, and that was a holy day. The people thronged to the restriction was later removed (2nd century A.D.). Cf. XXXVII. ix. 9; XXXVIII. xviii. 9.

[2] Her statue was later placed in the temple of the Magna Mater dedicated in 191 B.C., the consulship of Nasica. Cf. XXXVI. xxxvi. 3 f.; Tacitus Ann. IV. 64; Val. Max. I. viii. 11. Between 204 B.C. and 191 the black stone remained in the Temple of Victory, § 14.

A.U.C. 550

frequens dona deae in Palatium tulit, lectisterniumque et ludi fuere, Megalesia appellata.

XV. Cum de supplemento legionum quae in provinciis erant ageretur, tempus esse a quibusdam senatoribus subiectum est, quae dubiis in rebus utcumque tolerata essent, ea dempto iam tandem deum benignitate metu non ultra pati. Erectis exspectatione patribus subiecerunt colonias Latinas duodecim quae Q. Fabio et Q. Fulvio consulibus abnuissent milites dare, eas annum iam ferme sextum vacationem militiae quasi honoris et beneficii causa habere, cum interim boni oboedientesque socii pro fide atque obsequio in populum Romanum continuis omnium annorum dilectibus exhausti essent. Sub hanc vocem non memoria magis patribus renovata rei prope iam oblitteratae quam ira irritata [1] est. Itaque nihil prius referre consules passi, decreverunt ut consules magistratus denosque principes Nepete, Sutrio, Ardea, Calibus, Alba, Carsiolis, Sora,[2] Suessa, Setia, Circeis, Narnia, Interamna—hae namque coloniae in ea causa erant—Romam excirent; iis imperarent, quantum quaeque earum coloniarum militum plurumum dedisset populo Romano, ex quo hostes in Italia essent, duplicatum eius summae

[1] quam ira irritata (or in-) A'N'HJK Froben 2: om. P(1)N, one line.

[2] Sora A'N'HJK Aldus, Froben (cf. XXVII. ix. 7): om. P(1)N.

---

[1] Later the festival was shifted to pridie nonas, the 4th of April in place of the 12th. Its name came from her Megalesion at Pergamum, the temple from which she was brought to Rome according to Varro L.L. VI. 15.

Palatine bearing gifts for the goddess, and there B.C. 204 was a banquet of the gods, and games also, called the Megalesia.[1]

XV. While they were discussing the men needed to recruit the legions in the provinces, certain senators suggested that, since now by favour of the gods fear had at last been removed, it was time for them no longer to tolerate what had been endured as best they could in critical circumstances. As the senate was alert and in suspense, they added that the twelve Latin colonies [2] which had refused to furnish soldiers in the consulship of Quintus Fabius and Quintus Fulvius had been exempt from service for now about five years, as though it were an honour and a favour bestowed upon them, whereas in the meantime good and obedient allies, in return for their loyalty and submission to the Roman people, had been exhausted by successive levies every year. These words revived the memory of an affair almost obliterated and correspondingly inflamed the anger of the senators. Accordingly, allowing the consuls to bring up no other question first, they decreed that the consuls should summon to Rome the magistrates [3] and ten leading citizens in each case from Nepete, Sutrium, Ardea, Cales, Alba, Carsioli, Sora, Suessa, Setia, Circeii, Narnia, Interamna, for these were the colonies concerned; that they should order them to furnish double the maximum number of infantry that each of those colonies had ever furnished to the Roman people since the enemy was [3] I.e. the two duumviri iure dicendo, two duumviri aediles, and two quaestors of each colony. The leading citizens are decuriones, members of a local senate.

[2] Cf. Vol. VII. pp. 242 f. and notes; below, § 5.

A.U.C. 550

numerum peditum daret et equites centenos vicenos;
7 si qua eum numerum equitum explere non posset, pro equite uno tres pedites liceret dare; pedites equitesque quam locupletissimi legerentur mitterenturque ubicumque extra Italiam supplemento opus
8 esset. Si qui ex iis recusarent, retineri eius coloniae magistratus legatosque placere, neque, si postularent, 9 senatum dari priusquam imperata fecissent. Stipendium praeterea iis coloniis in milia aeris asses singulos imperari exigique quotannis, censumque in iis [1] coloniis agi ex formula ab Romanis censoribus
10 data—dari autem placere eandem quam populo Romano—deferrique Romam ab iuratis censoribus coloniarum priusquam magistratu abirent.
11 Ex hoc senatus consulto accitis Romam magistratibus primoribusque earum coloniarum consules cum milites [2] stipendiumque imperassent, alii aliis magis
12 recusare ac reclamare; negare tantum militum effici posse; vix, si simplum ex formula imperetur, 13 enisuros; orare atque obsecrare ut sibi senatum adire ac deprecari liceret; nihil se quare perire merito deberent admisisse; sed si pereundum etiam foret, neque suum delictum neque iram populi Romani ut plus militum darent quam haberent posse

[1] iis PCR: his $R^2MBDANH$: om. JK.
[2] milites ANHJK: -tem $P(3)N$.

---

[1] To such a statement of property was prefixed a questionnaire to establish identity of the tax-payer. Cf. Caesar's Lex Iulia municipalis 146 f. (Bruns, Fontes[7] p. 109 f.).
[2] Complied with in xxxvii. 7.
[3] A quite different sense of the term formula from that in § 9. Explained in Vol. VII. p. 245, note.

in Italy, and also one hundred and twenty horsemen in each case. If any colony should be unable to make up that number of horsemen, it should be permitted to give three foot-soldiers for one horseman. Men having the largest means should be chosen for infantry and cavalry and sent to any place outside of Italy where supplements were needed. If any delegation should refuse, it was decided that the magistrates and envoys of that colony should be detained, and that if they asked for a hearing in the senate, it should be refused until they had done what was required of them. It was further ordered that a tax of one as for each thousand be laid upon those colonies and exacted every year, and that a census be taken in those colonies on the basis of a census-list [1] furnished by the Roman censors. They resolved also that it be the same which was given to the Roman people—and that it be sworn to by the censors of the colonies and brought to Rome before they laid down their office.[2] B.C. 204

In accordance with this decree of the senate the consuls summoned the magistrates and leading citizens of those colonies to Rome and required of them soldiers and the tax. Thereupon they outdid each other in refusing and loudly protesting. They said that such a number of soldiers could not be made up; that even if the normal number were required according to the original compact,[3] they could hardly reach it. They begged and implored that they be permitted to go before the senate and make their plea. No such offence, they said, had been committed that they deserved to perish. But even if perish they must, neither their crime nor the anger of the Roman people could enable them to

A.U.C. 550

14 efficere. Consules obstinati legatos manere Romae iubent, magistratus ire domos [1] ad dilectus habendos: nisi summa militum quae imperata esset Romam 15 adducta, neminem iis senatum daturum. Ita praecisa spe senatum adeundi deprecandique dilectus in iis duodecim coloniis, per longam vacationem numero iuniorum aucto, haud difficulter est perfectus.

XVI. Altera item res prope aeque longo neglecta silentio relata a M. Valerio Laevino est, qui privatis conlatas pecunias se ac M. Claudio consulibus reddi
2 tandem aequum esse dixit; nec mirari quemquam debere in publica obligata fide suam praecipuam curam esse; nam praeterquam quod aliquid proprie ad consulem eius anni quo conlatae pecuniae essent pertineret, etiam se auctorem ita conferendi fuisse inopi
3 aerario nec plebe ad tributum sufficiente. Grata ea patribus admonitio fuit; iussisque referre consulibus decreverunt ut tribus pensionibus ea pecunia solveretur; primam praesentem ii qui tum essent, duas tertii et quinti consules numerarent.

4 Omnes deinde alias curas una occupavit, postquam Locrensium clades, quae ignoratae [2] ad eam

[1] domos A[a]HJK Aldus, Froben : -mum P(1)N.
[2] ignoratae (or -te) P(3) Eds. : ignotae (or -te) ANHK Aldus, Froben : ingnote J.

---

[1] Cf. XXVI. xxxvi, including Laevinus' speech on that occasion and the generous response (§§ 11 f.). It was in 210 B.C., a year before the refusal of the colonies named in xv. 5.
[2] Cf. XXVI. xxxv. 4 ff., 9.
[3] I.e. biennial payments. See Vol. IX. p. 40, note (200 B.C.). Final settlement, however, was not made until 196 B.C.; XXXIII. xlii. 3.
[4] Cf. ix, esp. §§ 11 f.

furnish more soldiers than they had. The consuls, B.C. 204 disinclined to yield, ordered the envoys to remain at Rome, the magistrates to go to their homes in order to conduct levies, adding that unless the number of soldiers demanded of them was first brought to Rome, no one would give them a hearing in the senate. Thus, after their hopes of appearing before the senate and of making their plea had been shattered, a levy was carried out in those twelve colonies without difficulty, since owing to long exemption the number of younger men had increased.

XVI. In like manner another matter which had been passed over in silence for about the same length of time was broached by Marcus Valerius Laevinus, who said it was proper that the sums contributed [1] when he and Marcus Claudius were consuls should at last be repaid to private citizens; and that no one ought to be astonished that a matter in which the credit of the state was involved should especially concern himself. For in addition to the responsibility that in a way belonged peculiarly to a consul of the year in which the moneys had been contributed, he had also been the first to suggest such contribution, since the treasury was empty and the common people unable to pay a tax.[2] This reminder was welcomed by the senators, and bidding the consuls to introduce the measure, they decreed that the money should be paid in three instalments; that the consuls who were then in office should pay the first in ready money, that the consuls of the third and fifth years should pay two instalments.[3]

Thereafter all other concerns yielded place to a single one, when the atrocities suffered by the Locrians [4] but up to that time unknown were spread u.c. 550 diem fuerant, legatorum adventu volgatae sunt. 5 Nec tam Plemini scelus quam Scipionis in eo aut ambitio aut neglegentia iras hominum inritavit. 6 Decem legati Locrensium, obsiti squalore et sordibus, in comitio sedentibus consulibus velamenta supplicum, ramos oleae, ut Graecis mos est, porgentes [1] ante tribunal cum flebili vociferatione humi pro- 7 cubuerunt. Quaerentibus consulibus Locrenses se dixerunt esse, ea passos a Q. Pleminio legato Romanisque militibus quae pati ne Carthaginienses quidem velit populus Romanus; orare [2] uti sibi patres adeundi deplorandique aerumnas suas potestatem facerent.

XVII. Senatu dato maximus natu ex iis: "Scio, quanti aestimentur nostrae apud vos querellae, patres conscripti, plurimum in eo momenti esse si probe sciatis et quo modo proditi Locri Hannibali sint et quo modo pulso Hannibalis praesidio restituti in di- 2 cionem vestram; quippe si et culpa defectionis procul a publico consilio absit, et reditum in vestram dicionem appareat non voluntate solum, sed ope etiam ac virtute nostra, magis indignemini bonis ac fidelibus sociis tam indignas [3] iniurias ab legato vestro militi- 3 busque fieri. Sed ego causam utriusque defectionis nostrae in aliud tempus differendam arbitror esse 4 duarum rerum gratia; unius ut coram P. Scipione, qui Locros recepit et [4] omnium nobis recte perperamque

[1] porgentes $P(3)$: porrigentes BD(pori-)$ANJK$.
[2] orare N^2HJK Froben 2: rogare $P(3)R^1N$ Aldus.
[3] tam indignas $P(1)N$: tam atroces $Sp?A^a$(altern.)N^a(altern.)HJK: tam indignas tam atroces Johnson, Conway.
[4] et Alschefski: om. $P(1)NSpH$: quique A^aJK Aldus, Froben.

abroad by the arrival of their envoys. And it was B.C. 204 not so much the crime of Pleminius that provoked men to anger as Scipio's partiality for him or else indifference. The ten envoys of the Locrians, in soiled and neglected clothing and holding out the woollen bands of suppliants and olive branches, as is the custom of the Greeks, towards the consuls seated in the Comitium, fell to the ground before the tribunal as they raised a mournful plaint. In answer to the consuls' question they said that they were Locrians who had suffered from Quintus Pleminius, the legatus, and the Roman soldiers such things as the Roman people would not wish even the Carthaginians to suffer; that they begged the consuls to give them permission to go before the senate and complain of their sufferings.

XVII. A hearing in the senate being granted, the eldest of them said: "I know, conscript fathers, that in determining what weight is to be given to our complaints in your presence very much depends upon your being well informed both as to how Locri was betrayed to Hannibal, and how by driving out Hannibal's garrison it was restored to your authority. For if it prove that no guilt for the revolt attaches to our council of state, and if it be at the same time evident that we returned to your authority not by our consent only but also by our effort and our courage, you will be all the more indignant that good and faithful allies are receiving such outrageous treatment from your legatus and his soldiers. But in my opinion enquiry into our revolts should be put off in both cases to another time for two reasons. The first is in order that the hearing may be in the presence of Publius Scipio, who recovered Locri and factorum est testis, agatur;[1] alterius quod, qualescumque sumus, tamen haec quae passi sumus[2] pati non debuimus. Non possumus dissimulare, patres conscripti, nos, cum praesidium Punicum in arce nostra haberemus, multa foeda et indigna et a praefecto praesidii Hamilcare et ab Numidis Afrisque passos esse; sed quid illa sunt, conlata cum iis quae hodie patimur? Cum bona venia, quaeso, audiatis, patres conscripti, id quod invitus eloquar.[3] In discrimine est nunc humanum omne genus, utrum vos an Carthaginienses principes orbis[4] terrarum videat. Si ex iis quae Locrenses aut ab illis passi sumus aut a vestro praesidio nunc cum maxime patimur aestimandum Romanum ac Punicum imperium sit, nemo non illos sibi quam vos dominos praeoptet. Et tamen videte quem ad modum in vos Locrenses animati sint. Cum a Carthaginiensibus iniurias tanto[5] minores acciperemus, ad vestrum imperatorem confugimus; cum a vestro praesidio plus quam hostilia patiamur, nusquam alio quam ad vos querellas detulimus. Aut vos respicietis perditas res nostras, patres conscripti, aut ne ab diis quidem immortalibus quod precemur quicquam superest.

u.c. 550

Q. Pleminius legatus missus est cum praesidio ad recipiendos a Carthaginiensibus Locros et cum eodem ibi relictus est praesidio. In hoc legato vestro— dant enim animum ad loquendum libere ultimae

[1] est testis, agatur A^1N^1(altern.)HJK Aldus, Froben: est testigatur $P(1)N$: teste agatur Rhenanus (om. et above).

[2] tamen haec quae passi sumus A^1N^1(marg.)HJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.

[3] eloquar N^1HJK Aldus, Froben, Conway: dicam $P(1)N$ Eds.

[4] orbis A^1N^1HJK: om. $P(1)N$.

is our witness for every act, the good and the bad. B.C. 204
The second reason is because, whatever our character is, we nevertheless did not deserve to suffer these things that we have suffered. We cannot conceal the truth, conscript fathers, that when we had a Punic garrison in our citadel we suffered many shameful outrages both at the hands of Hamilcar, commandant of the garrison, and from the Numidians and Africans. But what are they in comparison with the things we are suffering today? With kind indulgence, conscript fathers, give ear, I pray, to what I shall reluctantly say. The entire human race is now in suspense as to whether it is to see you, or the Carthaginians, lords of the whole world. If one must judge Roman and Carthaginian rule from what we Locrians either have suffered from them, or are at this very moment suffering from your garrison, no one would fail to prefer them rather than you as his masters. And yet observe how the Locrians are disposed towards you. Although from the Carthaginians we were suffering wrongs so much less serious, we sought refuge with your general. Although from your garrison we are suffering acts worse than those of an enemy, we have brought our complaints nowhere else than to you. Either you will have regard for our ruin, conscript fathers, or else no help remains for us to pray for even from the immortal gods.

"Quintus Pleminius was sent as legatus with a military force to recover Locri from the Carthaginians, and with that same force he was left there. In this legatus of yours—for the depths of misery

[5] tanto B^2A^3HJK : manto $P(1)(C?)N$: multo $C^4M^7N^2$: tam multo A^v.

u.c. 550

miseriae—nec hominis quicquam est, patres conscripti, praeter figuram et speciem neque Romani civis praeter habitum vestitumque[1] et sonum
12 Latinae linguae: pestis ac belua inmanis, quales fretum quondam quo ab Sicilia dividimur ad perniciem 13 navigantium circumsedisse fabulae ferunt. Ac si scelus libidinemque et avaritiam solus ipse exercere in socios vestros satis haberet, unam profundam quidem voraginem tamen patientia nostra explere-
14 mus; nunc omnes centuriones militesque vestros—adeo in promiscuo licentiam atque improbitatem esse
15 voluit—Pleminios fecit; omnes rapiunt, spoliant, verberant, volnerant, occidunt; constuprant matronas, virgines, ingenuos raptos ex conplexu parentium.
16 Cotidie capitur urbs nostra, cotidie diripitur; dies noctesque omnia passim mulierum puerorumque qui rapiuntur atque asportantur ploratibus sonant.
17 Miretur qui sciat,[2] quo modo aut nos ad patiendum sufficiamus, aut illos qui faciunt nondum tantarum iniuriarum satietas ceperit. Neque ego exsequi possum nec vobis operae est audire singula[3] quae
18 passi sumus; communiter omnia amplectar. Nego domum ullam Locris, nego quemquam hominem expertem iniuriae esse; nego ullum genus sceleris, lubidinis, avaritiae superesse quod in ullo qui pati 19 potuerit praetermissum sit. Vix ratio iniri potest

[1] vestitumque P(1)(vestitum habitumque D)N Aldus: om. SpHJK Froben 2.

[2] sciat P(1)N Aldus, Froben: nesciat $A^{2}N^{s}HJK$.

[3] singula $CA^{s}N^{s}JK$ Eds., Conway: singuli P(1)N Alschefski, most recent Eds.

embolden me to speak freely—there is nothing of a B.C. 204 human being, conscript fathers, except his form and outward appearance, nothing of a Roman citizen except his bearing and garments and the sound of the Latin language. He is a pest-bringing monster, like those of which myths say that, in order to destroy mariners, they once had their abode on this side and that of the strait by which we are separated from Sicily. And if he were content to be the only man to practise his criminal passion and greed upon your allies, we in our long-suffering should still be filling up a single whirlpool however deep. As it is, he has made every centurion and every soldier of yours a Pleminius; so universal has he wished licence and dishonour to be. They all rob, plunder, beat, wound, slay. They defile matrons, maidens and free-born boys, dragged from the embrace of parents. Every day our city is captured, every day it is plundered. Day and night every part of it re-echoes the wailing of women and children who are being seized and carried off. Knowing that, any one would wonder either how we have the patience to endure, or how those who commit such outrages are not yet sated with them. Neither can I retail them all, nor is it worth your while to hear each thing that we have suffered. In a general statement I shall embrace everything.[1] I tell you there is not a house at Locri, not a man that has not suffered a wrong. I tell you there remains no kind of crime, lust, avarice that has been overlooked in the case of any possible victim. It is all but impossible to decide

[1] Here and in the following statement one finds an obvious reminiscence of Cicero in Verr. IV. 1; cf. ibid. 57.

A.U.C. 550

uter casus civitati[1] sit detestabilior, cum hostes bello urbem cepere, an cum exitiabilis tyrannus vi atque armis oppressit. Omnia quae captae urbes patiuntur passi sumus et cum maxime patimur, patres conscripti; omnia quae crudelissimi atque inportunissimi tyranni scelera in oppressos cives edunt Pleminius in nos liberosque nostros et coniuges edidit.

XVIII. " Unum est de quo nominatim et nos queri religio infixa animis cogat et vos audire et exsolvere rem publicam vestram religione, si ita vobis videbitur, velimus, patres conscripti. Vidimus[2] enim cum quanta caerimonia non vestros solum colatis deos, sed etiam externos accipiatis. Fanum est apud nos Proserpinae, de cuius sanctitate templi credo aliquam famam ad vos pervenisse Pyrrhi bello, qui cum ex Sicilia rediens Locros classe praeterveheretur, inter alia foeda quae propter fidem erga vos in civitatem nostram facinora edidit, thensauros quoque Proserpinae intactos ad eam diem spoliavit; atque ita pecunia in naves inposita, ipse terra est profectus. Quid ergo evenit, patres conscripti? Classis postero die foedissima tempestate lacerata, omnesque naves quae sacram pecuniam habuerunt in litora nostra eiectae sunt. Qua tanta clade edoctus tandem deos esse, superbissimus rex pecuniam omnem con-

[1] Civitati Forchhammer : -tatis $P(1)NHJK$.
[2] Vidimus $P(1)NHJK$: videmus Madvig.

[1] Livy represents the speaker as actually having witnessed the stately ceremonial when the Magna Mater was welcomed; xiv. 5–14.
[2] Cf. viii. 9 f.

which of the two is the more revolting lot for a state B.C. 204
—when the enemy have captured the city in war, or when a death-dealing tyrant has overpowered it by force of arms. All things that captured cities suffer we have suffered and at this very moment are suffering, conscript fathers. All the crimes that the most cruel and despotic tyrants inflict upon their helpless citizens Pleminius has inflicted upon us and our children and our wives.

XVIII. "There is one thing in regard to which conscientious scruples implanted in our minds compel us to complain in particular, and at the same time we would have you, conscript fathers, give us your attention and, if you approve, free your state from impiety. For we have seen with what punctiliousness you worship, not your own gods merely, but even welcome them from abroad.[1] We have in our city a sanctuary of Proserpina, a temple of whose sanctity I believe some report reached you in the war with Pyrrhus.[2] When on his return from Sicily he was passing Locri in his fleet, among other shameful acts which he visited upon our state for its loyalty to you, he despoiled the treasury of Proserpina[3] as well, which had been untouched down to that time. And, that done, he put the money on shipboard, setting out himself by land. What happened, conscript fathers, in consequence? On the following day the fleet was shattered by a terrible storm, and all the ships which had the sacred money on board were cast upon our shores. Having at last learned from this great disaster that the gods do exist, the haughtiest

[3] Appian Samn. 12 tells the story of Pyrrhus' sacrilege. Plutarch omits it. Cf. Diodorus Sic. XXVII. iv. 3; Val. Max. I. i. Ext. 1.

A.U.C. 550

quisitam [1] in thensauros Proserpinae referri iussit. Nec tamen illi umquam postea prosperi quicquam evenit, pulsusque Italia ignobili atque inhonesta morte temere nocte ingressus Argos occubuit. 7 Haec cum audisset legatus vester tribunique militum et mille alia quae non augendae religionis causa, sed praesenti deae numine saepe conperta nobis maiori- 8 busque nostris referebantur, ausi sunt nihilo minus sacrilegas admovere manus intactis illis thensauris et nefanda praeda se ipsos ac domos contaminare suas 9 et milites vestros. Quibus, per vos fidem [2] vestram, patres conscripti, priusquam eorum scelus expietis neque in Italia neque in Africa quicquam rei [3] gesseritis, ne quod piaculi commiserunt non suo solum sanguine sed etiam publica clade luant.

10 " Quamquam ne nunc quidem, patres conscripti, aut in ducibus aut in militibus vestris cessat ira deae. Aliquotiens iam inter se signis conlatis concucurrerunt;[4] dux alterius partis Pleminius, alterius duo tribuni militum erant. Non acrius cum Carthaginiensibus quam inter se ipsi ferro dimicaverunt, 11 praebuissentque occasionem furore suo Locros recipiendi Hannibali, nisi accitus ab nobis Scipio 12 intervenisset. At hercule milites contactos sacrilegio furor agitat; in ducibus ipsis puniendis nullum deae

[1] conquisitam P(1)N Aldus : in- SpHJK Froben 2.

[2] fidem Gronovius, Madvig : fidemque P(1)NHJK Weissenborn, Conway.

[3] eorum scelus . . . rei A'N'HJK Eds. : eo P(1)N, om. probably three lines.

[4] concucurrerunt PCR Eds. : concurrerunt MBDANHJK Conway (thirteen long syllables at end of sentence in a speech!).

[1] For Pyrrhus' death v. Plutarch, Pyrrhus 34; Strabo VIII. vi. 18 (before the walls); Justin XXV. 5.

of kings ordered that all the money should be sought out and restored to the treasure-chambers of Proserpina. And yet never thereafter did he meet with any success, and having been driven out of Italy, he rashly entered Argos by night and died an inconspicuous and inglorious death.[1] Although your legatus and the tribunes had heard all this and a thousand other occurrences which were repeated to them, not merely to increase religious feeling but as facts repeatedly confirmed for us and our ancestors by the evident intervention of the goddess, they nevertheless dared to lay sacrilegious hands upon those treasure-chambers that were not to be touched, and by that unspeakable plunder to bring pollution upon themselves and their homes and upon your soldiers. With such men, conscript fathers, I beg of you for conscience' sake not to undertake any action either in Italy or in Africa until you first atone for their crime, lest for the sacrilege committed they make amends not only by their own blood but also by a disaster to the state. B.C. 204

"Even now, however, the wrath of the goddess is not idle, conscript fathers, as regards either your commanders or your men. Several times already have they clashed with each other in actual battle. Pleminius was in command of the one faction, of the other faction two tribunes of the soldiers. They have fought each other with the sword as fiercely as against the Carthaginians, and by their madness would have given Hannibal a chance to regain Locri, had not Scipio forestalled that in answer to our call for help. True, you may say, the soldiers polluted by sacrilege are indeed frenzied, but the power of the goddess has not been manifest in punishing the numen apparuit. Immo ibi praesens maxime fuit.

A.U.C. 550

13 Virgis caesi tribuni ab legato sunt; legatus deinde insidiis tribunorum interceptus, praeterquam quod toto corpore laceratus, naso quoque auribusque
14 decisis exsanguis est relictus; recreatus dein legatus ex volneribus tribunos militum in vincla coniectos, dein verberatos servilibusque [1] omnibus suppliciis cruciatos [2] occidit, mortuos deinde prohibuit sepeliri.
15 Has dea poenas a templi sui spoliatoribus habet, nec ante [3] desinet omnibus eos agitare furiis quam repo-
16 sita sacra pecunia in thensauris fuerit. Maiores quondam nostri gravi Crotoniensium bello, quia extra urbem templum est, transferre in urbem eam pecuniam voluerunt. Noctu audita ex delubro vox est: abstinerent manus; deam sua templa [4] defensuram.
17 Quia movendi inde thensauros religio incussa erat, muro circumdare [5] templum voluerunt. Ad [6] aliquantum iam altitudinis excitata erant moenia cum 18 subito conlapsa ruina sunt. Sed et nunc et tunc [7] et saepe alias dea suam sedem suumque templum aut tutata est aut a violatoribus gravia piacula exegit; nostras iniurias nec potest nec possit alius ulcisci

[1] servilibusque $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben, Eds. -ibus Rhenanus, Conway.

[2] cruciatos JK Eds.: -ando Sp Froben 2, Conway: -andos Hx: trucidatos cruciando $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[3] nec ante A^1N^1HJK Eds.: om. $P(1)N$: non C^4.

[4] templa $P(3)B^1NHJK$ Eds.: bracketed by Madvig, om. Conway.

[5] circumdare A^1HJK Aldus, Froben, Eds.: -dari $P(1)N$ Conway.

[6] ad A^1N^1HJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.

[7] et tunc N^1HJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$: (tunc) et nunc A^1.

[1] Cf. above, ix. 4 ff.

commanders themselves. On the contrary, it is B.C. 204
there that it was most evident. The tribunes were scourged by the legatus;[1] whereupon the legatus was isolated by a ruse of the tribunes, and besides receiving wounds in every part of his body, he was left half-dead after even his nose and ears had been mutilated. Then when the legatus had recovered from his wounds and the tribunes of the soldiers had been thrown into chains, then, after scourging them and racking them with all the torments applied to slaves, he put them to death, then forbade burial of the dead.

"Such are the penalties the goddess has exacted of those who despoil her temple, nor will she cease to drive them on by every form of madness until the consecrated money has been replaced in her treasury. Our ancestors once in a serious war with the Crotonians[2] desired to bring that money over into the city, since the temple is outside the city. In the night a voice from the sanctuary was heard: let them keep their hands off; the goddess will defend her temples. Since conscientious scruples were raised against moving the treasure away, they planned to surround the temple with a wall of defence. The walls had already been raised to a considerable height when suddenly they fell in ruins. But both at this time and at that, and often on other occasions, the goddess has either defended her abode and her temple, or else has exacted heavy penalties from those who profaned them. To avenge wrongs done to us, however, no one but you, conscript fathers,

[2] For Croton cf. XXIV. iii. 1 ff., and for the disastrous battle at the Sagra river (near Caulonia) v. Strabo VI. i. 10; Justin XX. 3.

A.U.C. 550

19 quam vos, patres conscripti. Ad vos vestramque fidem supplices confugimus. Nihil nostra interest utrum sub illo legato, sub illo praesidio Locros esse sinatis, an irato Hannibali et Poenis ad supplicium dedatis. Non postulamus ut extemplo nobis, ut de absente, ut indicta causa credatis; veniat, coram 20 ipse audiat, ipse diluat. Si quicquam sceleris quod homo in homines edere potest in nos praetermisit, non recusamus quin et nos omnia eadem iterum, si pati possumus, patiamur, et ille omni divino humanoque liberatur scelere."

XIX. Haec cum ab legatis dicta essent, quaesissetque ab iis Q. Fabius detulissentne eas querellas ad P. Scipionem, responderunt missos legatos esse, sed eum belli apparatu occupatum esse et in Africam aut iam traiecisse aut intra paucos dies traiecturum; 2 et legati gratia quanta esset apud imperatorem expertos esse, cum inter eum et tribunos cognita causa tribunos [1] in vincla coniecerit, legatum aeque sontem aut magis etiam in ea potestate reliquerit.

3 Iussis excedere templo legatis, non Pleminius modo, sed etiam Scipio principum orationibus lacerari. Ante omnes Q. Fabius natum eum [2] ad conrum- 4 pendam disciplinam militarem arguere; sic et in Hispania plus prope per [3] seditionem militum quam

[1] cognita causa tribunos A'N'HJK Eds.: om. P(1)N, one line.

[2] eum P(1)N Aldus: om. Sp²HJK Froben 2.

[3] prope per Sp²N'H Froben 2: proter PCR: propter MBDAN: prope JK Aldus.

[1] As princeps senatus he speaks first; cf. XXVII. xi. 12 and below, xxxvii. 1.

[2] The Curia had been inaugurated as a temple, that decrees of the senate might be valid; so Varro in Gellius XIV. vii. 7. Cf. XXVI. xxx. 11; xxxi. 11.

has the power—and may no one else have it! To you and your protection we have come for refuge as suppliants. It makes no difference to us whether you allow Locri to remain under that legatus, under that garrison, or surrender it to angry Hannibal and the Carthaginians for punishment. We do not demand that you at once believe us in regard to an absent defendant, his case unheard. Let him come, let him hear in person, in person let him disprove. If there is any crime which a man can perpetrate upon human beings that he has failed to commit upon us, we do not refuse to endure all the same wrongs again, if that is possible for us, while he is to be acquitted of every crime against gods and men." B.C. 204

XIX. After the envoys had thus spoken and Fabius [1] asked them whether they had carried such complaints to Publius Scipio, they replied that emissaries had been sent, but that he was occupied with preparations for war and had either already crossed over to Africa, or was about to do so within a few days; and they had learned what partiality for his legatus was felt by the general-in-command when, after hearing the charges of Pleminius and those of the tribunes, he put the tribunes in chains and, though the legatus was equally guilty or even more so, left him in that command.

When the envoys had been ordered to retire from the Senate House,[2] not Pleminius only but also Scipio was savagely attacked in the speeches of leading men. First and foremost Quintus Fabius charged that he was by nature adapted to corrupt his soldiers' discipline. Thus even in Spain, he said, almost more soldiers had been lost in a mutiny than bello amissum. Externo et regio more et indulgere licentiae militum et saevire in eos. Sententiam deinde aeque trucem orationi adiecit: Pleminium legatum vinctum Romam deportari placere et ex vinculis causam dicere ac, si vera forent quae Locrenses quererentur, in carcere necari bonaque eius publicari; P. Scipionem, quod de provincia decessisset iniussu senatus, revocari, agique cum tribunis plebis ut de imperio eius abrogando ferrent ad populum; Locrensibus coram senatum respondere quas iniurias sibi factas quererentur, eas [1] neque senatum neque populum Romanum [2] factas velle; viros bonos sociosque et amicos eos appellari; liberos,[3] coniuges quaeque alia erepta essent restitui; pecuniam quanta ex thensauris Proserpinae sublata esset conquiri, duplamque pecuniam in thensauros reponi, et sacrum piaculare fieri ita [4] ut prius ad conlegium pontificum referretur, quod sacri thensauri moti, aperti,[5] violati essent, quae piacula, quibus deis, quibus hostiis fieri placeret: milites qui [6] Locris essent omnes in Siciliam transportari; quattuor cohortes sociorum Latini nominis in praesidium Locros adduci.

A.U.C. 550

Perrogari eo die sententiae accensis studiis pro

[1] eas $P(1)NJK$ Aldus: om. Sp?H Froben 2.
[2] Romanum (or r.) B^1 Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)NHJK$.
[3] liberos $A'N'HJK$: om. $P(1)N$.
[4] et sacrum . . . ita $P(1)NJK$ Aldus, Froben: om. SpHx.
[5] aperti Sp(probably)$A'N'HJK$ Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.
[6] qui $P^2(1)NHJK$: quiqui P.

by war;[1] that after the manner of a foreign tyrant he B.C. 204 gave free rein to the excesses of his soldiers and was also cruel to them. He then appended to his speech an equally ruthless resolution: that it was the will of the senate that Pleminius, the legatus, be brought to Rome bound and plead his cause in chains, and if the complaints of the Locrians should prove true, that he be put to death in the prison and his property confiscated; that Publius Scipio, having left his province without orders of the senate, be recalled, and that the tribunes of the plebs be urged to bring before the people a bill to annul his command; that the senate should make answer to the Locrians face to face that neither the senate nor the Roman people approved of the wrongs which they complained had been inflicted upon them; that they be declared good men and good allies and friends; that their children, their wives and whatever else had been taken away by violence be restored to them; that all the money removed from the treasure-chambers of Proserpina be sought out and twice that amount be restored to her treasury; and that expiatory rites be performed, with the provision that the question be first laid before the college of pontiffs, in view of the removal, opening and profanation of the sacred treasure, what expiations they would order to be made, to what divinities, with what victims; that all the soldiers who were at Locri be transported to Sicily; that four cohorts of Latin allies be brought to Locri as a garrison.

Not all the senators could be asked their opinion on that day owing to the heat of party feeling for [1] An exaggerated statement, of course, for which prope is half-apologetic. Cf. XXVIII. xxvi. 2.

A.U.C. 550

Scipione et adversus Scipionem [1] non potuere.
11 Praeter Plemini facinus Locrensiumque cladem ipsius etiam imperatoris non Romanus modo sed ne militaris
12 quidem cultus iactabatur: cum pallio crepidisque inambulare in gymnasio; libellis eum palaestraeque operam dare; aeque segniter molliterque [2] cohortem
13 totam Syracusarum amoenitate frui; Carthaginem atque Hannibalem excidisse de memoria; exercitum omnem licentia corruptum, qualis Sucrone in Hispania fuerit, qualis nunc Locris, sociis magis quam hosti metuendum.

XX. Haec quamquam partim vera partim mixta eoque similia veris iactabantur, tamen vicit Q. Metelli sententia, qui de ceteris Maximo adsensus de Scipio-
2 nis causa dissensit: qui enim convenire quem modo civitas iuvenem admodum unum [3] recuperandae Hispaniae delegerit ducem, quem recepta ab hostibus Hispania ad imponendum Punico bello finem creaverit consulem, spe destinaverit Hannibalem ex Italia re-
3 tracturum,[4] Africam subacturum, eum repente, tamquam Q. Pleminium, indicta causa prope damnatum, ex provincia revocari, cum ea quae in se nefarie facta Locrenses quererentur ne praesente quidem Scipione facta dicerent, neque aliud quam patientia

[1] et adversus Scipionem P(1)N Aldus, Froben: om. SpHJK.
[2] -que $A^{y}JK$ Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)NH Conway (bracketing segniter).
[3] unum Sp(probably)$A^{x}N^{x}HJK$: om. P(1)N.
[4] retracturum Sp?HJK Froben 2: de- P(1)N, which have Africam subacturum before Hannibalem.

[1] Plutarch makes Cato, as quaestor to Scipio, complain that the general was extravagant, pampering his troops and giving too much time to palaestra and theatre; Cat. Mai. iii. 5 ff. Cf. below, p. 307 and note 2.

Scipio and against Scipio. In addition to the crime of Pleminius and the sufferings of the Locrians, they kept censuring even the personal appearance of the general-in-chief, as not even soldierly, not to say un-Roman; that wearing a Greek mantle and sandals he strolled about in the gymnasium, giving his attention to books in Greek and physical exercise;[1] that with equal indolence and self-indulgence his entire retinue[2] was enjoying the charms of Syracuse; that Carthage and Hannibal had been forgotten; that the entire army, being spoiled by lack of restraint and, like the army formerly at Sucro in Spain, like the troops now at Locri, was more to be feared by allies than by the enemy. B.C. 204

XX. Although some of these taunts were true, some half-true and hence plausible, nevertheless the motion of Quintus Metellus[3] carried the day. In agreement with Maximus on the other points, he disagreed with him so far as concerned Scipio, the man whom the state chose not long before, he said, in spite of his youth as sole general to recover Spain; then, after Spain had been rewon from the enemy, elected him consul to put an end to the Punic war, and counted upon him to draw Hannibal out of Italy and to conquer Africa. How then was it logical for him, as if he were a Quintus Pleminius, suddenly to be all but condemned without a hearing, recalled from his province, although the Locrians said that the criminal acts against them of which they complained had been committed when Scipio was not even present, and nothing else could be charged

[2] This would include such high officers as legati, as well as friends.

[3] Cf. x. 2; xi. 9 f. Consul in 206 B.C.; XXVIII. x. 2, 8.

A.U.C. 550

aut pudor, quod legato pepercisset, insimulari posset? 4 Sibi placere M. Pomponium praetorem, cui Sicilia provincia sorti evenisset, triduo proximo in provinciam proficisi; consules decem legatos, quos iis videretur, ex senatu legere quos cum praetore mitterent, et duos tribunos plebei atque aedilem; 5 cum eo consilio praetorem cognoscere; si ea quae Locrenses facta quererentur iussu aut voluntate P. Scipionis facta essent, ut eum de provincia decedere 6 iuberent; si P. Scipio iam in Africam traiecisset, tribuni plebis atque aedilis cum duobus legatis, quos maxime idoneos praetor censuisset, in Africam pro- 7 ficiscerentur, tribuni atque aedilis qui reducerent inde Scipionem, legati qui exercitui praeessent donec 8 novus imperator ad eum exercitum venisset; si M. Pomponius et decem legati comperissent neque iussu neque voluntate P. Scipionis ea facta esse, ut ad exercitum Scipio maneret bellumque ut proposuisset 9 gereret. Hoc facto senatus consulto, cum tribunis plebis actum est aut conparent inter se aut sorte legerent[1] qui duo cum praetore ac legatis irent; 10 ad conlegium pontificum relatum[2] de expiandis quae Locris in templo Proserpinae tacta ac violata elataque[3] inde essent.

11 Tribuni plebis cum praetore et decem legatis

[1] inter . . . legerent $A^{s}N^{s}HJK$ Aldus, Froben: om. $P(1)N$.
[2] relatum, $P(3)N$ add et (for which est M^{2}?x Alschefski).
[3] ac violata elataque A^{s}(om. ac)$N^{s}HJK$ Aldus, Froben: violataque $P(1)N$.

against him than slowness to anger, or else reluct- B.C. 204
ance in sparing his legatus? His proposal, he said, was that Marcus Pomponius, the praetor, to whom Sicily had been allotted as his province, should within three days leave for the province; that the consuls should choose ten legati at their discretion from the senate, to be sent with the praetor, as also two tribunes of the plebs and an aedile;[1] that with these men as assessors the praetor should conduct an examination; if the offences of which the Locrians complained had been committed by the command or with the consent of Publius Scipio, they should order him to retire from his province; if Publius Scipio should have already crossed over into Africa, the tribunes of the plebs and the aedile should go to Africa with two of the legati—those whom the praetor should judge most competent—the tribunes and aedile to bring Scipio away, the legati to be in command of the army until a new general-in-command should reach that army; if Marcus Pomponius and the ten legati should find that the acts had been committed neither by order of Publius Scipio nor with his consent, that Scipio should remain with the army and carry on the war as he had planned. A decree of the senate to this effect having been passed, the tribunes of the plebs were requested either to arrange among themselves or to choose by lot which two of them should go with the praetor and legati. The matter of expiation for all that in the temple of Proserpina at Locri had been touched and profaned and carried away was referred to the college of pontiffs.

The tribunes of the plebs, Marcus Claudius

[1] A plebeian aedile (§ 11), to carry out the orders of the tribunes.

A.U.C. 550

profecti M. Claudius Marcellus et M. Cincius Alimentus; aedilis plebis datus est quem, si aut in Sicilia praetori dicto audiens non esset Scipio aut iam in Africam traiecisset, prendere tribuni iuberent, ac iure sacrosanctae potestatis reducerent. Prius Locros ire quam Messanam consilium erat.

XXI. Ceterum duplex fama est quod ad Pleminium attinet. Alii, auditis quae Romae acta essent in exilium Neapolim euntem forte in Q. Metellum, unum ex legatis, incidisse et ab eo Regium vi retractum
2 tradunt: alii ab ipso Scipione legatum cum triginta nobilissimis equitum missum qui Q. Pleminium in cate-
3 nas et cum eo seditionis principes conicerent. Ii omnes, seu ante Scipionis seu tum praetoris iussu, traditi in custodiam Reginis sunt.[1]
4 Praetor legatique Locros profecti primam, sicuti mandatum erat, religionis curam habuere: omnem enim sacram pecuniam quaeque apud Pleminium quaeque apud[2] milites erat conquisitam, cum ea quam[3] ipsi secum attulerant, in thensauris reposu-
5 erunt ac piaculare sacrum fecerunt. Tum vocatos ad contionem milites praetor signa extra urbem efferre iubet castraque in campo locat cum gravi edicto, si quis miles aut in urbe restitisset aut secum extulisset

[1] sunt A'HJK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.
[2] Pleminium . . . apud A'N'JK Eds.: om. P(1)N.
[3] cum ea quam A'N'HJK Eds.: om. P(1)N.

[1] Cf. xi. 13; XXVII. xxvi. 12; xxvii. 7. Consul in 196 B.C.; censor 189 B.C.; XXXIII. xxiv. 1; XXXVII. lviii. 2.

[2] Almost certainly a brother of Lucius, the historian (frequently mentioned in XXVI–XXVII). As tribune in this year he proposed the Lex Cincia to limit gifts; cf. Cicero Cat. Mai. 10. Livy fails to mention the law until XXXIV. iv. 9, in a speech of Cato as consul, 195 B.C.

Marcellus[1] and Marcus Cincius Alimentus[2] de- B.C. 204 parted with the praetor and ten legati. A plebeian aedile was added to their number, and either in case Scipio in Sicily should fail to obey the praetor, or if he should have crossed already into Africa, the tribunes were to order the aedile to arrest him, and by virtue of their inviolable authority they were to bring him back. It was their plan to go to Locri first and then to Messana.

XXI. But so far as Pleminius is concerned we have two reports. Some authorities relate that, on hearing what had been done at Rome, he was on his way into exile at Neapolis when he happened to encounter Quintus Metellus, one of the legati, and that he was forcibly brought back by him to Regium. Others say that Scipio himself sent a legatus with thirty horsemen of the first order, to throw Quintus Pleminius into chains and with him the leaders of the outbreak. All of them, whether by Scipio's order earlier or at this time by that of the praetor, were delivered into the custody of the men of Regium.

The praetor and legati went to Locri and, as they had been instructed, made religion their first concern. For they sought out and restored to the treasure-chambers all the sacred money, both what was in the hands of Pleminius and what was in the possession of the soldiers, together with what they had themselves brought with them; and they performed the rite of expiation. Then the praetor summoned the soldiers to an assembly, ordered their units to march out of the city, and assigned a site in the plain for their camp, with a threatening edict in case any soldier should either remain in the c.c. 50 quod suum non esset;[1] Locrensibus se permittere ut quod sui[2] quisque cognosset prenderet, si quid non 6 compareret, repeteret.[3] Ante omnia libera corpora placere sine mora Locrensibus restitui; non levi defuncturum poena qui non restituisset.

7 Locrensium deinde contionem habuit atque iis libertatem legesque suas populum Romanum senatumque restituere dixit; si qui Pleminium aliumve
8 quem accusare vellet, Regium se sequeretur; si de P. Scipione publice queri vellent ea quae Locris nefarie in deos hominesque facta essent iussu aut voluntate P. Scipionis facta esse, legatos mitterent
9 Messanam; ibi se cum consilio cogniturum. Locrenses praetori legatisque, senatui[4] ac populo Romano gratias egerunt; se ad Pleminium accusandum
10 ituros; Scipionem, quamquam parum iniuriis civitatis suae doluerit, eum esse virum quem amicum sibi quam inimicum malint esse; pro certo se habere neque iussu neque voluntate P. Scipionis tot tam nefanda commissa, sed aut Pleminio nimium, sibi[5] 11 parum creditum, aut natura insitum quibusdam esse ut magis peccari nolint quam satis animi ad vindicanda peccata habeant.

Et praetori et consilio haud mediocre onus demp-

[1] quod . . . esset A^1N^1HJK Aldus, Froben : om. $P(1)N$.
[2] sui $P(3)C^1N$: suum $A^{1?}JK$ Aldus, Froben (H after quisque).
[3] repeteret $Ta^2A^1N^1HJK$ Eds. : unde $P(1)N$: repetundum Gronovius : unde vellet, repeteret Madvig.
[4] senatui, before this HJK Aldus, Froben have et (retained by Luchs, Riemann).
[5] sibi Forchhammer : aut sibi $P(1)NHJK$.

city or carry out with him what was not his own. B.C. 204
In this he stated that he gave permission to the Locrians to seize any possession a man should recognize as his; and if anything was not produced he should demand its restitution. Above all, he said, he ruled that free persons should be restored to the Locrians without delay; that a heavy penalty would be paid by the man who did not restore them.

Thereupon he held an assembly of the Locrians and said that the Roman people and senate restored to them their independence and their own laws; that if anyone desired to bring charges against Pleminius or any other man, let him follow him to Regium. As regarded Publius Scipio, should they wish, he said, to make complaint in the name of their state, claiming that such wicked deeds as had been committed at Locri against gods and men had been done by command of Publius Scipio or with his consent, let them send envoys to Messana; there with his assessors he would conduct the inquiry. The Locrians thanked the praetor and his legati, the senate and the Roman people. They would go, they said, to prefer charges against Pleminius. As for Scipio, although he was not sufficiently pained by the wrongs done to their state, he was such a man as they would prefer to have as their friend rather than as an enemy. They had definitely ascertained that the many unspeakable crimes had not been committed either by order or consent of Publius Scipio; but either he had trusted Pleminius too much and themselves too little; or else for some men it was natural to disapprove of misdoing but to lack sufficient spirit to punish the misdeeds.

Both the praetor and his assessors were relieved of

A.U.C. 550

12 tum erat de Scipione cognoscendi. Pleminium et ad duo et triginta homines cum eo damnaverunt atque
13 in catenis Romam miserunt. Ipsi ad Scipionem profecti sunt, ut ea quoque quae volgata sermonibus erant de cultu ac desidia imperatoris solutaque disciplina militiae comperta oculis referrent [1] Romam.

XXII. Venientibus iis Syracusas Scipio res, non verba ad purgandum sese paravit. Exercitum omnem eo convenire, classem expediri iussit, tamquam dimicandum eo die terra marique cum Car-
2 thaginiensibus esset. Quo die venerunt hospitio comiter acceptis,[2] postero die terrestrem navalemque exercitum, non instructos modo, sed hos decurrentes, classem in portu simulacrum et ipsam edentem navalis
3 pugnae ostendit; tum circa armamentaria et horrea bellique alium apparatum [3] visendum praetor lega-
4 tique ducti. Tantaque admiratio singularum universarumque rerum incussa ut satis crederent aut illo duce atque exercitu vinci Carthaginiensem
5 populum aut alio nullo [4] posse, iuberentque, quod di bene verterent, traicere [5] et spei conceptae quo die illum omnes centuriae priorem consulem dixissent primo quoque tempore compotem populum Romanum

[1] referrent (or -erent) P(1)N Aldus: per- Sp?HK: prae- J.
[2] acceptis *Ta*²(apparently)P(1)N: -cepti *N*²*?HJK Aldus, Froben*.
[3] horrea bellique alium apparatum *C*²*A*¹*N*¹*HJ Eds.*: reduced in P(1)(*A*²) to horratum by om. of some twenty letters (one line): horrea ad belli apparatum Madvig, Emend. Conway would insert ad before armentaria, *but does not so read. Weissenborn*³ assumed a lacuna before aliumque belli of Aldus, Froben.
[4] alio nullo P(1)N Aldus: nullo alio HJK Froben 2.
[5] traicere P(3)MHJK Aldus: -rent N: -ret Rhenanus, Froben 2.

the burden—no slight one either—of a court of B.C. 204 inquiry concerning Scipio. Pleminius and with him some thirty-two men they found guilty[1] and sent in chains to Rome. They themselves went to Scipio with the further intention to see for themselves what had been common talk in regard to the dress and indolent habits of the general and lax discipline of his soldiers, and to report back to Rome.

XXII. While they were on their way to Syracuse Scipio prepared tangible evidence, not words, in his defence. He ordered the entire army to be concentrated there, and the fleet to be cleared for action, as if on that day he must fight on land and sea with the Carthaginians. On the day of their arrival they were hospitably entertained, and the next day he showed them his land and naval forces, not merely drawn up in line, but the soldiers in manœuvres[2] and the fleet likewise manœuvring in mimicry of a naval battle in the harbour. Then the praetor and the legati were conducted on a tour of inspection of arsenals and magazines and other equipment for war. And so much was their admiration aroused for particular things and for the sum total that they fully believed the Carthaginian people could be defeated either by that general and army or by no other, and bade him with the blessing of the gods to cross over, and at the first possible moment to bring to the Roman people the fulfilment of the hope inspired on the day on which all the centuries

[1] I.e. at a preliminary hearing; cf. xxii. 7 ff. The charge would be treason, perduellio.

[2] It is a sham battle, as et ipsam proves. No parade here; no more than in XXVI. li. 4.

A.U.C. 550

6 facere;[1] adeoque laetis inde animis profecti sunt, tamquam victoriam, non belli magnificum apparatum nuntiaturi Romam essent.

7 Pleminius quique in eadem causa erant, postquam Romam est ventum, extemplo in carcerem conditi. Ac primo producti ad populum ab tribunis apud praeoccupatos Locrensium clade animos nullum 8 misericordiae locum habuerunt; postea cum saepius producerentur, iam senescente invidia molliebantur irae, et ipsa deformitas Plemini memoriaque absentis 9 Scipionis favorem ad volgum conciliabat. Mortuus tamen prius in vinclis est quam iudicium de eo populi[2] perficeretur.

10 Hunc Pleminium Clodius Licinus in libro tertio rerum Romanarum refert ludis votivis quos Romae Africanus iterum consul faciebat conatum per quosdam, quos pretio corruperat, aliquot locis urbem incendere, ut effringendi[3] carceris fugiendique

[1] facere MK Gronovius: faceret P(3)N Aldus, Froben: -rent A^1N^2?HJ.
[2] populi P(1)N Aldus: om. Sp?HJK Froben 2.
[3] effringendi Weissenborn: re- Luchs: fringendi P: frangendi P^2(1)NJK.

[1] A defendant charged with perduellio was brought before a contio in the Forum three times, not on successive days. At the close of the third contio the tribunes pronounced judgment, repeating their demand for a penalty or changing it in either direction. Then they announced a final hearing 28 days later had named him consul first. So happy also were they B.C. 204 on leaving the city, it was if they were to carry to Rome the news of a victory, not of a magnificent preparation for war.

Pleminius and those who were involved in the same charge, upon their arrival in Rome, were at once put in the prison. And when first brought before the people by the tribunes, while men's minds were already filled with the sufferings of the Locrians, they found no room left for pity. Later, as they were brought out repeatedly,[1] men's anger was subsiding as animosity now waned, and even Pleminius' disfigurement and the memory of the absent Scipio won them support among the populace. He died, however, in prison before his trial in the assembly of the people could be completed.

Clodius Licinus[2] in the third book of his Roman History relates of this Pleminius that during the votive games which Africanus was conducting at Rome in his second consulship,[3] he made an attempt, with the aid of certain men whom he had bribed, to set fire to the city in a number of places, in order to have a chance to break out of prison and escape;

(quarta accusatio). On that date the case would be finally decided by vote of the comitia tributa (if a fine was demanded), or of the centuriata (if a death penalty). Cf. XXVI. iii. 9 ff. (Vol. VII. pp. 13 ff. and notes p. 12); Mommsen, Staatsrecht III. 354 ff. Confinement was in the Carcer, § 7; cf. p. 296, n. 1.

[2] A younger contemporary of Livy, consul suffectus in A.D. 4. His history must have begun with the end of the Second Punic War. Cf. Suet. de Gram. 20. Rare in Livy is so precise a reference to any authority.

[3] 194 B.C.; XXXIV. xliv. 6 ff., the same story under a different date and with omission of the source.

A.U.C. 550

haberet occasionem; patefacto dein scelere delegatum [1] in Tullianum ex senatus consulto.

11 De Scipione nusquam nisi in senatu actum, ubi omnes legatique et tribuni, classem,[2] exercitum ducemque verbis extollentes, effecerunt [3] ut senatus censeret primo quoque tempore in Africam traicien-
12 dum Scipionique permitteretur ut ex iis exercitibus qui in Sicilia essent ipse eligeret quos in Africam secum traiceret, quos provinciae relinqueret praesidio.

XXIII. Dum haec apud Romanos geruntur, Carthaginienses quoque, cum speculis per omnia promunturia positis percunctantes paventesque ad singulos
2 nuntios sollicitam hiemem egissent, haud parvum et ipsi tuendae Africae momentum adiecerunt societatem Syphacis regis, cuius maxime fiducia traiec-
3 turum in Africam Romanum crediderant.[4] Erat Hasdrubali Gisgonis filio non hospitium modo cum rege, de quo ante dictum est, cum ex Hispania forte in idem tempus Scipio atque Hasdrubal convenerunt sed mentio quoque incohata adfinitatis, ut rex
4 duceret filiam Hasdrubalis. Ad eam rem consummandam tempusque nuptiis statuendum—iam enim [5]

[1] delegatum $P(1)NJK$(-lig-) Aldus, Froben: re- conj. Conway: deiectum Madvig.
[2] classem, after this $P^2(1)N$ Aldus have eam (meam P).
[3] effecerunt $A'HJK$: fecerunt $P(1)N$.
[4] crediderant Ta^2H: -runt $P(1)N$ Aldus, Froben.
[5] enim Sp^2HJK Froben 2: enim et $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[1] The older underground chamber beneath the Carcer. Mere mention of it implies that Pleminius was executed there, as is explicitly stated l.c. xliv. 8. Cf. xix. 5; Val. Max. I. i. 21.

that then, when his crime was revealed, he was B.C. 204 consigned to the Tullianum [1] in accordance with a decree of the senate.

In regard to Scipio no action was taken anywhere except in the senate, in which both legati and tribunes united in praise of the fleet, army and general. Consequently the senate voted that at the earliest possible moment the crossing to Africa must take place, and that out of the armies then in Sicily Scipio should be permitted to choose for himself what forces he would transport with him to Africa, and what he would leave as a garrison for the province.

XXIII. While these events were in progress among the Romans, the Carthaginians on their part, placing watch-towers on all the promontories, had passed an anxious winter, gathering information and alarmed by each fresh report. And then, as no small factor in the defence of Africa, they added an alliance of their own with King Syphax, in reliance chiefly upon whom the Roman, they had believed, intended to cross over to Africa. Hasdrubal the son of Gisgo had not merely a guest-friendship with the king, of which mention has been made above [2]—when Scipio and Hasdrubal coming from Spain arrived, as it happened, at the same time—but also the first proposal of a marriage tie was made, in which the king was to marry Hasdrubal's daughter. To carry the matter through and to fix a time for the wedding, Hasdrubal went to him; for the maiden was already of marriageable age. On perceiving that he was [2] The formal bond of a hospitium with Hasdrubal was implied in XXVIII. xviii but not exactly mentioned. As for Scipio, cf. below, xxiv. 3.

A.U.C. 550

nubilis erat virgo—profectus Hasdrubal ut accensum cupiditate—et sunt ante omnes barbaros Numidae effusi in Venerem—sensit, virginem a Carthagine 5 arcessit maturatque nuptias; et inter aliam gratulationem, ut publicum quoque foedus privato adiceretur, societas inter populum Carthaginiensem [1] regemque, data ultro citroque fide eosdem amicos inimicosque habituros, iure iurando adfirmatur.
6 Ceterum Hasdrubal, memor et cum Scipione initae regi societatis et quam vana et mutabilia
7 barbarorum ingenia essent, veritus ne, si traiecisset in Africam Scipio, parvum vinculum eae nuptiae essent, dum accensum recenti amore Numidam habet, perpellit blanditiis quoque puellae adhibitis ut legatos in Siciliam ad Scipionem mittat per quos moneat eum ne prioribus suis promissis fretus in Africam
8 traiciat; se et nuptiis civis Carthaginiensis, filiae Hasdrubalis quem viderit apud se in hospitio, et publico etiam foedere cum populo Carthaginiensi iunctum
9 optare primum ut procul ab Africa, sicut adhuc fecerint, bellum Romani cum Carthaginiensibus gerant, ne sibi interesse certaminibus eorum armaque aut haec aut illa, abnuentem alteram societatem, sequi
10 necesse sit; si non abstineat Africa Scipio et Carthagini exercitum admoveat, sibi necessarium fore et pro terra Africa, in qua et ipse sit genitus, et pro

[1] Carthaginiensem C^1HJK : -sum C : -sium $P(1)N$.

fired with passion—and more than all barbarians B.C. 204
the Numidians are prone to sensuality—he summoned the maiden from Carthage and hastened the wedding. And in the midst of congratulations on other grounds, in order that a public compact might be added to the private, an alliance between the Carthaginian people and the king was cemented by an oath, while a pledge was given by both sides that they would have the same friends and enemies.

Hasdrubal, however, remembered not only the alliance with Scipio into which the king had entered, but also how naturally characterless and fickle are barbarians. He feared that if Scipio should cross over to Africa this marriage would be a slender bond. Consequently while the Numidian, fired by his new-found love, was in his power, with the help also of the young woman's allurements, Hasdrubal prevailed upon him to send ambassadors to Scipio in Sicily, and through these men he was to warn Scipio not to cross over to Africa in reliance upon his previous promises. They were to say that he was linked with the Carthaginian people both by his marriage to a citizen of Carthage, daughter of the Hasdrubal whom Scipio had seen received as a guest in his own house, and by a public treaty as well; that in the first place he wished that the Romans would carry on war with the Carthaginians, as they had done hitherto, far from Africa, making it unnecessary for him to be involved in their conflicts and to follow the arms of this side or that, rejecting alliance with the other side; that if Scipio did not keep away from Africa and moved his army up to Carthage, it would be necessary for him to fight both for the land of Africa, in which he too had patria coniugis suae proque parente ac penatibus dimicare.

A.U.C. 550

XXIV. Cum his [1] mandatis ab rege legati ad Scipionem missi Syracusis eum convenerunt. Scipio quamquam magno momento rerum in Africa gerendarum magnaque spe destitutus erat, legatis propere, priusquam res volgaretur, remissis in Africam litteras dat ad regem, quibus etiam atque etiam monet eum ne iura hospitii secum neu cum populo Romano initae societatis neu fas, fidem, dexteras, deos testes atque arbitros conventorum fallat. Ceterum quando neque celari adventus Numidarum poterat—vagati enim in urbe obversatique praetorio erant—et, si sileretur quid petentes venissent, periculum erat ne vera eo ipso quod celarentur sua sponte magis emanarent, timorque in exercitum incederet [2] ne simul cum rege et Carthaginiensibus foret bellandum, avertit a vero falsis praeoccupando mentes hominum, et vocatis ad contionem militibus non ultra esse cunctandum ait; instare ut in Africam quam primum traiciat socios reges. Masinissam prius ipsum [3] ad C. Laelium venisse querentem quod cunctando tempus tereretur; nunc Syphacem mittere legatos idem admirantem, quae tam diuturnae morae

[1] his $CR^3MBDANK$: hiis J : iis PR.

[2] incederet P (probably (1)N, not reported by Conway): inciderent P^1?M^1HJK Aldus, Froben : insideret Madvig (with in exercitu from P).

[3] prius ipsum N^1HJK Froben 2 : ipsum prius P(3)N Aldus.

[1] Formerly the palace of King Hiero II; Cicero in Verr. IV. 118; V. 80.

been born, and for the native city of his wife and for her father and her home. B.C. 204

XXIV. With these instructions ambassadors were sent to Scipio by the king, and they met him at Syracuse. Scipio had lost, to be sure, an important factor for the campaign in Africa and a high hope; nevertheless, sending the messengers back to Africa promptly, before the matter should be widely reported, he gave them a letter to the king. In this he insistently admonished him not to prove false to the claims of a guest-friendship entered into with himself, nor to those of an alliance contracted with the Roman people, nor to divine law, to honour, to the clasped hands, to the gods as witnesses and arbiters of compacts. But the arrival of the Numidians could not be kept secret, for they had roamed about the city and had showed themselves at headquarters;[1] and if the object of their mission was passed over in silence there would be danger that the facts might of themselves transpire, all the more from the very attempt to conceal them, and that the fear of having to fight at the same time with the king and the Carthaginians might overtake the army. For that reason Scipio diverted men's attention from the truth by preoccupation with false statements, and summoning the soldiers to an assembly, he told them that there must be no further delay; that the kings, their allies, were insisting that he cross over to Africa as soon as possible. Masinissa, he said, had previously come in person to Gaius Laelius complaining because they were wasting time in hesitation; and now Syphax was sending ambassadors, stating that he also was at a loss to explain what was the reason for a delay so protracted, and sit causa postulantemque [1] ut aut traiciatur tandem in Africam exercitus aut, si mutata consilia sint, certior fiat, ut et ipse [2] sibi ac regno suo possit [3] 7 consulere. Itaque satis iam omnibus instructis apparatisque [4] et re iam non ultra recipiente cunctationem, in animo sibi esse, Lilybaeum classe traducta eodemque omnibus peditum equitumque copiis contractis, quae prima dies cursum navibus daret, deis bene iuvantibus in Africam traicere. 8 Litteras ad M. Pomponium mittit ut, si ei videretur, Lilybaeum veniret, ut communiter consulerent quas potissimum legiones et [5] quantum militum numerum 9 in Africam traiceret. Item circum oram omnem [6] maritimam misit ut naves onerariae comprensae Lilybaeum omnes contraherentur.

A.U.C. 550

10 Quidquid militum naviumque [7] in Sicilia erat cum Lilybaeum convenisset, et nec urbs multitudinem 11 hominum neque portus naves caperet, tantus omnibus ardor erat in Africam traiciendi ut non ad bellum duci viderentur, sed ad certa victoriae praemia. Praecipue qui superabant ex Cannensi exercitu milites illo, non alio duce credebant navata rei publicae opera finire se militiam ignominiosam posse. 12 Et Scipio minime id genus militum aspernabatur, ut

[1] quae . . . postulantem- om. $P(1)N$, two lines supplied from A^1N^1HJK.

[2] ipse om. $P(1)N$.

[3] possit P^1 and (om. suo)Sp?HJK Froben 2 : posset $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[4] instructis apparatisque N^1HJK Aldus, Froben, Conway (with paratisque Weissenborn, Madvig) : instructisque $P(1)N$.

[5] et $P(1)N^2$ or N^1 Aldus : om. Sp?HJK Froben 2.

[6] omnem om. $P(1)N$ Aldus.

[7] naviumque om. $(1)N$: P has only quae deleted.

demanding either that the army be at last transported to Africa, or, if their plans had been changed, that he be informed, so that he on his part might take measures for himself and his kingdom. Accordingly, since now everything had been duly fitted out and made ready and the situation admitted of no further delay, Scipio said it was his intention to shift his fleet to Lilybaeum and concentrate there all his infantry and cavalry forces, then on the first day that offered a passage to his ships to cross over with the blessing of the gods to Africa. He sent a letter to Marcus Pomponius,[1] requesting him, if he approved, to come to Lilybaeum, so that they might jointly decide which particular legions to transport to Africa and how large a number of men. He likewise sent orders round the entire coastline to have all merchantmen pressed into the service and concentrated at Lilybaeum. B.C. 20

When all the soldiers and ships in Sicily had been brought together at Lilybaeum and the city could not contain the multitude of men nor the harbour the ships, such was the ardour of every man for the passage to Africa that it seemed as though they were being led, not to a war but to assured rewards of victory. Especially the soldiers who were left of the army at Cannae believed that under that general and no other, by active duty for the state they could bring their ignominious service to an end.[2] And Scipio did not in the least scorn soldiers of that kind,

[1] Cf. xx. 4, 8; xiii. 2, 6: XXVIII. xlv. 12 (his mission to Delphi).

[2] Their appeals, such as that in XXV. vi. 2–23 (eight years before), had been of no avail. They saw no service as combat troops in Sicily, not even in the long siege of Syracuse.

A.U.C. 550

qui neque ad Cannas ignavia eorum cladem acceptam sciret neque ullos aeque veteres milites in exercitu Romano esse expertosque non variis proeliis modo 13 sed urbibus etiam oppugnandis. Quinta et sexta Cannenses erant legiones. Eas se traiecturum in Africam cum dixisset, singulos milites inspexit, relictisque quos non idoneos credebat, in locum eorum subiecit 14 quos secum ex Italia adduxerat, supplevitque ita eas legiones ut singulae sena milia et ducenos pedites, trecenos [1] haberent equites. Sociorum item Latini nominis pedites equitesque de exercitu Cannensi legit.

XXV. Quantum militum in Africam transportatum sit non parvo numero inter auctores discrepat.
2 Alibi decem milia peditum, duo milia et ducentos equites, alibi sedecim milia peditum, mille et sescentos [2] equites, alibi parte plus dimidia rem auctam, quinque et triginta milia peditum equitumque in
3 naves imposita invenio.[3] Quidam non adiecere numerum, inter quos me ipse in re dubia poni malim. Coelius ut abstinet numero, ita ad inmensum multi-
4 tudinis speciem auget: volucres ad terram delapsas clamore militum ait, tantamque [4] multitudinem conscendisse naves ut nemo mortalium aut in Italia aut in Sicilia relinqui videretur.

[1] trecenos Glareanus: tricenos $P(1)N$: trecentos P^5: CCC HJK.
[2] sescentos (DC) $P(3)N$ Eds.: quingenti (or -tos) A^1HJK.
[3] invenio z: om. $P(1)NJK$.
[4] ait, tantamque A^1HJK: aitque tantam $P(3)N$ (with atque CAN: ait atque N^2).

---

[1] Here Scipio had personal knowledge, having been a tribune of the soldiers at Cannae; XXII. liii. 2; Val. Max. V. vi. 7.

as he knew that the disaster at Cannae had not been incurred by their cowardice,[1] and that there were no soldiers in the Roman army who were such veterans and as highly trained not only in battles of different kinds but also in besieging cities. The fifth and sixth legions were those from Cannae. Having said he would transport these legions to Africa, he inspected the soldiers one by one, and leaving those whom he believed to be unfit, he substituted for them men whom he had brought with him from Italy, and recruited the legions to such an extent that each had six thousand two hundred infantry[2] and three hundred cavalry. In like manner he chose foot-soldiers and horse from the Latin allies out of the army which fought at Cannae. B.C. 204

XXV. As to the number of soldiers transported to Africa the authorities differ by no small figure. In some I find that ten thousand infantry, two thousand two hundred cavalry were embarked; in others sixteen thousand infantry, sixteen hundred cavalry; in others the total is more than doubled—thirty-five thousand infantry and cavalry. Some authorities have not introduced the figures, and it is among these that I should myself prefer to be counted in view of the uncertainty. Coelius, while he gives no figures, nevertheless immensely increases the impression of great numbers.[3] He says that birds fell to the ground owing to the shouts of the soldiers, and that such a multitude boarded the ships that not a human being seemed to be left either in Italy or Sicily.

[2] This is the maximum known for a legion.

[3] Another example of Coelius' rhetorical exaggeration is found in xxvii. 14 f.

A.U.C. 550

5 Milites ut naves ordine ac sine tumultu conscenderent, ipse eam sibi curam sumpsit; nauticos C. Laelius, qui classis praefectus erat, in navibus,[1] 6 ante conscendere coactos, continuit; commeatus imponendi M. Pomponio praetori cura data: quinque et quadraginta dierum cibaria, e quibus quindecim 7 dierum cocta, imposita. Ut omnes iam in navibus erant, scaphas circummisit ut ex omnibus [2] navibus gubernatoresque et magistri navium et bini milites 8 in forum convenirent ad imperia accipienda. Postquam convenerunt, primum ab iis quaesivit si aquam hominibus iumentisque in totidem dies quot frumen- 9 tum imposuissent. Ubi responderunt [3] aquam dierum quinque et quadraginta in navibus esse, tum edixit militibus ut silentium quieti, nautis sine certamine ad ministeria exsequenda bene oboedientes, praestarent. 10 Cum viginti rostratis se ac L. Scipionem ab dextro cornu, ab laevo totidem rostratas et C. Laelium praefectum classis cum M. Porcio Catone—quaestor 11 is tum erat—onerariis futurum praesidio. Lumina in navibus singula rostratae, bina onerariae haberent; in praetoria nave insigne nocturnum trium luminum

[1] in navibus $P(1)N$: navibus Sp? Froben 2: et navibus $N^{a}H$: in naves $A^{a?}JK$ Aldus.
[2] omnibus om. $P(1)N$.
[3] responderunt $P(3)HJK$: responsum est AN Aldus, Froben.

That the soldiers should board the ships in good order and without confusion the general took upon himself. As for the crews, Gaius Laelius, who was admiral of the fleet, ordered them to go on board first, and kept them there. The duty of loading supplies was assigned to Marcus Pomponius, the praetor. Rations for forty-five days—of these cooked rations for fifteen days—were placed on board. When now they had all embarked, Scipio sent ships' boats round with orders that pilots and masters from all the ships and two soldiers from each should assemble before the headquarters to receive commands. When they were assembled he first asked them if they had put on board water for men and beasts for just as many days as they had grain. When they replied that there was water for forty-five days on board, he thereupon gave orders to the soldiers to remain quiet and ensure silence in proper obedience to the seamen and without interference, that these might perform their duties. With twenty war-ships, he said, he and Lucius Scipio [1] on the right wing would protect the transports; on the left wing the same number of war-ships and Gaius Laelius, admiral of the fleet, with Marcus Porcius Cato, who was at that time quaestor; [2] that war-ships should have one lantern for each ship, transports two for each; that on the flagship the designation at night B.C. 204

[1] He had been with his older brother in Spain (XXVIII. iii. 2 ff.; iv. 2 ff.; xvii. 1) and in Sicily (above, vii. 2); consul in 190 B.C. with Laelius; XXXVI. xlv. 9.

[2] His quaestorship in this year is attested by Cicero Cat. Mai. 10; Brutus 60; not in 205 B.C., as Nepos Cato i. 3. Plutarch has him return in protest from Sicily to Rome, iii. 7.

A.U.C. 550

12 fore. Emporia ut peterent gubernatoribus edixit; fertilissimus ager eoque abundans omnium copia rerum est regio, et inbelles, quod plerumque in uberi agro evenit, barbari sunt, priusque quam ab [1] Carthagine subveniretur opprimi videbantur posse.
13 Iis editis imperiis redire ad naves iussi et postero die deis bene iuvantibus signo dato solvere naves.

XXVI. Multae classes Romanae e Sicilia atque ipso illo portu profectae erant; ceterum non eo bello solum—nec id mirum: praedatum enim tantummodo pleraeque classes ierant—sed ne priore quidem ulla
2 profectio tanti spectaculi fuit: quamquam, si magnitudine classis [2] aestimares, et [3] bini consules cum binis exercitibus ante traiecerant et prope totidem rostratae in illis classibus fuerant quot onerariis Scipio
3 tum traiciebat; nam praeter quadraginta longas naves quadringentis ferme onerariis exercitum travexit.
4 Sed et bellum bello secundum priori [4] ut atrocius

[1] ab om. $P(3\ R^2N$.
[2] classis $P(1)N$ Aldus: classes Sp^2A^1HJK Froben 2.
[3] aestimares, et $Sp(probably)A^1N^2$: extimares et HJK: es- (or aes-) timaret sed si $P\ (3)C^4$.
[4] priori $P(1)N$: priore A^1HJK Conway.

[1] Trading centres (emporia) along the western shore of the Gulf of Gabès (Syrtis Minor) gave this name to an entire region. It extended southward from Leptis Minor (100 miles from Carthage) and Thapsus. Cf. xxxiii. 9; XXXIV. lxii. 3; Polybius III. xxiii. 2; XXXI. xxi; Pliny N.H. V. 25. So public an announcement of a distant beachhead forces us to suspect that Scipio really intended to land near Utica, after misleading the enemy. Before the great convoy reached Africa spies could easily bring to Carthage news of the order. Cf. note on xxvii. 9; Gsell, op. cit. III. 213; Zielinski in Riv. di storia antica III. 74 f.

[2] But remoteness from Carthage would mean a greatly increased distance from Sicily, and on the long passage south-would be three lanterns. He ordered the pilots to steer for the Emporia.[1] There the soil is very fertile and for that reason the region supplies everything in abundance; and the natives are unwarlike, as is usually the case in a fertile country, and it seemed that they could be overpowered before aid could be sent from Carthage.[2] After he had issued these commands they were ordered to return to their ships and on the following day, with the blessing of the gods, to cast off at the given signal. B.C. 204

XXVI. Many Roman fleets had sailed from Sicily and out of that very harbour. Yet not only during that war was there never a sailing so spectacular—and no wonder, since most of the fleets had sailed out merely to plunder—but there had been nothing similar even in the previous war. And yet if one had based his comparison upon the size of the fleet, more than once [3] before had two consuls with two armies made the passage, and there had been almost as many war-ships in those fleets as now transports with which Scipio was crossing over. For in addition to forty war-ships only, he carried his army across on about four hundred transports. But the second war was made to appear to the Romans more terrible ward Roman ships would be in constant danger of attack, with few ports in which they might seek even a temporary refuge. The fertilissimus ager was little more than a strip—one more reason to believe that no Roman general would seriously propose to launch a campaign against Carthage from such a coast.

[3] Exactly twice: in 256 B.C. L. Manlius Vulso and M. Atilius Regulus (xxviii. 5) with 330 war-ships (Polybius I. xxv. 7; xxix. 1); in 255 B.C. M. Aemilius Paulus and Ser. Fulvius Nobilior with 350, but no army, and shipwrecked on their return; ibid. xxxvi. 10 ff.

A.U.C. 550

Romanis videretur, cum quod in Italia bellabatur, tum ingentes strages tot exercituum simul caesis
5 ducibus effecerant, et Scipio dux partim factis fortibus partim suapte fortuna quadam, ingenti ad incrementa gloriae re,[1] celebratus converterat animos,
6 simul et mens ipsa traiciendi, nulli ante eo bello duci temptata, quod ad Hannibalem[2] detrahendum ex Italia transferendumque et finiendum in Africa
7 bellum se transire volgaverat. Concurrerat ad spectaculum in portum omnis turba non habitantium modo Lilybaei, sed legationum omnium ex Sicilia, quae et ad prosequendum Scipionem officii causa convenerant et praetorem provinciae M. Pomponium 8 secutae fuerant; ad hoc legiones quae in Sicilia relinquebantur ad prosequendos commilitones processerant; nec classis modo prospectantibus e terra, sed terra etiam omnis circa referta turba spectaculo navigantibus erat.

XXVII. Ubi illuxit, Scipio e praetoria nave si-
2 lentio[3] per praeconem facto "Divi divaeque" inquit "qui[4] maria terrasque colitis, vos precor quaesoque uti quae in meo imperio gesta sunt, geruntur, postque gerentur,[5] ea mihi, populo plebique Romanae, sociis nominique Latino qui populi Romani quique meam

[1] re inserted by Harant, Riemann (momento by M. Müller), to relieve a desperate situation in which ingenti would have to agree with fortuna. For ingenti ad (all MSS., but corrupt according to Conway) there are several unsatisfactory emendations.

[2] temptata . . . Hannibalem A^1N^1(marg.)HJK Aldus, Froben: om. (and de- also) $P(1)N$; temptata probably corrupt, Conway.

[3] navigantibus erat . . . silentio A^1N^1HJK: om. $P(1)N$, probably three lines,

[4] qui om. $P(3)$.

than the first both by being carried on in Italy and by the immense losses which befell so many armies, with the death of their generals at the same time. Furthermore Scipio, whom men praised as a general partly because of his brave deeds, partly because of a good fortune peculiarly his own—a matter of the greatest importance to his growing celebrity—had commanded attention, as had also the very thought, not hazarded by any previous general in this war, of crossing the sea. For he had spread the report that he was making the passage in order to draw Hannibal out of Italy and, shifting its scene, to bring the war to an end in Africa. To see that sight there had flocked to the harbour a crowd made up, not only of all the inhabitants of Lilybaeum, but of all the delegations from Sicily which had arrived to show their respect as an escort to Scipio, and of those that had followed the praetor of the province, Marcus Pomponius. In addition the legions that were being left behind in Sicily had turned out to escort their fellow-soldiers. And not only was the fleet a spectacle for those who viewed it from the shore, but also the whole densely crowded shore on this side and that was a sight for those who were sailing. B.C. 204

XXVII. When the day dawned Scipio on his flagship, after silence had been secured by a herald, prayed: "Ye gods and goddesses who inhabit seas and lands, I pray and beseech you that whatever under my authority has been done, is being done, and shall henceforth be done, may prosper for me, for the Roman people and the commons, for allies and Latins who by land, by sea, and by rivers follow the [5] postque gerentur A^4H (-untur) JK Eds. : om. $P(1)N$.

A.U.C. 550

sectam, imperium auspiciumque terra mari amnibus-
3 que[1] secuntur, bene verruncent, eaque vos omnia bene iuvetis, bonis auctibus auxitis; salvos incolumesque victis perduellibus victores, spoliis decoratos, praeda onustos[2] triumphantesque mecum domos reduces sistatis; inimicorum hostiumque ulciscendorum copiam
4 faxitis; quaeque populus Carthaginiensis in civitatem nostram facere molitus est, ea ut mihi populoque Romano in civitatem Carthaginiensium exempla edendi facultatem detis."
5 Secundum has preces cruda exta caesa[3] victima, uti mos est, in mare proiecit tubaque signum dedit
6 proficiscendi. Vento secundo vehementi satis profecti[4] celeriter e conspectu terrae ablati sunt; et a meridie nebula occepit[5] ita vix ut concursus navium inter se vitarent; lenior ventus in alto factus.
7 Noctem insequentem eadem caligo obtinuit; sole orto est discussa, et addita vis vento. Iam terram cerne-
8 bant. Haud ita multo post gubernator Scipioni ait non plus quinque milia passuum Africam abesse; Mercuri promunturium se cernere; si iubeat eo
9 dirigi, iam in portu fore omnem classem. Scipio, ut in conspectu terra fuit, precatus deos[6] uti bono rei

[1] amnibusque P(1 except D, which om.) NHJK Conway (retaining the antique flavour suited to a formal prayer) : amnibus rejected by Held, Madvig and most recent Eds.
[2] praeda onustos om. SpHJK.
[3] caesa JK Aldus, Froben : cesam (with victimam) A^1N^1H : om. P(1)N.
[4] profecti P(1)NHJK Eds. : provecti conj. Weissenborn, Conway.
[5] occepit PRSpJK : occeperat Aldus : accepit C : ex- B Eds. : cepit MAN.
[6] deos om. P(1)N.

lead, authority and auspices of the Roman people B.C. 204 and of myself; and that ye lend your kind aid to all those acts and make them bear good fruit; that when the foe has been vanquished, ye bring the victors home with me safe and sound, adorned with spoils, laden with booty, and in triumph; that ye grant power to punish opponents and enemies; and that ye bestow upon the Roman people and upon me the power to visit upon the state of the Carthaginians the fate that the people of Carthage have endeavoured to visit upon our state."

Immediately after this prayer a victim was slain and Scipio threw the organs raw into the sea, as is customary,[1] and by a trumpet gave the signal to sail. A favouring wind sufficiently strong quickly carried them out of sight of land. And after mid-day they encountered a fog, so that with difficulty could they avoid collisions between the ships. In the open sea the wind was gentler. Through the following night the same fog held; and when the sun was up, it was dispersed and the wind increased in force. Already they were in sight of land. Not very long afterwards the pilot told Scipio that Africa was not more than five miles away; that they sighted the Promontory of Mercury;[2] if he should order him to steer for that, the entire fleet would soon be in port. Scipio, now that the land was visible, after a prayer to the gods that his sight of Africa might be a

[1] For this practice when ships were setting sail with ceremony v. Cicero N.D. III. 51 fin.; cf. Servius on Aeneid V. 238; Macrobius Sat. III. ii. 2 ff.

[2] This headland, now Cap Bon (Ras Adar), marks the eastern entrance to the Bay of Tunis. It is 45 miles from Carthage, and is the nearest point to Sicily. Cf. Pliny N.H. V. 23 f.; Strabo XVII. iii, 13, 16; Mela I. 34.

A.U.C. 550

publicae suoque Africam viderit,[1] dare vela et alium 10 infra navibus accessum petere iubet. Vento eodem ferebantur; ceterum nebula sub idem ferme tempus quo pridie exorta conspectum terrae ademit, et ventus 11 premente nebula cecidit. Nox deinde incertiora omnia fecit; itaque ancoras, ne aut inter se concurrerent naves aut terrae[2] inferrentur, iecere.
12 Ubi inluxit, ventus idem coortus nebula disiecta aperuit omnia Africae litora. Scipio, quod esset proximum promunturium percunctatus, cum Pulchri promunturium id vocari audisset. "Placet omen" 13 inquit; "huc dirigite naves." Eo classis decurrit, copiaeque omnes in terram expositae sunt.

Prosperam navigationem sine terrore ac tumultu fuisse permultis Graecis Latinisque auctoribus credidi.
14 Coelius unus,[3] praeterquam quod non mersas fluctibus naves, ceteros omnes caelestes maritimosque terrores, postremo abreptam tempestate ab Africa classem ad insulam Aegimurum inde aegre correctum cursum ex-

[1] viderit $P(1)N$ Eds.: videret A^1HJK.

[2] inter se . . . aut terrae N^1HJK(and A^1, om. aut) interrae $P(3)$, om. 25 letters.

[3] Coelius (or cael-) unus M^3A^1HJK: caecilius (or cec- $P(1)N$.

---

[1] I.e. farther along the coast. Cf. Caesar B.G. IV. 36 fin. He meant inside the Bay (not towards the Emporia), there being no harbour on either side of the Cape. His order to the helmsmen (at Lilybaeum, xxv. 12) to steer for the Emporia was probably a ruse (cf. note there); or it merely named a rendezvous in case the convoy should be scattered. A complete change in his plan for the campaign could not be made suddenly.

[2] I.e. of Apollo, translating Polybius' τοῦ Καλοῦ ἀκροτήριον (III. xxii. 5), who in the same passage has τὸ Καλὸν ἀκροτήριον.

blessing to the state and to himself, gave orders to make sail and to seek another landing-place for the ships farther down.[1] They were running before the same wind; but at about the same time as on the preceding day a fog appeared cutting off the sight of land, and under the weight of fog the wind dropped. Then night added to all their uncertainties; so they cast anchor, that the ships might not collide or drift onto the shore. When day dawned the same wind sprang up and by dispelling the fog revealed the whole African coast. Scipio inquired what the nearest promontory was, and upon being told it was called Cape of the Fair God,[2] he said "A welcome omen! steer your ships this way!" There the fleet came into port and all the troops were disembarked.[3] B.C. 204

That the passage was successful and free from alarm and disorder I have accepted on the authority of many Greek and Latin writers. Coelius[4] alone describes all the terrors of weather and waves—everything short of saying that the ships were overwhelmed by the seas. He relates that finally the fleet was swept by the storm away from Africa to the island of Aegimurus,[5] and that from there the proper (xxiii. 1). Cf. Apollinis, XXX. xxiv. 8; Pliny N.H. l.c.; Mela I. 34; Ἀπολλώνιον, Dio Cass. (Zonaras) IX. xii. 3 and Strabo XVII. l.c. The modern name is Ras Sidi Ali el Mekki.

[3] Inside the Cape, probably near modern Porto Farina, not far from Utica; Appian Pun. 13 fin.

[4] Cf. xxv. 3. We may, however, suspect a slip of Livy's memory, or an error in verification of a source. See p. 316, n. 1.

[5] North-west of the Prom. Mercurii (Hermaeum) and about 30 miles north-east of Carthage, now el Djamur (also called Zembra); XXX. xxiv. 9, 11 f.; Strabo II. v. 19 fin.; VI. ii. 11 fin. Pliny has two Aegimoeroe, V. 42.

A.U.C. 550

15 ponit, et prope obrutis navibus iniussu imperatoris scaphis, haud secus quam naufragos, milites sine armis cum ingenti tumultu in terram evasisse.

XXVIII. Expositis copiis Romani castra in pro- 2 ximis tumulis metantur. Iam non in maritimos modo agros conspectu primum classis, dein tumultu egredientium in terram pavor terrorque pervenerat, sed 3 in ipsas urbes. Neque enim hominum modo turba, mulierum puerorumque agminibus immixta, omnes passim compleverat vias, sed pecora quoque prae se agrestes agebant, ut relinqui subito Africam diceres. 4 Urbibus vero ipsis maiorem quam quem secum attulerant terrorem inferebant; praecipue Carthagini [1] 5 prope ut captae tumultus fuit. Nam post M. Atilium Regulum et L. Manlium [2] consules, annis prope quinquaginta, nullum Romanum exercitum viderant praeter praedatorias classes, quibus escensiones in 6 agros maritimos [3] factae erant, raptisque quae obvia fors fecerat prius recursum semper ad naves quam 7 clamor agrestes conciret fuerat. Eo maior tum fuga pavorque in urbe fuit. Et hercule neque exercitus domi validus neque dux quem opponerent erat. Hasdrubal Gisgonis filius genere, fama, divitiis, regia tum etiam adfinitate longe primus civitatis erat;

[1] Carthagini M^1 or $M^2A^cN^1HJK$ Aldus, Froben: -nis $P(1)M^2N$.

[2] Regulum . . . Manlium om. $P(1)N$, supplied from A^cN^cHJK.

[3] maritimos om. $P(1)N$.

[1] This entire statement about storm and wreck is disproved by a fragment (41) of Coelius' Book VI preserved by Nonius s.v. metari, p. 199 L. The fragment unquestionably refers to this landing. Cf. H. Peter, Hist. Rom. Rell. I. 159; Gsell op. cit. 212.

course was regained with difficulty; and that as the ships were all but sinking the soldiers, without waiting for an order from the general, made their way to the shore in small boats, as though they had been shipwrecked, with no arms and in the greatest disorder.[1] B.C. 204

XXVIII. After landing their troops the Romans laid out a camp on the nearest heights. By this time, first from the sight of the fleet, and then from the commotion produced as they were disembarking, apprehension and panic had reached not only the farms near the coast but even into the cities. For it was not merely the massed humanity that, interspersed with columns of women and children, had filled all the roads in every direction, but cattle also driven before them by the farmers, so that one would have said Africa was suddenly being deserted. But even in the cities they inspired greater alarm than that which they had brought with them. Especially at Carthage the uproar was almost like that of a captured city. For since the consulship of Marcus Atilius Regulus and Lucius Manlius, for almost fifty years [2] they had seen no Roman forces except only predatory fleets, by means of which descents had been made on farms near the sea; and seizing whatever chance had put in their way, the men had always raced back to their ships before the outcry should arouse the farmers. All the greater at this time was the flight and alarm in the city. They lacked also, to be sure, both a strong army at home and a general to confront the enemy. Hasdrubal the son of Gisgo was far the foremost man of the state in family, reputation, wealth, and at that time also by reason

[2] In reality just 52 years (256–204 B.C.); cf. xxvi. 2, note.

A.U.C. 550

8 sed eum ab ipso [1] illo Scipione aliquot proeliis fusum pulsumque in Hispania meminerant, nec magis ducem duci [2] parem quam tumultuarium exercitum
9 suum Romano exercitui esse. Itaque, velut si urbem extemplo adgressurus Scipio foret, ita conclamatum ad arma est, portaeque raptim clausae et armati in muris vigiliaeque et stationes dispositae, ac nocte
10 insequenti vigilatum est. Postero die quingenti [3] equites, speculatum ad mare turbandosque egredientes ex navibus missi, in stationes Romanorum
11 inciderunt. Iam enim [4] Scipio, classe Uticam missa, ipse haud ita multum progressus a mari tumulos proximos ceperat: equites et in stationibus locis idoneis posuerat et per agros miserat praedatum.

XXIX. Hi cum Carthaginiensi equitatu proelium cum commisissent, paucos in ipso certamine, plerosque fugientes persecuti, in quibus praefectum quoque
2 Hannonem, nobilem iuvenem, occiderunt. Scipio non agros modo circa vastavit, sed urbem etiam proximam
3 Afrorum satis opulentam cepit; ubi praeter cetera, quae extemplo in naves onerarias imposita missaque in Siciliam erant, octo milia liberorum servorumque capitum [5] sunt capta.
4 Laetissimus tamen Romanis [6] in principio rerum

[1] ipso om. $P(1)N$.
[2] duci A^1N^1HJK: om. $P(1)N$: duci credebant Madvig, Emend.
[3] quingenti (i.e. d) A^1N^1HJK Aldus, Froben: om. (after die) $P(1)N$.
[4] Iam enim A^1HJK Eds.: tamenim P: tamen $P^2(1)N$.
[5] capitum $P(1)N$ Eds.: om. $SpHJK$.
[6] Romanis A^5 or $A^{1\gamma}N^1HJK$ Aldus, Froben: omnis $P(1)(C?)N$: omnibus Gronovius.

[1] Cf. xxxiv. 14 ff., where this engagement may appear to be repeated with the same result for a commander of the same of his relationship to a king. But they recalled that B.C. 204 in a number of battles in Spain he had been routed and beaten by the self-same Scipio, and that the one general was no more a match for the other than was their own irregular army for the Roman army.

Accordingly they sounded the alarm, as if Scipio were intending forthwith to attack the city. The gates were hastily closed also and armed men posted on the walls, sentries and outposts stationed, while the following night no one slept. Next day five hundred horsemen, sent to the coast to reconnoitre and to break up the disembarkation, encountered Roman outposts. For already Scipio, after sending the fleet towards Utica, had himself advanced not very far from the sea and taken the nearest heights.
He had stationed cavalry on outpost duty in suitable positions and had sent others to plunder the countryside.

XXIX. These horsemen, having engaged in battle with the Carthaginian cavalry, slew a few in the actual engagement, many more as they pursued them in flight, among the number Hanno[1] also, the commander, a young man of rank. Scipio not only laid waste the farms all around but also captured the nearest city of the Africans, quite a prosperous place.
There, in addition to the other spoils which had been at once loaded on transports and sent to Sicily, eight thousand free persons and slaves were taken captive.

What brought the greatest joy, however, to the Romans at the beginning of the campaign was the [1] ame, a common name, however, at Carthage. But v. p. 343 nd notes.

A.U.C. 550

gerendarum adventus fuit Masinissae; quem quidam cum ducentis haud amplius equitibus, plerique cum duum milium equitatu tradunt venisse. Ceterum cum longe maximus omnium aetatis suae regum hic fuerit plurimumque rem Romanam iuverit, operae pretium videtur excedere paulum [1] ad enarrandum quam varia fortuna usus sit in amittendo recuperandoque paterno regno.

6 Militanti pro Carthaginiensibus in Hispania pater ei moritur; Galae nomen erat. Regnum ad fratrem regis Oezalcen pergrandem natu—ita mos apud 7 Numidas est—pervenit. Haud multo post Oezalce quoque mortuo maior ex duobus filiis eius Capussa, puero admodum altero, paternum imperium accepit. 8 Ceterum cum magis iure gentis quam auctoritate inter suos aut viribus obtineret regnum, exstitit quidam Mazaetullus nomine, non alienus sanguine [2] regibus, familiae semper inimicae ac de imperio varia fortuna 9 cum iis qui tum obtinebant certantis. Is concitatis popularibus, apud quos invidia regum magnae auctoritatis erat, castris palam positis descendere regem in 10 aciem ac dimicare de regno coegit. In eo proelio Capussa cum multis principum cecidit. Gens Maesuliorum omnis in dicionem imperiumque Mazae- 11 tulli concessit. Regio tamen nomine abstinuit contentusque nomine modico tutoris puerum Lacumazen, qui stirpis regiae supererat, regem appellat. 12 Carthaginiensem nobilem feminam, sororis filiam

[1] paulum $P(1)N$: paululum HJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] sanguine, N^1 or N^2HJK have a sanguine.

[1] The long digression (4½ chapters) is probably from a lost portion of Polybius, who had a personal acquaintance with Masinissa; for in his IX. xxv. 4 a conversation with him is reported.

arrival of Masinissa. Some authorities relate that B.C. 204
he came with no more than two hundred horsemen, the majority say with two thousand cavalry. But since he was far the greatest of all the kings of his time and gave the greatest aid to the Roman state, it seems worth while to digress a little to tell how checkered was the fortune he met with in losing and recovering his father's kingdom.[1]

While he was serving on the side of the Carthaginians in Spain his father died; Gala was his name. The kingdom came to the king's brother, Oezalces, a very aged man, such being the custom among the Numidians. Not long after, upon the death of Oezalces also, the elder of his two sons, Capussa, succeeded to his father's throne, the other son being a mere boy. But inasmuch as he held the kingship more by customary law of his people than by prestige among his countrymen or by his might, a man came forward named Mazaetullus, not unconnected by blood with the royal house and member of a family that had always been hostile and had contested the throne with different results against the house which was then in possession. After rousing his countrymen, among whom he had great influence because of the unpopularity of the royal family, and openly pitching his camp, he compelled the king to go out into battle-line and fight for his kingdom. In that battle Capussa fell with many of the leading men. The entire tribe of the Maesulii submitted to the sway and authority of Mazaetullus. Nevertheless he refrained from using the kingly title and, contented with the modest style of guardian, he gave the royal title to the boy Lacumazes, who also belonged to the royal line. He married a noble Carthaginian lady,

A.U.C. 550

Hannibalis, quae proxime Oezalci regi nupta fuerat, matrimonio sibi iungit spe Carthaginiensium socie-13 tatis, et cum Syphace hospitium vetustum legatis missis renovat, omnia ea auxilia praeparans adversus Masinissam.

XXX. Et Masinissa, audita morte patrui, dein nece fratris patruelis, ex Hispania in Mauretaniam —Baga ea tempestate rex Maurorum erat—traiecit.
2 Ab eo supplex infimis precibus auxilium itineri, quoniam bello non poterat, quattuor milia Maurorum
3 impetravit. Cum iis,[1] praemisso nuntio ad paternos suosque amicos, cum ad fines regni pervenisset, quingenti ferme Numidae ad eum convenerunt.
4 Igitur Mauris inde, sicut convenerat, retro ad regem remissis, quamquam aliquanto minor spe multitudo nec cum qua tantam rem adgredi satis auderet
5 convenerat,[2] ratus agendo ac moliendo vires quoque ad agendum aliquid conlecturum, proficiscenti ad Syphacem Lacumazae regulo ad Thapsum occurrit.
6 Trepidum agmen cum in urbem refugisset, et[3] urbem Masinissa primo impetu capit et ex regiis alios tradentes se recipit,[4] alios vim parantes occidit; pars maxima cum ipso puero inter tumultum ad

[1] iis PRM Aldus, Froben : hiis J : his CR²BDANHK.

[2] convenerat Alschefski, Madvig, Eds. : -venera P : -venere $P^2(3)$; -venire AN : -veniret (but after multitudo) A^1JK; (after auderet) Aldus, Froben : om. N^1H : Conway considers it an intrusion.

[3] et om. $P(1)N$ Aldus, as also et in next line.

[4] recipit $P(1)N$: recepit $Sp(apparently)HJK$ Aldus.

daughter of Hannibal's sister and lately wedded to B.C. 204
King Oezalces. He did so in the hope of an alliance with the Carthaginians, and with Syphax he renewed a guest-friendship of long standing, sending envoys for the purpose. All these advantages he was preparing against Masinissa.

XXX. And Masinissa having heard of the death of his uncle, and then that his cousin had fallen, crossed over from Spain into Mauretania, Baga being at that time king of the Mauri. From Baga with the most abject entreaties as a suppliant he obtained four thousand Mauri as an escort on his journey, being unable to obtain aid for the war. When with that escort, after first sending word to his father's friends and his own, he had reached the frontier of the kingdom, about five hundred Numidians joined him. Therefore from that point he sent back the Mauri to their king, as it had been agreed, and although the numbers that had joined him were considerably smaller than he had hoped for, and not such that he quite dared to attempt so great a venture with them, he thought that by vigorous action he would also gather up the forces needed for some success. Hence as Lacumazes, the prince, was on his way to Syphax, Masinissa encountered him near Thapsus.[1] When the frightened column had sought refuge in the city, Masinissa not only took the city by the first assault but received the surrender of some of the royal escort and slew others attempting resistance. The majority together with the boy himself in the midst of the commotion made [1] Unknown; probably a corruption of the name. Not to be confused with the distant city famous for Julius Caesar's victory, on the coast south of Hadrumetum (Sousse).

A.U.C. 550

Syphacem, quo primum intenderant iter, pervenerunt.
7 Fama huius modicae rei in principio rerum prospere actae convertit ad Masinissam Numidas, adfluebantque undique ex agris vicisque veteres milites Galae et incitabant iuvenem ad reciperandum paternum regnum.
8 Numero militum aliquantum Mazaetullus superabat; nam et ipse eum exercitum quo Capussam vicerat et ex receptis post caedem regis aliquot habebat, et puer Lacumazes ab Syphace auxilia
9 ingentia adduxerat. Quindecim milia peditum Mazaetullo, decem milia equitum erant, quibus cum Masinissa nequaquam tantum peditum equitumve [1] habente acie conflixit. Vicit tamen et veterum militum virtus et prudentia inter Romana et Punica
10 arma exercitati ducis; regulus cum tutore et exigua Masaesuliorum manu in Carthaginiensem agrum perfugit. Ita recuperato regno paterno Masinissa, quia sibi adversus Syphacem [2] haud paulo maiorem restare dimicationem cernebat, optimum ratus cum fratre pa-
11 truele gratiam reconciliare, missis qui et puero spem facerent, si in fidem Masinissae sese permisisset, futurum eum in eodem honore quo apud Galam Oezalces
12 quondam fuisset, et [3] Mazaetullo praeter inpunitatem sua omnia cum fide restitui sponderent, ambo 13 praeoptantes exsilio modicam domi fortunam, omnia,

[1] -ve $P(1)N$ Aldus: -que Sp?HJK Froben 2.
[2] adversus Syphacem $P^2(1)N$ Aldus: cum -ce Sp?HJK Froben 2.
[3] et, after this $P(1)NHJK$ have qui; but et qui does not balance missis qui et above: qui is rejected by most Editors, retained by Conway.

their way to Syphax, towards whom they had originally directed their march. The report of this modest success at the beginning of the campaign brought the Numidians over to Masinissa, and from farms and villages on all sides old soldiers of Gala flocked to him; and they spurred the young man on to recover the kingdom of his father. B.C. 204

In the number of his soldiers Mazaetullus was considerably superior; for not only did he himself have the army with which he had defeated Capussa, and a number of men whom he had taken over after the slaying of the king, but also the young Lacumazes had brought up very large auxiliary forces from Syphax. Fifteen thousand infantry Mazaetullus had and ten thousand cavalry; and with these he engaged in battle with Masinissa, who was far from having so great a number of infantry or cavalry. Nevertheless victory was won by the courage of the veteran soldiers and the sagacity of a general who had been trained in the war between Roman and Carthaginian armies. The prince with his guardian and a very small band of Masaesulians sought refuge in the territory of Carthage. So, having recovered his father's kingdom, Masinissa, seeing that his remaining conflict against Syphax would be considerably more serious, thought it best to be reconciled with his cousin. Accordingly he sent men to encourage the boy to hope that, if he should put himself in the hands of Masinissa, he would be held in the same honour as Oezalces had formerly been in the house of Gala. To Mazaetullus also they were to pledge, besides impunity, the faithful restoration of all his property. By this means, as they preferred a modest fortune at home to exile, Masinissa won ne id fieret, Carthaginiensibus de industria agentibus, ad sese perduxit.

A.U.C. 550

XXXI. Hasdrubal tum forte, cum haec gerebantur, apud Syphacem erat; qui Numidae, haud sane multum ad se pertinere credenti utrum penes Lacumazen an Masinissam regnum Maesuliorum esset, 2 falli eum magnopere ait, si Masinissam eisdem contentum fore quibus patrem Galam aut patruum eius Oezalcen credat: multo maiorem indolem in eo animi ingeniique esse quam in ullo gentis eius um- 3 quam fuisset; saepe eum in Hispania rarae inter homines virtutis specimen dedisse sociis pariter hostibusque. Et Syphacem et Carthaginienses, nisi orientem illum ignem oppressissent, ingenti mox incendio, cum iam nullam opem ferre possent, arsuros; 4 adhuc teneras et fragiles vires eius esse, vixdum coalescens foventis regnum. Instando stimulandoque pervincit [1] ut exercitum ad fines Maesuliorum 5 admoveat atque in agro de quo saepe cum Gala non verbis modo disceptatum, sed etiam armis certatum fuerat, tamquam haud dubie iuris sui, castra locet. Si quis arceat, quod [2] maxime opus sit, acie dimica- 6 turum; sin per metum agro cedatur, in medium regnum [3] eundum. Aut sine certamine concessuros in dicionem eius Maesulios aut nequaquam pares futuros armis.

[1] pervincit $P(1)NH$; -vicit JK Aldus, Froben.
[2] quod N^{1} or $N^{2}HJK$ Aldus, Froben: id quod x most Eds.: ut quod $P(1)N$.
[3] regnum $P(1)N$ Aldus, Eds.: regni $SpN^{2}JK$ Froben 2, Conway.

[1] For a previous visit, presumably at Siga (west of Oran), cf. XXVIII. xvii fin. and xviii.

them both over, although the Carthaginians purposely did everything to prevent it. B.C. 204

XXXI. Hasdrubal happened to be with Syphax[1] all the time that these events were in progress. And when the Numidian said he believed it was of no great importance to him whether the kingdom of the Maesulians was in the hands of Lacumazes or of Masinissa, Hasdrubal said he was very much mistaken if he believed that Masinissa would be content with what had satisfied his father Gala or his uncle Oezalces; that he had in him a far greater gift of spirit and talent than had ever been found in any man of his tribe; that often in Spain he had given allies and enemies alike evidence of a courage rare among men. He added that unless Syphax and the Carthaginians should put out that incipient flame, they would be consumed later by a mighty conflagration when they could no longer cope with it; that Masinissa's strength was still slight and frail, while he was nursing a kingdom whose wounds had barely begun to heal. By insisting and goading him on Hasdrubal brought him to the point of advancing his army to the frontier of the Maesulians and pitching his camp as though upon soil to which he was unquestionably entitled—land concerning which he had not only argued with Gala repeatedly but had contended also in arms. If anyone should try to drive him away he would fight a regular battle, which would be greatly to his advantage. But if Masinissa in fear should withdraw from that region they must advance into the interior of the kingdom. Either the Maesulians would submit without resistance to the rule of Syphax, or they would be no match for him in arms.

A.U.C. 550

7 His vocibus incitatus Syphax Masinissae bellum infert, et primo certamine Maesulios fundit fugatque. Masinissa cum paucis equitibus ex acie in montem— 8 Bellum [1] incolae vocant—perfugit. Familiae aliquot cum mapalibus pecoribusque suis—ea pecunia illis est—persecuti [2] sunt regem; cetera Maesuliorum 9 multitudo in dicionem Syphacis concessit. Quem ceperant exsules montem herbidus aquosusque est; et quia pecori bonus alendo erat, hominum quoque carne ac lacte vescentium abunde sufficiebat alimentis. 10 Inde nocturnis primo ac furtivis incursionibus, deinde aperto latrocinio infesta omnia circa esse; maxime uri Carthaginiensis ager, quia et plus praedae quam 11 inter Numidas et latrocinium tutius erat. Iamque adeo licenter eludebant ut ad mare devectam praedam venderent mercatoribus appellentibus naves ad id ipsum, pluresque quam iusto saepe in bello Carthaginienses [3] caderent caperenturque.

12 Deplorabant ea apud Syphacem Carthaginienses infensumque et ipsum ad reliquias belli persequendas instigabant. Sed vix regium videbatur latronem vagum in montibus consectari: XXXII. Bucar ex praefectis regis,[4] vir acer et inpiger, ad id delectus. Ei data quattuor milia peditum, duo equitum;

[1] Bellum $P(1)N$: balbum HJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] persecuti $P(3)SpHJ$ Froben 2: pro- AN Aldus.
[3] Carthaginienses $P(1)N$ Aldus: -sium Sp^2A^aHJK Froben 2.
[4] regis $P(1)NH$: regiis JK Aldus, Froben.

[1] No Mount Bellus is known.
[2] Thatched huts that were portable, often resembling an overturned ship, as Sallust describes them; Jug. xviii. 8.

Aroused by these words Syphax made war upon B.C. 204
Masinissa and in the first engagement routed the Maesulians and put them to flight. Masinissa with a few horsemen fled from the battle-field to a mountain called Bellus by the natives.[1] A considerable number of households followed the king with their portable huts [2] and their flocks, the latter being their only wealth. But the rest, the mass of the Maesulians, submitted to the rule of Syphax. The mountain which the fugitives had occupied is well supplied with grass and water and being suitable for the support of cattle, it was quite capable of sustaining men also who lived on flesh and milk. From it they rendered all the surrounding country unsafe, first by stealthy raids in the night and later by open brigandage. Most of all it was Carthaginian territory that was ravaged, because there was more plunder than among the Numidians, and also brigandage was safer. By this time they played their game so openly as to bring their booty down to the sea and sell it to traders who put in with their vessels for that very purpose; and more Carthaginians fell or were captured than occurred often in regular warfare.

The Carthaginians complained of all this to Syphax and, as he also was enraged, they spurred him on to complete what was left of the war. But it seemed hardly becoming for a king to pursue a nomad bandit in the mountains. XXXII. One of the king's officers, Bucar, a man of spirit and energy, was chosen for the purpose. Four thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry were given to him; and he

Cf. ibid. xlvi. 5; Pliny N.H. V. 22 (carried on wagons); Vergil Georg. III. 340.

A.U.C. 550

praemiorumque ingentium [1] spe oneratus, si caput Masinissae rettulisset aut vivum—id vero inaestimabile gaudium fore—cepisset. Palatos incurioseque [2] agentes inproviso adortus, pecorum hominumque ingenti multitudine a praesidio armatorum exclusa, Masinissam ipsum cum paucis in verticem montis compellit. Inde prope ut iam [3] debellato, nec praeda modo pecorum hominumque captorum missa ad regem, sed copiis etiam, ut aliquanto maioribus quam pro reliquiis belli, remissis, cum quingentis [4] haud amplius peditibus ducentisque equitibus degressum iugis Masinissam persecutus in valle arta faucibus utrimque obsessis inclusit. Ibi [5] ingens caedes Maesuliorum facta; Masinissa cum quinquaginta haud amplius equitibus per anfractus montis ignotos sequentibus se eripuit. Tenuit tamen vestigia Bucar adeptusque eum patentibus prope Clupeam urbem campis ita circumvenit ut praeter quattuor equites omnes ad unum interfecerit.[6] Cum iis ipsum quoque Masinissam saucium prope e manibus inter tumultum amisit. In conspectu erant fugientes; ala equitum dispersa lato campo, quibusdam, ut occurrerent, per obliqua tendentibus, quinque hostes sequebatur.[7] Amnis ingens fugientes

[1] ingentium Sp²A¹HJK Froben 2: -ti˜ PR² or R¹: -ti CMBDAN Aldus.

[2] -que Sp(apparently)C²HJK Aldus: si P(3): se AN: -que se CN².

[3] ut iam HJK Aldus, Froben: iam ut P(1)N.

[4] quingentis om. P(1)N (i.e. loss of d).

[5] Ibi A¹HJK Froben: ubi P(1)N.

[6] interfecerit Sp²HJK Froben 2: -ficeret P(1)N Aldus.

[7] sequebatur P(1): -bantur C²NJK Aldus: frequentabatur A¹H.

was laden with immense rewards in anticipation, if B.C. 204 he should bring back the head of Masinissa, or—and this would be a joy beyond price—should capture him alive. While they were scattered and off their guard Bucar unexpectedly attacked them, and separating the great number of cattle and men from their armed escort, he drove Masinissa himself with a few of his men up to the top of the mountain. Then, just as though the war had been already finished, he sent not only the booty in cattle and captives to the king but returned his troops also, as much too many for the remainder of the war. With not more than five hundred foot-soldiers and two hundred horsemen he pursued Masinissa (who had come down from the heights), and penned him in a gorge with both entrances blocked. There a great slaughter of the Maesulians took place; but Masinissa with no more than fifty horsemen following him through the unknown recesses of the mountain made his escape.
Bucar, however, kept on the trail and overtaking him in an open plain near the city of Clupea [1] so overwhelmed him that he slew every one of his horsemen except four. With these men, in the midst of the uproar he let the wounded Masinissa himself slip away when almost in his hands. The fugitives were in sight; a squadron of cavalry, scattering over the breadth of the plain, while some, in order to head them off, pushed on obliquely, was pursuing five enemies. A broad stream [2] was the refuge of the [1] Unknown, the name perhaps confused with that of the city on Cap Bon (XXVII. xxix. 7), now Kelibia. The place meant here was probably in north-western Tunisia or north-eastern Algeria.

[2] Probably the Bagradas (Medjerda), as streams of size are rare in the region.

A.U.C. 550

accepit—neque enim cunctanter, ut quos maior metus urgeret, immiserant equos—raptique gurgite[1] in 9 obliquum praelati. Duobus in conspectu hostium in praerapidum gurgitem haustis, ipse perisse creditus ac duo reliqui equites cum eo inter virgulta ulterioris ripae emerserunt.[2] Is finis Bucari sequendi fuit, nec ingredi flumen auso nec habere credenti se iam quem 10 sequeretur. Inde vanus auctor absumpti Masinissae ad regem rediit, missique qui Carthaginem gaudium ingens nuntiarent; totaque Africa fama mortis Masinissae repleta[3] varie animos adfecit.

11 Masinissa in spelunca occulta cum herbis curaret volnus, duorum equitum latrocinio per dies aliquot
12 vixit. Ubi primum ducta cicatrix, patique posse visus[4] iactationem, audacia ingenti pergit ire ad regnum repetendum; atque in ipso itinere haud plus quadraginta[5] equitibus conlectis cum in Maesulios
13 palam iam quis esset ferens venisset, tantum motum cum favore pristino tum gaudio insperato, quod quem perisse crediderant incolumem cernebant, fecit ut intra paucos dies sex milia peditum armatorum, 14 quattuor equitum ad eum convenirent,[6] iamque[7] non in possessione modo paterni regni esset, sed etiam socios Carthaginiensium populos Masaesuliorumque fines—id Syphacis regnum erat—vastaret.

[1] gurgite P(3): adding et AN Aldus, Froben: adding atque H[1]JK.

[2] emerserunt P(1)N Aldus: tenuerunt (om. inter) Sp[?]N[a]HJK Froben 2.

[3] repleta P(1)NHJK Eds.: perlata Allen, Luchs: repens allata M. Müller: om. Crévier, Madvig.

[4] visus SpA[a]HJK Froben 2: visa P(1)N: est visa Aldus.

[5] quadraginta (in numerals) P(1)N: XXX SpHJK.

[6] convenirent P(1)N Aldus, Froben, Eds.: confluerent HJK Conway.

[7] iamque P(1)N Aldus: atque SpHJK Froben 2.

fleeing; for without hesitation, under the pressure of a greater fear, they put their horses into it; and swept by the whirling current, they were borne obliquely past the enemy. When two of them had been drowned in the swiftly whirling waters before the eyes of the enemy, Masinissa himself, whom they believed to have perished, and the two remaining horsemen with him made their way out among the bushes of the farther bank. That was the end of pursuit for Bucar, as he did not dare enter the river and believed he had no one left to pursue. Then he returned to the king, falsely reporting that Masinissa had been drowned; and messengers were sent to bring tidings of great joy to Carthage. And all Africa was filled with the story of Masinissa's death, producing different emotions. B.C. 204

While Masinissa in a hidden cave was nursing his wound with herbs, he lived for some days on booty brought in by the two horsemen. As soon as the wound had closed and it seemed possible for him to endure jolting, with great audacity he set out to reclaim his kingdom. And after picking up not more than forty horsemen as he rode along, he came among the Maesulians, openly announcing now who he was; thereupon he caused a great stir, owing to their old-time favour and especially to their unexpected joy because they saw a man safe and sound whom they had believed to have perished. The results were that within a few days six thousand armed foot-soldiers and four thousand horsemen flocked to him, and that now he was not merely in possession of his father's kingdom but was even laying waste lands of allies of the Carthaginians and those of the Masaesulians, the kingdom, that is, of

A.U.C. 550 Inde inritato ad bellum Syphace, inter Cirtam Hipponemque in iugis opportunorum ad omnia montium consedit.

XXXIII. Maiorem igitur iam rem Syphax ratus quam ut per praefectos ageret, cum filio iuvene—nomen Vermina erat—parte exercitus missa imperat ut circumducto agmine in se intentum hostem ab 2 tergo invadat. Nocte profectus Vermina, qui ex occulto adgressurus erat; Syphax autem interdiu aperto itinere, ut qui signis conlatis acie dimicaturus 3 esset, movit castra. Ubi tempus visum est quo pervenisse iam circummissi videri poterant, et ipse leni clivo ferente ad hostem, cum multitudine fretus tum praeparatis ab tergo insidiis, per adversum 4 montem erectam aciem ducit. Masinissa fiducia maxime loci, quo multo aequiore pugnaturus erat, et ipse dirigit suos. Atrox proelium et diu anceps fuit, loco et virtute militum Masinissam, multitudine 5 quae nimio maior erat Syphacem iuvante. Ea multitudo divisa, cum pars a fronte urgeret, pars ab tergo se circumfudisset, victoriam haud dubiam Syphaci dedit, et ne effugium quidem patebat hinc a fronte, 6 hinc ab tergo inclusis. Itaque ceteri pedites equitesque caesi aut capti;[1] ducentos ferme equites Masinissa circa se conglobatos divisosque turmatim in

[1] aut capti P(1)NJK Aldus: om. SpHx Froben 2.

---

[1] This was Syphax' capital; XXX. xii. 3 7 f. Given to Masinissa, ibid. xliv. 12. Formidably defended by great cliffs. Later it was the city of Fronto, teacher of Marcus Aurelius. Rebuilt by Constantine, whose name it still bears. Cf. Appian Pun. 27; Strabo XVII. iii. 13.

[2] I.e. Hippo Regius (Bône), not the Hippo meant on p. 218.

Syphax. Consequently, having provoked Syphax to war, he established himself between Cirta [1] and Hippo [2] on a mountain range that in every way was favourable. B.C. 204

XXXIII. Therefore Syphax, thinking the affair was now too serious to be conducted by his officers, sent a part of the army under his young son, Vermina by name, with orders to lead his column round and attack the rear of the enemy, whose eyes would be upon the king himself. Vermina, who was to make a secret attack, set out by night. But Syphax broke camp and marched by day along an open road, since he intended to engage in battle formation, standards against standards. When the interval seemed to be such that the flanking party might be thought to have reached their objective already, the king on his part, relying both on numbers and on the ambuscade prepared in the rear, led his line up along the face of the mountain over a gentle slope leading in the direction of the enemy. Masinissa also, relying chiefly upon the much more favourable ground on which he was to fight, led his men out into line. The battle was fierce and long indecisive, while position and the courage of his soldiers aided Masinissa and numbers that were far superior favoured Syphax. That great army in its two sections—since the one pressed the enemy hard in front, while the other had accomplished its flanking movement in the rear—gave no uncertain victory to Syphax; and there was not even a way of escape open to men enclosed both in front and in the rear. Accordingly the rest, infantry and cavalry, were slain or captured; but some two hundred horsemen were ordered by Masinissa to mass about him, divide into tres partes erumpere iubet, loco praedicto in quem ex 7 dissipata convenirent fuga. Ipse qua intenderat inter media tela hostium evasit; duae turmae haesere; altera metu dedita hosti, pertinacior [1] in repugnando 8 telis obruta et confixa est. Verminam prope vestigiis instantem in alia atque alia flectendo itinera eludens, taedio et desperatione tandem fessum absistere sequendo coegit; ipse cum sexaginta equitibus ad 9 minorem Syrtim pervenit. Ibi cum conscientia egregia saepe repetiti regni paterni inter Punica Emporia gentemque Garamantum omne tempus usque [2] ad C. Laeli classisque Romanae adventum in 10 Africam consumpsit. Haec animum inclinant ut cum modico potius quam cum magno praesidio equitum ad Scipionem quoque postea venisse Masinissam credam; quippe illa regnanti [3] multitudo, haec paucitas exsulis fortunae conveniens est.

A.U.C. 550

XXXIV. Carthaginienses ala equitum cum prae-fecto amissa, alio [4] equitatu per novum dilectum comparato, Hannonem Hamilcaris filium praeficiunt.
2 Hasdrubalem subinde ac Syphacem per litteras nuntiosque, postremo etiam per legatos arcessunt;

[1] pertinacior P(1)NSp(apparently) Eds.: after this Conway adds altera (before it Aldus, Froben: after repugnando K).
[2] Garamantum omne tempus usque A[1]N[1]HJK Eds.: om. P(1)N.
[3] regnanti P(3)JK Aldus, Froben: -ntis AN Gronovius.
[4] alio P(1)N: alioque HJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] Cf. xxv. 12 and notes.
[2] Their land, south of modern Tripolitania, is now Fezzan, reaching back into the Sahara; Herodotus IV. 174, 183; Strabo II. v. 33; XVII. iii. 19, 23; Pliny N.H. V. 36; VI. 209; Mela I. 23, 45; Tacitus Ann. III. 74.
[3] In agreement with Polybius XXI. xxi. 2.

three troops, and so to break their way through, a B.C. 204 place being assigned in advance at which they should meet after their flight in different directions. He himself escaped in the direction he had chosen through the midst of the enemies' weapons. Two of the squadrons were held fast; one in fear surrendered to the enemy, while the other, offering a more stubborn resistance, was overwhelmed by missiles and slain. Vermina, who was almost at his heels, Masinissa evaded by turning now into this road and now into that, and compelled him at last to abandon pursuit when he was weary and had given up hope. He himself made his way with sixty horsemen to the Lesser Syrtis. There, with the proud consciousness of having repeatedly made claim to his father's kingdom, in the region between the Punic Emporia [1] and the tribe of the Garamantes [2] he spent the whole time until the arrival in Africa of Gaius Laelius and the Roman fleet. These circumstances incline me to believe that Masinissa came to Scipio also later with a small force [3] of cavalry rather than with a large one. For such great numbers are suited to a monarch, while my small figures match the plight of an exile.

XXXIV. The Carthaginians, having lost a squadron of cavalry with its commander [4] and acquired other horse by a fresh levy, placed Hanno the son of Hamilcar [5] in command. Again and again they summoned Hasdrubal and Syphax by letters and messengers, finally even by envoys. They bade

[4] I.e. the Hanno named in xxix. 1 without further description than nobilem iuvenem.

[5] According to Dio Cassius this Hanno was the son of Hasdrubal son of Gisgo; frag. 57. 65 f. See below, p. 343, n. 2.

U.C. 550

Hasdrubalem opem ferre prope circumsessae patriae iubent; Syphacem orant ut Carthagini, ut [1] universae 3 Africae subveniat. Ad Uticam tum castra Scipio mille ferme passus ab urbe habebat, translata a mari, ubi paucos dies stativa coniuncta classi fuerant. 4 Hanno nequaquam satis valido non modo ad lacessendum hostem, sed ne ad tuendos quidem a populationibus agros equitatu accepto, id omnium primum egit ut per conquisitionem numerum [2] equitum 5 augeret; nec aliarum gentium aspernatus, maxime tamen Numidas—id longe primum equitum in Africa 6 est genus—conducit. Iam ad quattuor milia equitum habebat, cum Salaecam nomine urbem occupavit 7 quindecim ferme milia ab Romanis castris. Quod ubi Scipioni relatum est, "Aestiva sub tectis [3] equitatus!" inquit. "Sint vel plures, dum talem 8 ducem habeant." Eo minus sibi cessandum ratus, quo illi segnius rem agerent, Masinissam cum equitatu praemissum portis obequitare atque hostem ad pugnam elicere iubet; ubi omnis multitudo se effudisset graviorque iam in certamine esset quam ut facile sustineri posset, cederet [4] paulatim; se in 9 tempore pugnae obventurum.[5] Tantum moratus quantum satis temporis praegresso visum ad elicien-

[1] ut $P(1)N$: et N^2HJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] egit . . . numerum A^1N^1HJK: erum P: numerum P^1 or $P^2(1)N$.
[3] tectis $P(1)N$: tectis agere A^1N^1HJK Aldus, Froben.
[4] cederet $P(1)N$ Aldus: cedere Sp^2N^1HJK Froben 2.
[5] obventurum $P(1)N$: venturum HJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] Evidently south-west of Utica and on the same long ridge. Not the same situation as that in xxxv. 7. Cf. Veith, op. cit. 579 f.

Hasdrubal bring aid to his native city, now almost B.C. 204 invested; they entreated Syphax to come to the rescue of Carthage, to the rescue of all Africa. Scipio at that time had his camp near Utica, about a mile from the city,[1] having shifted it from the seashore, where for a few days the camp had been established close to the fleet. Hanno, who had received a cavalry force not strong enough even to prevent the devastation of farms, to say nothing of attacking the enemy, made it his very first task to increase the number of his horsemen by recruiting. And though he did not reject men from other tribes, it was nevertheless especially Numidians that he hired, they being easily the foremost type of cavalry in Africa. Already he had about four thousand horsemen when he seized a city named Salaeca,[2] some fifteen miles from the Roman camp. When this was reported to Scipio, he said "Cavalry summering under roofs! Let them be even more numerous, provided they have that kind of a commander!" Thinking that the more spiritless they were the less must he delay, he sent Masinissa forward with cavalry, ordering him to ride up to the gates and draw the enemy out into battle. When the whole multitude should have sallied out and in battle should then prove too powerful for them to withstand easily, he was gradually to retire. He would himself come into the battle at the right moment. After delaying only long enough to give time, as it seemed, for Masinissa, who had preceded him, to draw out the enemy, Scipio followed with the [2] Mentioned only here and xxxv. 4. Possibly Henchir el Bey, west-south-west of Utica. Appian names a large town called Locha; Pun. 15.

u.c. 550

dos hostes, cum Romano equitatu secutus, tegentibus tumulis, qui peropportune [1] circa viae flexus oppositi [2] erant, occultus processit.

10 Masinissa ex composito nunc terrentis, nunc timentis modo aut ipsis obequitabat portis aut cedendo, cum timoris simulatio audaciam hosti
11 faceret, ad insequendum temere eliciebat. Nondum omnes egressi erant, varieque dux fatigabatur alios vino et somno graves arma capere et frenare equos cogendo, aliis, ne sparsi et inconditi sine ordine, sine signis omnibus portis excurrerent, obsistendo.
12 Primo [3] incaute se invehentes Masinissa excipiebat; mox plures simul conferti porta effusi aequaverant certamen: postremo iam omnis equitatus proelio
13 cum adesset, sustineri ultra nequiere. Non tamen effusa fuga Masinissa, sed cedendo sensim impetus eorum excipiebat,[4] donec ad tumulos tegentes
14 Romanum equitatum pertraxit. Inde exorti equites et ipsi integris viribus et recentibus equis Hannoni Afrisque pugnando ac sequendo fessis se circumfudere: et Masinissa flexis subito equis in pugnam
15 rediit. Mille fere [5] qui primi agminis fuerant, quibus [6] haud facilis receptus fuit, cum ipso duce Hannone
16 interclusi atque interfecti sunt; ceteros, ducis praecipue territos caede, effuse fugientes per triginta milia passuum victores secuti ad duo praeterea milia

[1] peropportune, Sp²H Froben 2 (om. per-).
[2] flexus oppositi Sp²HJK Froben 2 (with supposite AN Aldus): flexu supposite P(3).
[3] Primo P(1)NHJK Eds.: primos Perizonius, Riemann.
[4] excipiebat K Aldus, Froben, Eds.: ac- P(1)NHJK Alschefski, Conway.
[5] fere P(3)B^2N: ferme BSp(apparently)HJK Aldus.
[6] quibus P(1)N Aldus: ut quibus SpA¹HJK Froben 2.

Roman cavalry and advanced unseen under cover of the hills, which were most conveniently placed on both sides of a winding road. B.C. 204

Masinissa according to plan, now as inspirer of terror, now as the terror-stricken, would either ride up to the very gates, or retiring would tempt them to reckless pursuit whenever his pretence of fear added to the enemy's boldness. Not yet had all sallied out, and the commander was exerting himself in various ways, as he compelled some men heavy with wine and sleep to take up their arms and bridle their horses, and stood in the way of others, to prevent their dashing out of all the gates, scattering and unformed, with no order, no standards. At first, as they rashly charged, Masinissa would meet their attack. Later larger numbers, dashing out of a gate in a mass, had made it an even combat. Finally, when all their cavalry was engaged, they could no longer be withstood. Yet Masinissa did not flee in disorder, but retiring gradually would meet their attacks until he drew them to the hills which concealed the Roman cavalry. Thereupon the horsemen dashing out, themselves with undiminished strength and their horses fresh, surrounded Hanno and the Africans, who were exhausted by fighting and pursuit; and Masinissa, suddenly turning his horses about, went into battle again. About a thousand men who had been at the head of the column, finding retreat difficult, were cut off and slain along with Hanno himself, their commander. As for the rest, who were terrified especially by the death of their commander, the victors pursuing them in headlong flight for thirty miles either captured or slew about two thousand more horse-

A.U.C. 550

17 equitum aut ceperunt aut occiderunt. Inter eos satis constabat non minus ducentos Carthaginiensium equites fuisse, et divitiis quosdam et genere inlustres.

XXXV. Eodem forte quo haec gesta sunt die naves quae praedam in Siciliam vexerant cum commeatu rediere, velut ominatae ad praedam alteram
2 repetendam sese venisse. Duos eodem nomine Carthaginiensium duces duobus equestribus proeliis interfectos non omnes auctores sunt, veriti, credo, ne falleret bis relata eadem res; Coelius quidem et Valerius captum etiam [1] Hannonem tradunt.
3 Scipio praefectos equitesque, prout cuiusque opera fuerat,[2] ante[3] omnes Masinissam insignibus donis
4 donat; et firmo praesidio Salaecae imposito ipse cum cetero exercitu profectus, non agris modo quacumque incedebat populatis, sed urbibus etiam quibusdam
5 vicisque expugnatis, late fuso terrore belli, septimo die quam profectus erat magnam vim hominum et pecoris et omnis generis praedae trahens in castra redit, gravesque[4] iterum hostilibus[5] spoliis naves
6 dimittit. Inde omissis expeditionibus parvis popu-

[1] etiam $P(3)N$ Aldus: om. HJK Froben 2.
[2] fuerat $P(3)JK$: fuerant CANSpH.
[3] ante $P(1)N$ Eds.: et ante N^1HJK Aldus, Froben, Conway.
[4] in . . . gravesque A^1N^1HJK Aldus, Froben: -que $P(3)N$, om. one line.
[5] hostilibus $P(3)R^2N$: hostium HJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] Livy appears to have followed a lost part of Polybius. Two annalists only are mentioned (next sentence) who accepted but one encounter with cavalry commanded by a Hanno. Cf. Appian l.c. 14; Dio Cass. l.c. (= Zonaras IX. xii. 4 f.). These tell the story quite differently. Modern historians are divided, some insisting that one of the battles is a doublet, e.g. De Sanctis III. 2. 581 f.; C.A.H. VIII. 100, n. 2. Not so Gsell, op. cit. 216, n. 4; Neumann, Das Zeitalter men. Among these it was well established that B.C. 204

there were not less than two hundred Carthaginian horsemen, some of them distinguished both for wealth and noble blood.

XXXV. On the same day on which these events took place the ships which had carried booty to Sicily happened to return with supplies, as though with a presentiment that they had come for booty a second time. Not all the historians vouch for the slaying of two Carthaginian commanders of the same name in two cavalry battles, fearing, I suppose, unwittingly to tell the same story twice.[1] Coelius and Valerius, to be sure, relate that Hanno too was captured.[2]

Scipio bestowed conspicuous rewards upon the commanders and the horsemen according to the service each had rendered, and above all on Masinissa. And having posted a strong garrison at Salaeca, he set out himself with the rest of the army. Laying waste not merely the farms wherever he went, but storming certain cities also and villages, while the alarm of the war was spread far and wide, on the seventh day after his departure he returned to camp bringing a great number of men and cattle and much booty of every kind; and again he sent away the ships loaded down with spoils of the enemy. Then, giving up small raids and petty pillaging, he applied der punischen Kriege 522; Karstedt, Gesch. der Karthager III. 337 f., 545.

[2] This is the statement of Appian also and Dio Cass. (Zon.), who add (ll. cc.) that the prisoner was exchanged for Masinissa's own mother. So much detail seems to establish the historicity of the second engagement reported. As for the first (xxix. 1), something more than identity of a name (especially of a common name) is needed to stamp it as necessarily fictitious.

A.U.C. 550

lationibusque [1] ad oppugnandam Uticam omnes belli vires convertit, eam deinde, si cepisset, sedem ad
7 cetera exsequenda habiturus. Simul et a classe navales socii, qua ex parte urbs mari adluitur, et [2] terrestris exercitus ab [3] imminente prope ipsis
8 moenibus tumulo est admotus. Tormenta machinasque et advexerat secum, et ex Sicilia missa cum commeatu erant, et nova in armamentario, multis talium operum artificibus de industria inclusis, fiebant.
9 Uticensibus tanta undique mole circumsessis in Carthaginiensi populo, Carthaginiensibus in Hasdrubale ita, si is movisset Syphacem, spes omnis erat; sed desiderio indigentium auxilii tardius cuncta
10 movebantur. Hasdrubal intentissima conquisitione cum ad triginta milia peditum, tria equitum confecisset,[4] non tamen ante adventum Syphacis 11 castra propius hostem movere est ausus. Syphax cum quinquaginta milibus peditum, decem equitum advenit, confestimque motis a Carthagine castris haud procul Utica munitionibusque Romanis consedit.
12 Quorum adventus hoc tamen momenti fecit ut

[1] parvis populationibusque, P(3)N om. all but -que, one line.

[2] et, before this P(1)NHJK have a repeated simul, rejected by Madvig, Emend., retained by Conway.

[3] ab with abls. SpHJK Froben 2, Luchs, Conway: ad with accusatives P(1)N Aldus, Madvig, Weissenborn[3].

[4] confecisset P(1)N Aldus: ef- SpN[a]H[2]JK Froben 2.

[1] At the north-east end of a long ridge. Just beyond there was a small island on which lay the oldest quarter of the city, at least 200 years older than Carthage (cf. Gades, p. 141, n. 1). The Medjerda (Bagradas) has since changed its winding course far to the west, and coming within less than half a mile of the ridge, has brought down alluvial deposits so all his military resources to the siege of Utica, with B.C. 204 the intention of having that city, if captured, as a base henceforth for all remaining operations. From the fleet marines were brought up to the city on the side where it is washed by the sea,[1] and at the same time land forces on the side where a height almost overhung the very walls. Artillery and engines he had not only brought with him but they had also been sent from Sicily with the supplies, and new ones were being made in an arsenal where many makers of such devices had been interned for the purpose.[2]

For the people of Utica, completely beset by so great a force, all their hope was in the Carthaginian people; for the Carthaginians it was in Hasdrubal, provided he should prevail upon Syphax. But everything was moving more slowly than people in need of help desired. Although Hasdrubal by most intensive recruiting had made up a total of about thirty thousand infantry and three thousand cavalry, it was not before the arrival of Syphax, however, that he dared to move his camp nearer to the enemy. Syphax came with fifty thousand foot-soldiers and ten thousand horsemen, whereupon Hasdrubal, at once moving his camp away from Carthage, established himself not far from Utica and the Roman fortifications. Their arrival had this effect at any extensive that the ruins of Utica are now about 7 miles from the nearest coast-line. Cf. Caesar B.C. II. xxiv. 1, 3; Polybius I. lxxv. 5; XV. ii. 8 (his name for the river is Macaras); Strabo XVII. iii. 13 fin.; Pliny N.H. V. 24. Appian Pun. 75 errs as to the distance from Carthage, which was 27 miles (Itin. Ant. 22).

[2] The artisans as captives had become public slaves of the Roman people. Cf. those taken at New Carthage, XXVI. xlvii. 2; Polybius X. xvii. 6, 9.

A.U.C. 550

Scipio, cum quadraginta ferme dies nequiquam omnia experiens obsedisset Uticam, abscederet inde inrito 13 incepto. Et—iam enim[1] hiems instabat—castra hiberna in promunturio, quod tenui iugo continenti adhaerens in aliquantum maris spatium extenditur, 14 communit. Uno vallo et navalia[2] castra amplectitur; iugo medio legionum castris inpositis, latus[3] ad septentrionem versum subductae naves navalesque socii tenebant, meridianam vallem ad alterum litus
15 devexam equitatus.[4] Haec in Africa usque ad extremum autumni gesta.

XXXVI. Praeter convectum undique ex populatis circa agris frumentum commeatusque ex Sicilia atque Italia advectos, Cn. Octavius propraetor ex Sardinia ab Ti. Claudio praetore, cuius ea provincia erat, in-
2 gentem vim frumenti advexit; horreaque non solum ea[5] quae iam facta erant repleta, sed nova aedificata. Vestimenta exercitui deerant; id mandatum Octavio ut cum praetore ageret, si quid ex ea provincia com-
3 parari ac mitti posset. Ea quoque haud segniter curata res; mille ducentae togae brevi spatio et[6] duodecim milia tunicarum missa.

[1] Et iam (or etiam) enim P(1)NHSp?: iam enim JK Froben 2: etenim Aldus.

[2] navalia Sp?HJK Froben 2, Eds.: -lium P(1)N Aldus: navalia et Gronovius, Madvig, Conway.

[3] latus P(1)NHJK: litus Sp? Froben 2: in litus Aldus.

[4] devexam equitatus Sp?A^{1}N^{1}HJK Froben 2: om. P(1), one line.

[5] ea om. P(1)N.

[6] et P(3)R^{2}N Aldus, Eds.: om. RHJK Froben 2, Conway.

rate, that Scipio, after besieging Utica for about B.C. 204 forty days to no purpose in spite of all his attempts, retired from the place, having failed in his undertaking. And as winter was now at hand, he fortified a winter camp on a promontory which is connected with the mainland by a narrow ridge, but extends for a considerable distance into the sea.[1] By a single earthwork he enclosed the naval camp as well. The camp of the legions being placed on the middle of the ridge, its northern side was occupied by the beached ships and the men to man them, its southern slope, descending to the other shore, by the cavalry. Such were the events in Africa down to the end of autumn.

XXXVI. Besides the grain brought in on all sides from ravaged farms of the whole region and supplies transported from Sicily and Italy, Gnaeus Octavius, the propraetor, brought a large amount of grain sent from Sardinia by Tiberius Claudius, the praetor in charge of that province. And not only were the granaries filled which had been built already, but also new granaries were built. Clothing was insufficient for the army. Octavius was ordered to obtain from the praetor whatever could be assembled and sent from that province. This charge also was carried out without delay. Twelve hundred togas were sent in a short time and twelve thousand tunics.

[1] Caesar describes the site, still called Castra Corneli(an)a in his time and much later; B.C. II. xxiv; cf. Appian B.C. II. 44; Pliny N.H. V. 29; Ptolemy IV. 3. It was at the north-east end of a long ridge projecting into the sea (a cape Polybius calls it, XIV. vi. 7), and parallel to the ridge on which lay Utica, nearly two miles farther west, with a broad marsh between them. Caesar's text gives half the actual distance.

A.U.C. 550

4 Aestate ea qua haec in Africa gesta sunt P. Sempronius consul cui Bruttii provincia erat in agro Crotoniensi cum Hannibale in ipso itinere tumultuario proelio conflixit. Agminibus magis quam acie pugnatum est. Romani pulsi, et tumultu verius quam pugna ad mille et ducenti de exercitu consulis interfecti; in castra trepide reditum,[1] neque oppugnare tamen ea hostes ausi. Ceterum silentio proximae noctis profectus inde consul, praemisso nuntio ad P. Licinium proconsulem ut suas legiones admoveret, copias coniunxit. Ita duo duces, duo exercitus ad Hannibalem redierunt; nec mora dimicandi facta[2] est, cum consuli duplicatae vires, Poeno recens victoria animos faceret.[3] In primam aciem suas legiones Sempronius induxit; in subsidiis locatae P. Licinii legiones. Consul principio pugnae aedem Fortunae Primigeniae vovit, si eo die hostes fudisset; composque eius voti fuit. Fusi ac fugati Poeni; supra quattuor milia armatorum caesa, paulo minus trecenti vivi capti et[4] equi quadraginta[5] et undecim militaria signa. Perculsus adverso proelio Hannibal Crotonem exercitum reduxit.[6]

Eodem tempore M. Cornelius consul in altera

[1] trepide reditum $P(1)N$: trepidi (-de N^{1}) rediere $N^{1}HJK$ Aldus, Froben.

[2] facta $P(1)N$: facta est $N^{1}HJK$ Aldus, Froben.

[3] animos faceret A^{5}*?(altern.)N^{1}(altern.)HJK Aldus, Froben, Eds. (with* fecisset Madvig, Riemann): animo esset $P(1)N$.

[4] et $P(1)N$ Aldus: om. SpHJK Froben 2.

[5] quadraginta (numeral) $P(1)N$: quinquaginta $SpA^{1}HJK$.

[6] reduxit $P(1)N$ Aldus: ab- $Sp^{2}HJK$ Froben 2.

In the summer in which these events occurred in Africa Publius Sempronius, the consul who had the land of the Bruttii as his province, engaged with Hannibal in the territory of Croton in an unorganized battle while actually on the march. They fought in columns rather than in battle-line. The Romans were worsted, and in what was in fact a confused struggle rather than a battle about twelve hundred of the consul's army were slain. There was a panic-stricken retreat to the camp, and yet the enemy did not venture to attack it. But in the silence of the following night the consul set out, and after despatching a messenger to Publius Licinius, the proconsul, urging him to bring up his legions, he united their forces. Thus two generals and two armies once more confronted Hannibal, and there was no delay in engaging, since doubled forces emboldened the consul, as his recent victory did the Carthaginian. Sempronius led his legions into the first line, while Publius Licinius' legions were posted in reserve. At the beginning of the battle the consul vowed a temple to Fortuna Primigenia,[1] if he should rout the enemy that day; and he had his wish. The Carthaginians were routed and put to flight. Over four thousand armed men were slain, a little less than three hundred were captured alive, and forty horses and eleven military standards taken. Discouraged by defeat, Hannibal led his army back to Croton. B.C. 204

At the same time Marcus Cornelius, the consul, in

[1] The temple, dedicated in 194 B.C., stood on the Quirinal inside the Porta Collina; cf. XXXIV. liii. 5 f. The worship of this goddess came from Praeneste (Palestrina). She was so named as Jupiter's first-born daughter.

A.U.C. 550

parte Italiae non tam armis quam iudiciorum terrore Etruriam continuit, totam ferme ad Magonem ac 11 per eum ad spem novandi res versam. Eas quaestiones ex senatus consulto minime ambitiose habuit; multique nobiles Etrusci qui aut ipsi ierant aut miserant ad Magonem de populorum suorum de-12 fectione, primo praesentes erant condemnati, postea conscientia sibimet ipsi exsilium consciscentes, cum absentes damnati essent, corporibus subtractis bona tantum quae publicari poterant pigneranda poenae praebebant.

XXXVII. Dum haec consules diversis regionibus agunt, censores interim Romae M. Livius et C. Claudius senatum recitaverunt. Princeps iterum lectus [1] Q. Fabius Maximus; notati septem, nemo tamen qui 2 sella curuli sedisset. Sarta tecta acriter et cum summa fide exegerunt. Viam e foro bovario [2] ad Veneris circa foros publicos et aedem Matris Magnae
3 in Palatio faciendam locaverunt. Vectigal etiam novum ex salaria annona statuerunt. Sextante sal et Romae et per totam Italiam erat. Romae pretio

[1] lectus Sp?HJK Froben 2: delectus C²AN Aldus: di- P(3).

[2] bovario, after this P(1)NJK Aldus add an impossible et, deleted by Madvig.

[1] Begun in 206 B.C. under M. Livius Salinator for the punishment of Etruscan and Umbrian disloyalty; p. 43 med. Fugitives who escaped execution suffered confiscation of property (§ 12).

[2] Cf. XXVII. xi. 12.

[3] The nota of the censors was a mark or stigma affixed (in the revised list of citizens) to the names of such men as had been degraded by the censors, who added the reason in each case. Cf. XXIV. xviii. 2 ff., esp. 9.

[4] I.e. Venus Obsequens. Built 295 B.C., near the east end of the Circus Maximus, and on the side toward the Aventine;

the north of Italy held Etruria in check not so much B.C. 204 by arms as by the alarm produced by the trials,[1] while almost the whole land was inclined towards Mago and through him to the hope of a political change. In accordance with a decree of the senate he conducted these cases with no respect of persons. And at first many noble Etruscans who either had gone in person to Mago or had sent others to him reporting on the disloyalty of their communities, had appeared and had been condemned. Later on men who from a guilty conscience went into voluntary exile, on being condemned in absence, eluded bodily punishment, merely exposing their property instead to possible confiscation.[1]

XXXVII. While the consuls were thus employed in opposite regions, the censors Marcus Livius and Gaius Claudius at Rome meanwhile publicly read the list of senators. Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen princeps for the second time.[2] Seven men received their "mark,"[3] but no one who had occupied a curule chair. Repairs to public buildings and their roofs they enforced strictly and with the greatest fidelity. They let the contract for the making of a street leading out of the Cattle Market, on both sides of the spectators' stands, as far as the Temple of Venus,[4] also for the erection of a Temple of the Great Mother[5] on the Palatine. They also established a new revenue from the yearly production of salt. Both at Rome and throughout Italy salt was then sold at one-sixth of an as. The censors let

X. xxxi. 9. The stands for spectators were of wood, as the upper tiers of the Circus always continued to be.

[5] For thirteen years longer she was to remain in the Temple of Victory; cf. xiv. 14; XXXVI. xxxvi. 3 f.

A.U.C. 550

eodem, pluris in foris et conciliabulis et alio alibi
4 pretio praebendum locaverunt. Id vectigal commentum alterum ex censoribus satis credebant, populo iratum, quod iniquo iudicio quondam damnatus esset, et [1] in pretio salis maxime oneratas tribus quarum opera damnatus erat.[2] Inde Salinatori [3] Livio inditum cognomen.

5 Lustrum conditum serius quia per provincias dimiserunt censores, ut civium Romanorum in exercitibus quantus ubique esset referretur numerus.
6 Censa cum iis ducenta quattuordecim [4] milia homi-
7 num. Condidit lustrum C. Claudius Nero. Duodecim deinde coloniarum, quod numquam antea [5] factum erat, deferentibus ipsarum coloniarum censoribus, censum acceperunt, ut quantum numero militum, quantum pecunia valerent in publicis tabulis monu-
8 menta exstarent. Equitum deinde census agi coeptus est; et ambo forte censores equum publicum habebant. Cum ad tribum Polliam ventum est,[6] in qua M.

[1] et HJK Eds.: om. P(1)N.
[2] erat, P(1)NHJK Eds. add credebant (repeated): rejected by Madvig, Conway.
[3] Salinatori N^2 or $N'H^1JK$: -tor P(1)N.
[4] quattuordecim Conway (cf. ii. 17): decem quattuor P(1)N Eds. (cf. Periocha fin.): LXV $SpA'N'HJK$.
[5] antea HJK Froben 2: ante P(1)N Aldus.
[6] est P(1)NJK Eds.: esset Siesbye, Madvig, Conway: om. H.

[1] On these petty localities v. Vol. VI. p. 356, n. 1. In the Lex Iulia municipalis (45 B.C.) they are repeatedly mentioned as the lowest grades of communities, inferior to municipia, coloniae and praefecturae, which are implied here in alibi, as we cannot believe that any towns however small escaped the higher price. In Rome alone was the previous "ceiling" continued.

[2] How to reconcile this statement with the status of Livius' own Maecia (§ 13) as one of the rustic tribes and hence bound to contracts for the sale of salt at the same price at Rome, at a higher price even in market-towns and local centres,[1] and at prices which varied from place to place. This source of revenue was generally believed to have been devised by only one of the censors, who was angry with the people because he had formerly been condemned by an unjust verdict; and that in the price of salt those tribes by whose efforts he had been condemned were most heavily burdened.[2] Hence the cognomen Salinator was bestowed upon Livius. B.C. 204

The ceremony of purification was completed later than usual because the censors had sent men to the various provinces to report the number of Roman citizens in each of the armies. Including these, 214,000 men[3] were listed. Gaius Claudius Nero concluded the rite of purification. Then they received the census lists of the twelve colonies[4] presented by their own censors, as had never been done before. The purpose was that documents, to show what was their strength in the number of soldiers and what in money, might be found in the public records. Then they began to take the census of the knights; and it happened that both of the censors had horses from the state. When they had reached the Pollia tribe, in which stood the name of pay the higher price is a futile question, since the whole story bears the stamp of fiction. The state owned all salt works, but they were operated by contractors, who with prices raised could now pay more for their concessions. This amounted to putting a tax on salt except in Rome. Cf. Dio Cassius frag. 57. 70.

[3] Compared with 137,108 four years before; Vol. VII. p. 355, n. 3.

[4] Cf. xv. 5 ff., esp. 10.

A.U.C. 550

Livi nomen erat, et praeco cunctaretur citare ipsur 9 censorem, "Cita" inquit Nero "M. Livium"; et siv ex residua vetere simultate sive intempestiva iacta tione severitatis inflatus M. Livium, quia popu iudicio esset damnatus, equum vendere iussi 10 Item M. Livius, cum ad tribum Arniensem et nome conlegae ventum est, vendere equum C. Claudiu iussit duarum rerum causa, unius quod falsu adversus se testimonium dixisset, alterius quod no 11 sincera fide secum in gratiam redisset. Aeque foedum certamen inquinandi famam alterius cu suae famae damno factum est exitu censura 12 Cum in leges iurasset C. Claudius et in aerariu escendisset, inter nomina eorum quos aerarios reli 13 quebat dedit conlegae nomen. Deinde M. Livius i aerarium venit et [2] praeter Maeciam tribum, quae s neque condemnasset neque condemnatum aut consu lem aut censorem fecisset, populum Romanu omnem, quattuor et triginta tribus, aerarios reliqui 14 quod et innocentem se condemnassent et condem natum consulem et censorem fecissent, nequ infitiari possent aut iudicio semel aut comitiis bis a 15 se peccatum esse: inter [3] quattuor et triginta tribu et C. Claudium aerarium fore; quod si exemplu

[1] Aeque N^2(probably) Gronovius, Eds.: neque $P(1)N$ neque ibi $HN^1?$: itaque ibi A^1JK Aldus, Froben.

[2] venit et N^1HJK Aldus, Froben, Luchs: venit $P(1)$ Eds., Conway.

[3] inter Aldus, Froben: in HJK: om. $P(1)N$.

[1] The horse had been bought out of an allowance (aes equestre) from the state, but was not public property; Mommsen, Staatsrecht III. 256, n. 3.

[2] In the trial before the popular assembly; cf. Vol. VII p. 347 and note 1.

Marcus Livius, and while the herald was hesitating B.C. 204 to summon the censor himself, Nero said, "Summon Marcus Livius!" And whether as still nursing their ancient quarrel, or priding himself on an ill-timed display of strictness because he had been condemned by a verdict of the people, he ordered Marcus Livius to sell his horse.[1] Likewise Marcus Livius, when they had reached the Arniensis tribe and the name of his colleague, ordered Gaius Claudius to sell his horse for two reasons: one because he had given false testimony[2] against Livius, the other that he had not honestly been reconciled with him. Equally shameful at the close of their censorship was their contest in besmirching each the other's reputation to the detriment of his own. When Gaius Claudius had taken the oath that he had complied with the laws, upon going up into the Treasury and giving the names of those whom he was leaving as mere tax-payers,[3] he gave the name of his colleague. Then Marcus Livius came into the Treasury, and except for the Maecia tribe, which had neither condemned him nor after his condemnation voted for him either for consul or for censor, he left the entire Roman people, thirty-four tribes, as mere tax-payers, alleging that they had both condemned him, an innocent man, and after his condemnation had made him consul and censor, and could not deny that they had erred either once in their verdict or twice in the elections. He said that among the thirty-four tribes Gaius Claudius also would be a mere tax-payer; and that if he had a precedent

[3] Cf. Vol. VI. p. 231. Any action taken by a censor without approval of his colleague was void; Mommsen op. cit. II.[3] 358; cf. e.g. XLV. xv. 8.

A.U.C. 550

haberet bis eundem aerarium relinquendi, C. Claudium nominatim se inter aerarios fuisse relic-16 turum. Pravum certamen notarum inter censores; castigatio inconstantiae populi censoria et [1] gravitate 17 temporum illorum digna. In invidia censores cum essent, crescendi ex iis ratus esse occasionem Cn. Baebius tribunus plebis diem ad populum utrisque [2] dixit. Ea res consensu patrum discussa est, ne postea obnoxia populari aurae censura esset.

XXXVIII. Eadem aestate in Bruttiis Clampetia a consule vi capta, Consentia et Pandosia et ignobiles
2 aliae civitates voluntate in dicionem venerunt. Et cum comitiorum iam adpeteret tempus, Cornelium potius ex Etruria, ubi nihil belli erat, Romam acciri
3 placuit. Is consules Cn. Servilium Caepionem et C.
4 Servilium [3] Geminum creavit. Inde praetoria comitia habita. Creati P. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Quinctilius
5 Varus, P. Aelius Paetus, P. Villius Tappulus; hi duo cum aediles plebis essent, praetores creati sunt. Consul comitiis perfectis ad exercitum in Etruriam redit.

6 Sacerdotes eo anno mortui atque in locum eorum

[1] et $P(1)N$ (after gravitate JK): om. z Aldus, Froben 2.
[2] utrisque $P(1)N$ Eds.: utrique H Aldus, Froben, Conway (before ad JK).
[3] Caepionem . . . Servilium A^1N^1JK Eds.: om. $P(1)N$, one line.

---

[1] Baebius Tamphilus reached the consulship in 182 B.C.; XXXIX. lvi. 4.

[2] Chief town of the Bruttii, modern Cosenza, captured by the Carthaginians in 216 B.C. It returned to the Romans in 213, but had changed sides once more; cf. XXIII. xxx. 5; XXV. i. 2; XXX. xix. 10 (a repetition). Later an important for twice leaving the same man a mere tax-payer, B.C. 204

he would have left Gaius Claudius among them with express mention of his name. A perverted contest between the censors in regard to their "marks"; but to the fickleness of the people it was a rebuke worthy of a censor and in keeping with the earnestness of those times. Since the censors were unpopular, Gnaeus Baebius, a tribune of the plebs,[1] thinking it an opportunity to advance himself at their expense, named a day for both to appear before the people. That procedure was quashed by unanimity among the senators, lest the censorship should be subject thereafter to the caprice of the populace.

XXXVIII. During the same summer in the land of the Bruttii Clampetia was taken by storm by the consul. Consentia[2] together with Pandosia and other cities of no importance voluntarily submitted to his authority. And since the time for elections was now at hand, it was decided to summon Cornelius to Rome from Etruria, where there was no war. He announced the election of Gnaeus Servilius Caepio and Gaius Servilius Geminus as consuls. Then elections for the praetorships were held. Elected were Publius Cornelius Lentulus, Publius Quinctilius Varus, Publius Aelius Paetus, Publius Villius Tappulus, the last two being made praetors while they were plebeian aediles. The consul after the elections were over returned to the army in Etruria.

Priests who died that year and successors appointed point on the great inland road, Via Popilia, from Capua to Reggio (Regium); C.I.L. X. 6950 (= I. ii, ed. 2, 638). Clampetia was on the coast south-west of Consentia.

A.U.C. 550

suffecti: Ti. Veturius Philo flamen Martialis in locum M. Aemili Regilli, qui priore anno mortuus erat, 7 creatus inauguratusque; in M. Pomponi Mathonis auguris et decemviri locum creati decemvir M. Aurelius Cotta, augur Ti. Sempronius Gracchus admodum adulescens, quod tum perrarum in mandandis 8 sacerdotiis erat. Quadrigae aureae eo anno in Capitolio positae ab aedilibus curulibus C. Livio et M. Servilio Gemino, et ludi Romani biduum instaurati, item per biduum plebei ab aedilibus P. Aelio, P. Villio; et Iovis epulum fuit ludorum causa.

---

[1] Immediately correcting the opening words of the paragraph. Cf. xi. 14 for Regillus' death in 205 B.C.

[2] Pomponius, probably praetor in 216 B.C., had held two priesthoods concurrently, as did Otacilius in XXVII. vi. 15.

in their places were: Tiberius Veturius Philo, B.C. 204 elected and installed flamen of Mars in place of Marcus Aemilius Regillus, who had died in the preceding year;[1] in succession to Marcus Pomponius Matho, augur and decemvir,[2] were elected Marcus Aurelius Cotta as decemvir, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus as augur, being a mere youth, which was then a very unusual thing in the assignment of priesthoods. A gilded four-horse chariot was set up in that year on the Capitol by the curule aediles Gaius Livius and Marcus Servilius Geminus. And the Roman Games were repeated for two days, as were the Plebeian Games also for two days by the aediles Publius Aelius and Publius Villius; and on account of the festival there was a banquet for Jupiter.

LIBRI XXIX PERIOCHA

Ex Sicilia C. Laelius in Africam a Scipione missus ingentem praedam reportavit et mandata Masinissae Scipioni exposuit querentis quod nondum exercitum in Africam traiecisset. Bellum in Hispania finitum victore Romano quod Indibilis excitaverat; ipse in acie occisus, Mandonius exposcentibus Romanis a suis deditus. Magoni, qui Albingauni in Liguribus erat, ex Africa et militum ampla manus missa et pecuniae quibus auxilia conduceret, praeceptumque ut se Hannibali coniungeret. Scipio a Syracusis in Bruttios traiecit et Locros pulso Punico praesidio fugatoque Hannibale recepit. Pax cum Philippo facta est. Mater Idaea deportata est Romam a Pessinunte oppido Phrygiae, carmine in libris Sibyllinis invento, pelli Italia alienigenam hostem posse, si mater Idaea deportata Romam esset. Tradita est autem Romanis per Attalum regem Asiae. Lapis erat quem matrem deum incolae dicebant. Excepit P. Scipio Nasica Cn. filius eius qui in Hispania perierat, vir optimus a senatu iudicatus, adulescens nondum quaestorius, quoniam ita responsum iubebat ut id numen ab optimo viro exciperetur consecrareturque. Locrenses legatos Romam miserunt qui de inpotentia [1] Plemini legati quererentur qui pecuniam Proserpinae sustulerat et liberos eorum ac coniuges stupraverat. In catenis Romam perductus in carcere est mortuus. Cum falsus rumor de P. Scipione

[1] inpotentia Froben: inpudentia MSS.

[1] Cf. pp. 283 (xix. 5) and 296, n. 1.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XXIX

GAIUS LAELIUS, having been sent by Scipio from Sicily to Africa, brought back immense booty and delivered to Scipio Masinissa's messages, complaining because he had not yet transported his army to Africa. The war which Indibilis had stirred up in Spain was brought to an end with the Roman as victor. He himself was slain in battle; Mandonius was surrendered by his own people to the Romans in response to their demand. To Mago, who was at Albingaunum, among the Ligurians, a large contingent was sent from Africa and also funds with which to hire auxiliaries; and he was ordered to unite with Hannibal. Scipio crossed over from Syracuse into the Bruttian territory and recovered Locri by defeating the Punic garrison and putting Hannibal to flight. Peace was made with Philip. The Idaean Mother was brought to Rome from Pessinus, a town in Phrygia, since in the Sibylline books verses had been found, saying that a foreign enemy could be driven out of Italy if the Idaean Mother should be brought to Rome. And she was delivered to the Romans by Attalus, King of Asia. It was a stone which the natives said was the Mother of the gods. She was received by Publius Scipio Nasica, son of that Gnaeus who had perished in Spain. He was adjudged the best man by the senate, because, although he was a young man who had not yet been quaestor, the oracle commanded that that divinity should be received and consecrated by the best man. The Locrians sent envoys to Rome to complain of the lawless conduct of Pleminius, the legatus, who had carried off the money of Proserpina and had outraged their children and their wives. He was taken in chains to Rome and died in the prison.[1] When an unfounded report proconsule, qui in Sicilia erat, in urbem perlatus esset, tamquam ibi luxuriaretur, missis ob hoc legatis a senatu qui explorarent an ea vera essent, purgatus infamia Scipio in Africam permissu senatus traiecit. Syphax accepta in matrimonium filia Hasdrubalis Gisgonis amicitiam quam cum Scipione iunxerat renuntiavit. Masinissa rex Massyliorum, dum pro Carthaginiensibus in Hispania militat, amisso patre Gala de regno exciderat. Quo per bellum saepe repetito aliquot proeliis a Syphace rege Numidarum victus in totum privatus est, et cum ducentis equitibus exsul Scipioni se iunxit et cum eo primo statim bello Hannonem Hamilcaris filium cum ampla manu occidit. Scipio adventu Hasdrubalis et Syphacis, qui prope cum centum milibus armatorum venerant, ab obsidione Uticae depulsus hiberna communivit. Sempronius consul in agro Crotoniensi prospere adversus Hannibalem pugnavit. Inter censores M. Livium et Claudium Neronem notabilis discordia fuit. Nam et Claudius Livio collegae equum ademit, quod a populo damnatus actusque in exsilium fuerat, et Livius Claudio, quod falsum in se testimonium dixisset et quod non bona fide secum in gratiam redisset. Idem omnes tribus extra unam aerarias reliquit, quod et innocentem se damnassent et posthac consulem censoremque fecissent. Lustrum a censoribus conditum est. Censa sunt civium capita CCXIIII.

had been brought to the city in regard to Publius Scipio, the proconsul, who was in Sicily, alleging that he was leading a life of indulgence there, representatives were for this reason sent by the senate to discover whether the charges were true. Being cleared of evil repute Scipio crossed over to Africa by permission of the senate. Syphax, having received in marriage the daughter of Hasdrubal son of Gisgo, renounced the friendship which he had made with Scipio. Masinissa, King of the Massylians, while serving in Spain for the Carthaginians, after losing his father Gala, had been excluded from the kingship. When he repeatedly sought to regain it by war, he was defeated by Syphax, King of the Numidians, in a number of battles and was completely dispossessed. And as an exile with two hundred horsemen he joined Scipio and with him at the very beginning of the campaign he slew Hanno son of Hamilcar, together with his large force. Scipio, on the arrival of Hasdrubal and Syphax, who had come with almost a hundred thousand armed men, was forced to raise the siege of Utica and fortified a winter camp. Sempronius, the consul, fought successfully against Hannibal in the territory of Croton. Between the censors, Marcus Livius and Claudius Nero, there was a memorable quarrel. For Claudius took away his colleague Livius' horse because he had been condemned by the people and driven into exile, and Livius did the same for Claudius because the latter had borne false witness against him and because he had not been sincere in being reconciled with him. Likewise Livius left all the tribes but one mere tax-payers, because they had both condemned him, though innocent, and had later made him consul and censor. The rite of purification was completed by the censors. The number of citizens listed was 214,000.

BOOK XXX

LIBER XXX

a.u.c. 551

I. Cn. Servilius et C. Servilius consules—sextus decimus is annus belli Punici erat—cum de re publica belloque et provinciis ad senatum rettulissent, 2 censuerunt patres ut consules inter se compararent sortirenturve uter Bruttios adversus Hannibalem, uter 3 Etruriam ac Ligures provinciam haberet; cui Bruttii evenissent exercitum a P. Sempronio acciperet; P. Sempronius—ei quoque enim pro consule [1] imperium in annum prorogabatur—P. Licinio suc- 4 cederet. Is Romam reverteretur, bello quoque bonus habitus ad cetera, quibus nemo ea tempestate instructior civis habebatur, congestis omnibus 5 humanis ab natura fortunaque bonis. Nobilis idem ac dives erat; forma viribusque corporis excellebat; facundissimus habebatur seu causa oranda, seu in senatu et apud [2] populum suadendi ac dissuadendi

[1] pro consule H Luchs, Riemann, Conway: proconsuli P(1)NVJK Eds.

[2] et apud SpHVJK: et ad N[1] Aldus, Froben: ad P(1)N: aut ad conj. Weissenborn.

---

[1] Omission of cognomina at the beginning of a new book would be striking if their full names had not just been given in XXIX. xxxviii. 3; cf. below, § 8 (cognomina only).

[2] This addition to Etruria as one consul's province (and for the first time) was in view of Mago's activity on the Ligurian coast; cf. § 10; XXIX. v.

BOOK XXX

I. Gnaeus Servilius and Gaius Servilius,[1] the consuls, whose year was the sixteenth of the Punic war, having laid before the senate the condition of the state and the war and the assignments, the senators voted that the consuls should arrange between them, or determine by lot, which of them should have as his assignment the land of the Bruttii, confronting Hannibal, and which of them Etruria and Liguria;[2] that the consul to whom the Bruttii should fall was to take over an army from Publius Sempronius; that Publius Sempronius—for he also had his command prolonged for one year as proconsul—should succeed Publius Licinius;[3] that the latter should return to Rome. In war also Licinius was now highly rated, in addition to the other fields in which no citizen was at that time considered more fully equipped, since all the advantages possible to man had been heaped upon him by nature and fortune. Of noble birth he was at the same time wealthy. Conspicuous for a handsome figure and physical strength, he was considered a very eloquent speaker, whether a legal case was to be conducted, or when there was occasion in the senate and before the people B.C. 203

[3] The first Crassus to be called Dives; Dio Cass. frag. 57. 52. Before his consulship in 205 B.C. he had been censor in 210; XXVII. vi. 17.

u.c. 551

6 locus esset; iuris pontificii peritissimus; super haec bellicae quoque laudis consulatus compotem fecerat. Quod in Bruttiis provincia, idem in Etruria ac
7 Liguribus decretum: M. Cornelius novo consuli tradere exercitum iussus; ipse prorogato imperio Galliam provinciam obtineret [1] cum legionibus
8 iis quas L. Scribonius priore anno habuisset. Sortiti deinde provincias: Caepioni Bruttii, Gemino [2]
9 Etruria evenit. Tum praetorum provinciae in sortem coniectae: iuris dictionem urbanam Paetus Aelius, Sardiniam P. Lentulus, Siciliam [3] P. Villius, Ariminum cum duabus legionibus—sub Sp. Lucretio eae fuerant 10 —Quinctilius Varus est sortitus. Et Lucretio prorogatum imperium, ut Genuam oppidum a Magone Poeno dirutum exaedificaret. P. Scipioni non temporis, sed rei gerendae fine, donec debellatum in 11 Africa foret, prorogatum imperium est; decretumque ut supplicatio fieret, quod is in Africam provinciam traiecisset, ut ea res salutaris populo Romano ipsique duci atque exercitui esset.

II. In Siciliam tria milia militum sunt scripta, quia [4] quod roboris ea provincia habuerat in Africam

[1] obtineret A'N'HVJK Froben 2, Luchs, Luterbacher: -ere P(1)N Aldus, Eds., Conway.

[2] Gemino, before this P(1)NHJK Eds. have Servilio (om. by V), rejected by Madvig, Conway as the nomen of both consuls.

[3] P. Lentulus, Siciliam A'N'HVJK: om. P(1)N, one line.

[4] quia, before this P(1)NSp(prob.)HVJK Aldus have et, rejected by Gronovius, Madvig, Riemann, Conway: retained by those who put a period after oram, p. 370.

---

[1] No important victory of Crassus is known. Elected pontifex maximus in 212 B.C. (XXV. v. 3 f.), he held that office for 29 years down to his death in 183 B.C. His funeral was marked by many gladiatorial combats, games and a public to persuade or dissuade. In the pontifical law he was B.C. 203 accounted a master; and now, to crown these distinctions, his consulship had brought him military laurels as well.[1] The decision taken in regard to the land of the Bruttii as a province was repeated in the case of Etruria and Liguria. Marcus Cornelius was ordered to turn over his army to the new consul, and himself, with his command continued, to hold Gaul as his assignment, having the legions which Lucius Scribonius had held the year before. Thereupon they drew their assignments by lot, the Bruttian country falling to Caepio, Etruria to Geminus. Lots were then cast for the praetors' assignments. Aelius Paetus[2] drew the city praetorship, Publius Lentulus Sardinia, Publius Villius Sicily, Quinctilius Varus Ariminum with two legions which had been under the command of Spurius Lucretius. Lucretius' command also was continued, that he might build up the town of Genua,[3] destroyed by Mago the Carthaginian. Publius Scipio's command was prolonged, not for a fixed time but to the completion of his task, until the war in Africa should be over. And it was decreed that there should be a season of prayer that his crossing over to Africa as his province might be beneficial to the Roman people and to the commander himself and his army.

II. For Sicily three thousand soldiers were enrolled because all the best troops that province used to have feast in the Forum; XXXIX. xlvi. 2 ff. Livy's portrait reads like a laudatio funebris, and it would seem more in place in Book XXXIX than here. Cf. Cicero de Orat. III. 134.

[2] Elected at XXIX. xxxviii. 4; consul in 201 B.C.; below, xl. 5; censor with Scipio Africanus in 199 B.C.; XXXII. vii. 2.

[3] Cf. XXVIII. xlvi. 8 and note.

A.U.C. 551

transvectum fuerat; et quia,[1] ne qua classis ex Africa traiceret, quadraginta navibus custodiri placuerat Siciliae maritumam oram, tredecim novas naves Villius secum in Siciliam duxit, ceterae in Sicilia veteres refectae. Huic classi M. Pomponius, prioris anni praetor, prorogato imperio praepositus novos milites ex Italia advectos in naves imposuit. Parem navium numerum Cn. Octavio, praetori item prioris anni, cum pari iure imperii ad tuendam Sardiniae oram patres decreverunt: Lentulus praetor duo milia militum dare in naves iussus. Et Italiae ora, quia incertum erat quo missuri classem Carthaginienses forent—videbantur autem quidquid nudatum praesidiis esset petituri—M. Marcio, praetori prioris anni, cum totidem navibus tuenda data est. Tria milia militum in eam [2] classem ex decreto patrum consules scripserunt et duas legiones urbanas ad incerta belli. Hispaniae cum exercitibus imperioque veteribus imperatoribus, L. Lentulo et L. Manlio Acidino, decretae. Viginti omnino legionibus et centum sexaginta navibus longis res Romana eo anno gesta. Praetores in provincias ire iussi. Consulibus imperatum ut,[3] priusquam ab urbe proficiscerentur,

[1] quod roboris . . . et quia om. SpHV.
[2] eam P(3) Eds.: eandem JK.
[3] ut HVJK Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)N.

[1] Octavius was really propraetor in 204 B.C., having been praetor in 205; XXVIII. xxxviii. 11, 13; XXIX. xiii. 5.

had been transported to Africa. Furthermore, B.C. 203 because it had been decided to defend the sea-coast of Sicily with forty ships, in order to prevent any fleet from crossing over from Africa, Villius took with him thirteen new ships to Sicily, while the rest in Sicily were old ships repaired. Placed in charge of this fleet, with his command continued, was Marcus Pomponius, praetor in the preceding year, who provided the ships with new soldiers brought from Italy. The same number of ships were by decree of the senate assigned, with the same extension of his command, to Gnaeus Octavius, who likewise had been praetor [1] in the preceding year, in order to defend the coast of Sardinia. Lentulus, the praetor, was ordered to furnish two thousand soldiers for the ships. As for the defence of the coast of Italy, since it was not known to what point the Carthaginians would send their fleet—while they seemed likely to attack any part of it that was left unguarded —that task with the same number of ships was entrusted to Marcus Marcius, praetor in the previous year. Three thousand soldiers were enrolled by the consuls for that fleet in accordance with a decree of the senate, and two city legions for emergency duty. The Spanish provinces were assigned by a decree of the senate to their veteran commanders, Lucius Lentulus and Lucius Manlius Acidinus with the armies and military authority. The Roman state was administered that year with a total of twenty legions and a hundred and sixty war-ships.[2]

The praetors were ordered to go to their provinces, while the consuls were bidden, before their departure

[2] Including another fleet of 40 ships which sailed with Scipio to Africa; XXIX. xxvi. 3; below, xli. 7.

A.U.C. 551

ludos magnos facerent quos T. Manlius Torquatus dictator in quintum annum vovisset, si eodem statu 9 res publica staret. Et novas religiones excitabant in animis hominum prodigia ex pluribus locis nuntiata. Aurum in Capitolio corvi non lacerasse tantum
10 rostris crediti sed etiam edisse; mures Antii coronam auream adrosere;[1] circa Capuam omnem agrum locustarum vis ingens, ita ut unde advenissent
11 parum constaret, complevit; eculeus Reate cum quinque pedibus natus; Anagniae sparsi primum
12 ignes in caelo, dein fax ingens arsit; Frusinone arcus solem tenui linea amplexus est, circulum deinde ipsum maior solis orbis extrinsecus inclusit; Arpini terra campestri agro[2] in ingentem sinum consedit;
13 consulum alteri primam hostiam immolanti caput iocineris defuit. Ea prodigia maioribus hostiis procurata; editi a collegio pontificum dei quibus sacrificaretur.

III. His transactis consules praetoresque in provincias profecti. Omnibus tamen, velut eam sortitis, Africae cura erat, seu quia ibi summam rerum belli-

[1] adrosere $P(1)N$ Aldus (arr-): -roserunt HVJ Froben 2: -rant K.

[2] agro $P(3)Sp^2HVJK$ Froben 2: in agro AN Aldus.

---

[1] Torquatus had made the vow 208 B.C., after presiding at the games vowed by Marcus Aemilius, praetor in 217 B.C.; XXVII. xxxiii. 8. They were actually postponed until 202 B.C.; below, xxvii. 11 f. Inclusive reckoning accounts for quintum.

[2] For meteors see p. 258, n. 2. Cf. also Aeneid II. 694 ff.; Lucretius II. 206 ff.; Pliny N.H. II. 96.

[3] Greek ἅλως = arcus in Pliny l.c. 98 (corona also and circulus); corona in Seneca N.Q. I. ii. 1 (area also ibid. § 3).

from the city, to conduct the great games which Titus Manlius Torquatus [1] as dictator had vowed for the fourth year, if the state should remain as it was before. And new religious fears were aroused in men's minds by portents reported from a number of places. On the Capitol ravens were believed not only to have torn away gilding with their beaks but even to have eaten it. At Antium mice gnawed a golden wreath. The whole region around Capua was covered by an immense number of locusts, while there was no agreement as to whence they had come. At Reate a colt with five feet was foaled. At Anagnia there were at first shooting-stars at intervals and then a great meteor blazed out.[2] At Frusino a halo [3] encircled the sun with its slender circumference, and then the ring itself had a greater circle bright as the sun circumscribed about it. At Arpinum in an open meadow the earth settled into a huge depression. One of the consuls on sacrificing his first victim found the "head" of the liver lacking.[4] These prodigies were expiated by full-grown victims; the gods to whom sacrifices should be offered were announced by the college of the pontiffs. B.C. 203

III. Having completed these tasks the consuls and praetors set out for their provinces. All of them, however, turned their attention to Africa, just as though that had been allotted to them, either because they saw it was there that the main issue and the [4] In divination the liver, being variable in form, was considered of great importance, particularly a protuberance known as the "head." If the caput was large the omen was favourable (XXVII. xxvi. 14), if small or misshapen, unfavourable. Nothing was accounted more ominous than its absence (ibid. § 13); cf. Cicero de Div. II. 32 fin. and Pease's notes; VIII. ix. 1; George F. Moore, History of Religions I. 559.

A.U.C. 551

que verti cernebant seu ut Scipioni gratificarentur, in 2 quem tum omnis versa civitas erat. Itaque non ex Sardinia tantum, sicut ante dictum est, sed ex Sicilia quoque et Hispania vestimenta frumentumque, et arma etiam ex Sicilia [1] et omne genus commeatus eo
3 portabantur. Nec Scipio ullo tempore hiemis belli opera remiserat, quae multa simul undique eum circumstabant: Uticam obsidebat; castra in conspectu
4 Hasdrubalis erant; Carthaginienses deduxerant naves, classem paratam instructamque ad commeatus intercipiendos habebant. Inter haec ne Syphacis quidem reconciliandi curam ex animo miserat,[2] si forte iam satias [3] amoris in uxore ex
5 multa copia eum [4] cepisset. Ab Syphace magis pacis cum Carthaginiensibus condiciones, ut Romani Africa, Poeni Italia excederent, quam, si bellaretur,
6 spes ulla desciturum adferebatur. Haec per nuntios acta magis equidem crediderim—et ita pars maior auctores sunt—quam ipsum Syphacem, ut Antias Valerius prodit, in castra Romana ad conloquium
7 venisse. Primo eas condiciones imperator Romanus vix auribus admisit; postea, ut causa probabilis suis commeandi foret in castra hostium, mollius eadem illa

[1] etiam ex Sicilia P(3)SpHVJ Froben 2, Eds.: om. ANK Aldus, prob. with good reason.
[2] miserat P(3)$A^{z}N$ Aldus: dimiserat Sp?HVJK Froben 2.
[3] satias z Aldus: satis P(1)NHVJK: saties A^{5}?
[4] eum HV Aldus, Froben: om. P(1)NJK.

---

[1] Resuming early in the spring (iv. 10) the siege abandoned in the previous autumn; XXIX. xxxv. 12.
[2] I.e would denounce his agreement with Carthage and renew previous relations with Scipio.

outcome of the war were centred, or in order to show B.C. 203
Scipio favour, on whom the eyes of all the citizens were then fixed Accordingly not only from Sardinia, as has been said above, but also from Sicily and Spain clothing and grain were being transported thither, and arms as well and supplies of every kind from Sicily. And at no time in the winter had Scipio lessened his military operations, which were many and all around him at the same time. He was besieging Utica;[1] the camp of Hasdrubal could be seen; the Carthaginians had launched their ships; they kept their fleet ready and equipped, in order to intercept supplies. In the midst of all this he had also not forgotten his effort to recover the support of Syphax, in case by that time, after much indulgence, satiety might have overtaken him in his love for his wife. From Syphax came rather terms of peace with the Carthaginians under which the Romans should withdraw from Africa, the Carthaginians from Italy, than any hope that in the event of war he would change sides.[2] That these dealings went on through messengers[3] I am more inclined to believe—and for this a majority of the historians vouch—than that Syphax came in person into the Roman camp for a conference, as Valerius Antias relates. At first the Roman general scarcely listened to such terms. Later, that his men might have a plausible reason for visiting the enemy's camp, he was less firm in rejecting the same offers, and encouraged [3] Cf. Polybius XIV. i. 6, who also seems to think Scipio began by sending messengers (i.e. envoys, below, iv. 2, 4) to Syphax. Others represent Syphax as beginning the negotiations; Zonaras IX. xii. 2; Appian Pun. 17, representing him as pretending friendship for both sides.

A.U.C. 551

abnuere ac spem facere saepius ultro citroque agitantibus rem conventuram.

8 Hibernacula Carthaginiensium,[1] congesta temere ex agris materia exaedificata, lignea ferme tota erant. 9 Numidae praecipue harundine textis storeaque pars maxima tectis passim nullo ordine, quidam, ut sine imperio occupatis locis, extra fossam etiam vallumque 10 habitabant. Haec relata Scipioni spem fecerant castra hostium per occasionem incendendi.

IV. Cum legatis quos mitteret ad Syphacem calonum loco primos ordines spectatae virtutis atque 2 prudentiae servili habitu mittebat, qui, dum in conloquio legati essent, vagi per castra alius alia aditus exitusque omnes, situm formamque et universorum castrorum et partium, qua Poeni, qua Numidae haberent,[2] quantum intervalli inter Hasdrubalis ac regia 3 castra esset, specularentur moremque simul noscerent stationum vigiliarumque, nocte an interdiu opportuniores insidianti[3] essent; et inter crebra conloquia alii atque alii de industria, quo pluribus omnia nota 4 essent, mittebantur. Cum saepius agitata res certiorem spem pacis in dies et Syphaci et Carthaginiensibus per eum faceret, legati Romani vetitos se reverti ad imperatorem aiunt, nisi certum re-

[1] Carthaginiensium P(1)NK Aldus, Froben: -ibus SpHVJ.
[2] haberent P(1)NHVJK Eds.: tenderent Gronovius, H. J. Müller.
[3] insidianti P(1)N(-ati D) most Eds., Conway: -antibus N[2]HVJK Aldus, Froben, Luchs.

[1] Cf. Polybius l.c. §§ 6 f.; Zonaras § 8. Not that Roman hibernacula were always much less inflammable; XXVII. iii. 3 (outside the walls of Capua); Hirtius B.G. VIII. v. 2; Bell. Hisp. xvi. 2. No representations of them are known.

the hope that, if they repeatedly discussed the matter B.C. 203 from both sides, agreement would be reached.

The winter quarters of the Carthaginians, being constructed of building material gathered at random from the farms, were almost entirely of wood.[1] In particular the Numidians were dwelling in huts of plaited reeds, most of them under thatched roofs, and scattered without a plan, some of their number even outside the fosse and earthwork—the natural result of seizing upon a site without waiting for orders. This was reported to Scipio and had inspired the hope of setting fire to the camp of the enemy when opportunity should offer.

IV. With the legates whom he kept sending to Syphax he would send some first centurions of attested courage and discretion as servants and garbed as slaves, that while the legates were in conference they might roam about the camp in different directions and take note of all entrances and exits, the situation and plan both of the camp as a whole and of its divisions, where the Carthaginians and where the Numidians had their quarters. They were to discover what was the distance between Hasdrubal's camp and that of the king, also to learn their practice as regards outposts and sentries, whether they were more exposed to an unexpected attack by night or by day. And in the course of numerous conferences other men and again others were purposely sent, that a larger number might acquaint themselves with everything. When repeated discussions were giving Syphax, and through him the Carthaginians, a daily surer hope of peace, the Roman legates announced that they were forbidden to return to their general unless a definite

A.U.C. 551

5 sponsum detur: proinde, seu ipsi staret iam sententia, . . .[1] seu consulendus Hasdrubal et Carthaginienses essent, consuleret; tempus esse aut pacem componi 6 aut bellum naviter geri. Dum consulitur Hasdrubal ab Syphace, ab[2] Hasdrubale Carthaginienses, et speculatores omnia visendi et Scipio ad conparanda 7 ea[3] quae in rem erant tempus habuit. Et ex mentione ac spe pacis neglegentia, ut fit, apud Poenos Numidamque[4] orta cavendi ne quid hostile 8 interim paterentur. Tandem relatum responsum, quibusdam, quia nimis cupere Romanus pacem videbatur, iniquis per occasionem adiectis, quae peropportune cupienti tollere indutias Scipioni 9 causam praebuere. Ac nuntio regis, cum relaturum se ad consilium dixisset, postero die respondit se uno frustra tendente nulli alii pacem placuisse; renuntiaret igitur nullam aliam spem pacis quam[5] relictis 10 Carthaginiensibus Syphaci cum Romanis esse. Ita tollit indutias, ut libera fide incepta exsequeretur; deductisque navibus—et iam veris principium erat—machinas tormentaque, velut a mari adgressurus 11 Uticam, imponit, et duo milia militum ad capiendum quem antea tenuerat tumulum super Uticam mittit,

[1] The lacuna may be filled by promeret sententiam (Johnson, prob. one line of P's archetype); by eam promeret, or promeret alone (Madvig); by pronuntiaret (Stöcker, 1833) or expromeret (Riemann), a verb being required to balance consuleret.

[2] Hasdrubal ab (or a) Syphace, ab A⁴HVJK Eds.: om. P(1)N, a line.

[3] ea om. SpHVJK Froben 2.

[4] Numidamque *PCM*²: -umquae RMBD: -asque ANHVJK Aldus, Froben.

[5] pacis quam A⁴N⁴HVJK: om. P(1)N.

[1] Cf. Polybius l.c. ii. 11.

answer was made to them. Therefore, if his own B.C. 203 decision was already made, ⟨let him declare it⟩;
if on the other hand Hasdrubal and the Carthaginians had to be conferred with, let him confer with them.
It was time, they said, either to agree upon peace or to wage war in earnest. While Hasdrubal was being conferred with by Syphax, and the Carthaginians by Hasdrubal, the spies had time to observe everything, as had Scipio to get together whatever was needful. And out of the talk of peace and the hope of it, as usually happens, there sprang a neglect on the part of the Carthaginians and the Numidian to guard against any attack which might be made upon them in the meantime. At last the answer was returned, including certain unreasonable terms adroitly added just because the Roman seemed extremely desirous of peace. These furnished Scipio, who was eager to denounce the truce, a very timely pretext. And after stating to the king's messenger that he would lay the matter before his council, on the next day he reported that, while he alone strove in vain to bring about peace, no one else had favoured it.[1] The messenger therefore, he said, should report that Syphax had no other hope of peace with the Romans except by abandoning the Carthaginians. His purpose in denouncing the truce was that, being no longer bound by promises, he might carry out his undertaking. And launching his ships—it was now the beginning of spring—he mounted engines of war and artillery upon them, as though intending to attack Utica from the sea. He also sent two thousand soldiers to seize the hill he had previously held,[2] looking down upon Utica, both

[2] See XXIX. xxxv. 7; Polybius §§ 3 f.

a.u.c. 551

simul ut ab eo quod parabat in alterius rei curam converteret hostium animos, simul ne qua, cum ipse ad Syphacem Hasdrubalemque profectus esset, eruptio ex urbe et impetus in castra sua relicta cum levi praesidio fieret.

V. His praeparatis advocatoque consilio et dicere exploratoribus iussis quae conperta adferrent Masinissaque, cui omnia hostium nota erant, postremo ipse quid pararet in proximam noctem proponit; tribunis edicit ut, ubi praetorio dimisso signa concinuissent, extemplo educerent castris legiones. Ita ut imperaverat signa sub occasum solis efferri sunt coepta. Ad primam ferme vigiliam agmen explicaverunt; media nocte—septem enim milia itineris erant —modico gradu ad castra hostium perventum est. Ibi [1] Scipio partem copiarum Laelio Masinissamque ac Numidas adtribuit et castra Syphacis invadere ignesque conicere iubet. Singulos deinde separatim Laelium ac Masinissam seductos [2] obtestatur ut, quantum nox providentiae adimat, tantum diligentia [3] expleant curaque: se Hasdrubalem Punicaque castra adgressurum; ceterum non ante coepturum quam ignem in regiis castris conspexisset. Neque ea res morata diu est; nam ut primis [4] casis iniectus ignis haesit, extemplo proxima quaeque et deinceps

[1] est. Ibi P(1)N Aldus : et ibi HVJK : om. Froben 2.
[2] seductos HVJK Aldus, Froben, Eds. : de- P(1)N.
[3] diligentia P(3)Sp²HV Froben 2 : -nti (with cura et) ANJK Aldus.
[4] primis Gronovius : proximis P(1)NHVJK (from proxima just below).

[1] Obviously some of the centurions of iv. 1–3 appeared before the consilium.

in order to divert the attention of the enemy from his real purpose to anxiety about a different attack, and at the same time that, when he should himself set out to meet Syphax and Hasdrubal, there should be no sally from the city and no attack upon his camp when left with only a small garrison. B.C. 203

V. After these preparations, summoning the council, he ordered the spies [1] to set forth what information they had to report, and Masinissa as well, who knew everything about the enemy. Finally he laid before them his plan for the following night. To the tribunes he gave orders that, when the council had been dismissed and the trumpets had sounded, they should at once lead their legions out of the camp. In accordance with the orders he had given the standards were first set in motion just before sunset; at about the first watch the column was deployed. At midnight—for it was a march of seven miles—proceeding at a moderate speed they reached the enemy's camp. There Scipio assigned to Laelius a part [2] of the forces and Masinissa with his Numidians, and bade them burst into the camp of Syphax and set fire to it. He then led Laelius and Masinissa aside separately and implored each of them to make up by their diligence and alertness for all the foresight of which night deprived them. He was about to attack Hasdrubal, he said, and the Carthaginian camp; but he would not begin until he should see fire in the king's camp. Nor did that delay him long; for as soon as fire was thrown upon the first huts it caught, and then at once laying hold of everything

[2] One-half according to Polybius iv. 2, to which Livy's partem is not meant as a correction. The whole passage should be read, being more detailed than in the Latin version.

A.U.C. 551

continua amplexus[1] totis se passim dissipavit 8 castris. Et trepidatio quidem, quantam[2] necesse erat in nocturno effuso tam late incendio, orta est;
ceterum fortuitum, non hostilem ac bellicum ignem rati esse, sine armis ad restinguendum incendium 9 effusi in armatos incidere hostes, maxime Numidas ab Masinissa notitia regiorum castrorum ad exitus 10 itinerum idoneis locis dispositos. Multos[3] in ipsis cubilibus semisomnos hausit flamma; multi[4] prae-cipiti fuga ruentes super alios alii in angustiis portarum obtriti sunt.

VI. Relucentem flammam primo vigiles Carthaginiensium, deinde excitati alii nocturno tumultu cum conspexissent, ab eodem errore credere et ipsi 2 sua sponte incendium ortum; et clamor inter caedem et volnera sublatus an ex trepidatione nocturna esset confusis[5] sensum veri adimebat.
3 Igitur pro se quisque inermes, ut quibus nihil hostile suspectum esset, omnibus portis, qua cuique proximum erat, ea modo quae restinguendo igni forent 4 portantes, in agmen Romanum ruebant. Quibus caesis omnibus praeterquam hostili odio, etiam ne quis nuntius refugeret,[6] extemplo Scipio neglectas ut 5 in tali tumultu portas invadit; ignibusque in proxima tecta coniectis, effusa flamma primo velut sparsa pluribus locis reluxit, dein per continua serpens uno re-

[1] amplexus, here R comes to an end.
[2] quantam A^{γ} Gronovius: quanta $P(3)NHVJK$.
[3] Multos $Sp(prob.)A^{a}VJK$ Aldus: -tis H: om. $P(3)N^{r}$.
[4] multi, after this $P(3)A^{a}NHVJK$ have in (ex A): rejected by Alschefski, Madvig, Conway.
[5] confusis Rhenanus: -sus $P(3)NVJK$ Aldus, Froben.
[6] refugeret $HVJK$: ef- $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben.

that was near, and so on in unbroken succession, it B.C. 203 spread hither and thither through the entire camp. Great was the alarm, to be sure, as was inevitable in a fire so widespread in the night; but they thought the blaze accidental, not due to an enemy and war. Pouring out without arms to extinguish the flames, they encountered armed enemies, particularly Numidians posted in suitable places at the ends of the streets by Masinissa, familiar as he was with the king's camp. Many even in their beds and half-asleep were burned to death; many rushing pell-mell in headlong flight were trodden down in the narrow gateways.

VI. When the light of the fire had been seen, first by sentries of the Carthaginians and then by others whom the uproar in the night aroused, they likewise made the same mistake in believing the fire to be spontaneous. And outcries raised in the midst of slaughter and wounds made men unable to grasp the real situation, being half-inclined to think it due to a disturbance in the night. Accordingly, having no suspicion of any attack, they outdid one another in dashing out of all the gates unarmed, each taking the nearest way, carrying only what would be of use to extinguish the fire, and suddenly encountered the Roman column. When they had all been slain, not only because of an enemy's hatred, but also that no man might escape to tell the tale, Scipio at once burst into the gates, naturally unguarded in such a commotion. And then as firebrands were thrown upon the nearest roofs, the flames pouring out at first seemed to blaze at a number of scattered points; and then creeping along without a break they promptly consumed

A.U.C. 551

6 pente omnia [1] incendio hausit. Ambusti homines iumentaque foeda primum fuga, dein strage obruebant [2] itinera portarum. Quos non oppresserat ignis ferro absumpti, binaque castra clade [3] una 7 deleta. Duces tamen ambo et ex tot milibus armatorum duo milia peditum et quingenti equites semermes, magna pars saucii adflatique incendio effugerunt.
8 Caesa aut hausta flammis ad [4] quadraginta milia hominum sunt, capta supra quinque milia, multi 9 Carthaginiensium nobiles, undecim senatores; signa militaria centum septuaginta quattuor, equi Numidici supra duo milia septingentos [5]; elephanti sex capti, octo ferro flammaque absumpti. Magna vis armorum capta; ea omnia imperator Volcano sacrata incendit.

VII. Hasdrubal ex fuga cum paucis Afrorum urbem proximam petierat, eoque omnes qui supererant vestigia ducis sequentes se contulerant; metu deinde
2 ne dederetur Scipioni urbe excessit. Mox eodem patentibus portis Romani accepti, nec quicquam hostile, quia voluntate concesserant in dicionem, factum. Duae subinde urbes captae direptaeque. Ea praeda et quae castris incensis ex igne rapta erat militi

[1] serpens uno repente omnia $P(3)NJK$ Eds.: om. SpHV.
[2] obruebant $P(1)N$ Aldus: -erant SpHJK Froben 2: obstruebant Madvig.
[3] clade $Sp A^{1}N^{1}HVJK$ Froben 2: de P: die $P^{2}(3)A^{5}N$ Aldus.
[4] ad $HVJK$ Eds.: om. $P(3)N$.
[5] septingentos $A^{1}J$: -genti $A(\text{dec}^{\text{ti}})HK$; numerals $P(3)NV$.

[1] The figures are taken from Polybius vi. 3, whose text gives none for the slain. But his editors indicate a lacuna after ch. v, to account for the omission. He was much impressed by the brilliance of Scipio's exploit (ibid. fin.). Appian has no fire in Syphax' camp, but gives 30,000 for the slain in Hasdrubal's army; Pun. 23.

everything in one conflagration. Men and beasts B.C. 203 of burden that had suffered burns blocked streets leading to the gates, at first by their panic-stricken flight and then by their fallen bodies. Those whom the fire had not overtaken were destroyed by the sword, and two camps were wiped out in a single disaster. Both of the generals, however, made their escape, and out of so many thousand armed men two thousand infantry and five hundred[1] horsemen escaped half-armed, many of the men wounded and scorched by the flames. Slain or burned to death were some forty thousand men, more than five thousand captured, many Carthaginian nobles, eleven senators. Of military standards a hundred and seventy-four were taken, of Numidian horses over two thousand seven hundred. Six elephants were captured, eight destroyed by sword or by fire. A great number of arms were captured, and all of these the general-in-command dedicated to Vulcan and burned.[2]

VII. Hasdrubal after fleeing had made his way with a few men to the nearest city [3] of the Africans; and to it had come all the survivors, following the trail of their general. Then for fear that it might surrender to Scipio he left the city. Soon after the gates were opened and the Romans admitted to the same city. And since they had voluntarily submitted no hostile step was taken. Thereafter two cities were captured and plundered. Their booty and what had been rescued from the flames when the camps

[2] Cf. XXIII. xlvi. 5 (Marcellus at Nola).

[3] Anda according to Appian op. cit. 24; not elsewhere mentioned. In Polybius the town appears to have been named in the lacuna before ch. vi.

A.U.C. 551

3 concessa est. Syphax octo milium ferme inde spatio loco munito [1] consedit; Hasdrubal Carthaginem contendit, ne quid per metum ex recenti clade
4 mollius consuleretur. Quo tantus primo terror est adlatus ut omissa Utica Carthaginem crederent
5 extemplo Scipionem obsessurum.[2] Senatum itaque sufetes, quod velut consulare imperium apud eos
6 erat, vocaverunt. Ibi tribus sententiis certatum [3]; una de pace legatos ad Scipionem decernebat, altera Hannibalem ad tuendam ab exitiabili bello patriam revocabat, tertia Romanae in adversis rebus
7 constantiae erat; reparandum exercitum Syphacemque hortandum ne bello absisteret censebat. Haec sententia, quia Hasdrubal praesens Barcinaeque
8 omnes factionis bellum malebant, vicit. Inde dilectus in urbe agrisque haberi coeptus, et ad Syphacem legati missi, summa ope et ipsum reparantem bellum, cum uxor non iam ut ante blanditiis, 9 satis potentibus ad animum amantis, sed precibus et misericordia valuisset, plena lacrimarum obtestans ne patrem suum patriamque proderet isdemque flammis Carthaginem quibus castra conflagrassent
10 absumi sineret. Spem quoque opportune oblatam adferebant legati: quattuor milia Celtiberorum

[1] munito SpHVJK Froben 2 : com- P(3)N Aldus.

[2] ob- (or op-)sessurum P(3)A[1]N[1]HVJK : oppressurum AN Aldus, Froben.

[3] sententiis certatum Madvig, Conway (M. Müller added est) : om. P(3)NHVJK, one line : dictis sententiis Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] The town of Abba in Polybius § 12; vii. 5. Obba, below, § 10, cannot be the same. Cf. p. 389, n. 2; 550 f.

[2] For the two sufētes cf. XXVIII. xxxvii. 2; XXXIV. lxi. 15.

were burned was granted to the soldiers. Syphax B.C. 203 established himself in a fortified place [1] at a distance of about eight miles. Hasdrubal hastened to Carthage, that no weak action might be taken in the fear induced by the recent disaster. At first the news brought such alarm to the city that they believed Scipio would leave Utica to itself and forthwith besiege Carthage. The senate was accordingly convened by the sufĕtes, whose authority corresponded to that of consuls.[2] There it was a conflict between three proposals: one favoured peace envoys to Scipio; the second was for recalling Hannibal to defend their city from a war which meant destruction; the third showed a Roman steadfastness in adversity. This proposal was that they should repair the losses to the army and urge Syphax not to give up the war.[3] This motion was carried because Hasdrubal in person and all of the Barcine party supported the war. Then they began to conduct a levy in the city and in the country, and emissaries were sent to Syphax, who on his part also was making every effort to renew the war, since his wife had influenced him—no longer, as before, by caresses, effectual enough for the temper of a lover—but by prayers and moving entreaty, imploring him, as her eyes filled with tears, not to betray her father and her city and allow Carthage to be destroyed by the same flames with which the camps had been consumed. Hope also at the right moment was brought by the emissaries in the news that four thousand Celti-

[3] The three proposals are from Polybius vi. 10 ff. Not so the following reference to Hasdrubal and the party of Hannibal. In one version Hasdrubal's loss of an army was to be punished by execution; Appian Pun. 24, 36; cf. 38.

A.U.C. 551

circa urbem nomine Obbam, ab conquisitoribus suis conducta in Hispania, egregiae iuventutis, sibi occurrisse; et Hasdrubalem propediem adfore cum 11 manu haudquaquam contemnenda. Igitur non benigne modo legatis respondit, sed ostendit etiam[1] multitudinem agrestium Numidarum, quibus per eosdem[2] dies arma equosque dedisset, et omnem
12 iuventutem adfirmat ex regno exciturum; scire incendio, non proelio cladem acceptam; eum bello
13 inferiorem esse qui armis vincatur. Haec legatis responsa, et post dies paucos rursus Hasdrubal et Syphax copias iunxerunt. Is omnis exercitus fuit triginta ferme milium[3] armatorum.

VIII. Scipionem, velut iam debellato quod ad Syphacem Carthaginiensesque attineret, Uticae oppugnandae intentum iamque machinas admoventem
2 muris avertit fama redintegrati belli; modicisque praesidiis ad speciem modo obsidionis terra marique relictis ipse cum robore exercitus ire ad hostes
3 pergit. Primo in tumulo quattuor milia ferme distante ab castris regiis consedit; postero die cum equitatu in

[1] etiam P(3)NH: eam VJK.
[2] eosdem P(3 N Aldus, Froben: eos HVJK.
[3] milium HVJ Froben 2: millium K: milia (-ll- P)P(3)N Aldus.

berians, the flower of their youth, had met them near B.C. 203 a city named Obba, having been hired in Spain by their own recruiting-officers; and Hasdrubal, they said, would soon arrive with a force by no means to be despised. In consequence he not only gave a favourable answer to the legates but also showed them a large number of Numidian rustics to whom he had just been furnishing arms and horses, and assured them that he would call out all the young men from his kingdom. He was aware, he said, that the disaster had been due to fire, not to battle; that a war is lost only by the man who is defeated in battle. Such was his answer to the legates, and after a few days Hasdrubal and Syphax again united their forces. The total strength of that army was about thirty thousand armed men.[1]

VIII. Scipio, as though the war was already over so far as concerned Syphax and the Carthaginians, was intent upon the siege of Utica and already bringing up his engines to the walls when news of renewed hostilities turned his attention in another direction. And leaving sufficient land and sea forces merely to keep up the appearance of a blockade, he himself at once advanced with the main body of his army against the enemy.[2] At first he established himself upon a hill about four miles from the king's camp. On the following day with his cavalry he

[1] Polybius' figures, including Numidians and the Celtiberian mercenaries; l.c. vii. 9.

[2] This and the next sentence would lead us to suppose the advance to have been for a short distance only. But Livy, condensing Polybius, omits to mention a five-days' march. The battle-field then will be some 80 miles south-west of Utica. Syphax and Hasdrubal had removed to that distance in order to gain time and to receive reinforcements from Numidia.

A.U.C. 551

Magnos—ita vocant—Campos subiectos ei tumulo degressus, succedendo ad stationes hostium laces-
4 sendoque levibus proeliis diem absumpsit. Et per insequens biduum tumultuosis hinc atque illinc excursionibus in vicem nihil dictu satis dignum fecerunt; quarto die in aciem utrimque descensum
5 est. Romanus principes post [1] hastatorum prima signa, in subsidiis triarios constituit; equitatum Italicum ab dextro cornu, ab laevo Numidas Masinis-
6 samque opposuit. Syphax Hasdrubalque Numidis adversus Italicum equitatum. Carthaginiensibus contra Masinissam locatis Celtiberos in mediam
7 aciem adversus signa legionum accepere. Ita instructi concurrunt. Primo [2] impetu simul utraque cornua, et Numidae et Carthaginienses, pulsi; nam neque [3] Numidae. maxima pars agrestes, Romanum equitatum neque Carthaginienses, et ipse novus miles, Masinissam recenti super cetera victoria
8 terribilem sustinuere. Nudata utrimque cornibus Celtiberum acies stabat, quod nec in fuga salus ulla ostendebatur locis ignotis, neque spes veniae ab Scipione erat, quem bene meritum de se et gente sua

[1] principes post Victorius, Eds.: post principes P(3)M[2]?NHVJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] Primo P(3)NH Aldus, Froben: igitur primo A[1]VJK.
[3] nam neque A[1]VJK Eds.: namque P(3)NH: nam M.

---

[1] La Dakhla, the broad central valley of the Medjerda (Bagradas), the granary of Tunisia. In geological times a broad lake 25 miles long. Spaces so ample make it impossible to identify the field of battle. Ennius in a fragment represents Scipio as addressing the patria: she has no reason for fear in view of his victories: Testes sunt Campi Magni; Vahlen[3] p. 213; Cicero de Orat. III. 167; Warmington, Remains of Old Latin I. p. 398; cf. Polybius vii. 9; viii. 2; Appian Pun.

went down into the so-called Great Plain,[1] at the foot B.C. 203 of that hill, and spent the day in light engagements, advancing against the enemy's outposts and challenging them. And on the next two days by irregular charges, now from one side and now from the other by turns, they accomplished nothing worthy of mention. On the fourth day both went down into battle-line. The Roman placed his principes behind the front line maniples, made up of the hastati, and as reserves the triarii.[2] The Italic cavalry he posted on the right wing, on the left the Numidians and Masinissa. Syphax and Hasdrubal opposed the Numidians to the Italic cavalry, the Carthaginians to Masinissa, and then placed the Celtiberians in the centre of the battle-line facing the maniples [3] of the legions. In this formation they clashed. By the first attack both wings, Numidians and Carthaginians alike, were beaten back at the same time. For neither could the Numidians, most of them rustics, withstand the Roman cavalry, nor could the Carthaginians, who were likewise raw recruits, hold out against Masinissa, a foe to be feared for other reasons and also on account of his recent victory. Stripped of both wings the line of the Celtiberians made a stand because they could see no safety in flight since they did not know the country, and they had no hope of pardon from Scipio since they had come to Africa

68 fin.; Veith, Antike Schlachtfelder III. 2. 589 ff.; Gsell, Hist. ancienne de l'Afrique du Nord III. 229 ff.; Scullard, Scipio Africanus 209 ff.

[2] This was the customary formation, as Polybius observes; viii. 5; cf. below, xxxii. 11; XXII. v. 7.

[3] For Polybius' terms for the maniple cf. p. 62, n. 2. In the passage used by Livy here both σημαία and σπεῖρα occur; viii. 5, 7; cf. XV. ix. 7.

A.U.C. 551

mercennariis armis in Africam oppugnatum [1] venis-9 sent. Igitur circumfusis undique hostibus alii super alios cadentes obstinate moriebantur; omnibusque in eos versis aliquantum ad fugam temporis Syphax et Hasdrubal praeceperunt. Fatigatos caede diutius quam pugna victores nox oppressit.

IX. Postero die Scipio Laelium Masinissamque cum omni Romano et Numidico equitatu expeditisque [2] militum ad persequendos Syphacem atque Has-
2 drubalem mittit; ipse cum robore exercitus urbes circa, quae omnes Carthaginiensium dicionis erant,
3 partim spe, partim metu, partim vi subigit. Carthagini erat quidem ingens terror, et circumferentem arma Scipionem omnibus finitimis raptim perdomitis ipsam Carthaginem repente adgressurum credebant.
4 Itaque et muri reficiebantur propugnaculisque armabantur, et pro se quisque quae diutinae obsidionis [3]
5 tolerandae sunt ex agris convehebat.[4] Rara mentio est pacis, frequentior legatorum ad Hannibalem
6 arcessendum mittendorum; pars maxima classem quae ad commeatus excipiendos parata erat mittere iubent ad opprimendam stationem navium ad Uticam incaute agentem; forsitan etiam navalia castra, 7 relicta cum levi praesidio, oppressuros. In hoc

[1] in Africam oppugnatum $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben: oppugnatum in Africam $HVJK$.

[2] expeditisque $P(3)N$ Aldus; -tissimisque A^1HVJK Froben 2.

[3] obsidionis (or ops-) $P(3)N$: -oni SpA^1HVJK Aldus.

[4] convehebat Sp Froben 2 (-bant JK: -bantur HV): convehit $P(3)N$ Aldus.

---

[1] Hasdrubal fled to Carthage. In the hope of overtaking Syphax the pursuit was mainly to the west; Polybius § 14.

as mercenaries to attack him in spite of his kind B.C. 203 treatment of them and their tribe. Therefore when the enemy had completely encircled them, falling one above another they were resolute in dying. And while all the enemy were intent upon them Syphax and Hasdrubal took advantage of a considerable interval for flight. Nightfall surprised the victors exhausted by a slaughter outlasting the battle.

IX. On the following day Scipio sent Laelius and Masinissa with all the Roman and Numidian cavalry and light-armed soldiers to pursue Syphax and Hasdrubal.[1] He himself with the main body of the army, partly by inspiring hope, partly by arousing fear, partly by the use of force, gained possession of neighbouring cities, all of which were subject to the Carthaginians. At Carthage there was a veritable panic, and they believed that Scipio, whose forces were circling about them, after swiftly vanquishing all their neighbours would suddenly assail Carthage itself. Accordingly they were repairing the walls and providing them with battlements; and men also each for himself brought in from the country what was needed in order to endure a long siege. Seldom was mention made of peace, more frequently they spoke of sending messengers to summon Hannibal. The majority urged that they should take the fleet, which had been made ready to intercept supplies, and send it to surprise the ships at anchor before Utica while off their guard. Perhaps, men said, they would surprise the naval camp[2] as well, which had been left with a small garrison. To this

[2] A part of the Castra Corneli(an)a, as it was later named, on the promontory; XXIX, xxxv. 13 and note.

A.U.C. 551

consilium maxime inclinant; legatos tamen ad Hannibalem mittendos censent: quippe classi ut felicissime geratur[1] res, parte aliqua levari Uticae
8 obsidionem; Carthaginem ipsam qui tueatur[2] neque imperatorem alium quam Hannibalem neque exerci-
9 tum alium quam Hannibalis superesse. Deductae ergo postero die naves, simul et legati in Italiam profecti; raptimque omnia stimulante fortuna agebantur, et in quo quisque cessasset prodi ab se salutem omnium rebatur.

10 Scipio gravem iam spoliis multarum urbium exercitum trahens, captivis aliaque praeda in vetera castra ad Uticam missis, iam in Carthaginem intentus occu-
11 pat relictum fuga custodum Tyneta. Abest ab Carthagine quindecim milia ferme passuum locus, 12 cum operibus tum suapte natura tutus,[3] et qui et ab Carthagine conspici et praebere ipse prospectum cum ad urbem tum ad circumfusum[4] mare urbi possit.[5] X. Inde, cum maxime vallum Romani iacerent, conspecta classis hostium est Uticam a Carthagine
2 petens. Igitur omisso opere pronuntiatum iter signaque raptim ferri sunt coepta, ne naves in terram et obsidionem versae ac minime navali proelio aptae

[1] geratur Sp?HVJK Froben 2 : -rantur P(3)N Aldus.
[2] tueatur P(3)NK Aldus : -antur SpA²N²VJ Froben 2.
[3] locus . . . tutus P(3)N Aldus, Eds. : locum . . . tutum Sp?A¹HJK Froben 2, Riemann, Conway (with abest . . . passuum as parenth.).
[4] cum (tum VJK) ad urbem tum ad circumfusum A¹N¹VJK : cumfusum P(3)N, om. one line : confusum BD.
[5] possit P(3)N : posset A¹HVJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] The scene in the Carthaginian senate is repainted after Polybius ix. 6–11.
[2] Cf. note on § 6.

plan they were particularly inclined, but voted to B.C. 203 send messengers to Hannibal.[1] For, they said, even supposing a great victory gained by the fleet, the siege of Utica would indeed be partially relieved; but for the defence of Carthage itself there remained no other general than Hannibal, no other army than that of Hannibal. Consequently ships were launched next day and at the same time the messengers sailed for Italy. There was also haste in all that they did under the goad of misfortune, while every one felt that if he should relax any effort he would be betraying the safety of all.

Scipio, who was slowly leading an army laden now with the spoils of many cities, sent captives and the rest of the spoils to the old camp [2] before Utica, and being now intent upon Carthage, took possession of Tynes,[3] abandoned by a fleeing garrison. The place is about fifteen miles from Carthage and defended by fortifications and particularly by its natural situation. It can also be seen from Carthage, at the same time itself affording a view both towards that city and towards the sea around the city. X. From that point, just as they were throwing up an earthwork, the Romans sighted the enemy's fleet making towards Utica from Carthage. Accordingly work was dropped, marching orders given and the standards hastily set in motion, that the ships, headed towards land and the besieged city, also in no condition for a naval battle, might not be taken by [3] Tunis, on a narrow tongue of land, nowhere higher than 190 feet, between the Lac de Tunis and the lagoon, now a salt lake. Cf. Strabo XVII. iii. 16. The distance from Carthage agrees with Polybius (120 stades; x. 5), but it is in fact 10 miles.

A.U.C. 551

3 opprimerentur: qui enim restitissent agili et nautico instrumento aptae et armatae classi naves tormenta machinasque portantes et aut in onerariarum usum versae aut [1] ita adpulsae muris ut pro aggere ac pontibus praebere ascensum [2] possent?

4 Itaque Scipio, postquam eo ventum est, contra quam [3] in navali certamine solet, rostratis quae praesidio aliis esse poterant [4] in postremam aciem receptis
5 prope terram, onerariarum quadruplicem ordinem pro muro adversus hostem opposuit, easque ipsas, ne in tumultu pugnae turbari ordines possent, malis antemnisque de nave in navem traiectis ac validis funibus velut uno inter se vinculo inligatis conprendit, tabulas-
6 que superinstravit,[5] ut pervium in totum navium [6] ordinem esset,[7] et sub ipsis pontibus intervalla fecit, qua procurrere speculatoriae naves in hostem ac tuto re-
7 cipi possent. His raptim pro tempore instructis mille ferme delecti propugnatores onerariis imponuntur; telorum maxime [8] missilium, ut quamvis longo
8 certamini [9] sufficerent, vis ingens congeritur. Ita parati atque intenti hostium adventum opperiebantur.

[1] in onerariarum . . . aut om. SpHV: supplied from P(3)N and (om. aut*)JK.*

[2] ascensum SpA'VJK Froben 2, Conway: ascensus P(3)NH Eds.: accessum Aldus.

[3] eo . . . quam om. P(3)N: supplied by Sp?A'N'HVJK.

[4] poterant P(3)NHVJK Eds.: potuerant Madvig, Emend.: non poterant conj. Weissenborn.

[5] superinstravit P(3)NJK Aldus: in- M: super- Sp?HV Froben 2.

[6] in totum navium SpA'N'VJK Froben 2: om. P(3)N

[7] esset SpV Froben 2: faceret A'J Aldus: -rent K: fecisset P(3)N.

[8] maxime om. P(3)N.

[9] certamini K Madvig, Emend.: -ine P(3)NHVJK Conway.

surprise. For how could an easily manœuvred fleet, B.C. 203 properly rigged with ship's gear and armed, have been resisted by ships carrying artillery and engines, and either converted now into transports or lying so close to the walls as to make scaling possible as if from an embankment and drawbridges?

Consequently Scipio, on reaching the place, gave those war-ships [1] which might have defended the others a place in the rear line near the land, contrary to the usual practice in a naval battle. On the other hand he placed four lines of transports as a bulwark against the enemy. To prevent the lines from being broken in the confusion of the battle he also held these transports together by placing masts and yards crosswise from ship to ship and lashing them with stout ropes as if by a single cable. In addition he laid down planks above to make a gangway the whole length of the line of ships; and beneath these bridges he left openings where scouting vessels could dash out against the enemy and return in safety. These preparations having been hastily completed as best the circumstances permitted, about a thousand picked fighting men were placed on board the transports. A vast number of weapons, chiefly missiles, were assembled, that they might be sufficient for a battle no matter how long-continued. Thus equipped and alert they were awaiting the approach of the enemy.

[1] Not mentioned again in the account of the battle. They would be perfectly helpless if the barrier of transports should be broken through. No figures are given here by Polybius, whose text breaks off abruptly after XIV. x. Appian, recording a different attack upon Scipio's naval base, has 100 Carthaginian war-ships against 20 Roman triremes; Pun. 24 fin.

A.U.C. 551

Carthaginienses, qui, si maturassent, omnia permixta turba trepidantium primo impetu oppressissent,[1] perculsi terrestribus cladibus atque inde ne[2] mari quidem, ubi ipsi plus poterant, satis fidentes, die segni navigatione absumpto sub occasum solis in portum—Rusucmona Afri vocant—classem adpulere. Postero die sub ortum solis instruxere ab alto naves velut ad iustum proelium navale et tamquam exituris contra Romanis. Cum diu stetissent, postquam nihil moveri ab hostibus viderunt, tum demum onerarias adgrediuntur. Erat res minime certamini navali similis, proxime speciem muros oppugnantium navium. Altitudine aliquantum onerariae superabant; ex rostratis Poeni vana pleraque, utpote supino iactu, tela in locum superiorem mittebant; gravior ac pondere ipso libratior superne ex onerariis ictus erat. Speculatoriae naves ac levia alia[3] navigia, quae sub constratis pontium per intervalla excurrebant, primo ipsae tantum[4] impetu ac magnitudine rostratarum obruebantur; deinde propugnatoribus quoque incommodae erant, quod permixtae cum hostium navibus inhibere saepe tela cogebant metu ne ambiguo ictu suis inciderent. Postremo

[1] oppressissent $P^2(3)N$ Aldus: pressissent P: deprehendissent (or -prend-) *Sp²N*ᵛ(alt.)HVJK Froben 2.

[2] ne $A^{6?}$Alschefski: ne in N^vJK Aldus, Froben: in $P\,3\,B^2NV$: om. BH.

[3] alia N^vHVJK: ipsa $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben: om. JK.

[4] ipsae tantum HV: ipso tantum A^cJK Aldus, Froben: ipsae tanto $P(3)$.

The Carthaginians, whose first attack, had they made it in good time, would have been overpowering when everything was confused by the mass of men dashing about, were discouraged by their disastrous defeats on the land. And having in consequence no sufficient confidence on the sea either, where lay their own superiority, after spending the day in sailing slowly, they put in with their fleet about sunset into a harbour called Rusucmon[1] by the Africans. On the next day about sunrise they drew up their ships in the open sea, as if for a regular naval battle and anticipating that the Romans would come out against them. After keeping their position for a long time and observing no movement on the part of the enemy, then only did they attack the transports. It was not in the least like a naval battle, but had almost the appearance of ships attacking the walls of a city. The transports were considerably higher. From their war-ships the Carthaginians generally hurled their weapons to no purpose against a higher position, since they did so leaning backwards, while a hit from the transports above was heavier and from its mere weight had more force. Scouting vessels and other light craft, which kept dashing out through openings underneath the bridges, were at first themselves sunk by the mere momentum and mass of the war-ships. Later they interfered with the fighting men as well because, as they mingled with the enemy's vessels, they often compelled the soldiers to withhold their missiles for fear in their uncertain aim they might hit their own men. Finally poles with an iron hook B.C. 203

[1] West of the Promontory of Apollo, it was inside the bay but had no real harbour. Its modern successor is Porto Farina.

A.U.C. 551

asseres ferreo unco praefixi—harpagones vocat[1] miles[2]—ex Punicis navibus inici in Romanas coepti.
17 Quos cum neque ipsos neque catenas quibus suspensi iniciebantur incidere possent, ut quaeque retro inhibita rostrata onerariam haerentem unco traheret,
18 scindi videres vincula quibus aliis[3] innexa erat,
19 seriem etiam[4] simul plurium navium trahi. Hoc maxime modo lacerati primi quidem ordinis[5] pontes, et vix transiliendi in secundum ordinem navium
20 spatium propugnatoribus datum est. Sexaginta[6] ferme onerariae puppibus abstractae Carthaginem sunt. Maior quam pro re laetitia, sed[7] eo gratior quod inter adsiduas clades ac lacrimas unum quan-
21 tumcumque ex insperato gaudium adfulserat, cum eo ut appareret haud procul exitio fuisse Romanam classem, ni cessatum a praefectis suarum navium foret et Scipio in tempore subvenisset.

XI. Per eosdem forte dies cum Laelius et Masi-

[1] vocat Px Gronovius : -ant CMBDANHVJK.

[2] miles B^2NHV Gronovius : mil PCMDA : mille C : milex BN : milites M^7 Aldus, Froben ; om. A'JK.

[3] aliis CHVJK Froben 2 : alia aliis P(3)N Aldus.

[4] etiam Ussing, Madvig, Luchs : aliam P(3)NJK Aldus, Froben, Eds., Conway : alias (adv.) Riemann.

[5] ⟨primi⟩ quidem ordinis M. Müller (with ordinis for MSS. omnes) : Riemann (retains omnes) : quidem P(3)NHVJK (bracketed by Conway) : tandem Madvig.

[6] Sexaginta H : ex (for lx) P : sex P^2N Aldus, Froben : XL (or in full) A^1VJK.

[7] sed P(3)NSp(app.)HVJK Aldus, Eds. : fuit et Madvig, Emend. Most Eds. begin a new sentence at Maior. Hence Madvig's demand for fuit. Riemann would insert ubi fuit before maior. Others understand maior laetitia to be in appos. with the previous statement.

at the end—grappling-irons [1] the soldiers call them —began to be thrown from the Carthaginian ships upon the Roman. Since the crews were unable either to cut off these poles or the chains by which they were hanging when thrown, whenever a warship was propelled astern, dragging a transport grappled by the hook, one might have seen men breaking up the links by which it had been bound to others, and even several of the vessels being towed away together. Much after this fashion the bridges in the first line were broken down and hardly enough time was given the fighting men to spring across to the second line of ships. About sixty transports [2] were towed away by the stern to Carthage. Rejoicing for that was excessive, but all the more acceptable because, in the midst of uninterrupted defeats and sorrows, one ray of joy however small had unexpectedly beamed upon them. In addition it was clear to them that the Roman fleet had narrowly escaped destruction, and would have been destroyed if the captains [3] of their own ships had not loitered, and if Scipio had not come to its aid in the nick of time. B.C. 203

XI. About the same time, as it happened, after

[1] Exaggerated boathooks. Cf. Vol. VII. p. 149 and note; Caesar B.G. VII. lxxxi. 1; Bell. Hisp. xvi. 2; Curtius IV. ii. 12; Vegetius II. 25; IV. 44 (in the navy); Zonaras IX. xii. 10.

[2] On the voyage across from Lilybaeum he had 400 transports; XXIX. xxvi. 3. Their number by this time may have been considerably increased.

[3] Cf. XXI. lxi. 4; XXXVI. xliv. 1; magistri navium in XXIX. xxv. 7. The admiral was a Hamilcar according to Appian Pun. 24. Cf. Laelius as praefectus classis, XXVI. xlviii. 7; XXIX. xxv. 10.

u.c. 551

nissa quinto decimo ferme die in Numidiam pervenissent, Maesulii, regnum paternum Masinissae, laeti ut ad regem diu [1] desideratum concessere. 2 Syphax pulsis inde praefectis praesidiisque suis vetere se continebat regno, neutiquam quieturus. 3 Stimulabat [2] aegrum amore uxor socerque, et ita viris equisque abundabat ut subiectae oculis regni per multos florentis annos vires etiam minus barbaro atque inpotenti animo spiritus possent facere. 4 Igitur omnibus qui bello apti erant in unum coactis equos, arma, tela dividit; equites in turmas, pedites in cohortes, sicut quondam ab Romanis centurionibus 5 didicerat, distribuit. Exercitu haud minore quam quem prius habuerat, ceterum omni prope novo 6 atque incondito, ire ad hostes pergit. Et castris in propinquo positis primo pauci equites ex tuto speculantes ab stationibus progredi, dein iaculis summoti recurrere ad suos; inde excursiones in vicem fieri et, cum pulsos indignatio accenderet, 7 plures subire, quod inritamentum certaminum equestrium est, cum aut vincentibus spes aut pulsis ira adgregat suos.

8 Ita tum a paucis proelio accenso omnem utrimque postremo equitatum certaminis studium effudit. Ac dum sincerum [3] equestre proelium erat, multitudo

[1] diu $P(3)NJK$ Aldus, Froben : om. SpHV.
[2] Stimulabat $P(3)N$ Aldus : -bant SpN'HVJK Froben 2.
[3] sincerum $P(3)N$(-re AN) : om. HVJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] Ten years before; XXIV. xlviii. 11 f.

Laelius and Masinissa had reached Numidia in about B.C. 203 fifteen days, the Maesulians, that is, the kingdom of Masinissa's father, joyfully submitted to his rule, as that of a long-wished-for king. Syphax, when his commanders and garrisons had been driven out, confined himself to his old kingdom with no intention of remaining inactive. Love-sick, he was spurred on by his wife and father-in-law, and he had men and horses in such abundance that, when the forces of a kingdom that had flourished for many years were before his eyes, they could have roused a spirit that was even less barbarous and uncontrollable. Therefore, concentrating all the men fit for war, he assigned them horses, arms and missile weapons. He organized cavalry in troops, infantry in cohorts, in the manner he had formerly[1] learned from Roman centurions. With an army no smaller than that which he had had before, but almost entirely raw and untrained, he at once advanced against the enemy. And after a camp had been pitched not far away, at first a few horsemen rode forth from the outposts, scouting from a safe distance; then being driven away by lances they dashed back to their own men. Next in order came attacks made from both sides and, as men beaten back were inflamed by anger, more and more came to help them—the usual provocation in cavalry engagements, when either hope adds reinforcements to the successful or anger to those who have been repulsed.

So on this occasion, the battle having been begun by a few, all the cavalry of both sides in the end were sent pouring out by their zest for the fray. And so long as it was purely a cavalry battle, the great

A.U.C. 551

Masaesuliorum, ingentia agmina Syphace emittente, 9 sustineri vix poterat; deinde, ut pedes Romanus repentino per turmas suas[1] viam dantes intercursu stabilem aciem fecit absterruitque effuse invehentem sese hostem, primo barbari segnius permittere 10 equos, dein stare ac prope turbari[2] novo genere pugnae, postremo non peditі solum cedere, sed ne equitem quidem sustinere peditis praesidio audentem. 11 Iam signa quoque legionum adpropinquabant. Tum vero Masaesulii non modo primum impetum, sed ne conspectum quidem signorum atque armorum tulerunt; tantum seu memoria priorum cladium seu praesens terror valuit.

XII. Ibi Syphax, dum obequitat hostium turmis, 2 si pudore, si periculo suo fugam sistere posset, equo graviter icto effusus opprimitur capiturque et vivus, laetum ante omnes Masinissae praebiturus specta- 3 culum, ad Laelium pertrahitur.[3] Caedes[4] in eo proelio minor quam victoria fuit, quia equestri 4 tantummodo proelio certatum fuerat. Non plus quinque milia occisa, minus dimidium eius hominum captum est impetu in castro facto, quo perculsa rege amisso multitudo se contulerat.

[1] suas CHVJK Aldus, Froben, Eds.: suis A^6 Conway: suam P(3).

[2] prope turbari K Aldus, Froben, Eds.: propere turbari A^1(-are J): propere turbati P(3)N: prope torpere turbati Novák (with stupere M. Müller).

[3] pertrahitur P(3)N Aldus: at- (or ad-) HJK Froben 2.

[4] Caedes, etc., this sentence and the following in the MSS. and most eds. follow Cirta . . vis (§ 3, p. 406): transferred to this position, as logical order requires, by Madvig, Conway.

---

[1] Cf. XXVIII. xvii. 5; XXIX. xxx. 10; xxxii. 14.

numbers of the Masaesulians,[1] while Syphax was sending out huge columns, could hardly be withstood. Then when Roman infantry[2] by a sudden movement into the openings made for them by troops of their own cavalry had steadied the battle-line and checked the wild charge of the enemy, the barbarians at first gave their horses less rein, then were at a standstill and all but confounded by the strange tactics. Finally they not only gave way before the infantry but did not withstand the cavalry either, who were emboldened by the protection of infantry. And now the units of legionaries[3] also were approaching. Then indeed the Masaesulians failed to sustain not only the first attack but even the sight of the standards and arms. Such was the effect either of remembering former defeats or of their present alarm. B.C. 203

XII. Then Syphax, while riding up to the enemy's troops of cavalry in the hope that by putting his men to shame, by exposing himself, he might be able to stem their flight, was thrown from a horse which had been seriously wounded, was overpowered, captured and brought alive to Laelius, a welcome sight presently to Masinissa above all others. The slaughter in that battle was not in proportion to the scale of the victory, since only a cavalry battle had been fought. Not more than five thousand men were slain; less than half of that number were captured in an attack upon the camp, to which very many men, losing heart with the loss of their king, had retreated.

[2] I.e., only the light-armed (velites). The legionaries enter first in § 11.

[3] Doubtless detachments, since in ix. 1 no mention was made of an entire legion.

a.u.c. 551

5 Cirta caput regni Syphacis erat, eoque se [1] ingens
6 hominum ex fuga [2] contulit vis.[3] Masinissa sibi quidem dicere nihil esse in praesentia pulchrius quam victorem recuperatum tanto post intervallo patrium invisere regnum; sed tam secundis quam adversis
7 rebus non dari spatium ad cessandum. Si se Laelius cum equitatu vinctoque [4] Syphace Cirtam praecedere sinat, trepida omnia metu se oppressurum; Laelium cum peditibus subsequi modicis itineribus posse.
8 Adsentiente Laelio praegressus Cirtam evocari ad conloquium principes Cirtensium iubet. Sed apud ignaros regis casus nec quae acta essent promendo nec minis nec suadendo ante valuit quam rex vinctus
9 in conspectum datus est.[5] Tum ad spectaculum tam foedum comploratio orta, et partim pavore moenia sunt deserta, partim repentino consensu gratiam apud victorem quaerentium patefactae portae.
10 Et Masinissa praesidio circa portas opportunaque moenium dimisso, ne cui fugae pateret exitus, ad regiam occupandam citato vadit equo.
11 Intranti vestibulum in ipso limine Sophoniba,[6] uxor Syphacis, filia Hasdrubalis Poeni, occurrit; et

[1] se A'HVJK Aldus, Froben : om. P(3)N : placed after hominum by Conway.
[2] ex fuga HVJK Aldus, Froben : om. P(3)N.
[3] contulit vis P(3)N : vis contulit AN : vis . . . contulerat A'HVJK Aldus, Froben : contulerat vis Conway.
[4] vinctoque A[2] Gronovius, Eds. : victoque P(3)NJK.
[5] est HVJK Froben 2 : esset P(3)N Aldus.
[6] Sophoniba P2N : Sophonisba VJK Aldus, Froben.

[1] Cf. XXIX. xxxii. 14 and note.
[2] Crossing the open court Masinissa and his men approach the door. Cf. the vestibulum curiae below, xxi. 4 and (at Carthage) xxiv. 10.

Cirta[1] was the capital of the kingdom of Syphax, B.C. 203 and to that city came a vast number of men from the rout. Masinissa said that, while for himself nothing was at that moment more attractive than to visit as victor his ancestral kingdom, recovered after so long an interval, nevertheless in success as well as in misfortune no time is allowed for loitering. If Laelius should permit him to go on in advance to Cirta with the cavalry and with Syphax in chains, he would surprise everybody in the excitement due to alarm. Laelius, he said, could follow with the infantry in short marches. With Laelius' assent he went to Cirta in advance and ordered that the leading Cirtensians be called out of the city to a conference. But with men who were unaware of the king's misadventure he accomplished nothing by revealing what had taken place, nor by threats nor by persuasion, until the king was placed before their eyes in chains. Then before a sight so grievous wailing began, and in alarm some deserted the walls, others with the sudden agreement of men who curry favour with the victor threw open the gates. And Masinissa, first sending detachments to all the gates and to favourable points on the walls, that no one might have a way of escape open to him, rode at full speed to take possession of the palace.

As he was entering the forecourt[2] Sophoniba,[3] the wife of Syphax, daughter of Hasdrubal the Carthaginian, met him at the very threshold. And [3] Probably married to Syphax in 205 B.C. Cf. Polybius i. 4; vii. 6; Diodorus Sic. XXVII. 7; Dio Cass. frag. 57. 51 (enlarging on her cultivation in letters and music); Zonaras IX. xi. 1 f.: xiii. 2 ff.; Appian Pun. 27 f.

A.U.C. 551

cum in medio agmine armatorum Masinissam insignem cum armis tum cetero habitu conspexisset, regem esse, id quod erat, rata, genibus advoluta eius 12 "Omnia quidem ut posses"[1] inquit "in nobis[2] dederunt virtusque et felicitas tua; sed si captivae apud dominum vitae necisque suae vocem supplicem mittere licet, si genua, si victricem attingere dextram,
13 precor quaesoque per maiestatem regiam, in qua paulo ante nos quoque fuimus, per gentis Numidarum nomen, quod tibi cum Syphace commune fuit, per huiusce regiae deos, qui te melioribus ominibus
14 accipiant quam Syphacem hinc miserunt, hanc veniam supplici des ut ipse quodcumque fert[3] animus de captiva tua[4] statuas neque me in cuiusquam Romani
15 superbum et crudele arbitrium venire sinas. Si nihil aliud quam Syphacis uxor fuissem, tamen Numidae atque in eadem mecum Africa geniti quam alienigenae et externi fidem experiri mallem;
16 quid Carthaginiensi ab Romano, quid filiae Hasdrubalis timendum sit vides. Si nulla re alia potes, morte me ut vindices ab Romanorum arbitrio oro
17 obtestorque." Forma erat insignis et florentissima aetas. Itaque cum modo genua modo[5] dextram amplectens in id ne cui Romano traderetur fidem exposceret, propiusque blanditias iam[6] oratio esset
18 quam preces, non in misericordiam modo prolapsus

[1] posses P(3)N Aldus, Froben: possis A[1]HVJK Conway.
[2] in nobis (omitting inquit) P(3)N: in nos A[1]N1HVJK Aldus, Froben.
[3] fert P(3)B[2]N: feret HJK Aldus, Froben: ferret V: om. B.
[4] tua N[1] or N[2]HVJK: om. P(3)N Aldus, Froben.
[5] modo genua modo Gronovius: modo A[1]?(alt.)N[1]HJK Aldus, Froben: domo P(3)N.
[6] iam A[1]HVJK Aldus, Froben: om. P(3).

when in the midst of the column of armed men she caught sight of Masinissa, conspicuous both by his arms and the rest of his dress, thinking it was the king, as was the fact, she clasped his knees and said: "All power over us has indeed been given you by the gods and by your courage and good fortune. But if a captive is permitted in the house of the master of her life and death to lift the voice of a suppliant, if she may touch his knees, his victorious right hand, I pray and entreat you by the royal state in which we too have lived a short time ago, by the name of the Numidian race, which you have shared with Syphax, by the gods of this palace here—and may they receive you under better auspices than those under which they sent Syphax away!—I beg you to grant this favour to a suppliant, that, whatever your inclination, you yourself decide in regard to your captive and do not suffer me to be subjected to the haughty and cruel decision of any Roman. If I had been nothing else than the wife of Syphax, still I should have preferred to trust the word of a Numidian and a man born in the same Africa as myself rather than that of a foreigner by birth and nationality. What a Carthaginian woman, what a daughter of Hasdrubal has to fear from a Roman you see. If by no other means you are able to do so, I beg and implore you to save me by death from the decision of Romans." Her beauty was conspicuous and her age at full bloom. Consequently while she was clasping now his knees and now his right hand, begging for his promise not to surrender her to any Roman, and her words were now more nearly those of a charmer than of a suppliant, the heart of the victor was quickly moved not to pity only, but with the amorous sus- B.C. 203

A.U.C. 551

est animus victoris, sed, ut est genus Numidarum in Venerem praeceps, amore captivae victor captus. Data dextra in id quod petebatur obligandae fidei in 19 regiam concedit. Institit deinde reputare[1] secum ipse quem ad modum promissi fidem praestaret. Quod cum expedire non posset, ab amore temerarium
20 atque impudens mutuatur consilium; nuptias in eum ipsum diem parari repente iubet, ne quid relinqueret integri[2] aut Laelio aut ipsi Scipioni consulendi velut in captivam quae Masinissae iam
21 nupta foret. Factis nuptiis supervenit Laelius, et adeo non dissimulavit improbare se factum ut primo etiam cum Syphace et ceteris captivis detractam eam lecto[3] geniali mittere ad Scipionem conatus sit.
22 Victus deinde precibus Masinissae orantis ut arbitrium utrius regum duorum fortunae accessio Sophoniba esset ad Scipionem reiceret, misso Syphace et captivis ceteras urbes Numidiae quae praesidiis regiis tenebantur adiuvante Masinissa recipit.[4]

XIII. Syphacem in castra adduci cum esset nuntiatum, omnis velut ad spectaculum triumphi multi-2 tudo effusa est. Praecedebat ipse vinctus; sequebatur grex nobilium Numidarum. Tum quantum quisque plurimum poterat[5] magnitudini Syphacis famaeque[6] gentis victoriam suam augendo addebat:

[1] Institit deinde reputare A'N'HVJK Eds.: P, omitting a line, has only -re: confusion in $P^2(3)N$.
[2] relinqueret integri $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben: -eret integrum HVJK: -eretur integrum Sp.
[3] lecto Madvig: om. $P(3)NHVJK$: thoro Aldus, Froben.
[4] recipit $P(3)B^2NSpHJK$ Froben 2: recepit B Aldus.
[5] poterat $P(3)N$ Aldus: posset SpVJK Froben 2: posse H.
[6] -que SpA'HVJK Froben 2: om. $P(3)N$.

ceptibility of the Numidian race the victor was B.C. 203 captivated by love of the captive. He gave her his right hand as a pledge for the fulfilment of her request and withdrew into the palace. Then he began by himself to consider how he could guarantee that the promise would be kept. As he was unable to solve that problem he borrowed from love a plan that was reckless and unbecoming. He promptly ordered preparations to be made for a wedding the very same day, in order not to leave any decision open either to Laelius or to Scipio himself in regard to her as a captive when she should be already married to Masinissa. After the wedding Laelius arrived, and so far was he from concealing his disapproval of the act that at first he even attempted to tear her away from the marriage couch and send her to Scipio with Syphax and the rest of the captives. He was then persuaded by the entreaties of Masinissa, who begged him to refer to Scipio the decision which of the two kings was to have Sophoniba share his lot. Whereupon, after sending Syphax and the captives away, he with Masinissa's aid subdued the remaining cities of Numidia which were held by the king's garrisons.

XIII. When it was announced that Syphax was being brought into the camp [1] all the rank and file poured out, as though they were to witness a triumph. First came Syphax himself in chains, followed by a company of noble Numidians. Then all the soldiers in enlarging upon their own victory did their best to magnify Syphax and the fame of his race, saying [1] Scipio's camp; cf. § 8. Although soldiers only are meant, Livy's comparison is with the populace witnessing a triumph and impressed by a victory over a worthy foe.

A.U.C. 551

illum esse regem cuius tantum maiestati duo potentissimi in terris tribuerint populi, Romanus Carthaginiensisque, ut Scipio imperator suus ad amicitiam eius petendam, relicta provincia Hispania exercituque, duabus quinqueremibus in Africam navigaverit, Hasdrubal Poenorum imperator non ipse modo ad eum in regnum venerit, sed etiam filiam ei nuptum dederit. Habuisse eum uno tempore in potestate duos imperatores, Poenum Romanumque. Sicut ab dis immortalibus pars utraque hostiis mactandis pacem petisset, ita ab eo utrimque pariter amicitiam petitam. Iam tantas habuisse opes ut Masinissam regno pulsum eo redegerit ut vita eius fama mortis et latebris, ferarum modo in silvis rapto viventis, tegeretur.

His sermonibus circumstantium celebratus rex in praetorium ad Scipionem est perductus. Movit et Scipionem cum [1] fortuna pristina viri praesenti fortunae conlata, tum recordatio hospitii dextraeque datae et foederis publice ac privatim iuncti. Eadem haec et Syphaci animum dederunt in adloquendo victore. Nam cum Scipio quid sibi voluisset quaereret qui non societatem solum abnuisset Romanam, sed ultro bellum intulisset, tum ille peccasse quidem sese atque insanisse fatebatur, sed non tum demum cum arma adversus populum Romanum cepisset; exitum sui furoris eum [2] fuisse, non principium;

[1] cum P(3)NHJ Froben 2 : tum $A^{\nu}NVK$ Aldus.
[2] eum $A^{\alpha}HJK$: cum V : om. P(3)N Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Cf. XXVIII. xvii. 11 ff.
[2] Ibid. xviii. 1 ff.
[3] Cf. XXIX. xxxii. 10 f.

that he was the king to whose majesty the two most powerful peoples in the world, the Roman and the Carthaginian, paid such honour that Scipio, their own general, left his province of Spain and his army and with two quinqueremes sailed to Africa to court his friendship,[1] while Hasdrubal, a general of the Carthaginians, not only came himself to him in his kingdom but also gave him his daughter in marriage. They said that he had at the same time had two generals,[2] a Carthaginian and a Roman, in his power; that just as both sides had sought the favour of the immortal gods by offering sacrifices, so had his friendship been sought at the same time by both sides. Moreover, so great, they said, had been his power that when Masinissa had been driven out of his kingdom, Syphax brought him so low that his life was protected only by the report of his death and by hiding-places where he lived in the forest like wild animals on what they caught.[3] B.C. 203

Honoured by such utterances of the bystanders the king was brought before Scipio at headquarters. Even Scipio was moved by the comparison of the man's former estate with his present condition, but especially by the memory of their guest-friendship and the clasp of hands, and of the compact made for the state and of that made in his own name. The same considerations gave Syphax also spirit in addressing the victor. For when Scipio repeatedly asked him what he had meant by not only rejecting a Roman alliance but also taking the aggressive in war, he would admit that he had indeed done wrong and lost his reason, but not then for the first time when he had taken up arms against the Roman people. That had been the culmination, not the beginning,

A.U.C. 551

11 tum se insanisse, tum hospitia privata et publica foedera omnia ex animo eiecisse,[1] cum Carthaginiensem matronam domum acceperit. Illis nuptialibus facibus regiam conflagrasse suam; illam furiam pestemque omnibus delenimentis animum suum avertisse atque alienasse, nec conquiesse donec ipsa manibus suis nefaria sibi arma adversus hospitem
13 atque amicum induerit. Perdito tamen atque adflicto sibi hoc in miseriis solatii esse, quod in omnium hominum inimicissimi sibi domum ac penates
14 eandem pestem ac furiam transisse videat. Neque prudentiorem[2] neque constantiorem Masinissam quam Syphacem esse, etiam[3] iuventa incautiorem; certe stultius illum atque intemperantius[4] eam quam se duxisse.

XIV. Haec[5] non hostili modo odio, sed amoris etiam stimulis, amatam[6] apud aemulum cernens, cum dixisset, non mediocri cura Scipionis animum
2 pepulit. Et fidem criminibus raptae[7] prope inter arma nuptiae neque consulto neque exspectato Laelio faciebant tamque praeceps festinatio ut quo die captam hostem[8] vidisset, eodem matrimonio

[1] tum (hospitia) . . . eiecisse P(3)N: cum . . . eiecisset $A^{6\ell}$ and $A^{z}HVJK$, Eds. before Gronovius.

[2] Neque prudentiorem P(3)N Aldus, Froben: om. SpHVJK.

[3] etiam P(3)N: iam ab SpHV: etiam ab $A^{a}JK$ Aldus, Froben.

[4] illum atque intemperantius P(3)$A^{z}N$ Aldus, (-atius with A^{a}) Froben: om. SpHVJK.

[5] Haec P(3)NSpJK: hanc $N^{z}HV$ Aldus.

[6] amatam P(3)$A^{\nu 1}NSpJK$: armatam A^{ν} Aldus.

[7] raptae P(3)N: facte (or -ae) AVJK Aldus, Froben: facere H.

[8] captam hostem Gronovius, Eds.: captum hostem P(3)N Luterbacher (cf. his appendix): captam reginam A^{a}(alt.)N^{a}(alt.)HJK early Eds.

of his madness. The time when he lost his reason, B.C. 203 when he put out of his head all private guest-friendships and public treaties, was when he admitted a noble Carthaginian lady to his house. From those nuptial torches his palace had taken fire; that baneful fury by all her blandishments had unbalanced and unhinged his mind, and she had never rested until with her own hands she had herself put on him guilt-stained arms against a guest-friend and a personal friend. Yet for himself, ruined and crushed, there was this consolation in his misfortunes, to see that the same baneful fury had passed into the house and home of the greatest enemy he had in the world. Masinissa was neither wiser, he said, nor more steadfast than Syphax; he was even more imprudent owing to his youth. Certainly there had been more folly and lack of self-control in Masinissa's marriage to her than in his own.[1]

XIV. By speaking thus, not only out of hatred as an enemy but also under the goad of jealousy, as he saw his beloved in the possession of his rival, he aroused no slight anxiety in the mind of Scipio.[2] The charges against her were substantiated both by the marriage hastily celebrated, almost on the battlefield, without either seeking the advice of Laelius or waiting for his arrival, and by such precipitate haste that on the very day on which he saw her as a captured enemy he took her to wife and performed

[1] This indirect speech is probably based upon a lost passage in Polybius, whose narrative fails us here; for the conclusion of his XIVth book has been lost (beginning after x. 14 above). Cf. Appian Pun. 27.

[2] Who had reason to fear that Sophoniba would persuade Masinissa to go over to the Carthaginian side.

A.U.C. 551

iunctam acciperet et ad penates hostis sui nuptiale
3 sacrum conficeret; et [1] eo foediora haec videbantur Scipioni, quod ipsum in Hispania iuvenem nullius forma pepulerat captivae. Haec secum volutanti Laelius ac Masinissa supervenerunt. Quos cum pariter ambo et benigno voltu excepisset et egregiis
4 laudibus frequenti praetorio celebrasset, abductum in secretum Masinissam sic adloquitur: "Aliqua te, Masinissa, existimo [2] intuentem in me bona et principio in Hispania ad iungendam mecum amicitiam venisse et postea in Africa te ipsum spesque
5 omnes tuas in fidem meam commisisse. Atqui nulla earum virtus est propter quas tibi adpetendus visus sim qua ego aeque ac temperantia et continentia
6 libidinum gloriatus fuerim. Hanc te quoque ad ceteras tuas eximias virtutes, Masinissa, adiecisse velim. Non est, non—mihi crede—tantum ab hostibus armatis aetati nostrae periculi [3] quantum ab
7 circumfusis undique voluptatibus. Qui eas temperantia sua frenavit ac domuit multo maius decus maioremque victoriam sibi peperit quam nos Syphace
8 victo habemus. Quae me absente strenue ac fortiter fecisti libenter et commemoravi et memini; cetera te ipsum tecum reputare quam me dicente erubescere malo. Syphax populi Romani auspiciis victus cap-
9 tusque est. Itaque ipse, coniunx, regnum, ager, oppida, homines qui incolunt, quidquid denique

[1] et SpHVJK Froben 2: om. P(3)N.
[2] existimo, here HVJK: after te P(3)N Aldus, Froben, most Eds.
[3] periculi *Sp*²*A*ˣ*HVJK Froben 2*: -lum P(3)N Aldus.

[1] Cf. XXVI. xlix. 11 ff. and chap. l.

the nuptial rites before the household gods of his foe. Again, all this seemed the more repulsive to Scipio because in Spain, in spite of his youth, he had himself never been smitten by the beauty of any captive.[1] Such thoughts were in his mind when Laelius and Masinissa arrived.[2] Scipio welcomed them both alike with kindly expression and lauded them in distinguished terms before a crowded council, and then leading Masinissa to a place apart thus addressed him: "Some good qualities you saw in me, I suppose, Masinissa, and so came to me first in Spain, to cement a friendship with me, and later in Africa entrusted yourself and all your hopes to my protection. But of those virtues on account of which my friendship might seem to you desirable there is none on which I might have prided myself so much as on self-restraint and continence. This virtue I would have you also, Masinissa, add to your other remarkable excellences. There is no danger—believe me, there is none—so great to our time of life from armed enemies as from pleasures all about us. Whoever has checked and mastered them by his self-control has gained for himself a far greater distinction and a greater victory than is ours by the defeat of Syphax. All that you in my absence have done with energy and courage I was glad to mention and gladly remember. Upon the rest of your acts I prefer to have you reflect inwardly yourself, rather than blush at my recital. Syphax has been defeated and captured under the auspices of the Roman people. In consequence he himself, his wife, his kingdom, territory, towns, the people who inhabit B.C. 203

[2] Some time has elapsed during which Numidian cities were recovered; xii. 22.

A.U.C. 551

10 Syphacis fuit praeda populi Romani est; et regem coniugemque eius, etiamsi non civis Carthaginiensis esset, etiamsi non patrem eius imperatorem hostium videremus, Romam oporteret mitti, ac senatus populique Romani de ea iudicium atque arbitrium esse quae regem socium nobis alienasse atque in arma
11 egisse[1] praecipitem dicatur. Vince animum; cave[2] deformes multa bona uno vitio et tot meritorum gratiam maiore culpa quam causa culpae est conrumpas."

XV. Masinissae haec audienti non rubor solum suffusus, sed lacrimae etiam obortae; et cum se quidem in potestate futurum imperatoris dixisset orassetque eum ut quantum res sineret fidei suae
2 temere obstrictae consuleret—promisisse enim se in nullius potestatem eam traditurum—ex praetorio in 3 tabernaculum suum confusus concessit. Ibi arbitris remotis cum crebro suspiritu[3] et gemitu, quod[4] facile ab circumstantibus tabernaculum exaudiri
4 posset, aliquantum temporis consumpsisset, ingenti ad postremum edito gemitu fidum e servis vocat,[5] sub cuius custodia regio more ad incerta fortunae venenum erat, et[6] mixtum in poculo ferre ad Sopho-
5 nibam iubet ac simul nuntiare Masinissam libenter

[1] egisse P(3)HVJK: coegisse $A^{a}N$ Aldus, Froben.
[2] cave P(3)NHVJ Froben 2: cave ne K Aldus.
[3] suspiritu P(3)N: spiritu $N^{2}H$: suspirio $P^{4}CM^{7}A^{6}JK$ Aldus, Froben.
[4] quod P(3)Sp?HVJK Froben 2: quo $A^{a}N$ Aldus.
[5] vocat PCMHV: vo BD: uno accito (with fido) $A^{a}NJK$ Aldus, Froben: unum vocat Johnson, Conway.
[6] et P(3): ei $N^{4}?HJK$ Aldus, Froben: eum V: om. $M^{2}?A^{a}N$.

[1] Livy understands her to have been brought to Scipio's camp; so Diodorus Sic. XXVII. 7. Other authorities laid them, in short whatever has belonged to Syphax, is B.C. 203 booty of the Roman people. And as for the king and his wife, even if she were not a Carthaginian citizen, even if we did not see in her father a high commander of the enemy, they would have to be sent to Rome, and the senate and the Roman people would properly have the right to judge and decide the case of her who is alleged to have estranged from us an allied king and driven him headlong into war. Conquer yourself; do not disfigure many good qualities by one defect and forfeit the favour earned by so many services through a fault out of all proportion to its cause."

XV. On hearing these words not only did Masinissa blush, but tears also came. And after saying that he on his part would be under the orders of the general and imploring him to have such regard as the case permitted for the promise he had rashly given, namely that he would not hand her over to any man's power, he withdrew from headquarters to his own tent a distracted man. There, with no witnesses present, he spent considerable time, with frequent sighs and groans, so that they could easily be heard by those who stood about the tent. Then at last, after one very loud groan, he called the faithful slave in whose keeping was the poison, against the uncertainties of fortune, as usual with kings, and bade him mix it and carry it in a cup to Sophoniba.[1] He also ordered him at the same time to tell her that Masinissa would gladly have fulfilled the most the scene at Cirta and made Masinissa hurry back from the camp; cf. Appian Pun. 28; Zonaras IX. xiii. 2 ff. A pertinent passage in Polybius is lacking.

A.U.C. 551

primam ei fidem praestaturum fuisse quam vir uxori debuerit: quoniam eius arbitrium qui possint adimant, secundam fidem praestare ne viva in 6 potestatem Romanorum veniat. Memor patris imperatoris patriaeque et duorum regum quibus nupta fuisset, sibi ipsa consuleret.

Hunc nuntium ac simul venenum ferens minister 7 cum ad Sophonibam venisset, "Accipio" inquit "nuptiale munus, neque ingratum, si nihil maius vir uxori praestare potuit. Hoc tamen nuntia, melius me morituram fuisse, si non in funere meo nupsissem." 8 Non locuta est ferocius quam acceptum poculum nullo trepidationis signo dato inpavide hausit.

9 Quod ubi nuntiatum est Scipioni, ne quid aeger animi[1] ferox iuvenis gravius consuleret, accitum 10 eum extemplo nunc solatur, nunc, quod temeritatem temeritate[2] alia luerit tristioremque rem quam 11 necesse fuerit fecerit, leniter castigat. Postero die, ut a praesenti motu averteret animum eius, in tribunal escendit et contionem advocari iussit. Ibi Masinissam, primum regem appellatum eximisque ornatum laudibus, aurea corona, aurea patera, sella curuli et scipione eburneo, toga picta et 12 palmata tunica donat. Addit verbis honorem: neque magnificentius quicquam triumpho apud Romanos neque triumphantibus[3] ampliorem eo

[1] animi $P(3)N$: -mo C^2A^1HVJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] temeritate $P(3)A^1NJK$ Aldus, Froben : om. A^1SpHV.
[3] triumphantibus $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben : -tis SpA^1HV : -ti JK.

---

[1] All of these were worn or used by a general in his triumph except the patera, or bowl. Cf. X. vii. 9. Similar gifts to kings in XXVII. iv. 8–10 (Vol. VII. p. 214, n. 2).

important promise which as husband he was bound B.C. 203 to keep for a wife; that since the freedom to do so was taken away by those who had the power, he was keeping the promise next to it in importance, namely, that she should not come into the Romans' power alive. Mindful of her father the general, and of her native city, and of the two kings to whom she had been married, she was to decide for herself.

When the slave bearing this message together with the poison had reached Sophoniba she said, "I receive the wedding gift, and it is not unwelcome if my husband has been able to bestow nothing better upon his wife. But tell him this, that it would have been easier for me to die if I had not married at my funeral." No less high-spirited than her words was her acceptance of the cup, fearlessly drained without a sign of wavering.

As soon as this was reported to Scipio he at once summoned Masinissa, for fear the high-spirited young man in his distress of mind might do something desperate. He offered now consolation, now gentle rebuke because he atoned for one reckless act by another and made the matter more deplorable than was necessary. On the following day, in order to divert Masinissa's thoughts from the emotion of the moment, Scipio mounted the tribune and ordered that an assembly be called. There for the first time he addressed Masinissa as king, bestowing upon him the highest terms of praise, and presented him with a golden wreath, a golden patera, a curule chair and ivory sceptre, an embroidered toga and a tunic adorned with palms.[1] He added this tribute: that there was no higher distinction among the Romans than a triumph, and that those who triumphed had ornatum [1] esse quo unum [2] omnium externorum

A.U.C. 551

13 dignum Masinissam populus Romanus ducat. Laelium deinde et ipsum conlaudatum aurea corona donat; et alii militares viri, prout a quoque navata 14 opera erat, donati. His honoribus mollitus regis animus erectusque in spem propinquam sublato Syphace omnis Numidiae potiundae.

XVI. Scipio C. Laelio cum Syphace aliisque captivis Romam misso, cum quibus et Masinissae legati profecti sunt, ipse ad Tyneta rursus castra refert et 2 quae munimenta incohaverat permunit. Carthaginienses non brevi solum, sed prope vano gaudio ab satis prospera in praesens oppugnatione classis perfusi, post famam capti Syphacis, in quo plus prope quam in Hasdrubale atque exercitu suo spei repo-
3 suerant, perculsi, iam nullo auctore belli ultra audito oratores ad pacem petendam mittunt triginta seniorum principes; id erat sanctius apud illos consilium maximaque ad ipsum senatum regendum
4 vis. Qui ubi in castra Romana et in praetorium pervenerunt, more adulantium—accepto, credo, ritu ex ea regione ex qua oriundi erant—procubuerunt.
5 Conveniens oratio tam humili adulationi fuit, non culpam purgantium, sed transferentium initium culpae in Hannibalem potentiaeque eius fautores.

[1] ornatum M^1 or M^2VJK : -tu $P(3)NH$ Aldus, Froben.
[2] unum K Froben : uno $P(3)NVJ$ Aldus : om. H.

[1] For previous fortifications cf. ix. 11.
[2] Cf. below, xxxvi. 9. They formed a separate body, the γερουσία; Polybius I. lxxxvii. 3; X. xviii. 1 (this at New Carthage).

no more magnificent array than that of which B.C. 203
Masinissa alone of all foreigners was accounted worthy by the Roman people. He then warmly praised Laelius also and presented him with a golden wreath. Other officers also and men were rewarded, each according to the service he had performed. By these distinctions the king was appeased and roused to the hope, soon to be fulfilled, that with Syphax removed he would gain possession of all Numidia.

XVI. Scipio, having sent Gaius Laelius with Syphax and other captives to Rome, while with these went Masinissa's legates also, himself moved his camp back again to Tynes and completed the fortifications he had already begun.[1] The Carthaginians, on account of their attack upon the fleet with considerable success for the moment, had been filled with a joy not only short-lived but almost unfounded. But on hearing of the capture of Syphax, on whom they had rested their hopes almost more than on Hasdrubal and their own army, they were discouraged. No longer listening to any advocate of war, they sent their thirty elder statesmen to plead for peace. This was their privy council,[2] and it had great influence even in guiding the senate. When they reached the Roman camp and headquarters they fell to the ground after the custom of courtiers, having derived that ceremony, I suppose, from the region from which they sprang.[3] Such humble obeisance was matched by their discourse, as they did not try to clear themselves of blame, but shifted the original blame to Hannibal and to those who

[3] I.e. as being of Phoenician (Tyrian) origin. Cf. XLII. xxiii. 10; Polybius XV. i. 6.

A.U.C. 551

6 Veniam civitati petebant civium temeritate bis iam [1] eversae, incolumi futurae iterum hostium beneficio;
7 imperium ex victis hostibus populum Romanum, non perniciem petere; paratis oboedienter servire imperaret quae vellet.
8 Scipio et venisse ea spe in Africam se ait, et spem suam prospero belli eventu auctam, victoriam se,
9 non pacem domum reportaturum esse; tamen, cum victoriam prope in manibus habeat, pacem non abnuere, ut omnes gentes sciant populum Romanum
10 et suscipere iuste bella et finire. Leges pacis se has dicere: captivos et perfugas et fugitivos restituant; exercitus ex Italia et Gallia deducant; Hispania abstineant: insulis omnibus quae inter Italiam
11 atque [2] Africam sint,[3] decedant; naves longas praeter viginti [4] omnes tradant, tritici quingenta, 12 hordei trecenta milia modium. Pecuniae summam quantam imperaverit parum convenit; alibi quinque milia talentum,[5] alibi quinque [6] milia pondo argenti, alibi duplex stipendium militibus imperatum invenio.

[1] iam, after this AN Aldus, Froben have ante where P(3) have te.
[2] atque P(3)HVJ : et ANK Aldus, Froben.
[3] sint P(3)HJK : sunt AN Aldus, Froben : essent V.
[4] viginti (XX) P(3)NHVJK : XXX Sigonius from Eutrop. III. 21.
[5] alibi . . . talentum P(3)NJ[1] : om. DHVJK.
[6] quinque, for V Weissenborn conj. D from Eutrop. l.c., 5000 being too small a sum.

---

[1] Cisalpine Gaul; cf. xviii. 1. Mago was to abandon the Ligurian coast as well; cf. xix. 2, 4, 12; and for his death at sea off Sardinia cf. ibid. § 5.
[2] Since the large islands in these waters were already held by the Romans, the Baleares, Pityusae and Malta are probably meant here, possibly Pantelleria and Lampedusa also.

supported his power. They craved pardon for a state now twice overthrown by the rashness of its citizens, to be saved a second time by the favour of its foes. It was power, they said, that the Roman people sought from vanquished enemies, not their destruction. They were ready to be obedient servants; let him give them whatever commands he pleased. B.C. 203

Scipio said he had come to Africa in the hope that he would carry home a victory, not a treaty of peace; that his hope had been also confirmed by a successful issue of the war. Nevertheless, although he had victory almost within his grasp, he was not rejecting a peace, in order that all nations might know that the Roman people acted fairly both in beginning and ending wars. He said that he announced the following terms of peace: that they restore captives and deserters and fugitive slaves; that they withdraw their armies from Italy and Gaul; [1] that they have nothing to do with Spain; that they give up ownership of all the islands lying between Italy and Africa; [2] that they deliver all their war-ships except twenty, and 500,000 pecks of wheat, 300,000 pecks of barley.[3] —As for money, there is no agreement as to the sum which he imposed. In one source I find that 5,000 talents [4] were imposed, in another 5,000 pounds of silver, in another double the pay of his soldiers.—

[3] This would be for the use of the Roman army during an armistice lasting until the treaty of peace was ratified. Double pay for the army (below) would be for the same length of time.

[4] So Polybius XV. viii. 7; 1600 talents, Appian Pun. 32. Cf. Dio Cass. frag. 57. 74 (no figures); Zonaras IX. xiii. 8 (do.). These were not the final terms, for which see xxxvii. 1 ff.; Polybius xviii. fin.

A.U.C. 551

13 "His condicionibus" inquit "placeatne pax triduum ad consultandum dabitur. Si placuerit, mecum indutias 14 facite, Romam ad senatum mittite legatos." Ita dimissi Carthaginienses nullas recusandas condiciones pacis cum censuissent, quippe qui moram temporis quaererent, dum Hannibal in Africam traiceret, 15 legatos alios ad Scipionem, ut indutias facerent, alios Romam ad pacem petendam mittunt, ducentes paucos in speciem captivos perfugasque et fugitivos, quo impetrabilior pax esset.

XVII. Multis ante diebus Laelius cum Syphace primoribusque Numidarum captivis Romam venit, quaeque in Africa gesta essent omnia ordine exposuit patribus, ingenti hominum et in praesens laetitia et 2 in futurum spe. Consulti inde patres regem in custodiam Albam mittendum censuerunt, Laelium retinen-
3 dum, donec legati Carthaginienses venirent. Supplicatio in quadriduum decreta est. P. Aelius praetor senatu misso et contione inde advocata cum C.
4 Laelio in rostra escendit. Ibi vero audientes fusos Carthaginiensium exercitus, devictum et captum ingentis nominis regem, Numidiam omnem egregia
5 victoria peragratam, tacitum continere gaudium non poterant quin clamoribus quibusque aliis multitudo
6 solet laetitiam inmodicam significarent. Itaque

[1] They had previously voted to recall him; ix. 7 f.

[2] In Polybius, Scipio's terms had been embodied in a treaty which was duly ratified by the Roman senate and people after Hannibal was out of Italy; XV. i. 3, 9, 11; iv. 8; viii. 9. Livy has the senate summarily rejecting a peace embassy from Carthage; below, xxii. f. This was surely the invention of some Roman annalist. See De Sanctis III. ii. 544.

[3] I.e. Alba Fucens; pp. 262, 538. A Roman colony since 304 B.C., it was on the Via Valeria, 47 miles beyond Tibur (Tivoli), 67 from Rome. Cf. Vol. VII. p. 41, note; Appian Hann. 39. Here Perseus of Macedon was later interned; XLV. xlii. 4.

"Whether on these terms," said he, "you are dis- B.C. 203 posed to make peace, on that point three days will be given you for deliberation. If that shall be your decision, make an armistice with me, send your embassy to the senate at Rome." Dismissed with these words, the Carthaginians agreed that no peace terms should be rejected, since they were seeking to gain time for Hannibal to cross over to Africa.[1] Accordingly they sent one embassy to Scipio to arrange an armistice and another to Rome to sue for peace,[2] taking with them a few captives and deserters and fugitive slaves for appearance' sake, that they might more readily obtain peace.

XVII. Many days before this, together with Syphax and the leading Numidian captives, Laelius reached Rome and set forth to the senate in order everything that had been done in Africa, in the midst of great rejoicing for the present and high hopes for the future. Thereupon the senate after deliberation voted that the king should be sent to Alba[3] to be interned; that Laelius should be detained until the Carthaginian embassy arrived.[4] A thanksgiving for four days was decreed. Publius Aelius, the praetor, having dismissed the senate, then summoned an assembly and with Gaius Laelius mounted the Rostra. Thereupon, hearing that the Carthaginian armies had been routed, a famous king conquered and captured, all Numidia overrun in a series of extraordinary victories, they were unable to keep their joy to themselves, but expressed their unbounded delight by shouting and such other means as the multitude commonly employs. Accordingly the [4] This conflicts with xxi. 11.

A.U.C. 551

praetor extemplo edixit uti aeditui aedes sacras omnes [1] tota urbe aperirent, circumeundi salutandique deos agendique grates per totum diem populo potestas fieret.

7 Postero die legatos Masinissae in senatum introduxit. Gratulati primum senatui sunt quod P. 8 Scipio prospere res in Africa gessisset; deinde gratias egerunt quod Masinissam non appellasset modo regem, sed fecisset restituendo in paternum regnum, in quo post Syphacem sublatum, si ita patribus visum esset, sine metu et certamine esset 9 regnaturus, dein conlaudatum [2] pro contione amplissimis decorasset donis, quibus ne indignus esset et dedisse [3] operam Masinissam et porro daturum 10 esse. Petere ut regium nomen ceteraque Scipionis 11 beneficia et munera senatus decreto confirmaret; et, nisi molestum esset, illud quoque petere Masinissam, ut Numidas captivos qui Romae in custodia essent remitterent; id sibi amplum apud [4] populares futu- 12 rum esse. Ad ea responsum legatis rerum gestarum prospere in Africa communem sibi cum rege gratulationem esse; Scipionem recte atque ordine videri fecisse, quod eum regem appellaverit, et quidquid aliud fecerit [5] quod cordi [6] foret Masinissae, id [7] 13 patres comprobare ac laudare. Munera quoque [8]

[1] omnes HVJK Aldus, Froben : om. P(3)N.

[2] conlaudatum (or coll-) P(3)H Aldus, Froben : quod (cum AN) laudatum A[a]NVJK.

[3] donis . . . dedisse om. P(3)N, two lines supplied by A[a]N[a]HVJK Aldus, Froben.

[4] apud P(3)N Aldus, Froben : ad HVJK.

[5] appellaverit . . . fecerit P(3)N Aldus : -visset . . . -cisset HVJK Froben 2.

[6] cordi P(3)N : honori A[a]HVJK Aldus, Froben 2.

[7] id C Alschefski, Eds. : ea C^2M^2 Aldus, Froben, Luchs : eis PMB : ei DAN : eaque HJK : et V.

praetor at once gave orders that the temple wardens B.C. 203 should open all the shrines throughout the city, and that people should have all day long the opportunity to make the rounds and pay their respects to the gods and return thanks to them.

On the next day he introduced Masinissa's envoys into the senate. They began by congratulating the senate on Publius Scipio's successful campaign in Africa. They then thanked the senators because he had not only saluted Masinissa as king but had made him king in restoring him to his father's kingdom, in which he would reign without fear and without contest since the removal of Syphax, if that should be the mind of the senators; also because, after warmly praising him before an assembly, he had conferred upon him the highest decorations, of which Masinissa had striven and would continue to strive to be not unworthy. He begged the senate, they said, by a decree to confirm the kingly title and the rest of Scipio's favours and gifts; and unless objection was made, another request of Masinissa's was this, that they return the Numidian captives who were interned at Rome. That would bring him great credit, he felt, among his countrymen. The response to these words of the envoys was that the senators reciprocated the king's congratulations on successes in Africa; that Scipio in their opinion had been entirely correct in saluting him as king, and that they approved and commended all else that he had done which gave pleasure to Masinissa. In addition gifts were decreed, [8] munera quoque A^{v}?HVJK Conway: munera P(3)N Aldus, Froben, Eds.

---

A.U.C. 551

quae legati ferrent regi decreverunt, sagula purpurea duo cum fibulis aureis [1] singulis et lato clavo tunicis, equos duo phaleratos, bina equestria arma cum loricis, et tabernacula militaremque supellectilem 14 qualem praeberi consuli mos esset.[2] Haec regi praetor mittere iussus. Legatis in singulos dona ne minus quinum milium, comitibus eorum milium [3] aeris, et vestimenta bina legatis, singula comitibus Numidisque qui ex custodia emissi redderentur regi; ad hoc aedes liberae, loca, lautia legatis decreta.

XVIII. Eadem aestate qua haec decreta Romae et in Africa gesta sunt P. Quinctilius Varus praetor et M. Cornelius proconsul in agro Insubrum Gallorum cum Magone Poeno signis conlatis pugnarunt.
2 Praetoris legiones in prima acie fuerunt; Cornelius suas in subsidiis tenuit, ipse ad prima signa equo advectus; proque duobus cornibus praetor ac proconsul milites ad inferenda in hostes signa summa vi
3 hortabantur. Postquam nihil commovebant, tum Quinctilius Cornelio: "Lentior, ut vides, fit pugna, et

[1] aureis A'N'HVJK: om. P(3)N.
[2] esset P(3)JK: est ANHV Aldus, Froben.
[3] milium (or -ll-) P(3) Eds.: milli AN: mille A' Aldus; milibus (or -ll-) N'HVJK Froben 2: singulorum milium Conway.

[1] Special seats in the Circus and at theatrical performances were reserved for them.
[2] Cf. p. 160, n. 1.
[3] The battle which follows is evidently taken from one of the Roman annalists and can be accepted only with reservations. To reject the whole passage as unhistorical, as has been done, is virtually to claim that Mago could remain on the Ligurian coast for three summers without ever penetrating to the plains to be carried to the king by the envoys: two purple military cloaks, each with a golden brooch, and tunics having the broad stripe, two horses with their trappings, two sets of arms with cuirasses for a horseman, and tents and field furniture such as were customarily furnished to a consul. These things the praetor was ordered to send to the king. For the envoys gifts were decreed, not less than five thousand asses for each of them, for their attendants one thousand each; and two garments apiece for the envoys, one each for their attendants, and for the Numidians who were ordered to be released from internment and restored to the king. In addition dwellings were ordered to be placed at the envoys' disposal, and places of honour,[1] and hospitable entertainment [2] were provided. B.C. 203

XVIII. In the same summer in which these measures were taken at Rome and these operations carried on in Africa, Publius Quinctilius Varus, a praetor, and Marcus Cornelius, the proconsul, fought a pitched battle with Mago the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrian Gauls.[3] The praetor's legions were in the first line. Cornelius kept his legions in reserve while he himself rode up to the front. And from in front of the two wings praetor and proconsul kept urging the soldiers to advance their ranks against the enemy with all their strength. When they failed to drive the enemy back, Quinctilius then said to Cornelius: "The battle is slowing down, of the Po. He may not have advanced so far as Mediolan(i)um (Milan), chief town of the Insubrians (V. xxxiv. 9; XXXIV. xlvi. 1). Cf. C.A.H. VIII. 102 f.; De Sanctis 540 f. and note; Neumann 536 f.; but also Ehrenberg in Pauly-Wissowa s.v. Mago 503; Kahrstedt 555 f.; G. Hesselbarth, Untersuchungen z. dritten Dekade d. Livius 572 f.

A.U.C. 551

induratur [1] praeter spem resistendo hostium timor, ac
4 ne vertat in audaciam periculum est. Equestrem procellam excitemus oportet, si turbare ac statu movere [2] volumus. Itaque vel tu ad prima signa proelium sustine, ego inducam in pugnam equites; vel ego hic in prima acie rem geram, tu quattuor legionum equites
5 in hostem emitte." Utram vellet praetor muneris partem proconsule accipiente, Quinctilius praetor cum filio, cui Marco praenomen erat, inpigro iuvene, ad equites pergit iussosque escendere in equos repente
6 in hostem emittit. Tumultum equestrem auxit clamor ab legionibus additus, nec stetisset hostium acies, ni Mago ad primum equitum motum paratos
7 elephantos extemplo in proelium induxisset. Ad quorum stridorem odoremque et aspectum territi equi vanum equestre auxilium fecerunt. Et ut . . .[3] permixtus, ubi cuspide uti et comminus gladio posset, roboris maioris Romanus eques erat, ita in ablatum paventibus procul equis melius ex intervallo Numidae
8 iaculabantur. Simul et peditum legio duodecima, magna ex parte caesa, pudore magis quam viribus
9 tenebat locum: nec diutius tenuisset, ni ex subsidiis tertia decuma legio in primam aciem inducta proelium dubium excepisset.[4] Mago quoque [5] ex subsidiis

[1] induratur x Madvig, Conway: -atus $P(3)NHVJK$ Aldus, Froben, Gronovius, Madvig 1863.

[2] movere P^1M^2HVJK Aldus, Froben: -eri $P(3)N$.

[3] Something has been lost here or reduced to the unintelligible rem of $P(3)N$: om. A^1HVJ Froben 2, most Eds. A missing dative is supplied, turmae Madvig 1886, or turbae M. Müller. J^1K emend to in rem (peritus), Aldus to in rem (permistis).

[4] excepisset A^vN^1HVJK Aldus, Froben; -petisset $P(3)N$.

[5] quoque N^1HVJK: que $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben.

as you see, and their unexpected resistance is harden- B.C. 203
ing the enemy against fright, and the danger is that fear may turn into daring. We must rouse our cavalry to a sudden charge if we wish to confuse and dislodge them. Accordingly, either do you in the front line keep up the fight, and I will lead the cavalry into the fray. Or I will command here at the front, and you shall send out the horse of four legions into the enemy." As the proconsul was ready to accept whichever part of the task the praetor wished him to take, Quinctilius, the praetor, with his son, an active youth whose praenomen was Marcus, made his way to the cavalry and ordering them to mount suddenly sent them out against the enemy. The confusion wrought by the cavalry was heightened also by the shouting of the legions, and the enemy's line would not have kept its position if Mago at the first movement of the cavalry had not at once led the elephants, which were kept in readiness, into battle. Terrified by their roar and odour and by the sight of them the horses made the assistance of the cavalry useless. And although, so long as they were in the thick of the fight, where they could make use of the lance and, at close quarters, of the sword, the Roman horsemen were the stronger, still when they were carried to a distance by frightened horses, the Numidians were the more successful in hurling javelins from a longer range. Of the infantry also the twelfth legion at the same time was largely cut to pieces and holding its ground more from a sense of honour than by its strength. And it would not have held on long if the thirteenth legion, brought up from the reserves into the front line, had not taken over the indecisive battle. Mago likewise

A.U.C. 551

10 Gallos integrae legioni opposuit. Quibus haud magno certamine fusis hastati legionis undecimae conglobant se-se atque elephantos iam etiam peditum
11 aciem turbantes invadunt. In quos cum pila confertos coniecissent, nullo ferme frustra emisso, omnes retro in aciem suorum averterunt; quattuor
12 gravati volneribus conruerunt. Tum primum [1] commota hostium acies, simul omnibus equitibus,[2] ut aversos videre elephantos, ad augendum pavorem ac tumultum effusis. Sed donec stetit ante signa Mago, gradum sensim referentes, ordines et [3] tenorem 13 pugnae servabant; postquam femine transfixo cadentem auferrique ex proelio prope exsanguem videre, extemplo in fugam omnes versi. Ad quinque milia hostium eo die caesa et signa militaria duo et 14 viginti capta. Nec Romanis incruenta victoria fuit; duo milia et trecenti de exercitu praetoris, pars multo maxima ex legione duodecima, amissi; inde et tribuni militum duo, M. Cosconius et M. Maevius;
15 tertiae decimae quoque legionis, quae postremo proelio adfuerat. C. Helvius tribunus militum in restituenda pugna cecidit; et duo et viginti ferme equites inlustres,[4] obtriti ab elephantis, cum centurionibus aliquot perierunt. Et longius certamen fuisset, ni volnere ducis concessa victoria esset.

[1] primum Duker: prima P(3)NHVJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] equitibus Alschefski, Eds.: peditibus P(3)NHVJK Leterbacher.
[3] et P(3)N: om. HVJK Aldus, Froben.
[4] inlustres, before the noun in HVJK.

brought up Gauls from his reserves to face the fresh B.C. 203 legion. After these had been routed with no great effort, the hastati of the eleventh legion massed together and attacked the elephants, which by this time were bringing disorder even to the infantry line. When the legionaries had hurled javelins against them in their close order, scarcely one missile being without effect, they drove all the elephants back into their own battle-line. Four of them, hampered by wounds, fell to the ground. Then for the first time the enemy's line was driven back, since all the cavalry, on seeing the elephants in flight, dashed out to increase the panic and confusion. But so long as Mago stood before the standards, his men as they slowly retired kept their ranks and continued to fight. After they saw him falling with his thigh pierced, and then borne almost lifeless from the battlefield, at once they all took to flight. About five thousand of the enemy were slain that day and twenty-two military standards were captured. Nor was it a bloodless victory for the Romans. Two thousand three hundred were lost from the army of the praetor, much the larger part of them from the twelfth legion; from it also two tribunes of the soldiers, Marcus Cosconius and Marcus Maevius. Of the thirteenth legion also, which had taken part in the last phase of the battle, Gaius Helvius, tribune of the soldiers, fell while rallying the men. And about twenty-two knights of the upper class were trampled by the elephants and perished together with a number of centurions. Also the engagement would have lasted even longer, had not victory been conceded because of the general's wound.

A.U.C. 551

XIX. Mago proximae silentio noctis profectus, quantum pati viae per volnus poterat itineribus ex-
2 tentis, ad mare in Ligures Ingaunos pervenit. Ibi eum legati ab Carthagine paucis ante diebus in sinum Gallicum adpulsis navibus adierunt, iubentes
3 primo quoque tempore in Africam traicere;[1] id et fratrem eius Hannibalem—nam ad eum quoque isse legatos eadem iubentes—facturum: non in eo esse Carthaginiensium res ut Galliam atque Italiam armis
4 obtineant. Mago non imperio modo senatus periculoque patriae motus, sed metuens etiam ne victor hostis moranti instaret, Liguresque ipsi, relinqui Italiam a Poenis cernentes, ad eos quorum mox in 5 potestate futuri essent deficerent, simul sperans leniorem[2] in navigatione quam in via iactationem volneris fore et curationi omnia commodiora, impositis copiis in naves profectus, vixdum superata Sardinia ex volnere moritur. Naves quoque aliquot Poenorum disiectae in alto a classe Romana quae
6 circa Sardiniam erat capiuntur. Haec terra marique in parte Italiae quae[3] iacet ad Alpes gesta.

Consul C. Servilius, nulla memorabili re in provincia Etruria Galliaque—nam eo quoque proces-

[1] traicere VJK Eds.: -iecere $A^{a}H$: -eret P(3)N.
[2] leniorem P(3)N Aldus: leviorem $A^{2}VJK$ Froben 2.
[3] quae $M^{1}B^{2}A^{a}HVJK$ Aldus, Froben; qua P(3)N.

---

[1] Presumably he followed a road leading down to Vada Sabat(i)a, which belonged to the Ingauni, as did Savo (Savona). Cf. pp. 197, n. 3 f.; 225, n. 2. The wounded Mago may have been carried on an elephant. Cf. Hannibal in the Arno valley, XXII. ii. 10 f. Nothing is said of any Roman pursuit.

[2] I.e. Gulf of Genoa.

[3] No further authority for this statement can be cited. Other sources vary so much that their statements are of no value: that Mago was still in Liguria after Zama (Appian

XIX. Mago set out in the stillness of the following night and, lengthening the day's marches as much as he could endure by reason of his wound, he reached the sea in the country of the Ligurian Ingauni.[1] There envoys from Carthage came to him, having put in a few days before into the Gallic Gulf,[2] bringing him orders to cross over to Africa as soon as possible. His brother Hannibal, they said, would do the same; for to him also envoys had gone bearing the same command; that the Carthaginian state was in no position to hold Gaul and Italy by armed forces. Mago was not only swayed by the command from the senate and the danger of his city, but also feared that if he delayed the victorious enemy might be upon him, and the Ligurians themselves, seeing that the Carthaginians were abandoning Italy, might go over to the side of those in whose power they would presently be. Hoping at the same time that motion would be less painful to his wound on shipboard than on the road and everything more convenient for treatment, he embarked his troops and sailed, but had hardly passed Sardinia when he died of his wound.[3] In addition a considerable number of the Carthaginian ships, being scattered in the open sea, were captured by the Roman fleet which was off Sardinia. Such were the events on land and sea in that part of Italy which borders upon the Alps. B.C. 203

The consul Gaius Servilius, who had accomplished nothing that deserves mention in his province of Etruria and in Gaul—for he had advanced into that

Pun. 49; cf. 59); that after reaching Africa he was sent back to Italy (Zonaras IX. xiii. 10); that ten years later he perished either in a shipwreck or by the hands of his slaves (Nepos Hann. viii. 1 f.).

A.U.C. 551

7 serat—gesta, patre C. Servilio et C. Lutatio [1] ex servitute post sextum decimum annum receptis, qui ad
8 vicum Tannetum a Boiis capti fuerant, hinc patre, hinc Catulo [2] lateri circumdatis privato magis quam
9 publico decore insignis Romam rediit. Latum ad populum est ne C. Servilio fraudi esset quod patre, qui sella curuli sedisset, vivo, cum id ignoraret, tribunus plebis atque aedilis plebis fuisset contra quam sanctum legibus erat. Hac rogatione perlata in provinciam rediit.

10 Ad Cn. Servilium consulem, qui in Bruttiis erat, Consentia, Aufugum, Bergae, Baesidiae, Ocriculum, Lymphaeum, Argentanum, Clampetia multique alii ignobiles populi, senescere Punicum bellum cernentes, 11 defecere. Idem consul cum Hannibale in agro Crotoniensi acie conflixit. Obscura eius pugnae fama est. Valerius Antias quinque milia hostium caesa ait; quae tanta res est ut aut impudenter ficta 12 sit aut neglegenter praetermissa. Nihil certe ultra rei in Italia ab Hannibale gestum. Nam ad eum quoque legati ab Carthagine revocantes [3] in Africam, [1] Lutatio, Aldus, Froben add patruo.

[2] Catulo $P(3)N$: patruo $N^{a}HVJK$ Aldus, Froben.
[3] revocantes $A^{6}HVJK$: vocantes $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Son of the victor in 242, he had been consul in 220 B.C.; Zonaras VIII. xx. 10.

[2] They were seized, as Livy himself has it, near Mutina (Modena), but their Gallic captors were unsuccessfully pursued northwestward as far as Tannetum (half-way between Parma and Reggio Emilia). Cf. XXI. xxv. 3, 13; xxvi. 2; XXVII. xxi. 10; Polybius III. xl. 9–13.

[3] He had held the praetorship; Polybius l.c. § 9.

country as well—rescued from slavery after fifteen B.C. 203 years his father Gaius Servilius and Gaius Lutatius,[1] who had been captured near the village of Tannetum [2] by the Boii. Upon that he returned to Rome escorted by his father on one side and Catulus on the other, gaining distinction for an act that was personal rather than official. A bill was brought before the people that it should not be a ground for charges against Gaius Servilius that while his father, who had occupied a curule chair,[3] was still alive—a fact of which he was unaware—he had been tribune of the plebs and plebeian aedile, contrary to provisions of the laws.[4] This bill became a law, whereupon he returned to his province.

As for Gnaeus Servilius, the consul, who was in the land of the Bruttii, Consentia,[5] Aufugum, Bergae, Baesidiae, Ocriculum, Lymphaeum, Argentanum, Clampetia and many other unimportant communities, came over to his side, seeing that the Punic war was failing. The same consul engaged in battle with Hannibal in the territory of Croton. The story of that battle is not clear. Valerius Antias [6] says five thousand of the enemy were slain—a victory on such a scale as to have been either shamelessly fabricated or else carelessly passed over. What is certain is that nothing further was accomplished by Hannibal in Italy. For to him also came emissaries from Carthage to recall him to Africa just at the time, it

[4] Cf. Vol. VII. p. 301, n. 1 for one explanation of this restriction placed upon patrician candidates who were under patria potestas. The purpose of the consul's return from his province was that his acts as a magistrate might be legalized.

[5] See p. 357, n. 2 (for Clampetia also).

[6] Cf. XXVIII. xlvi. 14 and note; XXIX. xxxv. 2; above, iii. 6; below, xxix, 7; xliii. 12 n.

A.U.C. 551

iis forte diebus quibus ad Magonem venerunt. XX. Frendens gemensque ac vix lacrimis temperans dicitur legatorum verba audisse. Postquam edita sunt mandata, "Iam non perplexe" inquit, "sed palam revocant qui vetando supplementum et pecuniam mitti iam pridem retrahebant.[1] Vicit ergo Hannibalem non populus Romanus totiens caesus fugatusque, sed senatus Carthaginiensis obtrectatione atque invidia. Neque hac deformitate reditus mei tam P. Scipio exsultabit atque efferet sese quam Hanno, qui domum nostram, quando alia re non potuit, ruina Carthaginis oppressit."

Iam hoc ipsum praesagiens animo praeparaverat ante naves. Itaque inutili militum turba praesidii specie in oppida Bruttii agri quae pauca metu magis quam fide continebantur dimissa, quod roboris in exercitu erat in Africam transvexit, multis Italici generis, quia[2] in Africam secuturos abnuentes concesserant in Iunonis Laciniae delubrum inviolatum ad eam diem, in templo ipso foede interfectis. Raro quemquam alium patriam exsilii causa relinquentem tam[3] maestum abisse ferunt quam Hannibalem hostium terra excedentem. Respexisse saepe Italiae litora, et deos hominesque accusantem

[1] retrahebant H Aldus, Froben : trahebant P(3)N : retrahunt VJK.
[2] quia P(3)NHVJK : qui Madvig, Emend.
[3] tam A[1]HVJK : om. P(3)N.

---

[1] Formerly leader of the opposition party; cf. XXI. iii. 2 ff.; x. 2–xi. 1; XXIII. xii. 6–xiii. 6 (216 B.C.). Still prominent according to Appian Pun. 34. At xliv. 5, if not at xlii. 12, another Hasdrubal (Haedus) has taken his place.
[2] Cf. p. 441, n. 3.

chanced, that others came to Mago. XX. Gnashing his teeth and groaning—so they say—and scarcely keeping back the tears he listened to the words of the emissaries. After they had delivered their message he said: "It is no longer obscurely but openly that I am being recalled by men who, in forbidding the sending of reinforcements and money, were long ago trying to drag me back. The conqueror of Hannibal is therefore not the Roman people, so often cut to pieces and put to flight, but the Carthaginian senate by carping and envy. And over this inglorious return of mine it will not be Publius Scipio who wildly exults, so much as Hanno,[1] who, unable to do so by any other means, has ruined our family by the downfall of Carthage." B.C. 203

Already foreboding this very thing he had previously put his ships in readiness. Accordingly, after distributing the mass of useless troops, nominally as garrisons, among the few Bruttian towns that were being held rather by fear than by loyalty, he transported the flower of his army to Africa. Many men of Italic race refusing to follow him to Africa had retired to the shrine of Juno Lacinia,[2] never desecrated until that day, and had been cruelly slain actually within the temple enclosure.[3] They say that rarely has any other man leaving his country to go into exile departed so sorrowfully as Hannibal on withdrawing from the enemy's land; that he repeatedly looked back upon the shores of Italy and, accusing gods and men, called down a curse

[3] The temple itself would have room for no more than a small number fleeing for refuge. Diodorus Sic. XXVII. 9 makes the number 20,000. Cf. Appian Hann. 59 (no mention of the temple). The whole story seems to be fictitious.

A.U.C. 551

8 in se quoque ac suum ipsius caput exsecratum, quod non cruentum ab Cannensi victoria militem Romam duxisset. Scipionem ire ad Carthaginem ausum, qui 9 consul hostem Poenum in Italia non vidisset; se, centum milibus armatorum ad Trasumennum, ad Cannas caesis, circa Casilinum Cumasque et Nolam consenuisse. Haec accusans querensque ex diutina possessione Italiae est detractus.

XXI. Romam per eosdem dies et Magonem et Hannibalem profectos adlatum est. Cuius duplicis
2 gratulationis minuit laetitiam et quod parum duces in retinendis iis, cum id mandatum ab senatu esset, aut
2 animi aut virium habuisse videbantur, et quod solliciti erant, omni belli mole in unum exercitum ducem-
3 que inclinata quo evasura esset res. Per eosdem dies legati Saguntini venerunt conprensos cum pecunia adducentes Carthaginienses qui ad conducenda
4 auxilia in Hispaniam traiecissent. Ducenta et quinquaginta auri, octingenta pondo argenti in 5 vestibulo curiae posuerunt. Hominibus acceptis et in carcerem conditis, auro argentoque reddito gratiae legatis actae, atque insuper munera data ac naves quibus in Hispaniam reverterentur.

6 Mentio deinde ab senioribus [1] facta est segnius homines bona quam mala sentire; transitu in Italiam

[1] senioribus P(3)N Aldus, Froben: senatoribus N^1(alt.) HVJK.

[1] Cf. XXII. li. 1–4; XXVI. vii. 3.
[2] Cf. Mago's summary in XXIII. xi. 8 f.

upon himself also and his own head because he had B.C. 203 not led his soldiers blood-stained from the victory of Cannae to Rome.[1] Scipio had dared, he said, to approach Carthage—a man who in his consulship had not seen a Carthaginian enemy in Italy—whereas he himself, after a hundred thousand armed men[2] had been slain at Trasumennus, at Cannae, had grown old round Casilinum and Cumae and Nola. Such were his accusations and laments as he was dragged away from his long occupation of Italy.

XXI. At Rome the news of Mago's departure and that of Hannibal were received about the same time. Rejoicing over this two-fold ground for congratulation was tempered by two circumstances: that men thought the generals had lacked either the spirit or the strength to detain them, although this had been ordered by the senate; and that they were concerned for the outcome, now that the whole burden of the war came down upon one army and one commander. About the same time envoys arrived from Saguntum bringing Carthaginians alleged to have crossed over into Spain to hire auxiliaries, having been seized together with the money. They set down two hundred and fifty pounds of gold and eight hundred pounds of silver in the forecourt[3] of the Senate House. After accepting the captives, remanding them to prison and returning the gold and silver, the senate thanked the envoys; and in addition presents were made to them and ships furnished for their return to Spain.

The older members thereupon observed that men are slower to recognize blessings than evils; that

[3] For vestibulum curiae cf. I. xlviii. 1; II. xlviii. 10; xlix. 3; at Carthage, below, xxiv. 10.

A.U.C. 551

Hannibalis quantum terroris pavorisque esset[1] meminisse. Quas deinde clades, quos luctus in-7 cidisse! Visa castra hostium e muris urbis; quae vota singulorum universorumque fuisse! Quotiens in conciliis voces manus ad caelum porrigentium[2]
8 auditas, en umquam ille dies futurus esset quo vacuam hostibus Italiam bona pace florentem visuri
9 essent! Dedisse tandem id deos[3] sexto decimo demum anno, nec esse qui deis grates agendas censeat; adeo ne advenientem quidem gratiam homines benigne accipere, nedum ut praeteritae
10 satis memores sint. Conclamatum deinde ex omni parte curiae est uti referret P. Aelius praetor; decretumque ut quinque dies circa omnia pulvinaria supplicaretur, victumaeque maiores immolarentur centum viginti.

11 Iam dimisso Laelio legatisque Masinissae cum Carthaginiensium legatos de pace ad senatum venientes Puteolis visos, inde terra venturos adlatum esset, revocari C. Laelium placuit, ut coram eo de 12 pace ageretur. Q. Fulvius Gillo, legatus Scipionis, Carthaginienses Romam adduxit. Quibus vetitis ingredi urbem hospitium in Villa Publica, senatus ad aedem Bellonae datus est.

[1] esset CM²A Madvig, Conway: esse PMBA²N Eds.: sese HVJ.

[2] porrigentium CMBANHVJK: porgentium P.

[3] tandem id deos HVJK Froben 2: id deos tandem P(3)N.

---

[1] On festal couches in temples cf. Vol. VI. p. 208, n. 1; VII. p. 217, n. 3; Book V. xiii. 6 (the first at Rome).

[2] This, taken from a different source, conflicts with xvii. 2.

[3] Temple and Villa Publica were in the Campus Martius, near the Flaminian Circus; X. xix. 17; XXVI. xxi. 1;

upon Hannibal's passage into Italy they remembered B.C. 203
what alarm and panic there had been. Since that time what disasters, what sorrows had befallen them! The enemy's camp had been visible from the walls of the city; what prayers had been said by individuals and by the entire people! How often in their deliberations had men been heard to say, as they lifted their hands to heaven, Would the day ever come when they should see Italy cleared of the enemy and prospering in a blessed peace! At last, they said, but not before the sixteenth year, the gods had granted that prayer; and yet there was no one to propose a vote of thanks to the gods; so true was it that men did not gratefully receive a blessing upon its coming, much less duly remember it when past. Upon that shouts came from every part of the Senate House that Publius Aelius, the praetor, should bring up the question. And it was voted that for five days thanks should be offered at all the pulvinaria,[1] also that a hundred and twenty full-grown victims should be sacrificed.

After Laelius and the envoys of Masinissa had been dismissed, word came that the Carthaginian envoys, on their way to the senate to sue for peace, had been seen at Puteoli and would proceed thence by land. Whereupon it was decided that Gaius Laelius should be recalled,[2] in order that the discussion of peace might be in his presence. Quintus Fulvius Gillo, Scipio's lieutenant, conducted the Carthaginians to Rome. Being forbidden to enter the city, they were entertained in the Villa Publica and a hearing in the senate was granted them in the Temple of Bellona.[3]

XXVIII. ix. 5; xxxviii. 2; below, xl. 1; and for the Villa, IV. xxii. 7; XXXIII. xxiv. 5; XXXIV. xliv. 5.

A.U.C. 551

XXII. Orationem eandem ferme quam apud Scipionem habuerunt, culpam omnem belli a publico
2 consilio in Hannibalem vertentes: eum iniussu senatus non Alpes modo sed Hiberum quoque transgressum, nec Romanis solum sed ante etiam Sagun-
3 tinis privato consilio bellum intulisse; senatui ac populo Carthaginiensi, si quis vere aestimet, foedus
4 ad eam diem inviolatum esse cum Romanis. Itaque nihil aliud sibi mandatum esse uti peterent quam ut in ea pace quae postremo cum C. Lutatio facta esset
5 manere liceret. Cum more tradito [1] patribus potestatem interrogandi, si quis quid vellet, legatos praetor fecisset, senioresque qui foederibus interfuerant alia alii interrogarent, nec meminisse se [2] per aetatem—etenim omnes ferme iuvenes erant—
6 dicerent legati, conclamatum ex omni parte curiae est Punica fraude electos qui veterem pacem repeterent cuius ipsi non meminissent.

XXIII. Emotis deinde curia legatis sententiae interrogari coeptae. M. Livius C. Servilium consulem, qui propior esset, arcessendum, ut coram eo de pace
2 ageretur, censebat; cum de re maiore quam quanta

[1] tradito, P(3)NVJK add a, rejected by Eds.
[2] se VJK Aldus, Froben: om. P(3)N.

[1] As in XXI. xix. 2 f. Livy connects the treaty of 241 B.C., ratified in the consulship of Quintus Lutatius Cerco, logically with the naval victory won by his brother Gaius Lutatius Catulus at the very end of his year of office (242). Polybius does the same, I. lxii. 7. Below, xliv. 1 is more exact. The brothers shared in the organization of this first province; Zonaras VIII. xvii. 7.

XXII. They made substantially the same plea as they had done before Scipio, shifting all blame for the war from public responsibility to Hannibal: that he had crossed not merely the Alps but even the Ebro without orders from the senate, and on his own responsibility had waged war not only on the Romans but before that upon the Saguntines also. The senate and the Carthaginian people, they claimed, had a treaty with the Romans which in any fair judgment was to that day unbroken; consequently they had no other instructions than to beg permission to abide by the last peace-treaty, made with Gaius Lutatius.[1] When the praetor, following traditional practice, had given the senators permission to ask any question of the envoys if any one was so disposed, and older members, who had been present when action was taken on the treaties, were asking various questions, the envoys kept saying that on account of their age they did not remember—nearly all of them being young men. Upon that there were shouts from every part of the house that Punic trickery had led them to choose men who did not themselves remember it, to ask that the old treaty should be revived. B.C. 203

XXIII. Then after the envoys had been ushered out of the house,[2] opinions began to be called for. Marcus Livius[3] moved that Gaius Servilius, the consul, being the nearer, should be summoned, in order that discussion of peace might be in his presence. Since there could be no more important

[2] I.e. the temple serving as a curia for this occasion.

[3] Consul in 219 and 207 B.C., and lately censor (204 B.C.). Fabius Maximus, princeps senatus, was probably ill, or had already died; xxvi. 7.

A.U.C. 551

ea [1] esset consultatio incidere non posset, non videri sibi absente consulum altero ambobusve eam rem agi
3 satis ex dignitate populi Romani esse. Q. Metellus, qui triennio ante consul dictatorque fuerat: cum P. Scipio caedendo exercitus, agros populando in eam necessitatem hostes compulisset ut supplices pacem
4 peterent, et nemo omnium verius existumare posset, qua mente ea pax peteretur quam qui [2] ante portas Carthaginis bellum gereret, nullius alterius consilio quam Scipionis accipiendam abnuendamve pacem
5 esse. M. Valerius Laevinus, qui bis consul fuerat, speculatores, non legatos venisse arguebat, iubendosque Italia excedere et custodes cum iis usque ad naves mittendos, Scipionique scribendum ne bellum
6 remitteret. Laelius Fulviusque adiecerunt et Scipionem in eo positam habuisse spem pacis, si Hannibal et Mago ex Italia non [3] revocarentur;
7 ceterum [4] omnia simulaturos Carthaginienses, duces eos exercitusque exspectantes; deinde quamvis recentium foederum et deorum omnium oblitos
8 bellum gesturos. Eo magis in Laevini sententiam discessum. Legati pace infecta ac prope sine responso dimissi.

[1] ea $P(3)N$: om. VJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] qui Alschefski, Eds.: is qui K Aldus, Froben: eum qui $P(3)NJ$.
[3] non N^2VJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(3)N$.
[4] ceterum N^2VJK Aldus, Froben: om. $P(3)N$.

---

[1] Cf. p. 246, n. 1.
[2] This conflicts with Polybius' positive statement that the treaty was duly ratified at Rome, and that the three envoys subject for deliberation than that, it did not seem to B.C. 203 him, he said, that debate on the question in the absence of one or both of the consuls was quite in keeping with the dignity of the Roman people. Quintus Metellus, who had been consul three years before and also dictator, said that, whereas Publius Scipio by slaying their armies and ravaging their lands had reduced the enemy to such straits that as suppliants they were suing for peace, and whereas no man in the world could more correctly judge of the spirit in which they were seeking that peace than he who was conducting a war at the gates of Carthage, peace must be accepted or rejected according to the advice of none other than Scipio. Marcus Valerius Laevinus, who had twice been consul,[1] contended that spies, not envoys, had come to them, and that they should be ordered to depart from Italy, and guards sent with them all the way to their ships, and that a written order should be sent to Scipio not to relax effort in the war. Laelius and Fulvius added that Scipio also had based his hope of peace only upon the supposition that Hannibal and Mago were not to be recalled from Italy. But while waiting for those generals and their armies, they said, the Carthaginians would use every pretence, and then, forgetful of treaties however recent and of all the gods, would carry on the war. Consequently a still larger number voted for Laevinus' motion. The envoys were sent away without securing peace and almost without an answer.[2] named in xxv. 2 had so notified the Carthaginians; XV. i. 3, 9. Livy's view is repeated in xxx. 28; xxxi. 9; cf. xvi. 15 and note.

A.U.C. 551

XXIV. Per eos dies Cn. Servilius consul, haud dubius quin pacatae Italiae penes se gloria esset, velut pulsum ab se Hannibalem persequens, in Siciliam, inde in [1] Africam transiturus, traiecit. Quod ubi Romae volgatum est, primo censuerant patres ut praetor scriberet consuli senatum aequum censere in Italiam reverti eum; dein, cum praetor spreturum eum litteras suas diceret, dictator ad id ipsum creatus P. Sulpicius pro iure [maioris imperii] consulem in Italiam revocavit. Reliquum anni cum M. Servilio magistro equitum circumeundis Italiae [2] urbibus quae bello alienatae fuerant noscendisque singularum causis consumpsit.

Per indutiarum tempus ex [3] Sardinia a P. Lentulo praetore centum onerariae naves cum commeatu viginti rostratarum praesidio, et ab hoste et ab tempestatibus mari tuto, in Africam transmiserunt. Cn. Octavio ducentis onerariis, triginta [4] longis navibus ex Sicilia traicienti non eadem fortuna fuit. In conspectum ferme Africae prospero cursu evectum [5] primo destituit ventus, dein versus in Africum turbavit ac passim naves disiecit. Ipse cum rostratis per adversos fluctus ingenti remigum labore enisus Apollinis promunturium tenuit; onerariae pars

[1] inde in JK Aldus, Froben : inde et $P(3)N$.
[2] Italiae $P(3)N$ Aldus, Eds. : in Italia $A^{2}JK$ Froben 2, Conway : in italiam V.
[3] ex Madvig, Luchs, Conway : et ex $P(3)NVJK$.
[4] triginta (XXX) $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben : XX VJK.
[5] evectum $A^{2}VJK$: vectum $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben.

[1] The city praetor Aelius Paetus (i. 9), presiding in the senate. But he lacked authority to give orders to a consul. Hence the resort to a dictator, whose maius imperium must be respected by the consul.

XXIV. About that time Gnaeus Servilius, the consul, who had no doubt that to him belonged the glory of giving peace to Italy, as if in pursuit of a Hannibal whom he had driven out himself, crossed over to Sicily, intending to cross from there to Africa. When this was noised abroad at Rome, at first the senators had voted that the praetor [1] should write to the consul that the senate thought it proper for him to return to Italy. Then, as the praetor said that Servilius would disregard his letter, Publius Sulpicius [2] was made dictator for that very purpose; and by virtue of his higher authority he recalled the consul to Italy. The rest of the year he spent with his master of the horse, Marcus Servilius,[3] in making the rounds of such cities in Italy as had been estranged by the war and in hearing their cases one after another. B.C. 203

During the armistice a hundred transports sent from Sardinia by the praetor Publius Lentulus [4] with supplies and convoyed by twenty war-ships crossed to Africa over a sea safe from the enemy and safe from storms. Gnaeus Octavius, crossing over from Sicily with two hundred transports and thirty war-ships, was not so fortunate. When he had almost come in sight of Africa after a favourable passage, the wind at first failed him; then shifting into a southwester, it damaged and scattered the ships far and wide. He himself with the war-ships battled against head seas by great efforts on the part of the oarsmen and reached the Promontory of Apollo.[5] Most of the transports were carried to the island of

[2] Consul in 211 and 200 B.C.

[3] Brother of the consul Gaius Servilius Geminus and himself consul in the following year; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 1.

[4] Cf. i. 9; ii. 4; xxxvi. 2 f.

[5] See p. 315, n. 2.

A.U.C. 551

maxima ad Aegimurum—insula ea [1] sinum ab alto claudit in quo sita Carthago est, triginta ferme milia ab urbe—, aliae adversus urbem ipsam ad Calidas 10 Aquas delatae sunt. Omnia in conspectu Carthaginis erant. Itaque ex tota urbe in forum concursum est; magistratus senatum vocare; populus in curiae vestibulo fremere ne tanta ex oculis manibusque 11 amitteretur praeda. Cum quidam pacis petitae, alii indutiarum—necdum enim dies exierat—fidem opponerent, permixto [2] paene senatus populique concilio consensum est ut classem [3] quinquaginta navium Hasdrubal Aegimurum traiceret, inde per litora portusque dispersas Romanas naves colligeret.
12 Desertae fuga nautarum primum ab Aegimuro, deinde ab Aquis onerariae Carthaginem puppibus tractae sunt.

XXV. Nondum ab Roma reverterant legati,[4] neque sciebatur quae senatus Romani de bello aut pace
2 sententia esset, necdum indutiarum dies exierat; eo indigniorem iniuriam ratus Scipio ab iis qui petissent pacem et indutias et spem pacis et fidem indutiarum violatam esse, legatos Carthaginem L. Baebium, L. Sergium, L. Fabium extemplo misit.

[1] insula ea $P(3)N?JK$ Eds.: insulam ea $A^{1}N^{2}?$ Aldus, Froben, Conway (with dash before ea*)*: -lam eam V.
[2] permixto, preceded by postremo V Aldus, Froben.
[3] classem $P(3)N$: classe VJK Aldus, Froben.
[4] ab Roma reverterant legati $PCM^{1}B^{2}$: reverterant ab Roma legati AN Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Zembra (Djamur); cf. p. 315, n. 5.
[2] Across the bay from Carthage and to the south-east (near Carpis), now Hammam Kourbes. The hot springs are mentioned by Strabo XVII. iii. 16, and the Tabula

Aegimurus [1]—which on the seaward side closes the bay upon which lies Carthage, about thirty miles from the city—the rest of them to Aquae Calidae,[2] opposite the city itself. Everything could be seen from Carthage; and so from all parts of the city people ran to the market-place. The magistrates summoned the senate; the people before the entrance of the Senate House protested against letting go so much booty out of their sight and reach. While some objected, pleading the sanctity of peace negotiations, others that of the armistice—for its term had not yet expired—the meeting of the senate was all but merged with that of the people. It was agreed that Hasdrubal should sail over to Aegimurus with his fleet of fifty ships, and then gather up the Roman ships scattered along the shore and in the harbours. Deserted by the flight of their crews the transports were towed by the stern to Carthage, first from Aegimurus and then from Aquae. B.C. 203

XXV. Not yet had the envoys returned from Rome, nor was it known what had been the decision of the Roman senate in regard to war or peace; [3] not yet had the term of the armistice expired. For that reason Scipio thought it an even more shameful outrage that both the hope of peace and the sanctity of an armistice had been treated with disrespect by men who had sued for peace and an armistice. At once he sent Lucius Baebius, Lucius Sergius and Lucius Fabius as envoys to Carthage.

Peutingeriana. They are still frequented by the people of Tunis.

[3] Cf. xvi. 15 and note; also Appian Pun. 34; Dio Cass. frag. 57. 74 f.; Zonaras IX. xiii. 8. All these place ratification of the treaty after Hannibal had left Italy. Cf. Gsell III. 248.

A.U.C. 551

3 Qui cum multitudinis concursu prope violati essent nec reditum tutiorem futurum cernerent, petierunt a magistratibus quorum auxilio vis prohibita erat ut 4 naves mitterent quae se prosequerentur. Datae triremes duae cum ad Bagradam flumen pervenissent, unde castra Romana conspiciebantur, Carthaginem 5 rediere. Classis Punica ad Uticam stationem habebat. Ex ea tres quadriremes, seu clam misso a Carthagine nuntio ut id fieret, seu Hasdrubale, qui classi praeerat, 6 sine publica fraude auso facinus, quinqueremem Romanam superantem promunturium ex alto repente adgressae sunt. Sed neque rostro ferire celeritate subterlabentem [1] poterant, neque transilire armati ex humilioribus in altiorem navem, et defendebatur 7 egregie, quoad tela suppeditarunt. Quis deficientibus iam nulla alia res eam quam propinquitas terrae multitudoque a castris in litus effusa tueri potuit.[2] 8 Concitatam enim remis quanto maximo impetu poterant in terram cum immisissent, navis tantum iactura facta, incolumes ipsi evaserunt.

9 Ita alio super aliud scelere cum haud dubie indutiae ruptae essent, Laelius Fulviusque ab Roma 10 cum legatis Carthaginiensibus supervenerunt. Qui-

[1] subterlabentem NVJK Aldus, Froben : super- P(3)N : sua prae- Weissenborn : sua praeter- M. Müller.

[2] potuit Drakenborch : potuisset P(3)NVJK Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] Now the Medjerda, principal river of Tunisia, 300 miles long but not navigable. See p. 344, n. 1 for the great changes in its lower course as the bay has silted up. The ancient mouth was half-way between Carthage and Utica.

[2] At the north-east end of the long ridge upon which lay the camp, later called Castra Cornelia. Cf. p. 347, n. 1. Perhaps Livy is wrong in thinking the ship was beached on the less

These narrowly escaped injury at the hands of a mob and foresaw that their return would be no safer. Accordingly they begged the magistrates whose help had prevented violence to send ships to escort them. Two triremes were furnished, and having reached the river Bagradas,[1] from which the Roman camp was visible, they returned to Carthage. The Carthaginian fleet was lying at anchor near Utica. Three quadriremes from that fleet, just as the Roman quinquereme was rounding the promontory,[2] suddenly attacked her from the seaward side, perhaps because a secret order to do so had been sent from Carthage, possibly because Hasdrubal, who was in command of the fleet, made bold to act without complicity on the part of the government. But they were unable to ram her as she eluded them by her speed, and the marines could not spring across from the lower vessels to the higher one. Also she was brilliantly defended so long as their missiles held out. When these failed them there was nothing else which could protect the ship but nearness to the land and the great numbers that poured out to the shore from the camp. For propelled at full speed by the oars, they ran her on the shore with all possible momentum. Consequently the ship only was lost, and the men themselves [3] escaped. B.C. 203

Thus the armistice beyond doubt had been broken by one crime after another when Laelius and Fulvius arrived from Rome with the Carthaginian favourable west side; Gsell III. 250, n. 1. The Punic fleet was no farther away than Rusucmon (Porto Farina; x. 9); Appian Pun. 34.

[3] Primarily the envoys, but also some of the crew; Polybius XV. ii. 15; cf. Appian l.c. fin.

A.U.C. 551

bus Scipio, etsi non indutiarum fides modo a Carthaginiensibus, sed ius etiam gentium in legatis violatum esset, tamen se nihil nec institutis populi Romani nec suis moribus indignum in iis facturum esse cum dixisset, dimissis legatis bellum parabat.

11 Hannibali iam terrae adpropinquanti iussus e nauticis unus [1] escendere in malum, ut specularetur
12 quam tenerent regionem, cum dixisset sepulchrum dirutum proram spectare, abominatus praetervehi iusso gubernatore ad Leptim adpulit classem atque ibi copias exposuit.

XXVI. Haec eo anno in Africa gesta; insequentia excedunt in eum annum quo M. Servilius Geminus,[2] qui tum magister equitum erat, et Ti. Claudius
2 Nero consules facti sunt. Ceterum exitu superioris anni cum legati sociarum urbium ex Graecia questi essent vastatos agros ab regiis praesidiis profectosque in Macedoniam legatos ad res repetendas non 3 admissos ad Philippum regem, simul nuntiassent quattuor milia militum cum Sopatro duce traiecta in Africam dici, ut essent Carthaginiensibus praesidio, et 4 pecuniae aliquantum una missum, legatos ad regem qui haec adversus foedus facta videri patribus nun-

[1] e nauticis unus B^2A^6? Crévier, Eds.: e nautis unus N^2VJK Aldus, Froben: enuticusunus P.

[2] Geminus om. $P(3)N$.

[1] In Polybius iv. 9 Scipio was absent, and Baebius, being left in command, carried out orders from the general.

[2] On the east coast of Tunisia; Leptis Minor (or Lepti Minus) to distinguish it from Leptis Magna in Tripolitania. Cf. p. 308, n. 1. It was now probably autumn.

envoys. Scipio informed these men that, although B.C. 203 not only the sanctity of an armistice had been violated by the Carthaginians, but also the law of nations in regard to his envoys, nevertheless he would not in their case do anything unworthy of the established usages of the Roman people or of his own character. Whereupon he dismissed the envoys [1] and made preparations for war.

As Hannibal was already nearing land, one of the sailors was ordered to go aloft, in order to make out what region they were approaching. When he reported that the bow was headed toward a ruined tomb, Hannibal with a prayer to avert such an omen ordered the pilot to sail on, brought his fleet in at Leptis,[2] and there disembarked his troops.

XXVI. Such were the events of that year in Africa. What follows runs over into the year in which Marcus Servilius Geminus, who at that time was master of the horse, and Tiberius Claudius Nero [3] became consuls. But at the end of the previous year envoys from Greece representing allied cities had complained that their territories had been ravaged by the king's forces, and that envoys who had gone into Macedonia to claim damages were not admitted to King Philip's presence. They had at the same time brought word that four thousand soldiers under the command of Sopater were alleged to have crossed over to Africa to defend the Carthaginians, and that a considerable sum of money was said to have been sent with them. Consequently the senate voted to send envoys to the king to report that in the opinion

[3] A first cousin of Gaius, consul in 207 B.C.

A.U.C. 551

tiarent mittendos censuit senatus. Missi C. Terentius Varro, C. Mamilius, M. Aurelius; iis [1] tres quinqueremes datae.

5 Annus insignis incendio ingenti, quo Clivus Publicius ad solum exustus est, et aquarum magnitudine, sed et [2] annonae vilitate fuit, praeterquam quod pace
6 omnis Italia erat aperta, etiam quod magnam vim frumenti ex Hispania missam M. Valerius Falto et M. Fabius Buteo aediles curules quaternis aeris vicatim populo discripserunt.

7 Eodem anno Q. Fabius Maximus moritur, exactae aetatis, si quidem verum est augurem duos et sexa-
8 ginta [3] annos fuisse, quod quidam auctores sunt. Vir certe fuit dignus tanto cognomine, vel si novum ab eo inciperet. Superavit paternos honores, avitos aequavit. Pluribus victoriis et maioribus proeliis avus insignis Rullus; sed omnia aequare unus hostis
9 Hannibal potest. Cautior tamen quam promptior hic habitus; et sicut dubites utrum ingenio cunctator fuerit an quia ita bello proprie quod tum gerebatur aptum erat, sic nihil certius est quam unum hominem nobis cunctando rem restituisse, sicut Ennius ait.

[1] iis P Aldus, Froben : his CMBANVK : hiis J.

[2] sed et AN Aldus : sed x Conway : et A'VJK Froben 2 : si*P*(3).

[3] sexaginta (LX) P(3)NJ[1] : XL CVK Aldus, Froben : XX J.

---

[1] Consul in 216 B.C.; XXII. xxxv. 2; escaped from Cannae, XXII. xlix. 14; lxi. 13 ff. Mamilius Atellus had been praetor, Aurelius Cotta an aedile. Cf. xlii. 2, 5, 10.

[2] See Vol. VII. p. 36, n. 3.

[3] I.e. one sesterce. Cf. XXXI. l. 1 (grain even cheaper).

[4] Quintus Fabius Maximus Gurges, three times consul, last in 265 B.C.

[5] Quintus Fabius Maximus Rull(ian)us, five times, last in 295 B.C. Plutarch Fab. 1. makes him great-grandfather of Delayer.

of the senators these acts had violated the treaty. B.C. 203
The men sent were Gaius Terentius Varro,[1] Gaius Mamilius, Marcus Aurelius; three quinqueremes were furnished them.

The year was marked by a great conflagration in which the Clivus Publicius [2] was burned to the ground, and by floods, but also by the low price of grain, because not only was all Italy open by reason of peace, but also a great quantity of grain had been sent from Spain; and Marcus Valerius Falto and Marcus Fabius Buteo, the curule aediles, distributed this to the populace by precincts at four asses [3] a peck.

In the same year Quintus Fabius Maximus died at a very advanced age, if indeed it is true that he had been an augur for sixty-two years, as some authorities say. He certainly was a man who deserved such a surname, even if it had been first applied to him. He surpassed the number of magistracies held by his father [4] and equalled those of his grandfather.[5] A larger number of victories and greater battles made the fame of his grandfather Rullus; but all of them can be balanced by a single enemy, Hannibal. Nevertheless Fabius has been accounted a man of caution rather than of action. And while one may question whether he was the "Delayer" by nature, or because that was especially suited to the war then in progress, still nothing is more certain than that one man by delaying restored our state,[6] as Ennius says. In his place as [6] A famous line of the Annales (Vahlen[3] v. 370; Warmington, Remains of Old Latin I. p. 132), so often cited or imitated that it became proverbial; e.g. Cicero Cato Mai. 10; Virgil Aen. VI. 846.

A.U.C. 551

10 Augur in locum eius inauguratus Q. Fabius Maximus filius; in eiusdem locum pontifex—nam duo sacerdotia habuit—Ser. Sulpicius Galba.

11 Ludi Romani diem unum, plebei ter toti instaurati ab aedilibus M. Sextio Sabino et Cn. Tremelio Flacco. Hi [1] ambo praetores facti et cum iis [2] C.

12 Livius Salinator et C. Aurelius Cotta. Comitia eius anni utrum C. Servilius consul habuerit an, quia eum res in Etruria tenuerint quaestiones ex senatus consulto de coniurationibus principum habentem, dictator ab eo dictus P. Sulpicius incertum ut sit diversi auctores faciunt.

A.U.C. 552

XXVII. Principio insequentis anni M. Servilius et Ti. Claudius senatu in Capitolium vocato de pro-

2 vinciis rettulerunt. Italiam atque Africam in sortem conici, Africam ambo cupientes, volebant. Ceterum Q. Metello maxime adnitente neque negata neque

3 data [3] est Africa. Consules iussi cum tribunis plebis agere ut, si iis [4] videretur, populum rogarent quem

4 vellent [5] in Africa bellum gerere. Omnes tribus P. Scipionem iusserunt. Nihilo minus consules provin-

[1] Hi VK H. J. Müller: hii A²N²J: ti PCBN: ii x Aldus, Froben, Eds., Conway.

[2] iis P Aldus, Froben, Eds.: his CBANVK Conway: hiis J.

[3] negata neque data PCBVJK Eds.: data neque negata AN Aldus, Froben.

[4] iis Aldus, Froben: is PC: his BA: hiis N: eis A²VJK.

[5] vellent P(3)NV Aldus, Eds.: vellet V²JK Froben 2, Conway.

---

[1] An error for grandson, since the son of the same name (consul 213 B.C.) died before the Cunctator; Cato Mai. 12.

[2] Son of the consul of 207 B.C. Cf. XXIX. xxxviii. 8.

[3] Scipio's command had been given him for the duration; i. 10. That, however, would not prevent the assignment of a colleague; cf. § 5 sub fin.

augur his son[1] Quintus Fabius Maximus was installed; likewise in his place as pontifex—for he held two priesthoods—Servius Sulpicius Galba. B.C. 203

The Roman Games were repeated for a single day, the entire Plebeian Games three times over by the aediles Marcus Sextius Sabinus and Gnaeus Tremelius Flaccus. Both of them were made praetors, and with them Gaius Livius Salinator[2] and Gaius Aurelius Cotta. As for the elections of that year, conflicting authorities make it uncertain whether Gaius Servilius as consul conducted them or Publius Sulpicius as dictator, appointed by Servilius because business detained him in Etruria, where in accordance with a decree of the senate he was conducting trials for conspiracy among the leading citizens.

XXVII. At the beginning of the following year B.C. 202
Marcus Servilius and Tiberius Claudius summoned the senate to the Capitol and raised the question of the provinces. They wished that lots should be cast for Italy and Africa, both of them being eager to have Africa.[3] But chiefly owing to the efforts of Quintus Metellus[4] Africa was not refused nor yet given them. The consuls were instructed to arrange with the tribunes of the plebs that, with their approval, they should bring before the people the question whom they wished for the conduct of the war in Africa. All the tribes voted for Publius Scipio.[5] In spite of that the consuls cast lots for Africa as a [4] Cf. xxiii. 3.

[5] This of course settled any controversy as to the term of his command, until contention was renewed a year later. Cf. p. 518, § 12, where the province of one consul for 201 B.C. is defined as command of the fleet, while the other was to have Italy.

A.U.C. 552

ciam Africam—ita enim senatus decreverat—in sortem coniecerunt. Ti. Claudio Africa evenit, ut quinquaginta navium classem, omnes quinqueremes, in Africam traiceret parique imperio cum P. Scipione imperator[1] esset; M. Servilius Etruriam sortitus. In eadem provincia et C. Servilio prorogatum imperium, si consulem manere[2] ad urbem senatui[3] placuisset. Praetores M. Sextius Galliam est sortitus, ut duas legiones provinciamque traderet ei P. Quinctilius Varus; C. Livius Bruttios cum duabus legionibus quibus P. Sempronius proconsul priore anno[4] praefuerat; Cn. Tremelius Siciliam, ut a P. Villio Tappulo praetore prioris anni provinciam et duas legiones acciperet; Villius pro praetore viginti navibus longis, militibus[5] mille oram Siciliae tutaretur; M. Pomponius viginti navibus reliquis mille et quingentos milites Romam deportaret; C. Aurelio Cottae urbana evenit. Ceteris ita uti quisque obtinebant provincias exercitusque prorogata imperia. Sedecim non amplius eo anno legionibus defensum

[1] imperator P(3)NJK Aldus, Froben: rejected by Crévier, Madvig: imperatore V Luchs, H. J. Müller, Johnson.

[2] manere P(3)N Aldus: remorari N²(alt.)VJK Froben 2.

[3] senatui A¹N²VJK Aldus, Froben, Conway: -tu Alschefski, Madvig: -tum P(3)N.

[4] priore anno VJK Froben 2: prioris anni P(3)N.

[5] militibus, before this A¹VJK add et, for which P has si: om. by P²(3)N Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] But not to command an army in addition to his fleet; probably not to sail over to Africa except in an emergency. In fact Claudius never reached African waters; xxxix. 3.

province, for so the senate had decreed. Africa fell B.C. 202 to Tiberius Claudius, with the provision that he should take a fleet of fifty ships, all of them quinqueremes, over to Africa, and that he should be commanding general with an authority equal to that of Scipio.[1] Marcus Servilius received Etruria by lot. In the same province Gaius Servilius' command was also continued, in case the senate decided that the consul should remain near the city. Of the praetors Marcus Sextius received Gaul by lot, with the understanding that Publius Quinctilius Varus should turn over to him the two legions with the province; Gaius Livius received the land of the Bruttii with the two legions which Publius Sempronius had commanded in the previous year as proconsul; Gnaeus Tremelius was allotted Sicily, to take over the province from Publius Villius Tappulus, praetor of the previous year, and the two legions. Villius as propraetor was to defend the coast of Sicily with twenty war-ships and a thousand soldiers. Marcus Pomponius with the remaining twenty ships was to transport fifteen hundred soldiers back to Rome. The city praetorship fell to Gaius Aurelius Cotta. For the rest of the praetors[2] their commands were continued just as they then held their several provinces and armies. With no more than sixteen legions[3] the empire was

[2] I.e. Lucretius at Genua, in Sardinia Publius Lentulus, in Spain Lucius Lentulus and Manlius Acidinus (these two as proconsuls); cf. i. 9 f.; ii. 7; XXIX. xiii. 7.

[3] Compared with 20 in the previous year; ii. 7. The maximum had been 25 in 212–211 B.C. In the first year of the war (218 B.C.) the number was only 6. The average number in the next three years was 12·7; in following eight years, 22·5 (214–207 B.C.); in the last six years, 17·8 (206–201 B.C.). Cf. De Sanctis' table, p. 633; C.A.H. VIII. 104.

A.U.C. 552

11 imperium est. Et ut placatis dis omnia inciperent agerentque, ludos quos M. Claudio Marcello, T. Quinctio consulibus T. Manlius dictator quasque hostias maiores voverat, si per quinquennium [1] res publica eodem statu fuisset, ut eos ludos consules, priusquam ad bellum proficiscerentur, facerent. 12 Ludi in circo per quadriduum facti hostiaeque quibus votae erant dis caesae.

XXVIII. Inter haec simul spes simul cura in dies crescebat, nec satis certum constare apud animos [2] poterat utrum gaudio dignius [3] esset Hannibalem post sextum decimum annum ex Italia decedentem vacuam possessionem eius reliquisse populo Romano, an magis metuendum quod incolumi exercitu in 2 Africam transisset: locum nimirum, non periculum mutatum; cuius tantae dimicationis vatem, qui nuper decessisset, Q. Fabium haud frustra canere solitum graviorem in sua terra futurum hostem Hannibalem 3 quam in aliena fuisset. Nec Scipioni aut cum Syphace, inconditae barbariae rege, cui Statorius semilixa ducere [4] exercitus solitus sit, aut cum socero eius Hasdrubale, fugacissimo duce, rem futuram aut cum [5] tumultuariis exercitibus ex agrestium semermi turba

[1] quinquennium, AN Aldus, Froben add illud.
[2] animos A¹VJK Froben 2: -mum P(3)N Aldus.
[3] dignius V Froben 2: dignum P(3)NJK Aldus.
[4] ducere PCVJK: ad- BAN: docere conj. Putsche, Luchs.
[5] cum Riemann, Conway: om. P(3)NVJK.

[1] Cf. p. 373, n. 1.

defended that year. And that they might begin B.C. 202 everything and carry it on with the favour of the gods, inasmuch as in the consulship of Marcus Claudius Marcellus and Titus Quinctius the dictator Titus Manlius had vowed games [1] and full-grown victims if the state should remain for four years as it was before, it was ordered that the consuls should celebrate those games before they set out for the war. The games were celebrated in the Circus for four days, and victims were sacrificed to the gods to whom they had been vowed.

XXVIII. Meanwhile hope and anxiety alike were increasing from day to day, and men could not quite make up their minds whether it was a fit subject for rejoicing that Hannibal, retiring from Italy after sixteen years, had left the Roman people free to take possession [2] of it, and not rather a ground for apprehension that he had crossed over to Africa with his army intact. The place doubtless had been changed, they thought, not the danger. Foretelling that mighty conflict Quintus Fabius, recently deceased, had often predicted, not without reason, that in his own land Hannibal would be a more terrible enemy than in a foreign country. And Scipio would have to deal neither with Syphax, king of a land of untrained barbarians, for whom Statorius,[3] who was little more than a sutler, commonly commanded his armies, nor with the father-in-law of Syphax, Hasdrubal, a general very swift in flight, nor with irregular armies suddenly raised from a half-armed mob of rustics. Rather

[2] I.e. to recover that title to Italian soil which Hannibal had in a way acquired by occupying it for more years than were needed to acquire a title by usucapio. Cf. XXII. xliv. 6.
[3] Cf. XXIV. xlviii. 9, 11 f.

A.U.C. 552

4 subito conlectis, sed cum Hannibale, prope nato in praetorio patris, fortissimi ducis, alito atque educato inter arma, puero quondam milite, vixdum iuvene 5 imperatore, qui senex vincendo factus Hispanias, Gallias, Italiam ab Alpibus ad fretum monumentis ingentium rerum complesset. Ducere[1] exercitum aequalem stipendiis suis, duratum omnium rerum patientia quas vix fides fiat homines passos, perfusum miliens cruore Romano, exuvias non militum tantum,[2] 6 sed etiam imperatorum portantem. Multos occursuros Scipioni in acie qui praetores, qui imperatores,[3] qui consules Romanos sua manu[4] occidissent, muralibus vallaribusque insignes coronis, pervagatos 7 capta castra, captas urbes Romanas. Non esse hodie tot fasces magistratibus populi Romani, quot captos ex caede imperatorum prae se ferre posset Hannibal. 8 Has formidines agitando animis ipsi curas et metus augebant, etiam quod, cum adsuessent per aliquot annos bellum ante oculos aliis atque aliis in Italiae partibus lenta spe in nullum propinquum debellandi finem gerere, erexerant omnium animos Scipio et Hannibal, velut ad supremum certamen comparati

[1] Ducere $P(3)NVJK$: duceret Gronovius : ducente Allen.
[2] tantum $PCBVJK$: modo AN Aldus, Froben.
[3] qui imperatores $P(3)N$ Aldus : om. VJK Froben 2.
[4] sua manu $P(3)N$ Aldus, Froben : manu sua VJK.

[1] Cf. XXI. xliii. 15.

[2] Slightly exaggerated, as in xxx. 10, but for the sake of a climax. He was only 45 (senior strictly, rather than senex); xxxvii. 9; over 45 says Polybius, XV. xix. 3.

[3] For the corona muralis cf. Vol. VI. p. 60, n. 2; XXVI. xlviii. 5. The corona vallaris (or castrensis) represented earthworks of a camp. Cf. X. xlvi. 3; Gellius V. vi. 16 f.

would he have to do with Hannibal, who had been B.C. 202 born, one might almost say, at the headquarters of his father, the bravest of generals, had been reared and brought up in the midst of arms;[1] who even in boyhood was a soldier, in earliest manhood a general; who, ageing[2] as a victor, had filled the Spanish and Gallic lands and Italy from the Alps to the Straits with the evidence of his mighty deeds. He was in command of an army whose campaigns equalled his own in number; was toughened by enduring such hardships as one could scarcely believe human beings had endured; had been spattered with Roman blood a thousand times and carried the spoils, not of soldiers only but also of generals. Many men who would encounter Scipio in battle had with their own hands slain Roman praetors, generals-in-command, consuls; had been decorated with crowns for bravery in scaling city-walls and camp defences;[3] had wandered through captured camps, captured cities of the Romans. All the magistrates of the Roman people did not at that time have so many fasces as Hannibal was able to have borne before him, having captured them from fallen generals.[4]

By brooding over such terrifying thoughts men were adding to their own anxieties and fears, for another reason too: whereas year after year it had been their habit to carry on a war before their eyes in one part and then in another of Italy, with hope deferred and looking to no immediate end of the conflict, all men's interest was now intensified by Scipio and Hannibal, as it were, pitted against each

[4] Coelius pretended to know the exact number of fasces captured by Hannibal, viz. 72; Nonius X. p. 818 L.

A.U.C. 552

9 duces. Eis quoque quibus erat ingens in Scipione fiducia et victoriae spes, quo magis in propinquam eam imminebant animis, eo curae intentiores erant.[1] 10 Haud dispar habitus animorum Carthaginiensibus erat, quos modo petisse pacem, intuentes Hannibalem ac rerum gestarum eius magnitudinem, paenitebat, 11 modo, cum respicerent bis sese acie victos, Syphacem captum, pulsos se Hispania, pulsos Italia, atque ea omnia unius virtute et consilio Scipionis facta, velut fatalem eum ducem in exitium suum natum horrebant.

XXIX. Iam Hadrumetum pervenerat[2] Hannibal; unde, ad reficiendum ex iactatione maritima militem paucis diebus sumptis, excitus pavidis nuntiis omnia circa Carthaginem obtineri armis adferentium, magnis 2 itineribus Zamam contendit. Zama quinque dierum

[1] erant A^1N^1VJK and so (but with intentioris) Aldus, Froben : om. $P(3)N$: volvebant Weissenborn (with curas) found in $P(3)N$: agebant Madvig, Riemann (with curas).

[2] pervenerat VJK Aldus, Froben : venerat $P(3)N$.

---

[1] One defeat was obviously that on the Campi Magni; viii. 3–9; the other may be that of Hanno's cavalry in XXIX. xxxiv. 8–17. The surprise attack on two camps (v. 7–vi. 9) made no use of an acies.

[2] A Tyrian colony and the most important town in the region, now Sousse, 20 miles north-west of Leptis Minor (Lemta), where Hannibal had landed. But he immediately established his winter camp at Hadrumetum. Polybius cannot have failed to give the time and place of Hannibal's landing in lost chapters from the beginning of Book XV.; for he is in Africa already at iii. 5, if not at i. 10 f. It was now autumn, 203 B.C. He would not have risked a winter passage. Cf. De Sanctis 545 ff., 586 f.; Scullard 326 f.

[3] If we could follow Livy here we should place the final battle within an incredibly short time after Hannibal's landing. That this was the case no one can believe after comparing the other for the final combat. Even in the case of those B.C. 202 who had great confidence in Scipio and high hope of victory, the more their minds were bent upon immediate victory the more intense were their anxieties. Not unlike were the feelings of the Carthaginians, who at one moment, when they thought of Hannibal and the greatness of his achievements, regretted having sued for peace, at another moment, on reflecting that they had been twice defeated in battle,[1] that Syphax had been captured, that they had been driven out of Spain, driven out of Italy, and all this accomplished by the courage and strategy of Scipio alone, they dreaded him as a predestined commander, born to work their destruction.

XXIX. By this time Hannibal had reached Hadrumetum.[2] From there, after he had spent a few days that his soldiers might recuperate from sea-sickness, he was called away by alarming news brought by men who reported that all the country round Carthage was occupied by armed forces, and he hastened[3] to Zama by forced marches. Zama[4] passage Livy must have had before him, or tried to recall, as he wrote our sentence. For Polybius' "after a few days" (v. 3) makes no connection with the landing, but merely with the receipt of an urgent message from Carthage. That may have come to him many months—even a year—after disembarkation. Hannibal would be the last to shorten the long preparation indispensable to the making of an army out of his heterogeneous forces.

[4] Probably Zama Regia, ca. 90 m.p. due west of Hadrumetum (Sousse). An old Numidian city, it is now Seba Biar, on the edge of a plain just west of the long dorsal ridge extending from Cap Bon south-west some distance beyond Kasserine and Tebessa. Lying north of Maktar this city was a residence of Jugurtha (Sallust 56–61); strongly fortified by King Juba I.; Bell. Afr. 91 f., 97 (Caesar leaves Sallust iter ab Carthagine abest. Inde praemissi speculatores cum excepti ab custodibus Romanis deducti ad Scipionem essent, traditos eos tribuno[1] militum, iussosque omisso metu visere omnia, per castra qua 3 vellent circumduci iussit; percunctatusque satin[2] per commodum[3] omnia explorassent, datis qui 4 prosequerentur, retro ad Hannibalem dimisit. Hannibal nihil quidem eorum quae nuntiabantur—nam et Masinissam cum sex milibus peditum, quattuor equitum venisse eo ipso forte die adferebant—, laeto animo audivit,[4] maxime hostis fiducia, quae[5] non de nihilo profecto concepta esset, perculsus.[6] 5 Itaque quamquam et ipse causa belli erat et adventu suo turbaverat et pactas indutias et spem foederum, tamen, si integer quam si victus peteret pacem, aequiora[7] impetrari posse ratus, nuntium ad Scipionem misit, ut conloquendi secum potestatem faceret. 6 Id utrum sua sponte fecerit an publico consilio, 7 neutrum cur adfirmem habeo. Valerius Antias

A.U.C. 552

[1] tribuno A'VJK (cf. Polyb. XV. v. 5) : -nis P(3)N Alllus, Froben.

[2] satin A'JK Alllus, Froben : satin si V : statim P(3)N : statim si N'.

[3] per commodum P(3)NV : -mode N'JK Alllus, Froben.

[4] audivit VJK Alllus, Froben : audit P(3)N.

[5] fiducia, quae Alllus, Froben, Gronovius, Conway : -ciaque P(3)NVJK (P(3)N having si before hostis) : fiducia audaciaque Weissenborn, Madvig.

[6] esset, perculsus Gronovius, Conway : est perculsus VJK Alllus, Froben : percussus est P(3)N Weissenborn, Madvig : perculsus est C[5]A' Luchs.

[7] aequiora P(3)N Alllus : -orem A'VJK Froben 2.

---

there as proconsul); Vitruvius VIII. iii. 24. Captured by Sextius in 41 B.C. (Dio Cass. XLVIII. xxiii. 4), it long lay desolate (Strabo XVII. iii. 9, 12). Absence of ruins from is distant five day's marches from Carthage. Scouts B.C. 202 who had been sent in advance from that position were captured and brought before Scipio by their Roman guards. Thereupon he turned them over to a tribune of the soldiers, and bidding them go and see everything without fear, he ordered them to be led about the camp wherever they wished to go; and after questioning them as to whether they had examined everything quite at their leisure, he sent them back to Hannibal, furnishing men to escort them.[1] Hannibal did not indeed hear with joy any of the reports of his scouts, for they reported that Masinissa had also arrived that very day, as it happened, with six thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry. But he was particularly dismayed by the enemy's confidence, which surely seemed to be not without foundation. Consequently, although he was himself at once the cause of the war and by his coming the breaker of a truce already arranged and of a prospective treaty as well, nevertheless, thinking that fairer terms could be obtained if he should sue for peace while his army was intact, rather than after defeat, he sent a messenger to Scipio, requesting that he grant the privilege of a conference with him. Whether he did so on his own responsibility or that of the state, I have no means of deciding either this way or that. Valerius Antias[2] relates the Empire shows that the city was not rebuilt. Polybius plainly indicates that the battle was considerably farther inland than Hannibal's first position at Zama (v. 14; vi. 2). Cf. p. 472, n. 1. For modern works and the controverted questions see Appendix.

[1] The story of the scouts is from Polybius XV. v. 4–7, as also the following figures for Masinissa's forces (§ 12).

[2] Cf. xix. 11.

A.U.C. 552

primo proelio victum eum ab Scipione, quo duodecim milia armatorum in acie sint [1] caesa, mille et septingenti capti, legatum cum aliis decem legatis tradit in castra ad Scipionem venisse.

8 Ceterum Scipio cum conloquium haud abnuisset, ambo ex composito duces castra protulerunt, ut 9 coire ex propinquo possent. Scipio haud procul Naraggara [2] urbe, cum ad cetera loco opportuno tum quod aquatio intra teli coniectum erat, consedit. 10 Hannibal tumulum a quattuor milibus inde, tutum commodumque alioqui, nisi quod longinquae aquationis erat, cepit. Ibi in medio locus conspectus undique, ne quid insidiarum esset, delectus.

XXX. Summotis pari [3] spatio armatis, cum singulis interpretibus congressi sunt, non suae modo aetatis maximi duces, sed omnis ante se memoriae, omnium 2 gentium cuilibet regum imperatorumve pares. Paulisper alter alterius conspectu, admiratione mutua prope attoniti, conticuere. Tum Hannibal prior: 3 "Si hoc ita fato datum erat, ut qui primus bellum intuli populo Romano quique totiens prope in manibus victoriam habui, is ultro ad pacem petendam venirem, laetor te mihi sorte [4] potissimum datum a quo pete- 4 rem. Tibi quoque inter multa egregia non in ultimis

[1] sint VJK : sunt P(3)N.

[2] Naraggara P(3)N ; naggara N^1; narcara VJK : (Μάργαρον Polybius XV. v. 14).

[3] pari $A^{pr}VJK$ Aldus, Froben : par in P(3)N (with spatium BA$\bar{N}$).

[4] sorte P(3)N Aldus : om. VJK Froben 2.

[1] Polybius' name for the place is Margaron, occurring nowhere else. It is accordingly altered by his editors to correspond with the better class of Livy MSS.—a bold correction, it must be admitted. The site of Naraggara is thought to be occupied by Sidi Youssef, on the boundary between Tunisia that he was defeated by Scipio in their first engage- B.C. 202

ment, in which twelve thousand soldiers were slain in battle and seventeen hundred captured; and that as an envoy with ten other envoys Hannibal came to Scipio in his camp.

To resume, once Scipio had assented to the conference, both generals by agreement advanced the position of their camps, so that their meeting might be at a short distance. Scipio established himself not far from the city of Naraggara,[1] in a situation otherwise favourable, but particularly because water was to be had within the range of a javelin. Hannibal occupied a hill four miles away, safe and convenient otherwise, except that one had to go far for water. Half-way between them a spot was chosen which was visible from all sides, that there might be no ambuscades.

XXX. Keeping their armed men at the same distance the generals, each attended by one interpreter, met, being not only the greatest of their own age, but equal to any of the kings or commanders of all nations in all history before their time. For a moment they remained silent, looking at each other and almost dumbfounded by mutual admiration. Then Hannibal was the first to speak: "If it was foreordained by fate that I, who was the first to make war upon the Roman people and who have so often had the victory almost in my grasp, should come forward to sue for peace, I rejoice that destiny has given me you, and no one else, to whom I should bring my suit. For you also, among your many distinctions, it will prove not the least of your honours and Algeria. It was ca. 52 Roman miles west of Zama Regia. Cf. Appendix, esp. p. 547.

A.U.C. 552

laudum hoc fuerit, Hannibalem, cui tot de Romanis ducibus victoriam di dedissent, tibi cessisse, teque huic bello, vestris prius [1] quam nostris cladibus insigni, finem imposuisse. Hoc quoque ludibrium casus ediderit fortuna,[2] ut, cum patre tuo consule ceperim arma, cum eodem primum Romano imperatore signa contulerim, ad filium eius inermis ad pacem petendam veniam. Optimum quidem fuerat eam patribus nostris mentem datam ab dis esse ut et vos Italiae et nos Africae imperio contenti essemus; neque enim ne vobis quidem Sicilia ac Sardinia satis digna pretia sunt pro tot classibus, tot exercitibus, tot tam egregiis amissis ducibus. Sed praeterita magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi. Ita aliena adpetivimus ut de nostris dimicaremus, nec in Italia solum nobis bellum, vobis [3] in Africa esset, sed et vos in portis vestris prope ac moenibus signa armaque hostium vidistis et nos ab Carthagine fremitum castrorum Romanorum exaudimus. Quod igitur nos maxime abominaremur,[4] vos ante omnia optaretis,[5] in meliore vestra fortuna de pace agitur. Agimus ei quorum et maxime interest pacem esse, et qui quodcumque egerimus, ratum civitates nostrae habiturae sunt. Animo tantum nobis opus est non abhorrente a quietis consiliis.

"Quod ad me attinet, iam aetas senem in patriam revertentem, unde puer profectus sum, iam secundae,

[1] prius VJK Froben 2 : plus P(3)N Aldus.

[2] fortuna, A[1]N[1]VJK Froben 2 have fortunae casus ediderit, for which Aldus reads fortuna an casus ediderit.

[3] nobis bellum, vobis Elsperger, recent Eds., Conway : vobis bellum nobis A[1]NVJ Froben, Eds., Weissenborn : vobis PCAN : nobis B.

[4] abominaremur A[1]N[1]VJK : -namur PCBAN.

[5] optaretis P(3)N : optare debetis Madvig, Emend.

that Hannibal, to whom the gods have given the B.C. 202 victory over so many Roman generals, has submitted to you, and that you have made an end of this war, which was memorable at first for your disasters and then for ours. This also may prove to be Fortune's mocking sport, that having taken up arms when your father was consul, and having fought with him my first battle with a Roman general, I come to his son unarmed to sue for peace. It would indeed have been best if the gods had given our fathers the disposition to be contented, you with rule over Italy and us in turn with ruling Africa.[1] For even for you Sicily and Sardinia have been no adequate compensation for the loss of so many fleets, so many armies, so many remarkable generals. But the past is sooner disapproved than changed for the better. In grasping at what was not ours we fell to fighting for our own; and for us Carthaginians it came to be a war not in Italy alone, nor for you entirely in Africa. On the contrary you have seen the enemy's standards and arms almost at your gates and walls, just as we can hear from Carthage the noise of a Roman camp. Consequently we discuss terms of peace while Fortune is favouring you—a situation most ominous for us, while you could pray for nothing better. We who are treating have the most to gain by peace, and furthermore, whatever terms we are to make our states will ratify. We need only a temper not averse to measures calmly considered.

"As for myself, age has at last taught me, returning as an old man to my native city, from [1] With this thought begins the speech in Polybius vi. 4. What precedes in Livy is his exordium, designed to produce a favourable impression according to rhetorical rule.

A.U.C. 552

iam adversae res ita erudierunt ut rationem sequi
11 quam fortunam malim; tuam et adulescentiam et perpetuam felicitatem, ferociora utraque quam quietis opus est consiliis, metuo. Non temere incerta casuum reputat quem fortuna numquam decepit.[1]
12 Quod ego fui ad Trasumennum, ad Cannas, id tu hodie es.[2] Vixdum militari aetate imperio accepto omnia audacissime incipientem nusquam[3] fefellit
13 fortuna. Patris et patrui persecutus mortem ex calamitate vestrae domus decus insigne virtutis pietatisque eximiae cepisti; amissas Hispanias reciperasti quattuor inde Punicis exercitibus pulsis;
14 consul creatus, cum[4] ceteris ad tutandam Italiam parum animi esset, transgressus in Africam, duobus hic exercitibus caesis, binis eadem hora captis simul incensisque castris, Syphace potentissimo rege capto, tot urbibus regni eius, tot nostri imperii ereptis, me sextum decimum iam annum haerentem in posses-
15 sione Italiae detraxisti. Potest victoriam malle quam pacem animus. Novi spiritus magnos magis quam utiles; et mihi talis aliquando fortuna adfulsit.
16 Quodsi in secundis rebus bonam quoque mentem darent dei, non ea solum quae evenissent, sed etiam ea quae evenire possent reputaremus. Ut omnium obliviscaris aliorum, satis ego documenti in omnes
17 casus sum, quem, modo castris inter Anienem atque urbem vestram positis signa inferentem ac iam prope

[1] decepit A'N'VJK Aldus, Froben: decipit P(3)N.
[2] es A'N'VJK Aldus, Froben: om. P(3)N.
[3] nusquam P(3)N: nunquam N'VJK.
[4] cum, after this word P is lost to us up to xxxvii. 3.

[1] Similar is Polybius vii. 1. [2] Cf. XXVI. xix. 9.
[3] In 211 B.C.; three miles from the city; XXVI. x. 3.

which I set out as a boy, success and failure have at last so schooled me that I prefer to follow reason rather than chance. In your case I am apprehensive alike of your youth and of your unbroken success, both of them too refractory for the demands of calmly considered measures. It is not easy for a man whom fortune has never deceived to weigh uncertain chances.[1] What I was at Trasumennus, at Cannae, that you are today. Although you had received a command when hardly of an age to serve,[2] and undertook everything with the greatest boldness, nowhere has fortune deluded you. By avenging the death of your father and uncle you won from the disaster to your family signal honour for courage and extraordinary devotion. You recovered the lost Spanish provinces by driving out of them four Punic armies. Elected consul, while the rest lacked courage to defend Italy, you crossed over to Africa; and by destroying two armies here, by taking and at the same time burning two camps in the same hour, by capturing Syphax, a most powerful king, by seizing so many cities of his kingdom, so many in our domain, you dragged me away when now for sixteen years I had clung to the possession of Italy. It is possible for the heart to prefer victory to a peace. I know those aspirations that soar but are ineffectual; on me too such fortune as yours once shone. But if in prosperity the gods blessed us with sound reason also, we should be reflecting not merely upon what has happened but also upon what can happen. Though you forget everything else, I am a sufficient warning against all that may chance. For it was I that, pitching my camp not long ago[3] between the Anio and your city, was advancing my standards

B.C. 202

A.U.C. 552

scandentem [1] moenia Romana,[2] hic cernas duobus fratribus, fortissimis viris, clarissimis imperatoribus orbatum ante moenia prope obsessae patriae quibus terrui vestram urbem, ea pro mea deprecantem.

18 "Maximae cuique fortunae minime credendum est. In bonis tuis rebus, nostris dubiis, tibi ampla [3] ac speciosa danti est pax, nobis petentibus magis
19 necessaria quam honesta. Melior tutiorque est certa pax quam sperata victoria: haec in tua, illa in deorum manu est. Ne tot annorum felicitatem in unius horae 20 dederis discrimen. Cum tuas vires, tum vim Fortunae Martemque belli communem propone animo. Utrimque ferrum, utrimque [4] corpora humana erunt; nusquam minus quam in bello eventus respondent.
21 Non tantum ad id quod data pace iam habere potes, si proelio vincas,[5] gloriae adieceris, quantum dempseris,[6] si quid adversi eveniat. Simul parta ac sperata decora unius horae fortuna evertere potest.
22 Omnia in pace iungenda tuae potestatis sunt, P. Corneli; tunc ea habenda fortuna erit quam di 23 dederint. Inter pauca felicitatis virtutisque exempla M. Atilius quondam in hac eadem terra fuisset, si [7] victor pacem petentibus dedisset patribus nostris;

[1] ac iam (acie A¹VJK) prope scandentem A¹VJK Froben 2: om. CBDAN Aldus.

[2] Romana CBDANV: Romana videras A¹N¹JK Aldus, Froben (with videris Conway).

[3] tibi ampla A¹N¹VJK Eds.: iam apta CBDAN?

[4] ferrum, utrimque CA¹: ferrum N¹VJK Aldus, Froben: om. BDAN.

[5] vincas Aldus, Froben, Eds.: -ces D Conway: -cens CBA: -cis A¹N¹VJK: viceris x: vinceris N.

[6] dempseris Madvig, recent Eds.: ademeris Aldus, Froben: om. CBDANVJK.

[7] fuisset, si DVJK Froben 2: fuisse et si CB¹: fuisse fertur qui sic (si AN) AN Aldus.

and now almost scaling the walls of Rome. But here B.C. 202 bereft of my two brothers, the bravest of men, the most eminent of generals, you see me before the walls of my native city, already almost invested, and I am praying that she may be spared the terrors which I brought to yours.

"The greatest good fortune is always the least to be trusted. In your favourable circumstances, in our uncertain situation, peace, if you grant it, will bring you honour and glory;[1] for us who sue it is necessary rather than honourable. Better and safer is an assured peace than a victory hoped for. The one is in your own power, the other in the hands of the gods. Do not commit the success of so many years to the test of a single hour. Bear in mind not only your own resources but also the might of Fortune and the impartial god of war. On both sides will be the sword, on both sides human bodies. Nowhere less than in war do results match men's hopes. You will not add so much glory, if victorious in battle, to what you can now have by granting peace, as you will lose in case of any reverse.[2] The fortune of a single hour can lay low honours already won, and with them those in prospect. In making peace, Publius Cornelius, you have everything in your own power. In the other case you will have to bear the lot which the gods may give. Among the foremost examples of success and courage would have been Marcus Atilius[3] formerly in this same land, if as victor he had granted the peace which our fathers

[1] Cf. the closing words of Hannibal in Polybius vii. 9.

[2] The thought of Polybius vii. 6.

[3] Regulus had been used as an exemplum deterrens in a speech by Fabius in XXVIII. xlii. 1; cf. ibid. xliii. 17 in Scipio's reply.

A.U.C. 552

sed non statuendo felicitati modum nec cohibendo efferentem se fortunam, quanto altius elatus erat, eo foedius conruit.

24 "Est quidem eius qui dat, non qui petit, condiciones dicere pacis; sed forsitan non indigni simus qui 25 nobismet ipsi[1] multam inrogemus. Non recusamus quin omnia propter quae ad bellum itum[2] est vestra sint, Sicilia, Sardinia, Hispania, quidquid insularum toto inter Africam Italiamque continetur mari.
26 Carthaginienses inclusi Africae litoribus vos, quando ita dis placuit, externa etiam terra marique videamus
27 regentes imperio.[3] Haud negaverim propter non nimis sincere petitam aut exspectatam nuper pacem suspectam esse vobis Punicam fidem. Multum per quos petita sit ad fidem tuendae pacis pertinet, 28 Scipio. Vestri quoque, ut audio, patres non nihil etiam ob hoc, quia parum dignitatis in legatione
29 erat, negaverunt pacem: Hannibal peto pacem, qui neque peterem, nisi utilem crederem, et propter ean-30 dem utilitatem tuebor eam propter quam petii. Et quem ad modum, quia a me bellum coeptum est, ne quem eius paeniteret, quoad ipsi invidere dei, praestiti, ita adnitar ne quem pacis per me partae paeniteat."

XXXI. Adversus haec imperator Romanus in

[1] ipsi CBD: ipsis ANVJK Aldus, Froben.
[2] itum CBDNVJK: initum (om. ad) AN Aldus, Froben.
[3] imperio Madvig, Eds.: -ia CBDANVJK.

---

[1] Sicily had been lost by Carthage in the peace of 241 B.C., Sardinia three years later. Unsuccessful attempts to recover them in the present war, however, justify mention of both here.

requested. But by setting no limit to his success B.C. 20- and not reining in an unruly fortune, the higher he had climbed the more terribly did he fall.

"It belongs, to be sure, to the giver of peace, not to the suitor, to name the terms. But possibly we may not be unworthy to impose a penalty upon ourselves. We do not reject the condition that all the possessions for which we went to war shall be yours—Sicily, Sardinia,[1] Spain, and any islands existing in all the sea between Africa and Italy. Let us Carthaginians, confined by the coasts of Africa, behold you ruling under your authority even foreign countries by land and sea,[2] since that has been the will of the gods. I would not deny that, on account of a lack of sincerity in our recent suit for peace, and because we did not wait for it, Punic honour for you Romans is now tainted with suspicion. For the faithful observance of a peace much depends, Scipio, on the persons by whom the suit is presented. Your senators also have refused the peace,[3] I hear, partly for the reason that the embassy was lacking in dignity. I, Hannibal, am suing for peace, I who should not be so doing if I did not think it an advantageous peace; and I shall uphold it because of the same advantage on account of which I have sued for it. And just as I, having begun the war, therefore made sure—until the gods themselves became envious—that no one should regret it, so will I strive to prevent any man from regretting the peace obtained through me."

XXXI. To these pleas the Roman general replied

[2] Nothing is said of Scipio's other demands in xvi. 10 ff., including a heavy indemnity.

[3] See p. 449 and n. 2.

A.U.C. 552

hanc fere sententiam respondit: "Non me fallebat, Hannibal, adventus [1] tui spe Carthaginienses et praesentem indutiarum fidem et spem pacis turbasse; 2 neque tu id sane dissimulas, qui de condicionibus superioribus [2] pacis omnia subtrahas praeter ea quae iam 3 pridem in nostra potestate sunt. Ceterum ut [3] tibi curae est sentire cives tuos quanto per te onere leventur, sic mihi laborandum est ne [4] quae tum [5] pepigerunt hodie subtracta ex condicionibus pacis 4 praemia perfidiae habeant. Indigni quibus eadem pateat condicio, etiam ut prosit vobis fraus petitis. Neque patres nostri priores de Sicilia, neque nos de Hispania fecimus bellum; et tunc [6] Mamertinorum sociorum periculum et nunc Sagunti excidium nobis 5 pia ac iusta induerunt arma. Vos lacessisse et tu ipse fateris et dei testes sunt, qui et illius belli exitum secundum ius fasque dederunt et huius dant et dabunt.

6 "Quod ad me attinet, et humanae infirmitatis memini et vim Fortunae reputo et omnia quaecumque 7 agimus subiecta esse mille casibus scio; ceterum, quem ad modum superbe et violenter me faterer facere, si, priusquam in Africam traiecissem, te tua voluntate cedentem Italia et inposito in naves exercitu ipsum venientem ad pacem petendam 8 aspernarer, sic nunc, cum prope manu conserta [7]

[1] adventus A¹N¹VJK Aldus, Froben, Eds.: avere (habere CDAN) adventus CBDAN: ab adventus Alschefski: aura adventus conj. Madvig.

[2] superioribus CBDAN Aldus, Froben, Eds.: superioris N¹VJK ("perhaps correct" Conway).

[3] ut CBDVJK: sicut AN Aldus, Froben.

[4] ne Aldus, Froben: ne si CBDANVJK.

[5] tum CBDAN: tunc N² or N¹VJK Aldus, Froben.

[6] tunc N¹VJK Froben 2: tum CBDAN Aldus.

[7] conserta z: -tum (supine) CBDANVJK.

somewhat to this effect: "I was not unaware, B.C. 202
Hannibal, that the Carthaginians, anticipating your arrival, showed no respect either for present obligations to the armistice or for the peace in prospect; and you surely make no concealment of that fact when you omit from the earlier terms of peace everything except what has long been in our possession.[1] But just as you are concerned to have your citizens appreciate how great is the burden of which they are relieved by you, so I must exert myself that they do not have as the reward of perfidy any relaxation of the terms of peace to which they at that time agreed. Unworthy to have the same terms open to you as before, you Carthaginians are asking to have your dishonesty profit you. Our fathers were not aggressors in making war for Sicily; no more were we for Spain. In the former case the peril of our allies, the Mamertines, as in the latter instance the destruction of Saguntum, armed us with the weapons of duty and justice. That your people were the aggressors you yourself admit, and the gods as well are our witnesses, who gave for that war and are giving and will give for this one an outcome in accordance with justice and the right.

"So far as I am concerned, I am mindful of human weakness, and I reflect upon the might of Fortune and know that everything that we do is exposed to a thousand chances. But, just as I should admit that I were acting with arrogance and violence if, before I had crossed over to Africa, I were to reject you when you were voluntarily withdrawing from Italy and, while your army was already on shipboard, you were coming in person to sue for peace, so now,

[1] Cf. xvi. 10.

A.U.C. 552

restitantem ac tergiversantem in Africam adtraxerim,[1] nulla sum tibi verecundia obstrictus.
9 Proinde si quid ad ea in quae tum pax conventura videbatur, quasi [2] multa navium cum commeatu per indutias expugnatarum [3] legatorumque violatorum, adicitur, est quod referam ad consilium; sin illa quoque gravia videntur, bellum parate, quoniam pacem pati non potuistis."
10 Ita infecta pace ex conloquio ad suos cum se recepissent, frustra verba iactata [4] renuntiant: armis decernendum esse habendamque eam fortunam quam dei dedissent. XXXII. In castra ut est ventum, pronuntiant ambo arma expedirent milites animosque ad supremum certamen, non in unum diem sed in per-
2 petuum, si felicitas adesset, victores. Roma an Carthago iura gentibus daret ante crastinam noctem scituros; neque enim Africam aut Italiam, sed orbem terrarum victoriae praemium fore; par periculum praemio quibus adversa [5] pugnae fortuna fuisset.
3 Nam neque Romanis effugium ullum patebat in aliena ignotaque terra, et Carthagini, supremo [6] auxilio effuso, adesse videbatur praesens excidium.

[1] adtraxerim (or at-) CBDAN Aldus, Froben: traduxerim $N^{1}VJK$ Froben 2.

[2] quasi A^{5} conj. Gronovius, Eds.: quae si CBA?: que si A?N: quae sit Alschefski: que sunt $A^{1}VJK$: si D.

[3] expugnatarum BDAN Aldus, Froben, Eds.: -gnarum C: oppugnatarum (or ob-) $A^{1}VJK$ Riemann.

[4] iactata Gronovius, many Eds.: temptata x Conway: praelata Alschefski: praecata (prec-) BD: p̄cata CN?: pcata A: pacata $A^{1}N^{1}VJK$ Aldus, Froben.

[5] adversa K J.Perizonius, Eds.: adversae CBDANVJ Aldus, Froben.

[6] -que . . . supremo om. CBDAN (evidently P had om. two lines of the archetype): supplied from $A^{1}N^{1}VJK$.

when I have dragged you to Africa, resisting and shifting ground as we almost came to blows, I am under no obligation to respect you. Therefore, if to the terms upon which peace was formerly about to be made,[1] as it seemed, you are adding some kind of compensation for the ships loaded with supplies that were taken by force during the armistice, and for violence done to my envoys, I have reason to bring it before the council. But if that addition also seems too severe, prepare for war, since you have been unable to endure a peace." B.C. 202

Accordingly without making peace they returned from the conference to their armies, reporting that words had been of no avail; that arms must decide the issue and they must accept whatever lot the gods should give them. XXXII. Arrived at their camps, they both ordered their soldiers to have arms and their spirits in readiness for the final conflict to make them victors, if success attended them, not for one day but forever. Whether Rome or Carthage should give laws to the nations they would know the next day before nightfall. For not Africa, they said, or Italy but the whole world would be the reward of victory [2]—a reward matched by the danger for those whom the fortune of battle should not favour. In fact the Romans had no way of escape open in a foreign and an unknown land,[3] and for Carthage, once it had poured out its last resources, immediate destruction seemed impending.

[1] Cf. xxx. 28.

[2] So Polybius ix. 5 and again x. 2, in a later speech of Scipio to his troops. The suspense of a great historical moment deeply impressed both historians. Cf. §§ 4 f.

[3] This statement added by Livy reflects what Scipio says to his men in Polybius x. 4. Cf. Appian Pun. 42 fin.

A.U.C. 552

4 Ad hoc discrimen procedunt postero die duorum opulentissimorum populorum duo longe clarissimi duces, duo fortissimi exercitus, multa ante parta 5 decora aut cumulaturi eo die aut eversuri. Anceps igitur spes et metus miscebant animos; contemplantibusque modo suam modo hostium aciem, cum [1] oculis magis quam ratione pensarent vires, simul laeta, simul tristia obversabantur. Quae ipsis sua sponte non succurrebant, ea duces admonendo atque 6 hortando subiciebant.[2] Poenus sedecim annorum in terra Italia [3] res gestas, tot duces Romanos, tot exercitus occidione occisos et sua cuique decora, ubi ad insignem alicuius pugnae memoria militem 7 venerat, referebat: Scipio Hispanias et recentia in Africa proelia et confessionem hostium, quod neque non petere pacem propter metum neque manere in ea 8 prae insita animis perfidia potuissent. Ad hoc conloquium Hannibalis in secreto habitum ac 9 liberum fingenti qua [4] volt flectit.[5] Ominatur, quibus quondam auspiciis patres eorum ad Aegates pugnaverint insulas, ea illis exeuntibus in aciem portendisse 10 deos. Adesse finem belli ac laboris; in manibus esse praedam Carthaginis, reditum domum in patriam ad

[1] cum CDANVJK Aldus, Froben, Conway: cum non Weissenborn, Madvig, most recent Eds.: cui B.
[2] subiciebant N[1]VJK: -iciunt AN Aldus, Froben.
[3] Italia, AN have italiam with intra for in terra.
[4] qua A[1]N[1]VJK Aldus, Froben: quae CBDAN.
[5] flectit, V Aldus, Froben have flecti.

[1] Even the month is much debated. Those who place the "battle of Zama" in the spring or early summer are unable to explain such delay in making the peace (spring of 201 B.C.). Against the summer is the heat of a Tunisian sun, both for European troops and African elephants in action. More probable is October. Cf. Appendix, pp. 551–554.

For this decision on the following day[1] two generals B.C. 202 far and away the most distinguished and two of the bravest armies of the two wealthiest nations went forth,[2] on that day either to crown the many distinctions heretofore won, or to bring them to naught. Consequently a wavering between hope and fear confused their spirits; and as they surveyed now their own battle-line, now that of the enemy, while weighing their strength more by the eye than by calculation, the bright side and at the same time the dark was before their minds. What did not occur to the men themselves of their own accord the generals would suggest in admonition and exhortation. The Carthaginian kept recalling to their minds the achievements of sixteen years in the land of Italy, so many Roman generals, so many armies wiped out completely, and brave deeds of individuals, whenever he came to a soldier distinguished in the record of some battle. Scipio would recall the Spanish provinces and recent battles in Africa and the enemy's admission, in that on account of fear they could but sue for peace, and yet had been unable to abide by the peace on account of their ingrained perfidy. Furthermore, as his conference with Hannibal had been in private and could be freely altered, he gave it the direction he desired. He divined that as the Carthaginians went out into battle-line, the gods had given them the same omens as when their fathers fought at the Aegates Islands. The end of the war and hardship was at hand, he said, the spoils of Carthage within reach, and the return home to their native city, to parents, children,

[2] At daybreak; Polybius ix. 2.

A.U.C. 552

11 parentes, liberos, coniuges penatesque deos. Celsus haec corpore voltuque ita laeto ut vicisse iam crederes dicebat.

Instruit deinde primos hastatos, post eos principes; triariis postremam aciem clausit. XXXIII. Non confertas autem cohortes ante sua quamque signa instruebat, sed manipulos aliquantum inter se distantes, ut esset spatium qua elephanti hostium
2 acti [1] nihil ordines turbarent. Laelium, cuius ante legati, eo anno quaestoris extra sortem ex senatus consulto opera utebatur, cum Italico equitatu ab sinistro cornu, Masinissam Numidasque ab dextro
3 opposuit. Vias patentes inter manipulos antesignanorum velitibus—ea tunc levis armatura erat—complevit, dato praecepto ut ad impetum elephantorum aut post directos [2] refugerent ordines aut in dextram laevamque discursu applicantes se antesignanis [3] viam qua inruerent in ancipitia tela beluis darent.

4 Hannibal ad terrorem primos [4] elephantos—octoginta autem erant, quot nulla umquam in acie
5 ante habuerat—instruxit, deinde auxilia Ligurum

[1] acti CBDAN: capti N1: rapti V: accepti JK Aldus, Froben.

[2] directos Alschefski, Eds.: in rectos CBDANVJK: rectos A[1]? Aldus, Froben.

[3] se antesignanis, for this CBDAN have signis.

[4] primos CBD Eds.: -mum ANVJK Aldus, Froben.

---

[1] This is confused. Polybius does not mention cohorts, but is merely using both of his terms for maniple in the same sentence, ix. 7; cf. pp. 62 f., n. 2. Novel was the formation with principes directly behind hastati, instead of behind the normal intervals between front line maniples. This was Scipio's device to reduce losses in the charge of the elephants.

wives and household gods. So erect did he stand B.C. 202 as he spoke these words, and with so happy a look on his face that one would have believed him already the victor.

Thereupon he drew up in the first line the hastati, behind them the principes, in the rear the triarii closing the formation. XXXIII. However, he did not form cohorts[1] in close contact, each in advance of its standards, but rather maniples at a considerable distance from each other, so that there should be an interval where the enemy's elephants might be driven through without breaking up the ranks. Laelius, whom he had previously had in his service as lieutenant, but in the present year as quaestor, assigned not by lot but by decree of the senate,[2] was posted with the Italic cavalry on the left wing, Masinissa and the Numidians on the right. The open passages between the maniples of the front line troops Scipio filled with velites,[3] the light-armed of that day, under orders that, upon the charge of the elephants, they should either flee behind the ranks in the line, or else dashing to right and left and closing up to the maniples in the van, should give the beasts an opening through which they might rush among missiles hurled from both sides.

Hannibal in order to create a panic drew up his elephants in front, and there were eighty of them, a number he had never before had in any battle. Next in order he placed the Ligurian and Gallic

[1] Cf. Frontinus Strat. II. iii. 16; E. Meyer, Kleine Schriften II. 206 f.

[2] A rare procedure. His election is passed over by both of our authorities.

[3] So Polybius §§ 9 f.; Frontinus l.c.

A.U.C. 552

Gallorumque Baliaribus Maurisque admixtis; in secunda acie Carthaginienses Afrosque et Macedonum
6 legionem; modico deinde intervallo relicto subsidiariam aciem Italicorum militum—Bruttii plerique erant, vi ac necessitate plures quam sua voluntate
7 decedentem ex Italia secuti—instruxit. Equitatum et ipse[1] circumdedit cornibus; dextrum Carthaginienses, sinistrum Numidae tenuerunt.
8 Varia adhortatio erat in exercitu inter tot homines, quibus non lingua, non mos, non lex, non arma, non vestitus habitusque, non causa militandi eadem esset.
9 Auxiliaribus et praesens et multiplicata ex praeda merces ostentatur; Galli proprio atque insito in Romanos odio accenduntur; Liguribus campi uberes Italiae deductis ex asperrimis montibus in spem
10 victoriae ostentantur: Mauros Numidasque Masinissae inpotenti futuro[2] dominatu terret; aliis aliae 11 spes ac metus iactantur. Carthaginiensibus moenia patriae, di penates, sepulcra maiorum, liberi cum parentibus coniugesque pavidae, aut excidium servitiumque aut imperium orbis terrarum, nihil aut in metum aut in spem medium, ostentatur.
12 Cum maxime haec imperator apud Carthaginienses, duces suarum gentium inter populares, pleraque per interpretes inter immixtos[3] alienigenis[4] agerent,

[1] ipse CBDA^{1}N : ipsum VJK Aldus, Froben : om. N^{5}.
[2] futuro NV Froben 2 : -ros CBDA^{1}JK Aldus.
[3] inter immixtos, for this JK Aldus, Froben have intermixtos.
[4] alienigenis CBDANV Aldus, Froben, Eds. : -generis JK : -genas Freinsheim, M. Müller.

[1] Cf. xxvi. 3. Not mentioned by Polybius, but by Frontinus; doubted or rejected by modern historians.
[2] More than a furlong in Polybius xi. 2.
[3] Cf. XXVIII. xii. 3 f. and note.

auxiliaries in combination with Balearic and Maure- B.C. 202 tanian troops; in the second line Carthaginians and Africans and the legion of Macedonians.[1] Then, leaving a moderate interval,[2] he drew up a reserve line of Italic soldiers, most of these Bruttians, more of whom had followed him under compulsion and of necessity than of their own consent as he retired from Italy. As for the cavalry, he also placed them on the wings; the Carthaginians held the right wing, the Numidians the left.

In an army made up of so many men who had no language, no custom, no law, no arms, no clothing and general appearance in common,[3] nor the same reason for serving, exhortation took various forms. To the auxiliaries was offered pay in cash and greatly increased by a share in the booty. The Gauls had their own inbred hatred of the Romans fanned into flame. Ligurians were offered as an incentive to victory the rich plains of Italy, once they were brought down from their rugged mountains. Mauretanians and Numidians were frightened by Hannibal with the prospect of Masinissa's tyrannical rule. To different nations different hopes and fears were displayed. The Carthaginians' attention was called to the walls of their city, to household gods, tombs of ancestors, children and parents and terror-stricken wives, to destruction and servitude on the one hand, on the other to rule over the world, to the absence of any ground between the extremes of fear and hope.

Just as the general was thus speaking among the Carthaginians, and the national leaders among their countrymen, mainly through interpreters, since foreigners were intermingled, trumpets and horns

A.U.C. 552

13 tubae cornuaque ab Romanis cecinerunt, tantusque clamor ortus ut elephanti in suos, sinistrum maxime cornu, verterentur,[1] Mauros ac Numidas. Addidit facile Masinissa perculsis terrorem nudavitque ab
14 ea parte aciem equestri auxilio. Paucae tamen bestiarum intrepidae [2] in hostem actae inter velitum ordines cum multis suis volneribus ingentem stragem
15 edebant. Resilientes enim ad manipulos velites, cum viam elephantis, ne obtererentur, fecissent, in ancipites ad ictum utrimque coniciebant hastas, nec
16 pila ab [3] antesignanis cessabant, donec undique incidentibus telis exacti ex Romana acie hi quoque in suos dextrum [4] cornu, ipsos Carthaginienses equites, in fugam verterunt. Laelius ut turbatos vidit hostes addidit perculsis terrorem.

XXXIV. Utrimque nudata equite erat Punica acies cum pedes concurrit, nec spe nec viribus iam par. Ad hoc dictu parva sed magna eadem in re gerenda momenta: [5] congruens clamor ab Romanis eoque maior et terribilior, dissonae illis, ut gentium
2 multarum discrepantibus linguis, voces; pugna Romana stabilis et suo et armorum pondere incum-

[1] verterentur CBDAN: con- V (cor-) JK Aldus: verterent Froben 2.

[2] intrepidae CBDAN Froben 2: trepide VJK: intrepide: Aldus.

[3] hastas, nec pila ab, these words and also an- of the next were probably omitted by P, as is shown by the same omission in CBDAN.

[4] suos dextrum VJK: suo dextro (or -ero) CBDAN Aldus, Froben.

[5] magna . . . momenta CBDANV (adding res A[a]J): magni . . . momenti res K Aldus, Froben, Madvig (om. res).

[1] The account of the battle should be compared throughout with that of Polybius XV. xii.–xvi. Cf. Frontinus II. iii.

sounded on the Roman side, and such shouts were raised that the elephants turned against their own men, especially against the left wing, the Mauretanians and Numidians.[1] Masinissa easily increased their panic and stripped that end of the line of its cavalry support. A few of the beasts, however, being fearlessly driven into the enemy, caused great losses among the ranks of the light-armed, though suffering many wounds themselves. For springing back to the maniples the light-armed made way for the elephants, to avoid being trampled down, and then would hurl their lances from both sides against the beasts doubly exposed to missiles. Nor was there any slackening in the javelins of the men in the front lines until these elephants also, driven out of the Roman line and into their own men by missiles showered upon them from all sides, put the right wing, even the Carthaginian cavalry, to flight. Laelius, on seeing the enemy in confusion, increased their panic. B.C. 202

XXXIV. On both sides the Punic battle-line had been stripped of its cavalry when the infantry clashed, now no longer matched either in their hopes or in their strength. In addition there were what seem small things to mention, but at the same time were highly important in the battle: a harmony in the shouting of the Romans, which consequently was greater in volume and more terrifying; on the other side discordant voices, as was natural from many nations with a confusion of tongues; for the Romans a battle of little movement, as they pressed on into the 16; Zonaras IX. xiv. 7 ff. Appian's narrative includes much fiction, with single combats in the epic manner; Pun. 45. Cf. Scullard 237 ff.; Veith 645 ff.; Kahrstedt 564 ff.; De Sanctis 552 ff., 604 ff.; C.A.H. VIII. 105 ff.

A.U.C. 552

bentium in hostem, concursatio et velocitas illinc 3 maior quam vis. Igitur primo impetu extemplo movere loco hostium aciem Romani. Ala deinde et umbonibus [1] pulsantes, in summotos gradu inlato, aliquantum spatii velut nullo resistente incessere, 4 urgentibus et novissimis primos ut semel motam aciem sensere, quod ipsum vim magnam ad pellendum 5 hostem addebat. Apud hostes auxiliares cedentes secunda acies, Afri et Carthaginienses, adeo non sustinebant ut contra etiam, ne resistentes pertina-citer primos [2] caedendo ad se perveniret hostis, 6 pedem referrent. Igitur auxiliares terga dant repente, et in suos versi partim refugere in secundam aciem, partim non recipientes caedere, ut et paulo 7 ante non adiuti et tunc exclusi. Et prope duo iam permixta proelia erant, cum Carthaginienses simul cum hostibus, simul cum suis cogerentur manus 8 conserere. Non tamen ita perculsos iratosque in aciem accepere, sed densatis ordinibus in cornua vacuumque circa campum extra proelium eiecere,[3] ne pavido [4] fuga volneribusque [5] milite sinceram et integram aciem miscerent.

[1] umbonibus A¹VJK Aldus, Froben: umboni CBDA: -one A^6.

[2] primos A¹VJK Aldus, Froben: primo CBDAN.

[3] eiecere N¹VJK Aldus, Froben: eicere CBDAN.

[4] pavido CBD: -dos ANVJK Aldus, Froben (with milites below, as have DANVJK).

[5] -que N Aldus, Froben, Madvig, Conway: om. CBDA: VJK have et before noun.

---

[1] Livy here departs from Polybius' statements (xiii. 1), which probably had already suffered a text corruption still remaining in our MSS. and some editions. If the enemy were at once dislodged there would seem to be no need of enemy by their own weight and that of their arms ; on B.C. 202 the other side repeated charges at high speed but with less power. Consequently by the first attack the Romans at once dislodged the enemy's line. Then beating them back with their shoulders and the bosses of their shields,[1] being now in close contact with men forced from their position, they made considerable progress, as no one offered any resistance, while as soon as they saw that the enemy's line had given way, even the rear line pressed upon the first, a circumstance which of itself gave them great force in repulsing the enemy. Among the enemy so far was their second line, the Africans and Carthaginians, from supporting the auxiliaries as they gave way, that on the contrary they even drew back for fear the enemy, by slaying the men of the first line if these stoutly resisted, should reach themselves. Accordingly the auxiliaries suddenly retreated and facing their own men, some found refuge in the second line, others, having been refused aid shortly before, and also admission now to the ranks, slashed at those who would not make place for them. And by this time there were almost two battles in one, since the Carthaginians were forced to engage with the enemy and at the same time with their own men. Nevertheless even so they did not admit the panic-stricken, angry men into the line, but closing up their ranks, they forced them out upon the wings and into the empty plain on this side and that outside of the battle, in order not to contaminate their own line, still intact and fresh, with soldiers alarmed by the flight and their wounds.

pushing, instead of continuing to use their weapons. Cf. Meyer l.c. 408 f.; De Sanctis 607.

A.U.C. 552

